So Abū Nuwās was allowed to leave. Some young fellows from Quraysh then sent for him. He said to them, "I will not drink." They said, "Even if you do not drink, entertain us with your conversation." So he accepted. As the cup was being passed among them, they said, "Didn't you once like it?" He answered, [963] "By God, there is no way for me to drink it!" And he recited:[800]

You two who go speaking reproof, reprove on!
I will not taste aged wine, except as a fragrance.
I was reproved on account of it by an imām whom I do not think it right to disobey.
So pass it to someone else,
for I am a boon companion only for conversation.
My share in the wine, when it is passed round, is to see it and smell the scent.
As for my approving of it,
I am like a Qaʿadī extolling Khārijism:[801]
Unable to carry a weapon into battle, he advises anyone who can [carry one] not to stay home.

According to Abū al-Ward al-Subʿī, who said: We were at the home of al-Faḍl b. Sahl in Khurāsān, when al-Amīn was mentioned. He said, "How can it not be considered justified to fight against Muḥammad, when his poet says in his assembly:[802]

'Yea, give me wine to drink, and say to me that it is wine; do not give it to me to drink secretly, if it is possible to declare it openly'?"

When the story reached Muḥammad, he commanded al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ, and the latter took Abū Nuwās and imprisoned him.

---

800. Text, with variants, in Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, III, 273–74.

801. A Qaʿadī, as explained in the margin of the Dīwān, was any of the Khārijites who held the opinion that "Judgment belongs to God alone" [the formula known as taḥkīm, used to challenge the legitimacy of the ruling caliph], but who did not actually rebel against the ruling caliph. The word is derived from qaʿada, "to sit, stay behind [from a battle]." See Lane, Lexicon, II, 618 [for taḥkīm], and Dīwān, ad. loc.

802. For the full text of the poem, see Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, III, 126–29.

According to Kāmil b. Jāmi', on the authority of one of the companions of Abū Nuwās and transmitters of his poetry, who said: Abū Nuwās composed some verses that were reported to al-Amīn. At the end of them was the following:[803] [964]

What makes me behave even more proudly toward people is that I see myself as the wealthiest of them, even when I am in poverty.
Even if I had obtained[804] no [other] glory, my tongue's having protected me from all men would be glory enough for me.
Let no one hope to overcome me in this—not even the owner of the crown secluded in the palace.

So al-Amīn—Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far[805] was with him—sent for him. When he came before him, al-Amīn said, "You biter of your whore mother's clitoris! Son of a stinking uncircumcised woman!"[806] (And he cursed him with the foulest curses.) "With your poetry you earn filth from the hands of the wicked, and then you say, 'Not even the owner of the crown secluded in the palace!' My God, you had better not slander me ever in any way!" Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far said to him, "By God, Commander of the Faithful, he is one of the biggest dualist heretics." Muḥammad said, "Can anyone witness to it against him?" Sulaymān brought a group of witnesses. One of them said that Abū Nuwās had been drinking on a rainy day and had set his cup under the open sky, so that raindrops fell into it, and had said, "They say that with each drop an angel descends. How many angels do you think I'm drinking now?"—and he drank what was in the cup. Muḥammad therefore ordered him to be imprisoned. Concerning this, Abū Nuwās said:[807] 803. For the full text, with variants, see Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 339–40.

804. The reading of the Dīwān [arith] is superior—"Even if I had inherited no glory": Abū Nuwās often boasted of his descent from Yemeni tribes that carried on the traditions of the South Arabian kingdoms.

805. He was al-Amīn's great uncle on both the paternal and maternal sides.

806. The adjective lakhnā', meaning "stinking, malodorous," is applied particularly to women whose genitals are malodorous or who are uncircumcised [i.e., have not had their clitoris removed at puberty]. See Lisān, s.v.

807. See Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 340.

Lord, men have wronged me;
without my having committed dereliction[808] they have imprisoned me.
[965] To [the charge of] unbelief (juḥūd), though you know that the opposite is true of me—to this [charge] have they linked me by their cunning.[809] Running in their racecourse in every race and the fear [of God] have been my only religion.
My excuse is not accepted, so that their witness against me fears, nor are they satisfied with the oath of my right hand.
Truly Kawthar was more deserving of imprisonment in a house of reproach and home of shame.
As for al-Amīn, I have no hope that he will defend me:
Who will today be my helper with al-Ma'mūn?

When these verses by him reached al-Ma'mūn, the latter said, "By God, if I reach him, I will enrich him with wealth he had not hoped for!" However, Abū Nuwās died before al-Ma'mūn entered the City of Peace.

After Abū Nuwās had been imprisoned for a long time, he composed the following about his imprisonment—it was related on the authority of Di'āmah:

Praise God all together, all you Muslims.
Then say, and do not flag,
"Lord, grant life to al-Amīn!"
He has promoted eunuchs, until he has made impotence a religion.
And people one and all have emulated the Commander of the Faithful.

---

808. Instead of ta'aṭṭul ("dereliction"), the Dīwān reads khaṭī'ah ("offense, sin").

809. The text is difficult, but seems to represent real variant, not merely a miscopying of the text in the Dīwān, which is syntactically simpler:

To repudiation of that to which my heart is resolved, by falsehood and slander they have linked me.

These verses also reached al-Ma'mūn when he was in Khurāsān. He said, "I will take care of him, if he flees to me."

According to Ya'qūb b. Isḥāq, on the authority of someone who reported this from Kawthar, the eunuch (khādim) of the Deposed One: Muḥammad was unable to sleep one night while he was engaged in his war with Ṭāhir. He wanted someone [966] to spend the night conversing with him, but no one from his entourage was at hand. So he summoned his chamberlain (ḥājib) and said, "Alas, my mind is full of thoughts. Bring me a witty poet with whom I can spend the rest of this night." The chamberlain went to the closest person in his presence. He found Abū Nuwās and said to him, "Comply with the request of the Commander of the Faithful." Abū Nuwās replied, "Perhaps you were seeking someone else?" The chamberlain said, "I was seeking no one but you." So he brought Abū Nuwās to him. Muḥammad said, "Who are you?" "Your servant," he replied, "al-Ḥasan b. Hāni', whom you released yesterday." "Don't be afraid," said Muḥammad. "Certain proverbs came into my mind, and I wanted you to set them into poetry. If you do it, I will reward you with whatever you ask." Abū Nuwās asked, "What are they, Commander of the Faithful?" Muḥammad said, "They are these sayings of the Arabs: 'God has effaced what has past.'—'How badly, by God, my horse has run!'[810]—'Break a stick on your nose!'[811]—and, 'Refuse, and he will desire you even more.'"[812] Abū Nuwās said, "My wish is four shapely maidservants. Muḥammad ordered them to be brought, and Abū Nuwās recited:

Your long making of excuses has been for nought;
I see no wisdom in delaying with you.

---

810. See Freytag, Proverbia, I, 208. The proverb is said to be used referring to anyone who has done less than he should have done or to whom too little has been presented.

811. Ibid., II, 404. The proverb (addressed to a woman) is said to be used referring to anyone whom people want to compel by force or deceive by trickery.

812. Ibid., I, 218. The proverb is said to come from what a man once said to a woman: "Make a show of refusing when I court you, and it will arouse even more desire." It can be used to refer to a person who pretends not to want to sell something in order to sell the thing for a higher price, since desire increases for a thing withheld.

You wanted to avoid me, but I wanted dalliance with you.
What did you want by this?—
"Refuse, and he will desire you even more."

He took a maidservant by the hand and set her aside. Then he recited:

The oaths of your swearing were firm, and I cried out till I died from your staying away.
By God, my lady, violate your oath just once;
then "break a stick on your nose!"

He set the second one aside, and then he recited:

May I be your ransom! Why this disdain?
Why do you revile people of honor?
Grant a rendezvous to a wearied lover for whose misdeed there has been repentance.
[967] Do not remember bygones:
"God has effaced what has past."

He set the third one aside, and he recited:

Certain women sent to me in the darkness of night, saying, "Come to us, but beware of the watchmen."
And so, when the enemies had been lulled to sleep, and I feared no observer or fire's glow,
I mounted my colt and went joyfully toward creatures dark-eyed, fair, soft, and dark-lipped.
But I came when morning had already risen:
"How badly, by God, my horse had run!"

Said Muḥammad, "Take them [all]—may God not prosper you with them!"

According to al-Mawṣilī—Ḥusayn, al-Rashīd's eunuch (khādim), who said: When the caliphate came to Muḥammad, one of his lodgings on the bank [of the Tigris] was readied for him by spreading the best and most splendid of the carpets of the caliphate. He[813] said, "Master, your father never had any better carpet than this to impress kings and visitors who came to him; so I wanted to spread it for you." He replied, "I wanted to have what was inherited[814] spread out for me at the beginning of my caliphate." And he said, "They have cut it up!" By God, I saw that the servants and grooms had caused it to be cut up and had divided it.

813. The subject is unclear—presumably, someone in charge of furnishing the residence, perhaps Ḥusayn the eunuch.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, who said: Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Barmakī told me that Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī once sang to Muḥammad b. Zubaydah:[815]

I shunned you, until they said, "He knows not passion"; and I visited you, until they said, "He has no patience."

Muḥammad was delighted and said, "Fill his boat with gold."

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl—Mukhāriq,[816] who said: I was with Muḥammad b. Zubaydah on a rainy day. He was drinking a morning drink, and I was sitting near him, singing. There was no one with him. He was wearing an embroidered coat.[817] Never, by God, had I seen a better one. So I began to look at it. He said, "You seem to like it, Mukhāriq." I said, "Yes, master, on you, because your face is beautiful in it. I am looking at it, and praying for your protection." "Slave (ghulām)," he said; and the eunuch (khādim) responded to him. He called for another coat, put it on, and gave me the one he had been wearing. After a little while, I looked at him again. He repeated something similar, and I gave the same reply. So he called for another coat; and this went on until he had done this with three coats, which I put on, one over the other. However, when he saw me wearing them, he regretted what he had done, and his expression changed. "Lad," he said, "go to the cooks. [968]

814. The word used (al-m.r.d.raj) apparently corresponds to Persian murdarīg, "inheritance, patrimony." The reading may be corrupt. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CDLXXXIII.

815. The rest of the poem by Abū Ṣakhr al-Hudhalī can be found in al-Qālī, Kitāb al-Amālī, I, 148–50. Muḥammad b. Zubaydah is al-Amīn.

816. Mukhāriq was a virtuoso singer at the court of al-Rashīd. He continued at court until his death in the reign of al-Wāthiq in 230/844–45. See EI[1], Supplement, s.v. Mukhārik (Farmer).

817. The jubbah was an outer garment with broad sleeves. See Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements chez les Arabes, 107–17.

Tell them to cook us a roast and prepare it quickly.[818] Bring it to us right away." No sooner had the lad gone than the table was brought. It was pretty and small, and in the middle of it was a huge bowl and two loaves of bread. It was set before him. He broke off a morsel, dipped it into the dish, and said, "Eat, Mukhāriq!" I said, "Sir, excuse me from eating." "I won't excuse you. Eat!" he said. So I broke off a morsel and took something. When I put it into my mouth, he said, "God curse you! What a glutton you are! You've ruined it for me. You've spoiled it and stuck your hand into it." Then he lifted the bowl with his hand, and suddenly it was in my lap. "Get up!" he said, "and God curse you!" So I got up, with the fat and the gravy dripping from the coats. I took them off and sent them home. I called for the fullers and embroiderers. I tried my best to restore them to their original condition, but they were not restored.

According to al-Buḥturī Abū ʿUbādah[819]—ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Ghassān, who said: I was with Muḥammad on a very cold [969] winter day. He was in one of his audience rooms (majlis) that was set apart and spread with a carpet such that I have rarely seen one more precious or more beautiful. On that day I had for three days and nights consumed nothing but date wine (nabīdh) and could hardly speak or think. Muḥammad went to relieve himself. I said to one of the personal eunuchs (khādim), "Alas, by God, I am dying. Is there any way to get something to put into my stomach to soothe what I am feeling?" "Give me a chance," he said, "and I will use cunning on your behalf. Pay attention to what I say and say that my words are true." When Muḥammad returned and sat down, the servant looked at me and smiled. Muḥammad, seeing him do so, asked, "Why did you smile?" He said, "It was nothing, sir." Muḥammad became angry. [Continuing,] al-Buḥturī said: [The servant] then said, "There is something about ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Ghassān: he cannot smell the odor of watermelons or eat them. He becomes very upset because of them." [Muḥammad] said, "ʿUbaydallāh, is this true about you?" I said, "Yes, sir, it is something from which I suffer." "Too bad for you," he said, "seeing how good watermelons are and how good they smell!" "But that's how I am," I said. He expressed amazement and said, "Bring me some watermelon." Several were brought. When I saw them, I made a show of shuddering and of recoiling from them. "Take it," he said [to the servants], "and set the watermelon before him." I began to show him how upset and agitated I was about this, while he kept laughing. Then he said, "Eat one!" "Sir," I said, "you will kill me. You will ruin my stomach and make me sick. God help me!" "Eat a watermelon," he said, "and you shall have the carpet of this room! I swear to God." I said, "What shall I do with the room's carpet, when I die if I eat it?" I kept refusing, but he insisted. The servant[820] came with knives; they cut up a watermelon and began stuffing it into my mouth, while I screamed and struggled. Withal, I swallowed, making it appear to him that I was doing it against my will. I struck my head and [970] cried out, while he kept laughing. When I finished, he moved into another room. He called the carpet spreaders, and they carried the carpet of that room to my house. Then he bandied words with me about the carpet of the [second] room for another watermelon. He did as he had done the first time, and gave me the carpet of the room, until he had given me three carpets and had made me eat three watermelons. My condition, by God, became good, and I felt strong.

818. Ed. Cairo reads, "prepare it well."

819. The poet al-Walīd b. ʿUbayd[allāh] b. Yaḥyā Abū ʿUbādah was born in 206/821 and died in 284/897. See EI[2] s.v. al-Buḥturī (Pellat); Sezgin, GAS, II, 560–64.

Now Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī used to make a show of giving [Muḥammad] sincere advice. He came when Muḥammad had gotten up to wash himself. I realized that Muḥammad would seek to do me some evil out of regret for what he had given away. Having heard the news, Manṣūr approached me while Muḥammad was out of the chamber and said, "Son of a whore! Will you cheat the Commander of the Faithful and take his property? By God, I was on the verge of doing something, and will." "Sir," I said, "it did happen, but the reason was such and such"—and I explained. "If you would like to kill me and commit a sin, that's up to you! But if you act with graciousness, that would be worthier of you. I will not do it again." He replied, "I will be gracious to you."

820. Al-Khādim: Ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CCXV, argues that the word has a collective sense and should be translated "servants." This is unnecessary. One servant [or eunuch] brought in the knives, and those present began to cut up the watermelon and feed it to 'Ubaydallāh.

Muḥammad then came and said, "Spread carpets for us by that pool.[821] They spread them for him by it. He sat down, and we sat down also. The pool was full of water. Muḥammad said, "Uncle,[822] I have longed to do something—throw 'Ubaydallāh into the pool, so that you can laugh at him." Al-Manṣūr replied, "Sir, if you do it, he will die, because the water is very cold and it is a very cold day today. But I will tell you about something very nice I have tried." "What is it?" he asked. He replied, "Command that he be tied to a board and placed at the door of the lavatory. Everyone who comes to the door of the lavatory will urinate on his head." "By God, that's good!" he said. A board was brought, and I was tied to it. Then he gave orders, and I was carried off and set at the door of the lavatory. The servants came. They loosened the cord from me and approached, letting him see that they were urinating on me, while I screamed. This [971] went on God knows how long, while he kept laughing. Then he gave orders and I was untied. I let him see that I had cleaned myself and changed my clothes, and then I got away from him.

According to 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'—his father, the Deposed One's chamberlain (ḥājib), who said: I was standing beside him. The morning meal was brought. He ate alone, and had a wonderful meal. Sometimes it used to be prepared for the caliphs before him in the manner in which it used to be prepared for each one of them; he would eat of each food, and then he would be brought his food.[823] He ate until he had finished; then he raised his head toward Abū al-'Anbar, who was one of his mother's eunuchs (khādim), and said, "Go to the kitchen and tell them to prepare bizmāward[824] for me. Let

821. Birkah can refer either to a natural lake or to a man-made pool or tank.

822. That is, Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, who was al-Amīn's uncle.

823. The text is almost certainly corrupt, and the original meaning of the sentence cannot be determined.

824. Bizmāward (other forms of the same, originally Persian word are bazmāward, buzmāward, and zumāward) are described as meatballs wrapped in dough. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, CXXXIII; and Lane, Lexicon, III, 1250.

them leave them very long, and not cut them up. The filling should be fat pieces of chicken, clarified butter, herbs, eggs, cheese, olives, and nuts. Let them make a lot of them, and hurry." It was only a short time before they brought them on a square table. The long bizmāward had been placed on it in the shape of the Dome of 'Abd al-Ṣamad,[825] so that the top [of the pile] was a single bizmāward. It was placed before him. He took one and ate it, and he kept eating until he had left nothing on the table.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Jābir b. Muṣ'ab—Mukhāriq, who said:[826] I once passed a night the like of which I had never passed before. I was at home after nightfall, when a messenger came from Muḥammad, who was then caliph. He galloped off with me, and brought me to Muḥammad's residence. I was taken inside. There was Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, who had been sent for, as I had been. We went forward and reached a gate that led to a courtyard. Behold, the courtyard was filled with some of Muḥammad's large candles; it was as if the courtyard were in daylight. Muḥammad was on a hobby horse,[827] and the residence was full of maidservants and menservants (khadam). [972] The players were playing, and Muḥammad in the midst of them was on the hobby horse, dancing about with it. A messenger came to us and said, "He has said, 'Stand in this spot, by this door next to the courtyard, and raise your voices, singing loudly or softly after the oboe,[828] following it in its melody.'" Now the oboe, the maidservants, and the players were [singing and playing] one thing:

Lo, Danānīr forgets me, but I remember her[829]—

---

825. 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī, the uncle of al-Manṣūr, had died in 185 (801–2) during the reign of al-Rashīd (see Ṭabarī, III, 650).

826. Parallel: Aghānī, XVI, 138–39.

827. The word used (kurraj) is an Arabicized version of Persian kurrah, "colt." The word was applied to wooden horses used as toys by children. From the context, this must have been something like the representations of horses that Spanish dancers sometimes wear suspended from their shoulders in dances representing the movements of a battle. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 461; also Gaudefroy-Demombynes, "Sur le cheval-jupon et al-kurraj," 155–59.

828. On the sūrnāy, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 831.

829. Danānīr was the celebrated singer Danānīr al-Barmakiyyah, the freed slave girl of Yaḥyā b. Khālid al-Barmaki. She was a favorite of al-Rashīd, and and were following the piper. Ibrāhīm and I remained standing, reciting it, and splitting our throats with it, until daybreak. Muḥammad was on the hobby horse; he neither wearied nor grew bored until morning. Sometimes he would come near us and we would see him; sometimes the maidservants and menservants came between him and us.

According to al-Ḥusayn b. Firās, a mawlā of the Banū Hāshim, who said: In the time of Muḥammad, men went on military expedition on condition that he return to them the fifth.[830] It was returned to them. A man would obtain six dīnārs, which was a lot of money.

According to Ibn al-A'rābī, who said: I was present with al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'. Al-Ḥasan b. Hāni'[831] was brought. Al-Faḍl said, "The charge has been raised before the Commander of the Faithful that you are a Zindīq." Al-Ḥasan began to declare his innocence and to swear. Al-Faḍl kept repeating what he had said about him and asked him to speak to the caliph about him. He promised, and [al-Faḍl] released him. As al-Ḥasan left, he said:[832]

My family, I have come to you from the grave, while [other] people wait in vain for resurrection.
Were it not for Abū al-'Abbās [al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'], my eye would not be looking at children or at abundance.
Through him, God has clothed me with benefits the recounting of which has occupied the hands of my gratitude.
I was made to receive[833] them from a counselor of quick intelligence, and I counted[834] them with ten fingertips.

---

some of Abū Nuwās's love poems are addressed to her, e.g., Dīwān, IV, 11–12. See Aghānī, XVI, 136ff.; also Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad, 138–40.

830. That is, that he return to them the one-fifth share (khums) of any booty that was normally reserved for the ruler under Islamic law. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 404.

831. That is, Abū Nuwās.

832. See Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 249–50.

833. The translation follows the vocalization of the Dīwān, rather than that of ed. Leiden, which is metrically impossible.

834. The reading ('aqadtuhā) of the Dīwān is preferable. Ed. Leiden has madadtuhā, "I drew them (up, as from a well)."

According to al-Riyāshī—Abū Ḥabīb al-Mūshī, who said: I was with Mu'nis b. 'Imrān. We were on our way to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' in Baghdad. Mu'nis said to me, "Why don't we go to visit Abū Nuwās?" So we went into the prison to see him. He said to Mu'nis, "Abū 'Imrān, where are you heading?" He replied, "I was on my way to see Abū al-'Abbās al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'." Abū Nuwās said, "Will you deliver to him a note that I give you?" "Yes," he replied. So Abū Nuwās gave him a note containing the following:[835] [973]

Not a single hand is there among men but that Abū al-'Abbās is its master.[836] Trusted friends slept on their beds, but he came to my soul by night and revived it.
I feared you, but then there made me feel safe from fearing you your fear of God.
You pardoned me, as one pardons who is powerful and entitled to exact punishments, but remitted them.

These verses were the cause of his release from detention.

According to Muḥammad b. Khallād al-Sharawī—his father [Khallād], who said: Muḥammad heard Abū Nuwās's poem that says:[837]

Yea, give me wine to drink, and say to me that it is wine—

also, his poem that says:[838]

Give me it to drink, Dhufāfah, tart in taste and unsullied.
Inglorious in my eyes is he who hates it out of hope or out of fearing;[839]
Just as after the death of Hārūn the caliphate became inglorious and neglected.

---

835. See Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, I, 248

836. The reading of the Dīwān may be preferable: "Not a single hand is there among men like the hand of which Abū al-'Abbās is the master."

837. See note 802.

838. For additional lines and variants, see Abū Nuwās, Dīwān, III, 210–11. Dhufāfah al-'Absī was in charge of al-Rashīd's horses.

839. That is, hope for heaven or fear of hell.

Then the following was recited to him:[840]

[974] He brought it olive-golden, and we could not restrain ourselves from worshiping it.

Muḥammad imprisoned him for this, saying: "Enough! You are an unbeliever! You are a Zindīq!" Abū Nuwās wrote to al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ concerning this:[841]

You, Ibn al-Rabīʿ, taught me goodness[842] and accustomed me to it, and goodness became a habit.
My life of vanity stopped, my mindless behavior ceased, and I manifested fear of God and abstemiousness.
If you saw me, you would compare to me al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī in his asceticism, or Qatādah,[843]
Because of bowings that I adorn with prostrations, and a paleness like that of the locust.
Summon me then—may you not fail to evaluate someone like me—and note with your eye the prostration mark [on my forehead].[844]
If a hypocrite ever saw it, he would buy it to use as evidence [of his piety].

---

840. Ibid., 131.

841. Ibid., I, 246–47. Discussion and German translation in Wagner, Abū Nuwās, 82–83; discussion and English translation in Nicholson, Literary History of the Arabs, 293–94.

842. For khayr, "goodness," the Dīwān reads nusk, "piety, asceticism."

843. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī was a famous ascetic. Qatādah, a scholar also from al-Baṣrah (Abū Nuwās was himself a native of the city), was a contemporary of al-Ḥasan. He died in 735.

844. That is, the mark (sajjādah) left by repeatedly touching the forehead to the ground in prayer.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXII

The Reunification of the ʿAbbāsid Caliphate

TRANSLATED BY C. E. BOSWORTH

The Caliphate of ʿAbdallāh b. Hārūn al-Ma'mūn

[The Remainder of the Events of the Year 198 (September 1, 813–August 21, 814)]

In the year 198 (September 1, 813–August 21, 814), the war between the two sons of Hārūn al-Rashīd, Muḥammad (al-Amīn) and ʿAbdallāh (al-Ma'mūn), came to an end, and the people in the eastern lands, in Iraq and the Hijaz, came together and gave their obedience to ʿAbdallāh al-Ma'mūn.

In this year, al-Ḥasan al-Hirsh came out in revolt in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July–August 814) with a group of the dregs of the people and a large number of tribesmen, proclaiming, or so he asserted, the cause of "the one well-pleasing [to God] from the house of Muḥammad [al-Riḍā min al-Muḥammad]." He came as far as Nīl,[1] and then exacted taxes, practised extortion on the merchants, plundered the villages (of the neighborhood) and drove off herds.[2]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn granted to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl,[3] brother

1. Town of central Iraq to the south-southeast of Baghdad, near a transverse canal, the Greater Ṣarāt, which connected the Euphrates with the Tigris; see G. Le Strange, The lands of the Eastern Caliphate, 72–3.

2. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 301.

3. Secretary and financial official for al-Ma'mūn, detested, like his brother, by the Abnā', the Khurasanian military class of Baghdad, for his Zoroastrian background (see below, 52) and Iranian sympathies; see D. Sourdel, Le vizirat ʿabbāside, I, 215–18; id., EI^{2} s.v.

of al-Faḍl b. Sahl,[4] the governorship of all the districts of Jibāl, Fārs, Ahwāz, Baṣrah, Kūfah, the Hijaz and the Yemen which Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn[5] had conquered, this being after the killing of the deposed one Muḥammad (al-Amīn) and the people's general submission to al-Ma'mūn.[6]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn wrote to Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who was at that moment established at Baghdad,[7] ordering him to hand over the whole of the tax revenues in his possession, collected from all the provinces, to the representatives of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, and that he should leave and make his way to Raqqah.[8] He handed over to him responsibility for the war against Naṣr b. Shabath[9] and appointed him governor of Mosul, the Jazīrah, Syria and the western provinces (al-Maghrib).[10]

In this year, 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd[11] came to Iraq as al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's representative for collection of the land tax there. However, Ṭāhir refused to hand over the land tax to 'Alī until he had paid in full the army's pay allowances. When he had fulfilled this obligation to them, he handed over the tax revenues to him.

---

4. Adviser and vizier to al-Ma'mūn till his assassination in 202 (818) (see below, 80); see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 196–213; id., EI[2] s.v.

5. Al-Ma'mūn's general in the civil war with his brother al-Amīn, and member of an Iranian family long in the service of the 'Abbāsids; see C.E. Bosworth, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 90–5; EI[1] s.v. (W. Barthold).

6. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 539; anon., Kitāb 'Uyūn al-ḥadā'iq, 344; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 297–8.

7. Al-Ma'mūn himself was at this time in his eastern Khurasanian capital of Marw.

8. The main town of Diyār Muḍar, on the upper Euphrates, in what is now northern Syria; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, III, 58–60; Le Strange, Lands, 101–3; M. Canard, Histoire de la dynastie des H'amdânides, I, 90–1; EI[1] s.v. al-Raḳḳa (E. Honigmann).

9. Arab leader from the 'Uqayl tribe who took advantage of the confused situation in the Jazīrah during the civil war period to head bands of Zawāqīl or Qaysī Arabs against the central government till his submission in 209 (824/5) (see below, 138–44); see H. Kennedy, The early Abbasid caliphate, 168–9.

10. 'Uyūn, 344; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 298.

11. Khurasanian and cousin of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, bearer of the honorific of Dhū al-Qalamayn and administrator of Iraq for al-Ḥasan after the death of al-Amīn; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 202, 205, 216.

In this year, al-Maʾmūn wrote to Harthamah (b. Aʿyan) ordering him to proceed to Khurasan.[12] [976]

In this year, al-ʿAbbās b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the pilgrimage.[13]

12. ʿUyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit. Harthamah was a Khurasanian commander long in the service of the ʿAbbāsids until he was killed on al-Faḍl b. Sahl's orders in 200 (816) (see below, 39–41); see Patricia Crone, Slaves on horses, 177; *EI*² s.v. (Ch. Pellat).

13. Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 333; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

199

(August 22, 814–August 10, 815)

The notable events taking place during this year included the arrival in Baghdad of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, as al-Ma'mūn's appointee with responsibility for both military and financial matters. When he reached the city, he divided up his tax collectors ('ummāl) amongst the various districts and provinces.[14]

In this year, in Jumādā I (December 814–January 815), Ṭāhir, together with 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid,[15] set out for Raqqah.

In this year, Harthamah also set out for Khurasan.

In this year, Azhar b. Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab marched out against al-Hirsh and then killed him in Muḥarram (August–September 814).

In this year, on Thursday, the tenth of Jumādā II (January 26, 815), Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib rebelled at Kufāh, proclaiming the cause of "the one well-pleasing [to God] from the house of Muḥammad" and of acting in conformity with the Book (the Qu-

14. Azdī, 334; 'Uyūn, loc. cit.

15. Son of the Abnā' leader in Baghdad Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid (on whom see below, 42, n.117) and brother of 'Abdūs (see below, 15–16).

r'ān) and sunnah. This is the person known as Ibn Ṭabāṭabā.[16] The one who took charge of affairs for him in the conduct of war and who acted as commander of his forces was Abū al-Sarāyā, whose given name was al-Sarī b. Manṣūr; he used to mention that he was from the progeny of Hāni' b. Qabīṣah b. Hāni' b. Mas'ūd b. 'Āmir b. 'Amr b. Abī Rabī'ah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān.[17]

The Reasons behind the Revolt of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, called Ibn Ṭabāṭabā

There are differing accounts about that. Some people say that the reason for his rebellion was al-Ma'mūn's dismissal of [977]
Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn from the responsibility of collecting the taxes from the provinces which he had conquered and the Caliph's dispatch of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl for this duty. When he did this, people in Iraq talked (about it) among themselves, saying that al-Faḍl b. Sahl had secured an ascendancy over al-Ma'mūn; (they said) that he had installed al-Ma'mūn in a palace, where he had forbidden the members of his own family (the 'Abbāsids) and his chief military commanders, whether from his intimate circle or from the population at large, access to the Caliph. It was alleged, moreover, that al-Faḍl was managing affairs of state according to his own desires and was assuming sole judgment over public affairs without reference to the Caliph. Hence those members of the Hāshimite family and the leading men of the community who were in Iraq grew angry at this. They reacted strongly against al-Faḍl b. Sahl's ascendancy over al-Ma'mūn and assumed a provocative attitude towards al-Ḥasan b. Sahl because of it. Civil strife broke out in the garrison cities, and the first to come out in rebellion at Kūfah was Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, whom I have mentioned.

16. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 539–40; Mas'ūdī, Murūj al-dhahab, VII, 55 = ed. Pellat, § 2740; a detailed account of Ibn Ṭabāṭabā's revolt in Iṣfahānī, Maqātil al-Ṭalibiyyīn, 518–36, with the story of Abū al-Sarāyā's revolt continued at 542–59; Azdī, loc. cit.; A. Arioli, "La rivolta di Abū Sarāyā: appunti per una tipologia del leader islamico," Annali di Ca' Foscari, V (1974), 189–97; Kennedy, 207–11. It seems that there is nothing to indicate that Abū al-Sarāyā had any ideological commitment to Shī'ism, but that he saw the 'Alids as convenient tools to further his own military ambitions.

17. See on Abū al-Sarāyā, EI[2] s.v. (H.A.R. Gibb). His alleged ancestor Hāni' b. Qabīṣah had been one of the Arab chiefs of central Iraq connected with the last Lakhmid rulers of Ḥīrah; see Th. Nöldeke, Geschichte der Perser und Araber zur Zeit der Sasaniden, 332 ff.

An alternative account about why he rebelled says that Abū al-Sarāyā was one of Harthamah's commanders, but that Harthamah held back his pay allowances and kept putting off payment to him. Abū al-Sarāyā accordingly grew angry at this procrastination, and went off to Kūfah and proclaimed his allegiance to Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. He seized control of Kūfah, and the people there came together and gave him their obedience. He set up Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm in the city, and the people of the surrounding rural districts, the tribesmen and others flocked to his standard.[18]

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl sent Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab (al-Ḍabbī)[19] with his personal forces to Kūfah. The official in charge of the taxes of Kūfah when Ibn Ṭabāṭabā entered the city was Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr,[20] an appointee of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's; Sulaymān's deputy there was Khālid b. Muḥajjal al-Ḍabbī. When the news (of Ibn Ṭabāṭabā's arrival in Kūfah) reached al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, he upbraided Sulaymān harshly and denounced him for his weakness. He dispatched Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab with an army of ten thousand calvary and infantry, and Zuhayr advanced towards them. When they heard reports of Zuhayr's approach, the rebels in Kūfah prepared to march out against him, but they did not have sufficient strength for such a counteradvance. So they stood fast until Zuhayr reached Qaryat Shāhī;[21] then they made a sortie, and stood fast (at the bridge) until Zuhayr encountered them there.
[978] He pitched camp on the Tuesday evening at Ṣa'nabā,[22] and then fell upon them the next morning. But the Kūfans put him

18. Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 521, 523–4, with the date of Ibn Ṭabāṭabā's receiving the homage of the people of Kūfah given as the tenth of Jumādā I, 199 (December 27, 814); C.L. Geddes, "Al-Ma'mūn's Šī'ite policy in Yemen." WZKM, LIX–LX (1963–4), 99.

19. Veteran Khurasanian commander of the 'Abbāsids; see Crone, 186–7.

20. Great-uncle of al-Ma'mūn and governor of Baṣrah under Hārūn al-Rashīd.

21. "The royal village," presumably the one near Qādisiyyah of Kūfah given in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 316.

22. Presumably the village of the Sawād mentioned in ibid., III, 408.

to flight, treated his army camp as legitimate plunder (istabāḥū 'askarahu), and seized all the money, weapons, beasts, etc., which he had with him. This was on Wednesday.[23]

On the day after this battle between the people of Kūfah and Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab, i.e., Thursday, the first of Rajab, 199 (February 15, 815), Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, (called) Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, suddenly died.[24] People said that Abū al-Sarāyā had poisoned him because, it was alleged, when Ibn Ṭabāṭabā had placed a secure guard on all the money, weapons, beasts, etc., captured from Zuhayr's army encampment, he had refused to give Abū al-Sarāyā any of it and had prevented his access to it; moreover, he had the obedience of all the people. Abū al-Sarāyā realized that he had no control over Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, so he poisoned him. On the latter's death, Abū al-Sarāyā set up in his place a young, beardless lad called Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Zayd b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib;[25] but Abū al-Sarāyā was really the one who executed all affairs, appointing whomsoever he saw fit to official positions and dismissing whomsoever he pleased, and all affairs were in his hands.[26]

Abū al-Sarāyā kills 'Abdūs

Zuhayr withdrew on the same day of his defeat to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah[27] and took up his position there. Now al-Ḥasan b. Sahl had dispatched 'Abdūs b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī[28] to Nīl at the same time as Zuhayr was sent to Kūfah. After Zuhayr's defeat, 'Abdūs set out for Kūfah, according to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's instructions, and he and his forces

23. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 542–3.

24. Ibid., II, 540; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 525–32; Azdī, 335.

25. I.e., of the Zaydī branch of the Ḥusaynids; as Kennedy, 208–9, points out, he was doubtless acceptable in Kūfah because his grandfather, Zayd b. 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn, had led an 'Alid rising there against the Umayyad Caliph Hishām in 122 (740); see EI[1] s.v. Zaid b. 'Alī (R. Strothmann).

26. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 55–6 = ed. Pellat, § 2740; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 532–4, 545–50.

27. A town to the north of Ḥillah and named after its founder, the Umayyad governor Yazīd b. 'Umar b. Hubayrah; see Yāqūt Mu'jam, IV, 365; Le Strange, Lands, 70–1; EI[2] s.v. Ḳaṣr Ibn Hubayra (J. Lassner).

28. Brother of 'Īsā and son of the Abnā' leader in Baghdad (see below, 42, n.117).

reached Jāmi';[29] Zuhayr in the meantime had taken up his position at Qaṣr (Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah). Abū al-Sarāyā marched out against 'Abdūs and fell upon him at Jāmi' on Sunday, the seventeenth of Rajab[30] (March 3, 815). In this (confrontation) Abū al-Sarāyā killed 'Abdūs, captured Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid and proclaimed 'Abdūs's army camp to be lawful plunder.[31] It is reported that 'Abdūs had four thousand cavalrymen, of whom every one was either killed or taken prisoner. The Ṭālibids were able to spread themselves through the land, and [979] Abū al-Sarāyā now coined dirhams at Kūfah with the inscription, "God loves those who fight in His way in ranks, as though they were a building well-compacted."[32]

When the news reached Zuhayr that Abū al-Sarāyā had killed 'Abdūs—at that time (Zuhayr was) still at Qaṣr—he and his forces retired to Nahr al-Malik.[33] Abū al-Sarāyā now advanced and encamped with his troops at Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, with his advance scouts penetrating as far as Kūthā[34] and Nahr al-Malik. He then sent out armies to Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ, which occupied those two cities. 'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī[35] was the governor of Wāsiṭ and its environs on al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's behalf. Abū al-Sarāyā's army engaged 'Abdallāh's army near Wāsiṭ and put 'Abdallāh to flight; accordingly, he had to fall back on Baghdad, having lost a considerable number of his forces either killed or taken captive. When al-Ḥasan b. Sahl realized that any army which he might send against Abū al-Sarāyā and

29. More usually in the dual form Jāmi'ān, the settlement on the Sūrā branch of the Euphrates which later developed into the town of Ḥillah; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 96; Le Strange, Lands, 71–2; G. Makdisi, "Notes on Ḥilla and the Mazyadids in mediaeval Islam," JAOS, LXXIV (1954), 249–62.

30. Actually a Saturday.

31. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 543, with the same date for the battle.

32. Qur'ān, LXI, 4. At least one dirham of this type is extant; see C.J. Tornberg, "Ueber muhammedanische Revolutions-Münzen," ZDMG, XXII (1868), 706–7.

33. Town on the canal of the same name, to the south of Baghdad and connecting the Euphrates and Tigris; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 324; Le Strange, Lands, 70–1.

34. Town on the canal of the same name, to the south of Nahr al-Malik; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 487–8; Le Strange, Lands, 68–9.

35. Commander of al-Rashīd who fought for al-Amīn but who obviously recovered favor under the new régime; see Crone, 145.

his partisans would inevitably be put to flight; that whatever province they marched against, they occupied; and that, moreover, he had no commander in his own entourage who could successfully undertake a counter-campaign against Abū al-Sarāyā, he was compelled to have recourse to Harthamah. Now when Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl had come to Harthamah in Iraq as the governor appointed over it by al-Ma'mūn, Harthamah had handed over to him what tax revenues he then had in his possession and had set off for Khurasan, bitterly angry at al-Ḥasan. He journeyed onwards as far as Ḥulwān.[36] At that point, al-Ḥasan sent al-Sindī[37] and the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā Ṣāliḥ,[38] begging Harthamah to return to Baghdad and take charge of the warfare against Abū al-Sarāyā. However, he rejected the approach and refused. The envoy returned to al-Ḥasan bearing his refusal, so he sent al-Sindī back to him once more with conciliatory and flattering letters. Harthamah then agreed and turned back towards Baghdad; he entered Baghdad in Sha'bān (March–April 815). As he got ready to march on Kūfah, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl ordered 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd to move out to the neighborhood of Madā'in, Wāsiṭ and Baṣrah; this he and his forces prepared to do. [980]

Harthamah Marches Against Abū al-Sarāyā

News of all this reached Abū al-Sarāyā, all this time still at Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. He sent a force against Madā'in, and his troops entered it in Ramaḍān (April–May 815). In this same month of Ramaḍān, he himself and his forces moved forwards

36. Town of western Persia on the high road to Khurasan, and the first one in the mountain zone after leaving the plains of Iraq; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 293–4; Le Strange, Lands, 191; P. Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter, 673 ff.; EI[2] s.v. (L. Lockhart).

37. Presumably al-Sindī b. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī, of the old Qaysī family, hence a nephew of the 'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd mentioned above, and again a former supporter of al-Amīn; see Crone, 145.

38. Court official of al-Rashīd, who had charge of the prayer carpet (muṣallā) which was spread over the Caliph's sarīr (the divan which served as a throne) and which was regarded as one of the insignia of royalty; this might also be allotted for the use of distinguished visitors. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 172; id., "Questions de cérémonial 'abbaside," REI, XXVIII (1960), 131–2.

and encamped at the Nahr Ṣarṣar,[39] in the district which lies along the road to Kūfah. While Harthamah was still holding back from returning to al-Ḥasan at Baghdad, he had ordered al-Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī[40] to move forward and encamp at Yāsiriyyah[41] until Harthamah himself should join up with him. This al-Manṣūr did. When Harthamah arrived, he went forward and encamped at al-Safīniyyīn[42] in front of (al-) Manṣūr. Then he pushed on until he made camp at the Nahr Ṣarṣar, facing Abū al-Sarāyā and with the canal between them. Meanwhile, 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd was encamped at Kalwādhā.[43] He set off on Tuesday, one day after the 'Īd al-Fiṭr, and sent his vanguard on to Madā'in. There he engaged Abū al-Sarāyā's force in fierce fighting from the morning of Thursday till nightfall on that day. The next morning, he and his troops renewed the battle. Abū al-Sarāyā's soldiers were defeated, and Ibn Abī Sa'īd occupied Madā'in. The news (of the defeat) and Ibn Abī Sa'īd's capture of Madā'in reached Abū al-Sarāyā, and during the night of (Friday) Saturday the (twenty-fourth twenty-) fifth of Shawwāl (June 7–8, 814) he fell back from the Nahr Ṣarṣar to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah and encamped there. Harthamah moved forward the next morning and hurried in pursuit of him. He came upon a substantial detachment of Abū al-Sarāyā's troops and slaughtered them, sending their heads to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl. Harthamah then proceeded to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, and there took place a battle between him and Abū al-Sarāyā in which a large number of the latter's soldiers were killed; therefore Abū al-

[981]

39. The transverse canal connecting the Euphrates and Tigris immediately to the south of Baghdad, on which lay the town of Ṣarṣar; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 401; Le Strange, Lands, 67–8.

40. Leading member of the 'Abbāsid family in Iraq during al-Ma'mūn's absence, whom the opponents of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl later tried to set up as Caliph there; see below, fol. 23, and Kennedy, index s.v.

41. Township on the Nahr 'Īsā Canal, to the west of Baghdad, where there was a bridge over the canal; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 425; Le Strange, Baghdad under the Abbasid Caliphate, 151–2; Lassner, The topography of Baghdad, 100, 259.

42. Reading uncertain; this is the one adopted by the editor here and at III, 865, of the text, but in M.J. de Goeje's Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXVIII, and in 'Uyūn, 422, we have al-Safīnatayn.

43. District and town on the left bank of the Tigris just below Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 477–8; Le Strange, Lands, 32; EI[2] s.v. (ed.).

Sarāyā had to retreat towards Kūfah. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad and the group of Ṭālibids accompanying him now swept down on the houses of the 'Abbāsid family in Kūfah and on the houses of their clients and retainers (mawālīhim wa-atbā'ihim), ransacking and destroying these houses, expelling the 'Abbāsids and their followers from the city, and searching out their goods and possessions which had been deposited with other people and appropriating them.[44] They behaved in an abominable fashion.

Meanwhile, Harthamah was telling the people, so it is said, that his intention was to lead the pilgrimage. During this period, he had held back pilgrims from Khurasan, Jibāl and the Jazīrah, and the pilgrims of Baghdad and others, and had not allowed anyone to set off on the pilgrimage, hoping that he himself would take Kūfah. Abū al-Sarāyā sent representatives to Mecca and Madīnah who would take control there and take charge of the pilgrimage. The governor of Mecca and Madīnah at that time was Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās.[45] The person whom Abū al-Sarāyā sent to Mecca was Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan al-Afṭas b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib[46] and the one whom he sent to Madīnah was Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. Dāwūd b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[47] The latter entered Madīnah without encountering any resistance at all. Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan travelled towards Mecca, and when he drew near to it he halted for a brief while because of the garrison within the city.

Events at Mecca

When Dāwūd b. 'Īsā heard the news that Abū al-Sarāyā had sent Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan to Mecca in order to take charge of the [982] rites of the pilgrimage, he gathered together the clients of the 'Abbāsid family and the slaves who worked on their agricul-44. Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, II, 760–1; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 542–4; Azdī, 335; 'Uyūn, 345–7; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 302–6.

45. Great-nephew of al-Saffāḥ and first cousin once removed of al-Ma'mūn.

46. I.e., grandson of the fourth Imām 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn.

47. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 760; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 55, 58 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2740, 2743; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 540.

tural properties ('abīd ḥawā'iṭihim).[48] The eunuch Masrūr al-Kabīr[49] had made the pilgrimage that year with a force of two hundred cavalrymen from amongst his own troops. He now got ready to oppose the Ṭālibid forces attempting to enter and take over Mecca. He said to Dāwūd b. 'Īsā, "Set yourself up, or one of your sons, as my chief, and I will take upon myself the responsibility for fighting them."[50] Dāwūd replied, "I cannot declare lawful the idea of fighting in the sacred enclosure [al-ḥaram]. By God, if they enter by this way down through the mountains, I myself shall leave by another defile." Masrūr said to him, "You would hand over your ruling power and authority to your enemy! Who is there who will not criticize you for this, reproaching you for an act against your religion, the honor of your family and your own material interests?" Dāwūd responded to him, "What ruling power do I really have? By God, I have dwelled in their midst till I have grown aged, and they never appointed me to any administrative office till I had become an old man and my life had almost run. Then they made me governor of a part of the Hijaz which does not provide me with any sustenance. You and your likes can have this ruling power, so put up a fight or abandon the struggle, just as you wish!" Thereupon, Dāwūd left Mecca and retired to the vicinity of Mushāsh.[51] He had already loaded his bulkier possessions on camels, and he now sent them off on the road to Iraq and on his own initiative forged a diploma from al-Ma'mūn appointing his own son Muḥammad b. Dāwūd as leader of the worship during the pilgrimage period. He told him, "Go forth and lead the people in the midday and afternoon worship at Minā and then the sunset and evening worship. Stay overnight at Minā

48. The ḥawā'iṭ (sing. ḥā'iṭ) of Mecca are listed by Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, II, 227–30, cf. 301, and described as embanked pieces of agricultural land irrigated by water brought in through conduits leading ultimately to the Ḥaram.

49. Abū Hāshim Masrūr, official in the service of al-Rashīd, and then apparently of al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn; see Crone, 192–3.

50. I.e., the 'Abbāsid Dāwūd would be nominal leader of the forces, while the slave or freedman Masrūr would be the real commander.

51. A well-irrigated district between the hill of 'Arafāt and Ṭā'if, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 131; or a place half-a-stage from Mecca between there and the territory of the Banū Sulaym, according to Bakrī, Mu'jam mā 'sta'jam, IV, 1230.

and lead the dawn worship, then mount your steeds and go down via the 'Arafah Road and take the route on your left to the ravine of 'Amr until you get on to the Mushāsh Road, and then join up with me at Ibn 'Āmir's garden."[52] Muḥammad b. Dāwūd did that, and the body of men who had been with Dāwūd b. 'Īsā in Mecca, comprising the clients of the 'Abbāsid family and the slaves who worked on their agricultural properties, split up. This weakened the eunuch Masrūr's military strength, and he grew apprehensive that if he resisted the Ṭālibid forces, the majority of the people (i.e., the pilgrims) would join their side. Hence he set off on Dāwūd's tracks, returning to Iraq, and the pilgrims remained at 'Arafah. [983]

When the sun began to decline and it was time for the worship, a group (of religious leaders) from the people of Mecca successively refused to undertake the task of leading it. When they found that none of the rulers were present, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Walīd al-Radmī,[53] who was the muezzin, judge of the community of pilgrims (qāḍī al-jamā'ah) and imām for the congregation of the Sacred Mosque of Mecca, then said to the judge of Mecca, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī, "Step forward, deliver the sermon [khuṭbah] for the people and lead them in the two worships [midday and afternoon], for you are indeed the judge of the city." He replied, "In whose name shall I deliver the sermon, when the governor has fled, and these fellows [the Ṭālibids and their followers] are on the point of entering [the city]?" Aḥmad replied, "Don't make the prayers for anyone specifically." Muḥammad retorted, "No, you do it. Step forward, deliver the sermon and lead the people in the worship." Nevertheless he refused. Then they pushed forward a man from the lower classes of Mecca, and he led the people in the midday and afternoon worship without delivering any sermon. They proceeded and halted, in a body, at the standing-place of 'Arafah until the sun went down. Then the people began to go down from 'Arafah by themselves without any imām until they came to Muzdalifah. Another man from the lower classes of Mecca led them in the sunset and evening worships.

52. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 414, this was the vulgar name for Bustān Ibn Ma'mar, described as two wadis filled with date palms, and identified by Bakrī, Mu'jam mā 'sta'jam, IV, 1304, with the date grove called Nakhlat al-Yamāniyyah.

53. Vocalization of this nisbah or gentilic uncertain, unless from radm, "barrier." Several rudūm in Mecca are mentioned by Azraqī, e.g., Akhbār Makkah, II, 33, 167, as being barriers or embankments constructed to keep water in the wadis in check and to prevent flooding of the courtyard of the Ka'bah; cf. also the Radm Banī Jumaḥ of Yāqūt, Mu'jam III, 40.

Meanwhile, Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan was pausing at Sarif,[54] reluctant to enter Mecca for fear of being repulsed from it and of being forcibly opposed by its defenders, until a deputation of the citizens of Mecca who were favorably disposed towards the Ṭālibids and fearful of the 'Abbāsids went out to meet him. They told him that Mecca, Minā and 'Arafah had now become empty of any representatives of the ('Abbāsid) ruling power, and that these leaders had departed in the direction of Iraq. Hence Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan was able to enter Mecca before the time of the sunset worship on the Day of 'Arafah, together with all his retinue, numbering less than ten persons. They made the circumambulation (ṭawāf) round the Holy House, the running (sa'y) between Ṣafā' and Marwah, and proceeded to 'Arafah during the night. They then remained there during a period of time of that night for the standing (wuqūf), and then returned to Muzdalifah. Ḥusayn led the people in the dawn worship and [984] performed the standing at the place of Quzaḥ, and kept the press of people away from himself. He halted at Minā for the remaining days of the pilgrimage, staying there until the year 199 came to its end (August 10, 815). The Ṭālibid Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. Dāwūd remained at Madīnah for the rest of the year also. Then the pilgrims, and all of those who had been in Mecca and had taken part in the ceremonies of the pilgrimage, returned homewards—the pilgrims having had to make the running down (ifādah) from 'Arafah without any leader, however.[55]

54. A hollow or wadi, according to Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, II, 208, 213.

55. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 761; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IX, 69 = ed. Pellat, § 3648; Azdī, 335, 338; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 306–7; Geddes, 99–100. For the various features of the pilgrimage ceremonies mentioned here, see EI[2] Ḥadjdj (A.J. Wensinck—J. Jomier).

Meanwhile, when Harthamah had grown afraid that he would not be able to make the pilgrimage (i.e., that he would lose too much time over the military operations in Iraq to be able to lead the pilgrims on their way across Arabia) and had encamped at Qaryat Shāhī, he attacked Abū al-Sarāyā and his partisans at the very same spot that Zuhayr had attacked him (previously). In the first part of the daylight hours, Harthamah was pushed back, but in the latter part, Abū al-Sarāyā's forces were defeated. When Harthamah realized that he had not managed to attain his aim (of taking charge personally of the pilgrims of Persia and Iraq), he remained at Qaryat Shāhī, made the pilgrims and others retrace their steps, and sent for al-Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, who joined up with him at Qaryat Shāhī. Harthamah kept sending letters to the leading men in Kūfah. After ʿAlī b. Abī Saʿīd had occupied Madā'in, he had gone on to Wāsiṭ and seized that city; then he had marched to Baṣrah, but did not manage to capture it till the end of this year.[56]

56. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 543–4; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 307.

The Events of the Year

200

(August 11, 815–July 29, 816)

One of the events taking place during this year was the flight of Abū al-Sarāyā from Kūfah and Harthamah's entering the city. It is mentioned that Abū al-Sarāyā and his supporters from amongst the Ṭālibids fled from Kūfah during the night of (Saturday-) Sunday, the (fifteenth-) sixteenth of Muḥarram, 200 (August 26–7, 815) until they reached Qādisiyyah.[57] Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī and Harthamah entered Kūfah the morning after that night and gave the people a guarantee of safety; they did not, indeed, lay a hand on a single one of the townspeople. Manṣūr and Harthamah and their forces remained there during that day until the time of the afternoon worship, and then they went back to their encampment, leaving behind as their representa-[985] tive in Kūfah one of their men called Abū Ibrāhīm Ghassān b. Abī al-Faraj b. Ghassān,[58] who held the office of commander of

57. I.e., that of Kūfah, lying to the west of the latter on the road to Mecca, and the site of the great battle between the Arabs and Persians in the conquest period; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 291–3; Le Strange, Lands, 76.

58. The person mentioned below, 53, as Abū Ibrāhīm b. Ghassān; the text seems disturbed in both places, and confusion seems to have occurred in the latter place with the governor of Khurasan Ghassān b. 'Abbād.

the guard for the governor of Khurasan. He set up his residence in the house which had been formerly occupied by Muḥammad b. Muḥammad and Abū al-Sarāyā.[59]

Abū al-Sarāyā Is Captured and Executed

Abū al-Sarāyā, together with his retainers, left Qādisiyya and went to the neighborhood of Wāsiṭ, ʿAlī b. Abī Saʿīd being at Wāsiṭ itself. At this point Baṣrah was still in the hands of the ʿAlids, so Abū al-Sarāyā travelled onwards till he crossed the Tigris below Wāsiṭ and came to ʿAbdasī.[60] There he found a sum of money which had been brought thither from Ahwāz, so he appropriated it. Then he proceeded further until he reached Sūs.[61] He encamped there with his forces, remaining there for four days, and he started to allot one thousand (dirhams) each to the cavalrymen and five hundred (dirhams) each to the foot-soldiers. On the fourth day of their stay, al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī al-Bādhghīsī, known also as al-Maʾmūnī,[62] advanced towards them and sent a message, "Depart to wherever you like, for I see no point in engaging in fighting with you; and if you leave my province, I shall make no attempt to pursue you." But Abū al-Sarāyā was determined to provoke an engagement, and he attacked al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī's troops. The latter, however, defeated Abū al-Sarāyā's forces and plundered their encampment; Abū al-Sarāyā himself was severely wounded.[63] He now took to flight. He and Muḥammad b. Muḥammad and Abū al-Shawk joined together, after their troops had split up and dispersed. They made for the region of the road to the Jazīrah, intending to go to Abū al-Sarāyā's residence at Raʾs al-ʿAyn.[64] But when 59. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 543; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 545–7.

60. Settlement of the district of Kaskar, on the course of the modern Tigris channel just north of Qurnah; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 77; Le Strange, Lands, 42–3.

61. Town in Ahwāz, the ancient Susa; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 280–1; Le Strange, Lands, 240; Schwarz, 358–64.

62. Khurasanian mawlā of al-Maʾmūn, appointed governor of Armenia in 214 (829); see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 566; Crone, 257.

63. According to Yaʿqūbī, op. cit., II, 543, in the abdomen.

64. Town of the Jazīrah, on the headwaters of the Great Khābūr River and famed for its springs; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 13–14; Le Strange, Lands, 95; Canard, 97–8; EI[1] s.v. (Honigmann).

they reached Jalūlā,[65] they were intercepted. Ḥammād al-Kundughūsh came upon them and seized them, and then brought them to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, who stationed himself at Nahrawān when the Ḥarbiyyah troops drove him out (of Baghdad). Abū al-Sarāyā was brought forward and decapitated on Thursday, the tenth of Rabī' I (October 18, 815). It is mentioned that the man who took charge of his execution was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid, who had been a captive in Abū al-Sarāyā's hands. They mention that they never saw anyone, at the time of his execution, more terror-stricken than Abū al-Sarāyā; his arms and legs were violently agitated, and he was shrieking at the top of his voice. Finally, they put a halter round his neck; he was in a state of violent agitation, writhing and shrieking, until his head was actually cut off. Then his head was sent to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's army camp and publicly paraded round it, while his corpse was sent to Baghdad, where it was gibbeted in two halves on the bridge (over the Tigris), one half at each end of it. Ten months had elapsed between his rebellion at Kūfah and his execution.[66] [9

At the time of Abū al-Sarāyā's crossing of the river, 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd had moved towards him, but when he had missed him, he had pressed on to Baṣrah and recovered it. The member of the Ṭālibids who was at Baṣrah, together with a group of other members of the Ahl al-Bayt,[67] was Zayd b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[68] It was he who acquired the nickname of Zayd al-Nār ("Zayd of the Fire"), simply because of the large number of houses belonging to the 'Abbāsid family and their retainers at Baṣrah which he

65. Town of Iraq on the road from Baghdad to Ḥulwān and Khurasan; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 156–7; Le Strange, Lands, 62–3. According to Ya'qūbī, loc. cit., the interception took place at Rustaqābādh (conjectural reading of the text), but since this was in Ahwāz (the later 'Askar Mukram, Le Strange, Lands, 237), this can hardly be correct.

66. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 765; Ya'qūbī, loc. cit.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 59 = ed. Pellat, § 2744; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 547–9; Azdī, 338–9; 'Uyūn, 347; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 309–10; F. Gabrieli, Al-Ma'mun e gli Alidi, 10–23.

67. Here used apparently in the strict sense of the 'Alids, but the term had varying degrees of wideness; see EI[2] s.v. (I. Goldziher—Wensinck—A.S. Tritton).

68. I.e., the son of the sixth Imām Mūsā al-Kāẓim.

burnt down.[69] Whenever a member of the Musawwidah[70] was brought before him, he used to decree that his punishment was to be burnt alive. Zayd's supporters also plundered wealth and possessions at Baṣrah. 'Alī b. Abī Sa'id now took Zayd prisoner; it is said that the latter sought a guarantee of safety, and 'Alī granted this to him. From amongst the commanders who were with him, 'Alī b. Sa'īd then sent 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Julūdī,[71] Warqā' b. Jamīl, Ḥamdawayh b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān[72] and Hārūn b. al-Musayyab[73] to Mecca, Madīnah and the Yemen, ordering them to make war on any of the Ṭālibids in those places.[74] Al-Taymī[75] composed the following verses about al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's killing of Abū al-Sarāyā:

Have you not considered al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's blow, dealt with your sword, O Commander of the Faithful?

It sent Abū al-Sarāyā's head spinning as far as Marw, but preserved a warning [the corpse] to those crossing over [the bridge]. [987]

When Abū al-Sarāyā was killed, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl sent Muḥammad b. Muḥammad to al-Ma'mūn in Khurasan.

---

69. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 546; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 534. On the significance of Zayd's insurrection, see Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien et la formation de Ǧāhiẓ, 198–9.

70. "Those who wear black garments," the supporters of the 'Abbāsids.

71. Subsequently governor of Egypt in 212 (827) after 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir's pacification of the country (see below, 159 ff.); see Kindī, Kitāb al-Wulāt wa-Kitāb al-Quḍāt, 184 ff.

72. Member of an Abnā' family and son of the 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān whose governorship in Khurasan under al-Rashīd had been so oppressive; Ḥamdawayh himself subsequently became governor of the Yemen (see below, 38). See E. Daniel, The political and social history of Khurasan under Abbasid rule 747–820, 170–4; Crone, 187.

73. Scion of a family of prominent 'Abbāsid supporters in Khurasan; see Crone, 187.

74. Ya'qūbī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 310.

75. Text, al-Tamīmī. The correct reading appears in Azdī, 339, the poet in question being the mājin or libertine poet and colleague of Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, 'Abdallāh b. Ayyūb, a mawlā of the Meccan clan of Taym; see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 114–25.

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib rebelled in the Yemen.[76]

Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā Rebels in the Yemen

According to what has been mentioned, Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā and a group of members of his family were at Mecca when Abū al-Sarāyā rebelled and the fate of the latter and that of the Ṭālibids in Iraq were as described. News of them reached Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā. He therefore set out from Mecca, together with those of his family who were with him, making for the Yemen; the governor of the Yemen at that time was Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, who resided there and held power on al-Ma'mūn's behalf.[77] When Isḥāq heard about the 'Alid Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā's approach and how near he was to Ṣan'ā', he set off from the Yemen along the Najd Road with all his troops, comprising cavalry and footsoldiers, and abandoned the Yemen to Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Ja'far, recoiling from the prospect of fighting him. He had heard news of how his paternal uncle Dāwūd b. 'Īsā had acted at Mecca and Madīnah, so he did the same thing, (abandoning his charge without striking a blow). He journeyed onwards in the direction of Mecca until he descended to Mushāsh and then encamped there. He planned to enter Mecca, but the body of 'Alids within the city prevented him. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā's mother was at this time in Mecca, in concealment from the 'Alids; they were searching for her, but she remained in hiding from them. Meanwhile, Isḥāq b. Mūsā remained encamped at Mushāsh. Those persons who had gone underground in Mecca [988] now began to slip away along the mountaintops, and they brought 'Isā's mother to him at his camp. Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā used to be called al-Jazzār ("The Butcher") because of the large number of people whom he killed in the Yemen; he also took people as slaves and confiscated people's wealth.[78]

76. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 760; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 540, Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 56 = ed. Pellat, § 2740; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 533–4; Geddes, 100–1. Ibrāhīm was the brother of Zayd al-Nār (see above, 26–7), hence also a son of the Imām Mūsā al-Kāẓim.

77. Great-grandson of al-Saffāḥ's brother Mūsā and third cousin of al-Ma'mūn.

In this year, on the first day of Muḥarram (August 11, 815), after the pilgrims had dispersed on their various ways from Mecca, Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan al-Afṭas took up his position behind the maqām (Ibrāhīm),[79] on a doubled-over saddle cushion, and then gave orders regarding the covering of the Ka'bah.[80] As a result, the covering was stripped off until he left nothing at all of it, and the Ka'bah was left as a bare piece of stonework.[81] Then he had it covered with two pieces of fine silk which Abū al-Sarāyā had sent with him and which had written on them the following: "Al-Aṣfar b. al-Aṣfar[82] Abū al-Sarāyā, the propagandist for the house of Muḥammad, ordered this to be made as the covering of God's Holy House, and [he also ordered] that the covering of the tyrants from the progeny of al-'Abbās should be flung away so that the Holy House might be purified from [the profanation of] their covering. He wrote [this] in the year 199 [814/15]."[83]

Then Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan issued a command about the original covering of the Ka'bah, and as a result, it was divided up amongst his 'Alid supporters and their followers according to what he considered to be their respective statuses.[84] He directed his attention to the wealth in the treasury of the Ka'bah-

78. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 544; 'Uyūn, 347–8; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 310–11.

79. "The standing-place of Abraham," the stone, now kept in a small building in front of the façade of the Ka'bah, on which Abraham, re-founder of the Ka'bah after the Flood, is said to have stood; see EI[2] s.v. Ka'ba (Wensinck—Jomier).

80. I.e., the kiswah, the ornate, embroidered brocade covering, see ibid.

81. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 58 = ed. Pellat, § 2743.

82. Aṣfar, literally, "the light-coloured one;" the term Banū al-Aṣfar was often applied to the Byzantines and other Europeans (see EI[2] s.v. "Aṣfar" [Goldziher]), but is perhaps here used as a contrast to the use of black as the color par excellence of the 'Abbāsids (cf. the Musawwidah, above, 27). Abū al-Sarāyā's name al-Aṣfar was apparently used on the coins minted by him at Kūfah in the year 199 (814/5), see above, 16.

83. Cf. Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 264.

84. Or: "according to how he viewed their importance to his cause," 'alā qadri manāzilihim 'indahu.

and seized it.[85] He swept down on the house of every person who, so he heard, had deposited with him valuables entrusted to him by a member of the 'Abbāsid family or their followers. If he found there anything of these valuables, he seized them and inflicted punishment on the house owner; and if he found nothing there, he jailed and tortured the owner so that he [989] should have to procure his release by handing over the whole of his personal fortune and should have to make an attestation before the legal witnesses that the money in question belonged to the Musawwidah from the progeny of al-'Abbās and their followers. This procedure came to affect a large number of people. The man charged with torturing the victims was a man from Kūfah called Muḥammad b. Maslamah, who was living in a special house[86] near the (quarter of) the wheat dealers, which became known as the "House of Torture." The 'Alids so terrified the populace that a considerable number of the better-off citizens fled; the 'Alids thereupon punished these fugitives by pulling down their houses. They went so far as to interfere with people's womenfolk and to seize people's children, causing great scandal. They started scraping off the thin gilded covering on the capitals of the columns of the (Sacred) Mosque, and obtained from a single column, after much tedious labor, one mithqāl (4.25 gr.) or so of gold; this process was consequently applied to the majority of the columns of the Sacred Mosque. They wrenched out the iron which formed the gratings around Zamzam[87] and also beams of teak, and these were sold off for a negligible price.

Anti-Caliph in Mecca

When Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan and the members of his family accompanying him saw how the people's attitude towards them had 85. According to Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, I, 248, five thousand dirhams were appropriated as a forced loan; the custodians of the Ka'bah pursued their claim before al-Ma'mūn after Muḥammad b. Ja'far (see below) lost power in Mecca and managed to recover the money.

86. Dār khālişah, which might be alternatively rendered as "a white house;" the expression echoes Qur'ān, XXXVIII, 46.

87. The well in the courtyard of the Ka'bah; see EI[1] s.v. (Carra de Vaux).

changed on account of their behavior, and when they received news of Abū al-Sarāyā's execution, of the expulsion of the Ṭālibids resident there in Kūfah, Baṣrah and the regions of Iraq, and of the re-imposition of control there by the 'Abbāsids, they went together in a body to Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.[88] The latter was a venerable figure, of a very pacific nature, well-loved by the people at large and in no way associated with the evil activities of which many of the members of his house were guilty. He used to relate traditions concerning the religious sciences ('ilm) from his father Ja'far (al-Ṣādiq) b. Muḥammad; people used to write down this knowledge from his transmission, and he used to [990] show forth seemly behavior and asceticism.[89] They now said to him, "You are probably aware of your high status in the eyes of the people; so show yourself publicly, and we will give allegiance to you as Caliph, for if you do that, no two persons would dispute your status." Nevertheless he refused to accede to their request. But his son, 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Ja'far, and Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan al-Afṭas kept on at him until they persuaded the old man, against his better judgement, and he agreed to their plan. Thus they set him up on Friday, after the worship, the sixth of Rabī' II (November 13, 815). Then they did homage to him as Caliph, and all the people, including the permanent residents of Mecca and the temporary foreign immigrants (mujāwirūn), gathered round him in a body and pledged their allegiance, whether willingly or unwillingly, and addressed him by the title of "Commander of the Faithful."

He remained in this position and dignity for a few months, but held only the title and not the substance of power, while his son 'Alī, Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan and a group of their partisans behaved in the most outrageous possible way and committed the most reprehensible deeds. Thus Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan assaulted a woman of Quraysh from the Banū Fihr, whose husband belonged to the Banū Makhzūm and who was outstandingly beautiful. He sent a message to her[90] that she should come to him, but she refused his demand. He frightened her husband (with threats) and gave orders for him to be sought out, with the result that the husband went into hiding from him. Then, during the night, Ḥusayn sent a gang of his associates who broke down the house door, seized the woman's person and carried her off to Ḥusayn. She remained in his clutches almost till his departure from Mecca, but managed at that point to escape from him and return to her own family, who were at that moment involved in the fighting at Mecca. 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Ja'far assaulted a youth of Quraysh, the son of a judge in Mecca, called Isḥāq b. Muḥammad, who was extremely handsome. He rushed in and seized him, openly and by the full light of day, in his house on al-Ṣafā', overlooking the route of the pilgrims' sa'y; he hoisted him up on the saddle of his horse and himself rode behind him on the beast's hindquarters. 'Alī b. Muḥammad rode off with him and went right through the market until he came to Bi'r Maymūn[91] (he used to reside in the [991] house belonging to Dāwūd b. 'Īsā on the road to Minā). When the indigenous people of Mecca and the temporary foreign immigrants saw that, they all sallied forth and gathered together in the Sacred Mosque. The shops were closed and locked up, and the pilgrims who were circumambulating the Ka'bah (on the 'Umrah) joined up with them. They then went along to Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad, who was residing in Dāwūd's house and said, "By God, we shall certainly renounce our allegiance to you and kill you, unless you restore to us this youth whom your son has seized openly!" Muḥammad barred the door of the house and spoke to them from behind the grill of the window which opened on to the mosque and replied, "By God, I knew nothing (of this)!" He sent a message to Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan asking him to ride off to his son 'Alī and rescue the youth from him. But Ḥusayn refused to undertake this, protesting, "By God, you know perfectly well that I have no power over your son. If I were to go to him, he would attack me and set upon me with his band of partisans." When Muḥammad realized the position, he said to the people of Mecca, "Give me a guarantee of safety, so that I may ride along to 'Alī and take the youth away from him." They provided him with the required guarantee and allowed him to ride off. He rode along unescorted till he reached his son. Then he took back the youth from him and restored him to his family.

88. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 540; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 537–41.

89. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 56–7 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2741–2. His honorific title was al-Dībājah, "embellishment, handsome [face]," from his handsomeness and accomplishments.

90. Reading, with the editor, n. b, ilayhā for the text's ilayhi.

91. See concerning this, Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, II, 222; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 302.

The narrator continues: Only a short while elapsed before the 'Abbāsid, Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā, approached from the Yemen and halted at Mushāsh. The 'Alids gathered round Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad and said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, this is Isḥāq b. Mūsā approaching us with a force of both cavalry and infantry. We have come to the opinion that we should excavate a protective ditch and rampart around the higher parts of Mecca, and that you should show yourself publicly [in Mecca] so that the populace will see you and will take up arms at your side." They also sent messages to secure the support of the tribesmen of the surrounding districts and allotted subsidies to them, and they constructed the ditch and rampart around Mecca so that they might combat Isḥāq b. Mūsā from behind it. Isḥāq engaged them in battle over a period of several days, but then became disinclined to continue the fighting and the battle, and withdrew in the direction of Iraq. En route, Warqā' b. Jamīl and his personal force, and also those who were with him of al-Julūdī's force, met Isḥāq and said to him, "Go back to Mecca with us, and we will bring this fighting to a satisfactory conclusion for you." So he turned back in company with them till they drew near to Mecca and halted at Mushāsh. Those members of the Meccan mob who supported Muḥammad b. Ja'far, the blacks employed as water-carriers [sūdān ahl al-miyāh][92] and the tribesmen who had received subsidies, rallied round Muḥammad b. Ja'far, and he then got them ready for battle at Bi'r Maymūn. Isḥāq b. Mūsā and Warqā' b. Jamīl, together with the latter's commanders and [992] troops, approached and engaged them in combat at Bi'r Maymūn, and a considerable number on both sides were killed or wounded. Isḥāq and Warqā' then returned to their encampment, but returned to the fray a day later and resumed fighting the enemy.

92. Presumably slaves or ex-slaves. This interpretation of the phrase is that of Kennedy, 211, and fits well in the context; he notes the 'Alid attempts, here as in Kūfah, to enlist support amongst the lowest strata of society, the slaves and laborers.

Muḥammad b. Ja'far and his forces were now put to flight. When Muḥammad perceived this, he sent a group of envoys from Quraysh, including the judge of Mecca, asking them (Isḥāq and Warqā') for a guarantee of protection so that they might evacuate Mecca and go off to wherever they liked. Isḥāq and Warqā' b. Jamīl agreed to this request and guaranteed them a period of safety lasting for three days. When Tuesday arrived, Isḥāq and Warqā' entered Mecca, this being in the month of Jumādā II (January–February 816), with Warqā' acting as governor over Mecca on behalf of al-Julūdī. The Ṭālibids dispersed from the city, with groups of them making for various destinations. As for Muḥammad b. Ja'far, he started out in the direction of Juddah[93] and then went off towards Juḥfah.[94] However, he was intercepted by one of the clients of the 'Abbāsids called Muḥammad b. Ḥakīm b. Marwān. The Ṭālibids had despoiled Muḥammad b. Ḥakīm's house in Mecca and had violently ill-treated him; he used to act as the agent and steward (yatawakkalu) for one of the 'Abbāsids in Mecca from the family of Ja'far b. Sulaymān. He had now gathered together a force of the 'Abbāsids' slaves, those who worked in the gardens and orchards, and he eventually overtook Muḥammad b. Ja'far between Juddah and 'Usfān.[95] He then plundered and stripped him of everything which Muḥammad had brought with him from Mecca, to the point that he left him with nothing but his drawers, and fully intended to kill him; but in the end he threw him

93. The modern port of Jeddah; see EI[2] s.v. Djudda (R. Hartmann—P.A. Marr).

94. A settlement in the Tihāmah or Red Sea coastland of Arabia, on the pilgrimage route from Syria, between Madīnah and Mecca; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 111; Abdullah al-Wohaibi, The Northern Hijaz in the writings of the Arab geographers 800–1150, 102–12.

95. A settlement on the Madinah-Mecca pilgrimage route some forty miles northwest of the latter; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 121–2; Al-Wohaibi, 284–9.

a shirt, a turban, a cloak and a few dirhams (or: a very few dirhams, durayhimāt) on which he could eke out an existence. [993]

Muḥammad b. Ja'far set out and came to the territory of the Juhaynah on the (Red Sea) coast.[96] He remained there until the pilgrimage season came to an end, gathering together followers during this period, and on several occasions he clashed at Shajarah.[97] and elsewhere with Hārūn b. al-Musayyab, governor of Madīnah. The explanation of these clashes was that Hārūn sent men to seize Muḥammad b. Ja'far, and when the latter realized this intention, he marched out against Hārūn with the force which he had collected round himself until he reached Shajarah. Hārūn moved forward to confront him and gave battle. Muḥammad b. Ja'far's forces were defeated; he himself lost an eye through an arrow-shot, and a large part of his force was killed. Hence he withdrew and established himself at his original encampment, awaiting the outcome of the pilgrimage (in the hope that some of the pilgrims would join his cause). But none of those who had given promises to him ever showed up. So when he realized this, and when the pilgrimage season was over, he sought a guarantee of personal security from al-Julūdī and from Rajā' (b. Abī al-Ḍaḥḥāk)[98] al-Faḍl b. Sahl's cousin on his father's side.[99] Rajā' gave him guarantees in regard to al-Ma'mūn and al-Faḍl b. Sahl, that he should not be personally harassed and that the promise of security should be fully honored. He willingly accepted these conditions, and Rajā' brought him to Mecca eight days after the final dispersion of the pilgrims back to Mecca from Minā, on Sunday, the nineteenth of Dhu al-Ḥijjah (July 19, 816). 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Julūdī and Rajā' b. Abī al-Ḍaḥḥāk, al-Faḍl b. Sahl's cousin on his father's side, ordered the pulpit (minbar) to be brought forward and set up be-

96. The Banū Juhaynah, part of the Quḍā'ah group, occupied a large tract of the northern Hijaz, lying to the north of Madinah; see EI[2] s.v. s.v. Ḳuḍā'a (M.J. Kister).

97. A place just to the west of Madīnah; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 325; Al-Wohaibi, 337.

98. Official under al-Ma'mūn and al-Mu'taṣim, and subsequently head of the Dīwān al-kharāj or financial department for the former; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 240 n. 1.

99. 'Uyūn, 347–9.

tween the corner of the Ka'bah[100] and the maqām (Ibrāhīm), in the very same spot where homage had been given to Muḥammad b. Ja'far. The populace, Quraysh and the rest, had been assembled, and al-Julūdī then went up to the top of the pulpit, with Muḥammad b. Ja'far standing one step below him, wearing a short black coat and a pointed black cap, but without a sword, so that he might formally divest himself of power.

Then Muḥammad arose and delivered a speech, thus:

[994] O people, those of you who recognize me now knew me formerly, and those of you who do not recognize me, well, I am Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. Originally I pledged my allegiance to the servant of God, the Commander of the Faithful, 'Abdallāh, an allegiance by hearing and obedience, one freely entered into and not extracted by compulsion, and I was one of the legal witnesses who attested in the Ka'bah the two succession documents of Hārūn al-Rashīd regarding his two sons, the deposed one Muḥammad [al-Amīn] and the Commander of the Faithful, 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn.[101] Then, indeed, there arose civil strife which enveloped[102] the whole earth, involving ourselves and others, and a report reached me that the servant of God, 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, had died. This information led me to the position where they did homage to me as Commander of the Faithful, and I deemed the acceptance of that honor as lawful because of my earlier promises and convenants regarding my allegiance to the servant of God, 'Abdallāh; the Imām, al-Ma'mūn.[103] So you gave homage to me, [O people], or at least, those of you who did give homage [gave it]. But verily, the news has now reached me, and I attach full cre-

100. I.e., the northern 'Irāqī one, or, more probably, the eastern, Black Stone one.

101. The famous "Meccan documents" of 186 (802) in which al-Rashīd endeavored to arrange the succession and reconcile the conflicting claims of his sons; see Gabrieli, "La successione di Hārūn al-Rašīd et la guerra tra al-Amīn e al-Ma'mūn," RSO, XI (1926–8), 341–97; Kennedy, 124–5.

102. Reading ghashiyat for the text's ghushiyat.

103. I.e., he regarded himself as released from his earlier pledge of allegiance because of his belief that al-Ma'mūn was dead.

dence to it, that he is alive and sound in body. Indeed, I now ask pardon of God for having drawn you into giving allegiance to me, and I have cast off the allegiance which you pledged to me in exactly the same way as I have taken off this ring of mine from my finger. I have reverted to the status of being an ordinary Muslim, so that the Muslims have no obligation of allegiance to me, and I have extricated myself from all that affair. God has restored the rightful authority to the trusty Caliph, the servant of God, 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn, Commander of the Faithful. Praise to be God, the lord of the worlds, and blessings be upon Muḥammad, the seal of the prophets. Farewell, O Muslims!

Then he descended from the pulpit, and 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Julūdī set off with him towards Iraq. He left behind as governor over Mecca his son, Muḥammad b. 'Īsā, in the year 201 (816/17). 'Īsā and Muḥammad b. Ja'far travelled onwards until 'Īsā handed the latter over to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, who then sent him onwards, in the custodianship of Rajā' b. Abī al-Ḍaḥḥāk, to al-Ma'mūn at Marw.[104] [995]

In this year, the Ṭālibid Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad sent one of the progeny of 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib[105] from the Yemen to Mecca with a numerous military force in order that he might lead the pilgrimage. But the 'Aqīlī was met by armed resistance and put to flight, and was unable to enter Mecca.

The affair of Ibrāhīm and the 'Aqīlī

It is mentioned that Abū Isḥāq b. Hārūn al-Rashīd[106] led the pilgrimage in the year 200 (816). He travelled onwards until he entered Mecca, being accompanied by a large number of his commanders, including Ḥamdawayh b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān, whom al-Ḥasan b. Sahl had appointed governor over the Yemen. They went into Mecca, where al-Julūdī and his troops and commanders were in control. The 'Alid Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad dispatched from the Yemen one of the progeny of 'Aqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, ordering him to lead the pilgrimage. When the 'Aqīlī got as far as the garden of Ibn 'Āmir, he heard the news that Abū Isḥāq b. Hārūn al-Rashīd had taken charge of the pilgrimage and that he had with him commanders and troops (so numerous) that no one had power to withstand him. The 'Aqīlī halted at the garden of Ibn 'Āmir, and then there passed by him a caravan of pilgrims and merchants which also had with it the covering (kiswah) for the Ka'bah and fragrant perfumes for it. He seized the merchants' goods and the covering and perfumes for the Ka'bah, and the pilgrims and traders reached Mecca naked and stripped of their possessions.

104. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 761, 763; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 544; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 540; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 311–13. Muḥammad b. Ja'far died in Gurgān en route for Marw; Ya'qūbī, loc. cit.

105. I.e., a descendant of the Caliph 'Alī's half-brother; although 'Aqīl had supported Mu'āwiyah, his descendants adopted pro-'Alid views and are often reckoned among the Ahl al-Bayt (see above, 26). It now seems possible that the later Fāṭimid caliphs of Egypt and Syria arose from the 'Aqīlī branch of the Ṭālibids; Professor Heinz Halm of Tübingen University hopes to document this in a future publication.

106. I.e., the later Caliph al-Mu'taṣim.

News of this reached Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd, who was at that moment residing in the house (or: factory, storehouse) of the glass vessels (dār al-qawārīr)[107] in Mecca. He gathered together [996] his commanders and sought their advice. Al-Julūdī told him—this being two or three days before the Day of Refreshment ([Yawm] al-Tarwiyah)[108]—"May God keep the Amīr in the upright way! I will deal with these rebels for you. I will sally forth against them with fifty of the élite of my companions and another fifty whom I shall select from the rest of the commanders." They all agreed with him about this plan. Hence al-Julūdī marched out with his hundred men, until he fell upon the 'Aqīlī and his companions in the morning at the garden of Ibn 'Āmir. He surrounded them and took the greater part of them prisoner. Some of them took to flight, running away on foot. He got back the covering of the Ka'bah, except for part of it which the deserters from the 'Aqīlī's force had fled with a day previously, and also the perfumes and the goods of

107. Mentioned several times in Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, e.g., II, 75, 87, 250, as marking an open space and also a gate adjoining the Sacred Mosque.

108. The eighth day of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, when the pilgrims shift from the rites performed within Mecca to those performed on the hills outside.

the merchants and pilgrims. He sent the 'Aqīlī captive to Mecca, and he had all the 'Aqīlī's captured companions brought before him. He ordered each of them to be beaten round the head with ten strokes, and then said to them, "O dogs destined for hell fire, get you hence, for by God, there would be no difficulty in slaughtering you and no advantage in keeping you captive." Accordingly, he released them, and they went back to the Yemen, begging for food along the road until the majority of them perished from hunger and from exposure.[109]

Ibn Abī Sa'īd adopted an attitude of opposition towards al-Ḥasan b. Sahl. Al-Ma'mūn sent the eunuch Sirāj and gave him instructions, "If 'Alī places his hands in al-Ḥasan's hand [in submission], or makes his way towards me at Marw, [then well and good]; but if not, cut off his head!" So Ibn Abī Sa'īd went to al-Ma'mūn in the company of Harthamah b. A'yan.

In this year, in the month of Rabī' I (October–November 815), Harthamah travelled from his army camp to al-Ma'mūn at Marw.

Harthamah's Journey to al-Ma'mūn and what befell him

It is mentioned that Harthamah, having dealt with the revolt of Abū al-Sarāyā and the 'Alid, Muḥammad b. Muḥammad, and having entered Kūfah, remained in his encampment till Rabī' I. Then, as soon as the new month began, he set off towards the [997] Nahr Ṣarṣar. People thought that he was going to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl at Madā'in, but when he reached the Nahr Ṣarṣar he continued in the direction of 'Aqarqūf,[110] then to Baradān,[111] then to 109. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 313–14; Geddes, 101–2. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 544–6, the 'Alid Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā himself successfully occupied Mecca after driving out its governor Yazīd b. Muḥammad b. Ḥanẓalah al-Makhzūmī, and remained there to enforce the bay'ah or oath of allegiance to the Imām 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Riḍā in 201 (817); cf. also Geddes, 102–3.

110. Settlement on the West Side of Baghdad, famed as the site of a large tell; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 137–8; Le Strange, Lands, 67; EI[2] s.v. (S.M. Stern).

111. Village on the left bank of the Tigris above Baghdad; see Yāqūt, I, 375–6; Le Strange, Lands, 50.

Nahrawān,[112] and he proceeded until he reached Khurasan. Before this, letters had come to him from al-Ma'mūn, reaching him at various stages of his journey, to the effect that he should turn back and take up the governorship of Syria or the Hijaz. Harthamah refused, however, saying that he would not retrace his steps until he had had a personal meeting with the Commander of the Faithful in order to give proof on his part against al-Faḍl because of his acknowledged wise counsels in the past to al-Ma'mūn and his forefathers. He wished to inform the Caliph about how al-Faḍl b. Sahl was conducting affairs to the detriment of al-Ma'mūn's interests and how al-Fadl was concealing items of information from him, and that he, Harthamah, would not leave him until he had brought him, al-Ma'mūn, back to Baghdad, the seat of the caliphate of his ancestors and their royal power, in order that he might assume direct control of his own sphere of authority and watch over its outlying parts. Al-Faḍl realized what Harthamah was aiming at, and he said to al-Ma'mūn, "Harthamah has stirred up unrest in your territories and amongst your subjects; he has given support against you to your enemies and has shown hostility to your supporters. He secretly used Abū al-Sarāyā for his own nefarious designs, Abū al-Sarāyā being one of the soldiers in his army, until Abū al-Sarāyā came to act as he did; if Harthamah had really wanted Abū al-Sarāyā not to behave in that way, Abū al-Sarāyā would not have done so. The Commander of the Faithful has written numerous letters to him instructing him to go back and take up the governorship of Syria or the Hijaz, but he has refused; he has come back to the Commander of the Faithful's door in a state of rebelliousness and dissension, openly using harsh words and uttering threats with the intention of making a great issue of it. If, despite all these crimes, he is allowed to go free, this will be a cause of corruption for others." In this way, he filled the Commander of the Faithful's heart (with anger) against him.

112. Town to the northeast of Baghdad where there was a bridge, carrying the road to Khurasan, over the Nahrawān Canal; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 324–7; Le Strange, Lands, 59–61; R. McC. Adams, Land behind Baghdad, 91–2.

Harthamah's journey was a protracted one, and he did not reach Khurasan till Dhū al-Qa'dah (June 816). When he arrived in Marw he was afraid lest his coming be kept from al-Ma'mūn, hence he had drums beaten so that al-Ma'mūn should hear the noise. The latter did in fact hear them, and exclaimed, "What is this?" They told him, "Harthamah has begun to thunder and lighten!" Harthamah himself imagined that he was in full fa- [998]
vor. Al-Ma'mūn then ordered him to be brought in. When he was brought in—the Caliph's heart having been changed against him, as described above—al-Ma'mūn upbraided him, "You have conspired with the people of Kūfah and the 'Alids, and you have intrigued and plotted with Abū al-Sarāyā until he came out in revolt and perpetrated his various misdeeds. He was one of your retainers, and if you had really wanted to arrest the whole lot of them, you could have done so; but you let the rope around their throats be slack and you let the halter on their necks hang loosely." Harthamah was impelled to speak out, to make excuses and to defend himself against the charges levelled at him; but al-Ma'mūn would not listen to any of this. He gave orders; Harthamah's nose was violently struck, his belly was trampled on and he was dragged out of the Caliph's presence. Al-Faḍl b. Sahl had previously instructed his minions to treat Harthamah with harshness and violence, and he was then jailed. He remained in prison for a few days, and then they secretly conspired to kill him, reporting to the Caliph that he had died.[113]

In this year, an émeute was stirred up in Baghdad between the troops of the Ḥarbiyyah quarter[114] and al-Ḥasan b. Sahl.[115]

113. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 546; Jahshiyārī, Kitāb al-Wuzarā' wa-al-kuttāb, 259–61; Azdī, 341; 'Uyūn, 349–50.

114. The suburb to the north and northwest of the Round City, originally occupied by various groups of the 'Abbāsids' Khurasanian troops and named after al-Manṣūr's commander Ḥarb b. 'Abdallāh; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 107–35; Lassner, Topography, 68, 112, 152, 254 n. 26.

115. 'Uyūn, 351.

Trouble in Baghdad between the Troops of Ḥarbiyyaḥ and al-Ḥasan b. Sahl

It is mentioned that al-Ḥasan b. Sahl was at Madā'in when Harthamah set off for Khurasan, and he remained there until the news of what had been done to Harthamah reached the people of Baghdad and Ḥarbiyyah. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl now sent a message to 'Alī b. Hishām,[116] the governor of Baghdad appointed by himself, as follows: "Delay payment of their stipends to the army, both the Ḥarbiyyah and Baghdad troops; inspire them with promises of payment, but do not actually give it to them." Previously, al-Ḥasan had given promises to them that he would pay their stipends. Also, the Ḥarbiyyah troops had erupted when Harthamah had departed for Khurasan, and had proclaimed, "We shall not be content until we have driven al-Ḥasan b. Sahl out of Baghdad." Al-Ḥasan's financial officials in Baghdad included Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid (al-Marwarrūdhī)[117] and Asad b. Abī al-Asad. The Ḥarbiyyah troops now [999] rose up against them, expelled them and appointed Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. al-Mahdī[118] as al-Ma'mūn's representative in Baghdad. The citizens of Baghdad from both sides of the river concurred in this and approved of Isḥāq as governor. But al-Ḥasan used trickery towards them and was in correspondence with their commanders, until they rose up on the side of the 'Askar al-Mahdī.[119] He also began to pay out their stipends due for the previous six months, but only actually paid out exiguous amounts. The Ḥarbiyyah troops then transferred Isḥāq to their

116. Prominent Khurasanian, apparently brought westwards by al-Ḥasan b. Sahl to govern Baghdad, and subsequently executed, with his brother Ḥusayn, by al-Ma'mūn in 217 (832), see below, 192–4, and Kennedy, 152, 154–5. He was also a littérateur; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 617; J. Sadan, "Kings and craftsmen—a pattern of contrasts. On the history of a medieval Arabic humoristic form," SI, LVI (1982), 21–2.

117. Son of an Abnā' leader with a power base in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter, and ally of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn during the civil war between al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn; see Kennedy, 105, 144–5, 151, 154–6.

118. I.e., the son of the former Caliph al-Hādī.

119. The territories in the Ruṣāfah district of eastern Baghdad allotted by the Caliph al-Mahdī after his father al-Manṣūr had laid out Ruṣāfah, hence named after the former; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 42, 189; Lassner, Topography, 64, 251.

own camp and they installed him at Dujayl.[120] Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab arrived and then encamped at 'Askar al-Mahdī. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl sent 'Alī b. Hishām, and 'Alī made his way round the other flank and encamped at the Nahr Ṣarṣar. Then he, Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid and their commanders came by night and entered Baghdad. 'Alī b. Hishām lodged in the house of al-'Abbās b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath al-Khuzā'ī[121] near the Bāb al-Muḥawwal[122] on the eighth of Sha'bān (March 12, 816).

A little before that, the Ḥarbiyyah troops, hearing reports that the people of Karkh were intending to admit Zuhayr and 'Alī b. Hishām, had attacked the Bāb al-Karkh[123] and had gone on to burn it down and to plunder everywhere from the limits of the Qaṣr al-Waḍḍāḥ[124] to the area within the Bāb al-Karkh and to (the quarter of) the booksellers and paper vendors[125] during the night of (Monday-) Tuesday. On the Tuesday morning, 'Alī b. Hishām entered and engaged in battle with the Ḥarbiyyah troops over a period of three days at the old bridge and the new bridge of Ṣarāt[126] and at the water mills.[127] Then he promised the Ḥarbiyyah troops that he would pay their six months' stipend as soon as the tax revenues were gathered in. They, in turn, asked him for an immediate advance of fifty 120. The district of the Old Dujayl Canal which ran northwestwards from Baghdad to the Euphrates at Rabb; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 53; id., Lands, 51.

121. Former governor of Khurasan under al-Rashīd; see Crone, 185.

122. The gate leading out of the suburb to the southwest of the Round City, through which the nearby town of Muḥawwal ("the place of transfer," i.e., landing-stage) on the Nahr 'Īsā was reached; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 136–52; id., Lands, 67.

123. The gate of the suburb of Karkh to the south of the Round City, reached through the Bāb al-Kūfah of the Round City; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 63; EI[2] s.v. al-Karkh (M. Streck—Lassner).

124. Palace said to be formerly that of al-Mahdī, which marked the northern limits of Karkh; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 58, 92; Lassner, Topography, 61, 73, 248.

125. The Qaṣr al-Waḍḍāh quarter was famed for its booksellers and paper vendors.

126. The Ṣarāt Canal passed to the south of the Round City to join the Tigris; see Lassner, Topography, 101, 277.

127. The so-called "Mills of the Patricius" at the junction of the Greater and Lesser channels of the Ṣarāt Canal; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 148; Lassner, Topography, 75–6, 260.

dirhams to each soldier for their living expenses during the month of Ramaḍān. He agreed to this, and began to pay out the promised money, but had not paid over to them the whole of their stipends by the time that Zayd b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, the person known as Zayd al-Nār, had rebelled at Baṣrah.[128] He had escaped [1000] from his imprisonment at the hands of 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd, and then had rebelled in the district of Anbār,[129] together with the brother of Abū al-Sarāyā, in Dhū al-Qa'dah 200 (June 816). They sent forces against him, and he was captured and brought before 'Alī b. Hishām.

However, only Friday elapsed before 'Alī b. Hishām fled from the Ḥarbiyyah troops and set up his camp by the Nahr Ṣarṣar. The reason for this was that he had tricked the Ḥarbiyyah troops and had not fulfilled his promise to them to pay fifty (dirhams) by the time the 'Īd al-Aḍḥā (the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [July 10, 816]) came round. Furthermore they heard the news about Harthamah and his fate, so they fell upon 'Alī and drove him out, the guiding spirit behind this action and their leader in war being Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid. This arose from the fact that when 'Alī b. Hishām had entered Baghdad, he had treated Muḥammad with contempt. Furthermore, relations between Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid and Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab had deteriorated to such a point that Zuhayr caused Muḥammad to be flogged. Accordingly, the latter reacted angrily to this treatment, and in Dhū al-Qa'dah (June 816) went over to the side of the Ḥarbiyyah troops. He took the lead in proclaiming war against 'Alī b. Hishām and his forces, and people flocked to his standard. 'Alī b. Hishām lacked the strength to stand up to him, so they were able to expel him from Baghdad. Then they went after him in pursuit, until they defeated and [1001] dislodged him from the Nahr Ṣarṣar.[130]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn sent Rajā' b. Abī al-Ḍaḥḥāk and the

128. See above, 26–7.

129. Town on the Euphrates to the west of Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 257–8; Le Strange, Lands, 65–6; EI[2] s.v. (Streck—A.A. Dixon).

130. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 547; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 315–16.

eunuch Firnās to bring back ʿAlī (al-Ridā) b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad[131] and Muḥammad (al-Dībājah) b. Jaʿfar.[132]

In this year, the progeny of al-ʿAbbās were counted, and their number amounted to thirty-three thousand, including males and females.[133]

In this year, the Byzantines murdered their king Leo, who had ruled over them for seven years and six months, and they set up as ruler for his second reign Michael, son of George.[134]

In this year, al-Maʾmūn executed Yaḥyā b. ʿĀmir b. Ismāʿīl (al-Ḥārithī), because Yaḥyā had upbraided him in an unseemly fashion and had stigmatized him as "Commander of the Unbelievers" (Amīr al-Kāfirīn). Hence he was killed in his presnece.[135]

In this year, Abū Isḥāq (al-Muʿtaṣim) b. al-Rashīd led the pilgrimage.[136]

---

131. I.e., the eighth Imām of the Shīʿa, whom al-Maʾmūn was planning to nominate as his heir; see below, 61–2.

132. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 544–5; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 59 = ed. Pellat, § 2745; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 319.

133. Masʿūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.; Azdī, 339; ʿUyūn, 351; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

134. Ibid. Leo V the Armenian (813–30) was murdered in 820 by the partisans of Michael II the Stammerer (820–9), founder of the Amorian dynasty; see M.V. Anastos, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire. 1. Byzantium and its neighbours, 99–100; A.A. Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes. I. La dynastie d'Amorium (820–867), 280, noting that Arab authors confused Michael I Rhangabé and Michael II; id., History of the Byzantine empire, I, 272. Ṭabarī's date for the Emperor's death is therefore four years too early.

135. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 546, Yaḥyā was a confrère of Harthamah; see also Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 320; Crone, 257 n. 604, citing this incident as an instance of the opposition of the old Abnāʾ to al-Maʾmūn's Persianizing policies and reliance on Persian advisers.

136. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 764; Azdī, 341; Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

201

(July 30, 816–July 19, 817)

The events taking place during this year included the populace of Baghdad's attempt to persuade Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī to accept the caliphate; but he refused to accept it. On his affirming this refusal, they then dangled before him the prospect of assuming the military command (imrah) over them, with the proviso that they would recognise al-Ma'mūn in the Friday worship as Caliph, and he agreed to this.[137]

Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī Accepts the Military Command over Baghdad

We have already mentioned previously the reason why the people of Baghdad expelled thence ʿAlī b. Hishām. It is recorded concerning al-Ḥasan b. Sahl that, when the news of the Baghdādīs' expulsion of ʿAlī b. Hishām from the city reached him at Madā'in, he took to flight and retreated to Wāsiṭ. This took place at the opening of the year 201 (end of July 816). It has already been stated how the cause of ʿAlī b. Hishām's ejection from the city by the Baghdādīs was al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's sending Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī after Abū al-Sarāyā's execution and his rebellion[138] and his appointing ʿAlī b. Hishām as governor of the West Side of Baghdad, whilst Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab was to become governor over the East Side. Al-Ḥasan himself had remained at Khayzurāniyyah.[139] He had had ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Māhān[140] flogged for an infringement of the sharīʿah, so that the anger of the Abnā' was aroused; the populace rose up, and al-Ḥasan was forced to flee to Jarjarāyā[141] and then to Bāsalāmā.[142] He had ordered the [1002] troops of ʿAskar al-Mahdī to be paid their stipends but had refused to pay the troops of the West Side, and fighting had broken out between the soldiers of the two sides of the city. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid had distributed money to the Ḥarbiyyah troops and had put to flight ʿAlī b. Hishām. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl had then been forced to flee because of ʿAlī's flight.

137. ʿUyūn, 352.

Al-Ḥasan fell back to Wāsiṭ, and Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid b. al-Hinduwān pursued him, in open revolt against him, Muḥammad had himself assumed leadership over the people in Baghdad; he appointed Saʿīd b. al-Ḥasan b. Qaḥṭabah [al-Ṭāʾī][143] as governor of the West Side and Naṣr b. Ḥamzah b. Mālik [al-Khuzāʿī][144] over the East Side. Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, Khuzaymah

138. Reading here wa-fasādihi. One might also read baʿd qatli Abī al-Sarāyā wa-fasādihi/ifsādihi; the editor's n. c queries the manuscript's reading.

139. The quarter of Baghdad where Khayzurān, wife of al-Mahdī and grandmother of al-Maʾmūn, had had much property; see Nabia Abbott, Two queens of Baghdad, 120–1.

140. Brother of Ḥamdawayh, on whom see above, n. 72, and Crone, 179.

141. Clearly the emendation required of the text's Barbakhā, in the light of 50 below. Jarjarāyā was a town on the Tigris below Baghdad in the direction of Wāsiṭ; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 123; Le Strange, Lands, 37.

142. According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 322 (spelling Bāsalāmah), a village of the Baghdad district.

143. Member of an old Abnā' family, whose father and grandfather had been prominent in the ʿAbbāsid revolution; the family had fought strongly for al-Amīn in the civil war; see Crone, 188–9; Kennedy, 79–81.

144. From a similar background to Saʿīd's; his father had been governor of Khurasan for al-Rashīd; Naṣr's cousin Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh was a supporter of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī's anti-caliphate in Baghdad, see below, 66; and another cousin, Aḥmad b. Naṣr, suffered death under the miḥnah of al-Wāthiq. See Crone, 180–1; Kennedy, 80–1.

b. Khāzim (al-Tamīmī)[145] and al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'[146] gave him their support in Baghdad. It has been stated that 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid arrived during the course of this year from Raqqah, where he had been in the entourage of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, and he and his father agreed to attack al-Ḥasan. The two of them, together with those of the Ḥarbiyyah troops and the members of the Baghdad forces who were with them, proceeded until they reached the village of Abū Quraysh[147] near Wāsiṭ. Whenever they came upon a detachment of al-Ḥasan's forces in some place and a clash occurred there, al-Ḥasan's troops were on every occasion put to flight. When Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid came to Dayr al-'Āqūl,[148] he remained there for three (nights). At that moment, Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab was at Iskāf Banī al-Junayd,[149] acting as al-Ḥasan's financial agent ('āmil) over Jūkhā,[150] hence resident within his administrative charge. He kept sending messages to the commanders of the troops in Baghdad, and then sent his son al-Azhar. He himself proceeded as far as the Nahr al-Nahrawān, but came up against Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid. The latter rode forward against him and encountered him at Iskāf (Banī al-Junayd). He surrounded Zuhayr's force, but gave him a guarantee of personal security and took him captive. He brought Zuhayr into his camp at Dayr al-'Āqūl and stripped him of all the wealth and possessions, every single item, small or great, which he had with him. Then Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid advanced, and when he 145. From a similar background to that of Sa'īd and Naṣr, and now a leader in the anti-Sahlid movement in Baghdad; see Crone, 180–1; Kennedy, 81–2.

146. Formerly vizier to al-Rashīd and al-Amīn, subsequently a supporter of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 183–94; A.J. Chejne, "Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī'—a politician of the early 'Abbāsid period," IC, XXXVI (1962), 167–81; EI[2] s.v. (Sourdel).

147. A village between Wāsiṭ and Quraysh, the latter on the canal of the same name flowing into the Tigris below Wāsiṭ; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 337; Le Strange, Lands, 35.

148. Town on the Tigris below Madā'in; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 520–1; Le Strange, Lands, 35–6; Adams, Land behind Baghdad, 91; EI[2] s.v. (S.A. El-Ali).

149. Town on the Nahrawān Canal to the east of Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 181; Le Strange, Lands, 59–60; Adams, 95–6.

150. District to the east of the present course of the Tigris, to the north of Maysān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 179; Le Strange, Lands, 42.

reached Wāsiṭ, he sent Zuhayr back to Baghdad for imprisonment at the hands of a blind son of his named Ja'far.

Meanwhile al-Ḥasan remained at Jarjarāyā, but when he heard the news that Zuhayr had fallen into the hands of Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid, he travelled onwards till he entered Wāsiṭ and then encamped at Fam al-Ṣilḥ.[151] From Dayr al-'Āqūl, Muḥammad sent his son Hārūn to Nīl, which was being held by Sa'īd b. al-Sājūr al-Kūfī.[152] Hārūn defeated him and then pursued him until he (Hārūn) entered Kūfah, which he occupied, appointing a governor over it. 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Julūdī arrived from Mecca, accompanied by Muḥammad b. Ja'far. They set off together until they came to Wāsiṭ, via the land route. Then Hārūn retraced his steps towards his father, and they all met up together at the village of Abū Quraysh in order to enter Wāsiṭ, where al-Ḥasan b. Sahl was. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl then moved forward and encamped behind Wāsiṭ on its outer fringes. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' had been in concealment since the killing of the deposed one (al-Amīn), but when he saw that Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid had reached Wāsiṭ, he sent a message to him seeking a guarantee of personal safety; Muḥammad granted him this, and he emerged into the open. [1003]

Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid now prepared for battle. He and his son 'Īsā and their forces advanced to a position two miles from Wāsiṭ. Al-Ḥasan sent against them his troops and his commanders, and a fierce struggle took place by the residential area (abyāt) of Wāsiṭ. At a point after the time of the afternoon worship, a violent wind and dust storm blew up, until the combattants were completely mixed up with each other and confused together. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid's forces were defeated; he himself stood firm against the enemy, but received [1004]

151. Town on the Tigris at its confluence with the Ṣilḥ Canal, to the south of modern Kut el-Amara, shortly to be famed as the venue for the opulent celebrations of the consummation of al-Ma'mūn's marriage to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's daughter Būrān (see below, 153ff.); see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 276; Le Strange, Lands, 38.

152. Former supporter of al-Amīn, who soon after this deserted al-Ḥasan's side for that of the Baghdad insurrectionists (see below, 69–75); see Kennedy, 156, 159–60.

several severe wounds on his body.[153] He and his soldiers fled in total disarray, and al-Ḥasan's forces routed them.[154] This battle took place on Sunday the twenty-third of Rabīʿ I, 201 (October 19, 816).

When Muḥammad (and his forces) reached Fam al-Ṣilḥ, al-Ḥasan's forces marched out against them and drew up their ranks ready to give battle to Muḥammad's army. But when nightfall came, Muḥammad and his forces travelled onwards until they halted at Mubārak[155] and then encamped there. The next morning, al-Ḥasan's forces moved up towards them. They drew up their ranks against them for battle and the two sides clashed. When night enveloped them, they marched off till they reached Jabbul[156] and encamped there. Muḥammad sent his son Hārūn to Nīl, where he then took up his position, while Muḥammad remained at Jarjarāyā. His wounds became worse; he left his commanders behind with the rest of his army, and his son Abū Zanbīl had him carried till he brought him to Baghdad on the night of Saturday (Friday–Saturday),[157] the sixth of Rabīʿ II (October 31,–November 1, 816). Abū Zanbīl entered the city on the night of Monday (Sunday–Monday),[158] and Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid died of his wounds that very night. He was buried secretly in his house during that same night. Meanwhile, Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab was kept in prison at the hands of Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid. When Abū Zanbīl arrived, he went to Khuzaymah b. Khāzim on Monday, the eighth of Rabīʿ II (November 3, 816) and told him the news about his father. Khuzaymah sent to the Hāshimites and the commanders and 153. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 547, from an arrow.

154. As the editor notes, this phrase seems superfluous and adds nothing to the sense; if it is retained, one would have to emend hazama to hazamahum.

155. Village and canal on the Tigris to the north of Wāsiṭ; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 50–1; Le Strange, Lands, 38.

156. Small town on the eastern bank of the Tigris below Jarjarāyā; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 103–4; Le Strange, Lands, 36.

157. Reading, after the editor's suggestion in n. e, laylat al-sabt for laylat al-ithnayn, which gives the correct correspondence of date and day of the week and is congruent with the date of Monday, the eighth of Rabīʿ II below.

158. As the editor despairingly points out, this does not seem to accord with the reading laylat al-sabt possibly to be adopted, following also Ibn al-Athīr, for the preceding line (see n. 157 above); perhaps we should accordingly emend this also to laylat al-sabt.

gave them this information. He read out to them ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid's message, to the effect that he would assume the burden of the leadership in the war on their behalf, and they assented to this. ʿĪsā accordingly assumed the military leadership in succession to his father. Abū Zanbīl left Khuzaymah and went to Zuhayr b. al-Musayyab, dragged him out of his cell and cut off his head; it is said that he slaughtered him like a sacrificial victim. He took Zuhayr's head and sent it [1005] to ʿĪsā in his camp, and ʿĪsā stuck it up on a spearpoint. As for the body, they took it, tied a rope round the feet and then paraded it through Baghdad, carrying it past his own houses and those of his family in the quarter near the Bāb al-Kūfah.[159] Then they bore it publicly round Karkh, and brought it back to the Bāb al-Shām[160] in the evening; finally, when night came down, they threw it into the Tigris. This was on Monday, the eighth of Rabīʿ II (November 3, 816). Abū Zanbīl now made his way back to ʿĪsā, who dispatched him to Fam al-Ṣarāt.[161]

News of Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid's death reached al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, so he set off from Wāsiṭ and travelled as far as Mubārak. He halted there, and when it was Jumādā II (December 816–January 817), he sent Ḥumayd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Ṭūsī,[162] in company with ʿ.r.kū[163] al-Aʿrābī, Saʿīd b. al-Sājūr, Abū al-Baṭṭ, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ifrīqī and a number of other commanders. They encountered Abū Zanbīl at Fam al-Ṣarāt and defeated him. He fled to his brother Hārūn at Nīl, and the forces of the two of them engaged in battle with al-Ḥasan's army by the residential area (buyūt) of Nīl. They fought together for a while, and then Hārūn's and Abū Zanbīl's forces were defeated, and they fled as far as Madā'in. This was on Monday, the twenty-fourth of Jumādā II[164] (January 17, 817). Ḥumayd and 159. The southwestern gate of the Round City; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 17.

160. The northwestern gate of the Round City; see ibid.
161. The mouth of the Ṣarāt Canal which ran along the southwestern fringes of Baghdad.
162. Kinsman of Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb, and newly-arrived at this time from Khurasan to take command of al-Ḥasan's army; see Kennedy, 156, 159–60; *EI*² s.v. (ed.).
163. A conceivable reading for this same might be ʿUrwah.
164. Actually a Saturday.

his forces entered Nīl and sacked it for three days; they plundered the wealth and goods of the local people and further plundered the surrounding villages. Meanwhile, when Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid died, the Hāshimites and the commanders discussed the new situation together and said, "We will appoint one of ourselves as Caliph and throw off allegiance to al-Ma'mūn." They were urging each other on to these alluring courses when they received the news of the defeat of Hārūn and Abū Zanbīl. This only made them hurry even more in their plans, and they importuned Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī to accept the [1006] caliphate. He refused to accept the office, but they kept on at him until they made him amīr and representative (khalīfah) of al-Ma'mūn in Baghdad and Iraq, saying, "We won't accept the Zoroastrian, son of the Zoroastrian (al-majūsī ibn al-majūsī) al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, and we'll drive him out until he returns to Khurasan."[165]

It has been stated that, when the people of Baghdad rallied round ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid and gave him support in the struggle against al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, al-Ḥasan realized that he had insufficient military power to overcome ʿĪsā. So he sent, as an envoy to him, Wahb b. Saʿīd al-Kātib,[166] promising ʿĪsā a marriage alliance with one of his daughters; a sum of a hundred thousand dīnārs; a guarantee of personal security for himself, his family and the people of Baghdad in general; and the governorship of any region he might choose for himself. ʿĪsā sought from al-Ma'mūn a document in the Caliph's own hand setting forth these conditions. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl sent Wahb back with a favorable answer, but Wahb was drowned between Mubārak and Jabbul.[167] ʿĪsā now wrote to the Baghdad troops

165. ʿUyūn, 352. In a letter couched in violent and denunciatory language these rebellious partisans of the ʿAbbāsid family in Baghdad were later to castigate al-Ma'mūn for setting over them Magian governors; see below, 85, and W. Madelung, "New documents concerning al-Ma'mūn, al-Faḍl b. Sahl and ʿAlī al-Riḍā," in Studia arabica et islamica, Festschrift for Iḥsān ʿAbbās, 344.

166. Presumably the son of the Nestorian Christian secretary of the Barmakids, Saʿīd b. Wahb, from whom there later descended a line of viziers to the caliphs; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 143, 312.

167. See for these two places, above, 50 nn. 155–6.

that he was too preoccupied with the conduct of the warfare to concern himself with the collection of the land tax, and that they should appoint for this function one of the Hāshimites. So they nominated Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī. The latter encamped with his forces at Kalwādhā. They urged him to accept the caliphate, but he refused and said, "I am only the representative (khalīfah) of the Commander of the Faithful until he comes personally or until he appoints his own nominee as governor." The Hāshimites, the commanders and the army at large accepted this arrangement. The moving spirit behind this was Khuzaymah b. Khāzim. He now sent out commanders into every district.

Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī came immediately in pursuit of the sons of Muḥammad (b. Abī Khālid) until he reached Madā'in. He stayed there for just one day and then left for Nīl. When the news about these movements of Ḥumayd reached Manṣūr, he marched out and encamped at Kalwādhā. Yaḥyā b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān[168] came to Madā'in and then Manṣūr dispatched Isḥāq b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī[169] from the other side, and he himself encamped at the Nahr Ṣarṣar. Ghassān b. 'Abbād b. Abī al-Faraj[170] sent Abū Ibrāhīm b. Ghassān,[171] the governor of Khurasan's commander of the guard, to the region of Kūfah. [1007] Ghassān proceeded until he reached Qaṣr Ibn Hubayra and then halted there. When the news of this reached Ḥumayd —Ghassān being unaware of the fact that Ḥumayd had surrounded Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah—he took Ghassān captive, despoiled his retainers and killed some of them. This happened on Monday, the fourth of Rajab (January 26, 817). All the forces involved then remained in their respective encampments, ex-

168. Brother of the Ḥamdawayh and 'Abdallāh mentioned above, 27, 47, and deputy of his father 'Alī b. 'Īsā in the decisive battle of 195 (811) between al-Amīn's forces in Persia and Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn; see Kennedy, 140.

169. Grandson of Abū 'Abdallah Muḥammad, hence nephew of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr.

170. Cousin of the Sahl brothers, and subsequently governor of Khurasan before Ṭāhir's nomination and then governor in Sind; see below, 104, 179–80, 189.

171. On the apparent confusion between these two personages, see above, 24–5 and n. 58.

cept that Muḥammad b. Yaqṭīn b. Mūsā,[172] who was with al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, now fled from al-Ḥasan to 'Īsā's side. 'Īsā sent him to Manṣūr, who in turn sent him to the vicinity of Ḥumayd (and his forces). Ḥumayd was encamped at Nīl, except for a cavalry detachment at Qaṣr (Ibn Hubayrah). Ibn Yaqṭīn set off from Baghdad on Saturday, the second of Sha'bān[173] (February 23, 817), until he arrived at Kūthā.[174] Ḥumayd received news of this movement, but Ibn Yaqṭīn knew nothing of this last fact until Ḥumayd and his troops confronted him at Kūthā. They attacked Ibn Yaqṭīn and defeated him, killing some of his force and capturing others; a large number were drowned, too. Ḥumayd and his troops plundered the villages in the environs of Kūthā and seized cattle, sheep and goats, asses, and every piece of jewelry and finery, possessions, etc., which they could lay their hands on. Then Ḥumayd went back as far as Nīl, while Ibn Yaqṭīn withdrew and encamped at the Nahr Ṣarṣar.

Abū al-Shaddākh[175] has recited concerning Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid,

The lofty pride of the Abnā' has crashed to the ground after Muḥammad, and the great man of them who enjoyed power and respect has been brought low.

Yet do not rejoice at his death, O house of Sahl, for at some day in the future, the field of slaughter will be your lot too.

'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid counted the number of men [1008] in his army, and they came to one hundred twenty-five thousand, comprising both cavalrymen and foot soldiers; he then

172. Presumably the brother of the secretary and official for previous caliphs like al-Mahdī and al-Hādī, 'Alī b. Yaqṭīn, several times mentioned in Ṭabarī; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 112–14.

173. Actually a Monday.

174. The town of Kūthā Rabba, where there was a bridge of boats across the Kūthā Canal, running to the south of Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 487–8; Le Strange, Lands, 68–9; EI[2] s.v. (M. Plessner).

175. I have not been able to identify this poet.

gave each cavalryman a pay allowance of forty dirhams and each foot soldier an allowance of twenty dirhams.[176]

In this year, the volunteer fighters (al-muṭṭawwaiʿah) enthusiastically set about suppressing evildoers in Baghdad, under the leadership of Khālid al-Daryūsh and the Khurasanian Abū Ḥātim Sahl b. Salāmah al-Anṣārī.[177]

The Volunteer Fighters Suppress Crime in Baghdad

The reason for this was that the evildoers (fussāq) from amongst the Ḥarbiyyah troops and the mobsters (shuṭṭār) who were in Baghdad and Karkh inflicted great harm on the populace and indulged in evil behavior, brigandage and the seizing of youths and women openly from the streets.[178] They used to band together, go up to a man, seize his son and carry him off, and nothing could be done to stop them. They used to demand that people lend them money or give it to them as a gift, and nothing could be done to stop them. They used to band together, and then go out to the villages and overpower the local people, seizing all the goods, money, etc., which they could lay

176. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 321–4.

177. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 62 = ed. Pellat, § 2748, stigmatizing the volunteers as ruwaybiḍah "dregs of the population." Ṭabarī's qualification here min ahl Khurāsān most naturally refers to Sahl only, but in view of Khālid's Iranian other name, it was probably applicable to them both. For this most interesting episode, in which Khālid and Sahl, with slightly differing aims and attitudes, endeavored to halt the social and moral disintegration within Baghdad caused by the lack of discipline of the anti-Sahlid forces there and, doubtless, by the previous anarchy in the latter days of al-Amīn, see R. Levy, A Baghdad chronicle, 82–5; I.M. Lapidus, "The separation of state and religion in the development of early Islamic society," IJMES, VI (1975), 372–8; M.A. Shaban, Islamic history, a new interpretation. 2. A.D. 750–1055 (A.H.132–448), 46; Kennedy, 156–7.

178. Ṭabarī does not use here the term ʿayyārūn (although it is used in the corresponding context in ʿUyūn, 353), but it is clearly these anti-social, semi-criminal elements who are meant. On them and the shuṭṭār, elements of society much discussed recently by historians, see Cl. Cahen, Mouvements populaires et autonomisme urbain dans l'Asie musulmane du Moyen Âge, [40] ff.; Shaban, 45; R.P. Mottahedeh, Loyalty and leadership in an early Islamic society, 157 ff.; S. Sabari, Mouvements populaires à Baghdad à l'époque ʿabbaside, 77 ff.; EI[2] s.v. Ayyār (F. Taeschner).

their hands on. There was no government authority (sulṭān) which could restrain them, and none of its representatives had any control over them because the government authority itself depended on them for its power and they were, indeed, the government's own trusted guards. Hence it was impossible for the government to hold them back from any evil deed which they were perpetrating. They used to exact money from passersby on the roads, from passengers in the boats and from those riding on mounts. They used to demand protection money for watching over gardens, and they openly used to commit robberies on the roads. No one was able to stand up against them, and the people were in extreme misery because of them.

The culmination of their activities was that they sallied forth to Qaṭrabbul[179] and openly plundered the town, seizing [1009] goods, gold, silver, sheep and goats, cattle, asses, etc. They brought all these back to Baghdad and started publicly to offer them for sale. The rightful owners came along and appealed for the government authority's protection against them, but it was totally unable to punish them, nor was it able to get back for them, the rightful owners, anything at all of what had been seized. This was at the end of Sha'bān (ca. March 22, 817).

When the people perceived all that—what had been seized from them, the sale of their own possessions in their very own markets, and all the evil in the land, the oppression, iniquity and brigandage which the evildoers and mobsters had unleashed—and when they saw that the government authority was not reproving them in any way,[180] the God-fearing men from each suburban district and street (of the city) (ṣulaḥā' kull rabaḍ wa-kull darb)[181] rose up and went to each other, saying, "In each street there is just one evildoer, or a couple, or up to ten of them,yet they have managed to get the upper hand over you, despite your superior numbers. If only you would join together and agree on a concerted policy, you would put down these evildoers and they would not be able to commit all this iniquity in your midst." A certain man from the Anbār Road district, called Khālid al-Daryūsh, then came forward and summoned his neighbors, the members of his family and the inhabitants of his quarter to assist him in the enjoining of praiseworthy measures and the forbidding of reprehensible actions (al-amr bi-al-maʿrūf wa-al-nahy ʿan al-munkar).[182] They responded to his call, and he launched an attack on the local evildoers and mobsters and prevented them from carrying out their former depredations. They in turn put up resistance to him and intended to oppose him forcibly; so he fought them and defeated them, seizing some of them, beating them, imprisoning them and hauling them up before the government authority—not that he intended to criticize or blame that authority in any way.

179. Small town and district to the northwest of Baghdad, on the 'Isā Canal; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 371–2; Le Strange, Lands, 65–6; EI[2] s.v. (Lassner).

180. Reading here, and in two places below, with the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXVIII, the verb 'ayyara instead of the text's use of ghayyara.

181. The movement accordingly took advantage of local religious leadership. As appears from below, Khālid's center of power was in the western, Anbār Road area of the city, and Sahl's in the northern Ḥarbiyyah one; see Lapidus, 376. It is hard to see here, as does Shaban, 46, a movement deliberately manipulated by reactionary, wealthy, proto-Ḥanbalī merchants.

Then after him, there arose a man from the Ḥarbiyyah populace called Sahl b. Salāmah al-Anṣārī, one of the Khurasanians, who had the patronymic of Abū Ḥātim. He summoned the people to enjoin praiseworthy measures and to forbid reprehensible actions and to behave in conformity with the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet. He tied leaves of the Qur'ān round his neck and then began with his neighbors and the inhabitants of his quarter, giving them both positive injunctions and prohibitions; and they accepted these instructions from [1010] him. Then he summoned the populace en masse along these same lines, from the noble to the humble, from the Hāshimites to those socially inferior to them. He set up a register (dīwān) for this purpose in which were written the names of all who came and pledged loyalty to him (bāyaʿahu) in pursuance of these aims and in combatting all who opposed him and the measures which he advocated, whoever they might be. A great number of people came to him and pledged loyalty to him. Next, he went all round Baghdad, its markets, its suburban districts and its thoroughfares, and he prevented all those who were levying protection money and exacting payments from (making their demands on) passing travellers and on those visiting (the capital), announcing that "There is no protection-money [khifārah] in Islam." Al-khifārah meant that a man used to go along to the owner of a garden or an orchard and tell him, "Your garden is under my protection; I will ward off anyone intending damage to it, and you will have to pay me such-and-such amount of dirhams each month."[183] He had to hand over this money willy-nilly. The extortioner would have grown powerful through this if al-Daryūsh had not opposed him and said, "I do not mean to brand the government authority as being corrupt, nor to blame it, nor to combat it, nor to issue orders and prohibitions to it about anything." And Sahl b. Salāmah added, "But I shall attack anyone who opposes the Book and the sunnah whoever it may be, the government authority itself or anyone else; what is just and right [al-ḥaqq] is now established in the community as a whole, and whoever has pledged loyalty to me in this I shall accept, and whoever opposes me, I shall attack."[184] Sahl's proclamation of this took place on Thusday, the fourth of Ramaḍān, 201 (March 26, 817) in the mosque of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn which the latter had built in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter; Khālid al-Daryūsh had made his call two or three days previously.

182. Qur'ān, III, 100, the classic expression of the ruler's (or his deputy's, such as the muḥtasib or market inspector) duty to point the subjects in the direction of conformity with the sharīʿah; see e.g., Māwardī, al-Aḥkām al-sulṭāniyyah, tr. E. Fagnan, Les statuts gouvernementaux, ch. XX, 513–53; Lapidus, 376.

At this time Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī remained in his encampment at Jabbul. When these events involving the rise of Sahl b. Salāmah and his companions took place, and the news reached Manṣūr and ʿĪsā, it shattered them, for the greater part of their forces was composed of mobsters and evildoers. Manṣūr now entered Baghdad. Meanwhile, ʿĪsā had been corresponding with [1011] al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, so when ʿĪsā heard the news about events in Baghdad, he asked al-Ḥasan b. Sahl to grant himself, his family and his retainers a guarantee of safety, with the further proviso that al-Ḥasan would issue six months' pay allotment to his retainers, his troops and the remainder of the Baghdad troops when he had received the revenues from the tax collection. Al-Ḥasan agreed to this, and ʿĪsā left his encampment and entered Baghdad on Monday, the thirteenth of Shawwāl (May 4, 817). The whole of their forces was thrown into disarray, and then they entered Baghdad. ʿĪsā informed them of the peace agreement which he had made with al-Ḥasan b. Sahl on their behalf, and they assented to this.[185]

183. Khifārah, khafārah, "protection money" is in fact a term of ancient tribal life, the sum paid over to a khafīr or leader of tribal escorts for a caravan journeying through tribal territories; see H. Lammens, La Mecque à la veille de l'Hégire, 178–84. For a modern form of this due, khâwah (< khuwwah, "fraternity"), see H.R.P. Dickson, The Arab of the desert, 442–3.

184. I.e., Sahl is emphasizing the responsibility of the godly community as a whole, and not just the Caliph and his representatives, for bringing about the just society, one conformable to the sharīʿah; see Lapidus, 376.

ʿĪsā then retraced his steps to Madā'in. Yaḥyā b. ʿAbdallāh, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's cousin on his father's side, came to him, until he halted at Dayr al-ʿAqūl. They appointed Yaḥyā governor of the Sawād, associating him and ʿĪsā together in the exercising of the power of governorship. Each one was given a number of the sub-districts (ṭasāsīj) and tax divisions (aʿmāl) of Baghdad. When ʿĪsā took up the appointments which had been granted to him, this being at a time when the troops of ʿAskar al-Mahdī were hostile to him, there suddenly rose up al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mālik al-Khuzāʿī[186] proclaiming al-Ma'mūn's name and those of the two sons of Sahl, al-Faḍl and al-Ḥasan. Sahl b. Salāmah, however, displayed an attitude of aversion from him, saying, "You did not pledge your loyalty to me for this!"

Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and al-Faḍl b. Rabīʿ now removed themselves, having on the very day of their departure pledged their loyalty to Sahl b. Salāmah on the basis of behavior in conformity with the Book and the sunnah, to which Sahl had been summoning people. They encamped in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter, in flight from al-Muṭṭalib. Sahl b. Sa-

185. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 324–6.

186. Member of the family of the ʿAbbāsid naqīb or agent Mālik b. al-Haytham (see above, 47 n. 144) and former governor of Egypt, whose conduct was was characterized by such tergiversations as these; see Lapidus, 373–4; Crone, 182.

lāma came to the bridge[187] and sent a message to al-Muṭṭalib asking him to come to him; he also reiterated, "You did not pledge loyalty to me for this!" Al-Muṭṭalib, however, refused to come to him, so Sahl engaged in violent fighting with him extending over two or three days until 'Īsā and al-Muṭṭalib [1012] made peace together. 'Īsā now contrived secretly to send someone to assassinate Sahl. The assassin struck Sahl with his sword, but the blow did not have any serious effect on him. After this attempt on his life, Sahl retired to his house. 'Īsā thus became the people's leader, and they then all ceased from fighting.

Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd had remained at Nīl, but when he heard the news of this, he entered Kūfah and remained there for some days, before departing for Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, where he took up his position, obtaining a house and fortifying it with a wall and a trench; this was at the end of Dhū al-Qa'dah (mid-June 817). 'Īsā remained in Baghdad, inspecting and reviewing the troops and approving their fitness for service (ya'riḍu al-junda wa-yusaḥḥiḥuhum)[188] until the tax revenues were gathered in. He sent a message to Sahl b. Salāmah and apologized to him for what he had done (that is, for attempting his assassination), pledging his loyalty to Sahl and adjuring him to go back to his previous mission in direction people to praisworthy measures and restraining them from reprehensible actions, and promising that he would be Sahl's helper in all that. Sahl accordingly resumed his original rôle of summoning people to behavior in conformity with the Book and the sunnah.[189]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn designated 'Alī b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib as heir to the throne for the Muslims and as Caliph after himself, and gave him the name of The One Well-pleasing [to God] from the House of Muḥammad (al-Riḍā min āl Muḥammad); he further ordered his troops to 187. Reading, with n. d of the editor, al-jisr for al-Ḥasan.

188. On the institution of army reviews and musters, see EI[2] "Isti'rāḍ" (Bosworth), and id., "Recruitment, muster and review in medieval Islamic armies," in War, technology and society in the Middle East, 59–77.

189. 'Uyūn, 352–3; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 326.

discard their black robes and start wearing green ones, and he wrote letters announcing that to the farthest corners of the realm.[190]

Al-Ma'mūn Designates 'Alī b. Mūsā as Heir to the Throne

It is mentioned that, while 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid was busy reviewing and inspecting his troops after his return from his encampment to Baghdad, he received unexpectedly a [1013] message from al-Ḥasan b. Sahl informing him that the Commander of the Faithful al-Ma'mūn had made 'Alī b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad heir to the throne after himself. The reason for this, it said, was that al-Ma'mūn had given consideration to the members of the two houses of al-'Abbās and 'Alī but had not found anyone more excellent,[191] more pious or more learned than 'Alī. The message went on to say that al-Ma'mūn had given him the title of The One Well-pleasing [to God] from the House of Muḥammad, and it ordered him to throw off his black robes and put on green ones. This was on Tuesday, the second of Ramaḍān, 201 (March 24, 817). In the text of the message, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl further ordered 'Īsā to convey the command to all his subordinates and appointees—personal retainers, soldiers and commanders—and to the Hāshimites, that they should take an oath of allegiance to 'Alī (as heir to the throne); to require them to wear green-sleeved coats (aq-

190. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 764; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 545; Jahshiyārī, Kitāb al-Wuzarā', 255–6; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 562 ff.; 'Uyūn, 350, 353; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 326–7. On this episode in general, see Levy, A Baghdad chronicle, 80–1; Gabrieli, Al-Ma'mūn e gli Alidi, 35 ff.; D.M. Donaldson, The Shi'ite religion, 161–7; Abbott, 224; Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbāside al-Ma'mūn," REI, XXX (1962), 33–7; Y. Marquet, "Le Šī'isme au IX^e^ siècle à travers l'histoire de Ya'qūbī," Arabica, XIX (1972), 111; W.M. Watt, The formative period of Islamic thought, 176–8; Lapidus, 378–9; Kennedy, 157 ff.; Madelung, "New documents concerning al-Ma'mūn, al-Faḍl b. Sahl and 'Alī al-Riḍā," 333–46; EI^2^ s.v. 'Alī al-Riḍā (B. Lewis).

191. Afḍal. This adjective had emotive connotations for the Shī'ah when applied to 'Alī and his line, for the Shī'ah regarded each of these last as al-imām al-afḍal, "the most excellent leader of the community;" on this topic of faḍl as a characteristic of the imamate, see Watt, 226–8.

biyah),[192] tall pointed caps (qalānis) and other distinguishing features (a'lām);[193] and to compel the people of Baghdad in general to adopt these measures. When 'Īsā received these instructions, he proclaimed to the Baghdad troops that they should put them into practice, stipulating however to al-Ḥasan that he should expedite payment to them of a month's pay allotment and then the remainder when the tax revenues came in. Some of them replied, "We agree to take the oath of allegiance and to wear green;" but others answered, "We will not take the oath of allegiance, we will not wear green and we will not let this question of the succession pass out of the line of al-'Abbās; all this is nothing but machinations on the part of al-Faḍl b. Sahl." They persisted in this attitude for several days. The members of the 'Abbāsid family were angered by this; they banded together and discussed the question, and finally announced, "We will appoint as ruler one of ourselves and throw off our allegiance to al-Ma'mūn." The spokesmen here, the ones who were ceaselessly occupied in the negotiations involved in this matter and the ones who assumed the responsibility for it, were Ibrāhīm and Manṣūr, the two sons of al-Mahdī.[194]

In this year, the people of Baghdad gave their allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī as Caliph and declared al-Ma'mūn deposed.[195]

The People of Baghdad give allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī

We have already mentioned the reason for the members of the 'Abbāsid family in Baghdad rejecting al-Ma'mūn's provisions as

192. The qabā', a short coat of Persian origin, was becoming the general garment for ceremonial and court wear during this period; see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémoniale 'abbaside," 135.

193. This seems here a better translation than "flags" after the verbal noun libs on which these three nouns depend.

194. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 545; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 60–1 = ed. Pellat, § 2746; Azdī, 341–2; 'Uyūn, 353–4; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 326–7.

195. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 764; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 547–8; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.; 'Uyūn, 350, 353. On this episode in general, see C. Barbier de Meynard, "Ibrahim, fils de Mehdi, fragments historiques . . . ," JA, ser. 6. vol. XIII (1869), 225 ff.; Levy, A Baghdad chronicle, 80–5; Shaban, 45 ff.; Kennedy, 158–62; EI[2] s.v. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī (Sourdel).

they did, and the banding together of members of their group with the aim of combatting al-al-Ḥasan b. al-Sahl militarily, until he departed from Baghdad. When al-Ma'mūn proclaimed [1014] 'Alī b. Mūsā b. Ja'far as his heir and commanded the people to wear green, and when al-Ḥasan's letter reached 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid ordering him to put the measures into practice, and when he required the people in Baghdad to set about adopting them—this being on Tuesday, the twenty-fifth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 14, 817)—the members of the 'Abbāsid family in Baghdad proclaimed that they had given their allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī as Caliph and, after him, to his nephew Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. al-Mahdī. They declared al-Ma'mūn deposed and that they would issue a pay allotment of ten dīnārs to each man on the first day of Muḥarram, that is, on the first day of the coming year. Some people (among the Baghdad troops) agreed to this, but some would not agree to it until they actually got the payment. When Friday came round and they wished to perform the worship, they wished to set up Ibrāhīm as al-Ma'mūn's representative (in Baghdad) in place of Manṣūr. Therefore they gave instructions to a certain man who was to say, when the muezzin gave the call to worship, "We desire to pray for al-Ma'mūn and then, after him, for Ibrāhīm, who is to act as a representative." They had also secretly suborned a group of people and had told them, "When he gets up, saying, 'We will pray for al-Ma'mūn,' then you yourselves are to get up and say, 'We will only be satisfied by your giving allegiance to Ibrāhīm and to Isḥāq after him and by your declaring al-Ma'mūn irrevocably deposed; we do not wish you to seize our wealth and possessions, as Manṣūr did.' Then remain in your houses." Thus when the man got up to speak, this group of people answered him. Hence he did not lead them in the Friday worship on that particular Friday nor did anyone deliver the sermon. The people merely performed four cycles of inclinations (rak'ahs) and then went home. That took place on Friday, the twenty-eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 201 (July 17, 817).[196]

196. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 327.

[1015] In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Khurradādhbih,[197] governor of Ṭabaristān, conquered Lāriz[198] and Shirrīz[199] in Daylam and added them to the lands of Islam; he conquered the mountainous parts of Ṭabaristān; and he dislodged Shahriyār b. Sharwīn from them.[200] Salm[201] al-Khāsir has said (concerning these events):

Indeed, we expect the conquest of Byzantium and of China at the hands of one who has made us to prevail over[202] the royal power of Sharwīn!

So strengthen your hands by means of 'Abdallāh!
Indeed, he possesses an untiring faculty of judgment as well as faithfulness.

In this year, he sent Māzyār b. Qārin to al-Ma'mūn and took prisoner Abū Laylā, king of Daylam, without making any peace agreement with him.[203]

In this year, Abū al-Sarāyā's protégé Muḥammad b. Muḥammad died.[204]

---

197. Khurasanian commander and father of the geographer Abū al-Qāsim 'Ubaydallāh, called Ibn Khurradādhbih; for his governorship, see H.L. Rabino di Borgomale, "Les préfets du Califat au Ṭabaristān, de 18 à 328/639 à 939–40," JA, CCXXXI (1939), 262 (not recorded in E. von Zambaur's Manuel de généalogie et de chronologie).

198. Perhaps identical with Lārijān, also in this region near Āmul, pace Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 7; see Schwarz, 786; EI[2] s.v. Lār and Lāridjān (J. Calmard).

199. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 334; Schwarz, loc. cit.; according to Rabino di Borgomale, Mázandarán and Astarábád, 132, probably the present-day Shīr-rūd.

200. J. Marquart, Ērānšahr nach der Geographie des Ps. Moses Xorenac'i, 127–9. Shahriyār was a local ruler of the Bāwandid dynasty; see Zambaur, 187; EI[2] s.v. Bāwand (R.N. Frye).

201. Text, Sallām. Salm was a eulogist of the early 'Abbāsids, see Sezgin, GAS, II, 511–12. However, these verses must be attributed to him erroneously since, as G.E. von Grunebaum has pointed out, Salm died fifteen years before these events, in 186 (802); see his "Three Arabic poets of the early Abbasid age," Orientalia, XIX (1950), 56, 79.

202. Following here the correction of the Addenda et emendenda, p. DCCLXVIII.

203. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 328. On Māzyār and his family, the Qārinids of Ṭabaristān, see EI[1] s.v. Māzyār (V. Minorsky) and EI[2] s.v. Ḳārinids (M. Rekaya); Madelung, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 204–5.

204. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 340. The Zaydī youth mentioned above, is meant.

In this year, Bābak al-Khurramī became active with the Jāwīdhāniyyah, the partisans of Jāwīdhān b. Sahl, ruler of Badhdh;[205] he claimed that Jāwīdhān's spirit had entered into him, and embarked on mischief-making and evildoing.[206]

In this year, the people of Khurasan, Rayy and Iṣfahān were afflicted by famine; the price of food rose high and deaths resulted.[207]

In this year, Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī led the pilgrimage.[208]

---

205. Jāwīdhān was a leader of the Khurramiyyah before the rise of Bābak; see B. Scarcia Amoretti, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 505–6, 517. For al-Badhdh, the capital and bastion of these sectarians, see EI[2] Suppl. s.v. (Bosworth).

206. ʿUyūn, 354; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 328. Of the extensive literature on Bābak and the Khurramiyyah movement, see G.-H. Sadighi, Les mouvements religieux iraniens, 229–80; E.M. Wright, "Bābak of Badhdh and al-Afshīn during the years 816–41 A.D.," MW, XXXVIII (1948), 43–59, 124–31; Amoretti, op. cit., 503–9; EI[2] s.v. Bābak (Sourdel), s.v. Khurramiyya (Madelung).

207. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 340.

208. Ibid.; but in Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 764, Dāwūd b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā is named, and in Azdī, 342, Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.

The Events of the Year

202

(July 20, 817–July 8, 818)

The events taking place during this year included the people of Baghdad's giving their allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī as Caliph and their addressing him by the (regnal) name of al-Mubārak—it is said that they hailed him as Caliph on the first day [1016] of Muḥarram (July 20, 817) and declared al-Ma'mūn deposed.[209] When Friday came round, Ibrāhīm ascended the pulpit, and the first person to do homage to him was the Hāshimite 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad,[210] then Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, then the rest of the Hāshimites and then the commanders. The person who organized the ceremony of taking the oath of allegiance was al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abdallāh b. Mālik, and the ones who busied themselves and took charge of the whole affair were al-Sindī, the ṣāḥib al-muṣallā Ṣāliḥ, Minjab, Nuṣayr the slave retainer (al-waṣīf) and the rest of the clients and freedmen; these

209. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 547, gives Ibrāhīm the regnal name of al-Mardī and gives the date of the bay'ah to him as the fifth of Muḥarram, the same as in Mas'ūdī, al-Tanbīh wa-al-ishrāf, 349–50, tr. Carra de Vaux, Le livre de l'avertissement, 449.

210. Grandson of Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad and nephew of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr.

persons were indeed the leaders and foremost persons, (and did this) because of their anger against al-Ma'mūn when he wished to transfer the caliphate from the descendants of al-'Abbās to those of 'Alī and because he had abandoned the black garments of his forefathers in favor of green ones. When he had finished with the ceremony of pledging allegiance, he promised the army that he would give them pay allotments for six (months), but in fact he kept this back from them. When they realized this, they rose up in a clamor against him, so he gave each man two hundred dirhams. He also wrote to the Sawād on behalf of certain amongst them for the equivalent of the amount of pay owing to them in the form of wheat and barley. Hence they sallied forth to take possession of that, and everything in their path they carried off as plunder. In this way, they appropriated two shares in one operation, that of the local people and that of the ruling authority. With the aid of the Baghdad troops, Ibrāhīm secured power over the people of Kūfah and the whole of the Sawād. He established his encampment at Madā'in, and appointed as governor of the East Side of Baghdad al-'Abbās b. Mūsā al-Hādī and over the West Side Isḥāq b. Mūsā al-Hādī.[211] Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī recited the following:

O house of Fihr,[212] have you not realized that I have devoted myself to your defence in the perilous places?

In this year, Mahdī b. 'Alwān al-Ḥarūrī proclaimed a Khārijite rising (ḥakkama).[213] He raised the standard of rebellion at Buzurjshābūr and secured control of the sub-districts there and of the Nahr Būq and Rādhānayn.[214] Some people have asserted [1017]

211. Azdī, 342, 343; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 341.

212. I.e., Quraysh, Fihr usually being identified with the eponymous ancestor Quraysh.

213. The Khārijites were often called the Muḥakkimah because of their original call to 'Alī to submit to the judgment (taḥkīm) of God, and Ḥarūriyyah because their original secession from 'Alī's army took them to Ḥarūrā'.

214. Buzurjshābūr was a district to the east of the Tigris between Baghdad and Ḥarbā'; the Būq Canal connected Baghdad and Nahrawān; and the "two Rādhāns," Upper and Lower, comprised the district north of Madā'in to Nahrawān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 410, 510, III, 12–13, V, 318; Le Strange, Lands, 31, 35.

that Mahdī's rebellion took place in the year 203, in the month of Shawwāl (April 819). Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī sent against him Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd (the future Caliph al-Mu'taṣim), together with a group of commanders, including Abū al-Baṭṭ and Sa'īd b. al-Sājūr. In addition Abū Isḥāq had with him some Turkish military slaves (ghilmān). It is mentioned from Shubayl, the ṣāḥib al-s.l.bah,[215] that he accompanied Abū Isḥāq when he was himself a military slave, and they encountered the Khārijites (al-Shurāt)[216] in battle. One of the tribesmen aimed a lance-thrust at Abū Isḥāq, but one of his Turkish military slaves interposed himself to protect Abu Isḥāq, saying to the tribesman, "ashināṣ mā-rā [recognise me]!"[217] Abū Isḥāq gave him the name of Ashināṣ on that very day; he was Abū Ja'far Ashināṣ. Mahdī was defeated and driven back to Ḥawlāyā.[218]

A certain person (of those relating historical traditions) has said that Ibrāhīm sent only al-Muṭṭalib against Mahdī b. 'Alwān al-Dihqān al-Ḥarūrī. He marched against Mahdī, and when he drew near to the latter, he captured one of the non-activist Khārijites (qa'ad al-Ḥarūriyyah) called Aqdhā and killed him. The tribesmen banded together and attacked him, and routed him, compelling him to retreat into Baghdad.

In this year, the brother of Abū al-Sarāyā[219] rose in rebellion at Kūfah and adopted the wearing of white garments.[220] A group

---

215. Unexplained. Possibly a reference to an estate owned by this man, although Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 235, knows only vaguely of a Salabah mentioned in the historical traditions; perhaps more probably, given the military context of the passage, Shubayl was the official charged with the division of plunder, salab(ah), after a battle.

216. Again, the Khārijites were also known as "sellers" because they allegedly bartered (sharaw) their present life for a martyr's heavenly crown, echoing Qur'ān, II, 203.

217. In Persian.

218. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 548; Azdī, 343, 345, 350–2; 'Uyūn, 354; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 342. Ḥawlāyā was a village in the district of Nahrawān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 322.

219. Named as Abū 'Abdallāh, below, 72.

220. I.e., an anti-'Abbāsid, in this case almost certainly pro-'Alid, symbolic gesture; the wearing of green garments was an innovation of al-Ma'mūn, symbol of his hope of reconciling the two wings of Islam; see Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbāside al-Ma'mūn," 35. In Jahshiyārī, Kitāb of adherents gathered round him. Ghassān b. Abī al-Faraj then confronted him in battle in Rajab (January–February 818), killed him and sent his head to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī.[221]

Abū al-Sarāyā's Brother Adopts White Garments (tabyīḍ) and Appears at Kūfah

It is mentioned that al-Ma'mūn's message ordering him to adopt green clothing and to take the oath of allegiance to 'Alī b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad as heir to the throne after his own death reached al-Ḥasan b. Sahl when he was at Mubārak in his military encampment. The message further ordered him to move forward against Baghdad and besiege the people in it. Al-Ḥasan therefore struck camp and arrived at Simmar.[222] He wrote to Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd instructing him to move forward against Baghdad in order to besiege the people there from another side, and ordering him to adopt green clothing; this Ḥumayd duly did. Sa'īd b. al-Sājūr, Abū al-Baṭṭ, Ghassān b. Abī al-Faraj, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ifrīqī and a number of Ḥumayd's other commanders had written to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī undertaking to seize Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah on his behalf. There happened to have arisen a considerable distance between them and Ḥumayd himself, and at the same time, they were in correspondence with al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, telling him that Ḥumayd was in communication with Ibrāhīm, whilst Ḥumayd was writing similar information about them. Al-Ḥasan himself was writing to Ḥumayd summoning the latter to him; but Ḥumayd did not comply with this, fearing that if he set off to- [1018] al-Wuzarā', 256, Nu'aym b. Khāzim protests to al-Faḍl b. Sahl that white is the traditional color of the 'Alids, and green that of Kisrā and the Magians. In fact, as Farouk Omar rightly observes, there is much confusion and contradiction in the sources on this question of colors; what seems clear is that the wearing of white expressed opposition to the official 'Abbāsid authority, whether these opponents were pro-Umayyad, pro-'Alid or adherents of heterodox Iranian sects like the partisans of al-Muqanna' and the Khurramiyyah. See F. Omar, "The significance of the colours of banners in the early 'Abbasid period," in 'Abbāsiyyāt. Studies in the history of the early 'Abbāsids, 148–54.

221. Azdī, 343.

222. A village in the district of Kaskar, i.e., the region to the north and east of Wāsiṭ, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 246.

wards al-Ḥasan, the others would swoop down on his army. They, for their part, were writing to al-Ḥasan to the effect that there was nothing preventing Ḥumayd from going to al-Ḥasan except the fact that he was showing opposition to him and that he had purchased landed properties in the districts bounded by Ṣarāt, Sūrā[223] and the Sawād.[224]

When al-Ḥasan wrote messages to Ḥumayd insisting that he should come, Ḥumayd set out to go to him on Thursday, the fifth of Rabī' II[225] (October 21, 817). At that point, Sa'īd and his confederates wrote to Ibrāhīm passing on this information and asking him to dispatch to them 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid, so that they could transfer to his control Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah and Ḥumayd's army. Ibrāhīm had left Baghdad on the Tuesday and had encamped at Kalwādhā en route for Madā'in. When the message reached him, he sent 'Īsā to them. When the troops in Ḥumayd's army camp heard about 'Īsā's advance and [1019] his encamping at Qaryat al-A'rāb,[226] only one farsakh (six km) from Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, they prepared for flight; this was on the night of (Monday–) Tuesday. The troops of Sa'īd, Abū al-Baṭṭ and al-Faḍl b. Muḥammad b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī al-Kūfī[227] fell upon Ḥumayd's encampment and plundered everything in it. It is reported that they seized a hundred bags of wealth and goods belonging to Ḥumayd. One of Ḥumayd's sons and Mu'ādh b. 'Abdallāh fled; some of the fleeing troops proceeded in the direction of Kūfah and some in that of Nīl. Regarding Ḥumayd's son, he fled with his father's slavegirls to Kūfah, where he hired mules, and then set off along the highway till he caught up with his father at al-Ḥasan's camp. Meanwhile 'Īsā entered Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah; Sa'īd and his confederates handed it over to him, and 'Īsā took formal possession of it

223. Presumably the district of the Sūrā channel of the Euphrates (the main one at the present day), or the channel itself, which flowed by Ḥillah; see ibid., V, 321; Le Strange, Lands, 26, 70–2.

224. Presumably meant here in the restricted sense of the Sawād, i.e., the surrounding agricultural region, of Kūfah.

225. Actually a Wednesday.

226. "The village of the tribesmen, Bedouins."

227. Descendant of the great Kūfan family of al-Ash'ath b. Qays al-Kindī; shortly after this he was appointed governor of the city by Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī's supporters (below, 74); see Crone, 111.

from them. This was on Tuesday, the tenth of Rabī' II[228] (October 26, 817).

(This news) reached al-Ḥasan b. Sahl when Ḥumayd was with him, and the latter said to al-Ḥasan, "Didn't I tell you that this would happen? But you let yourself be deceived!" He then left al-Ḥasan and set off and came to Kūfah, where he collected some money and possessions of his which were deposited there. He also appointed as governor of Kūfah the 'Alid al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. Ja'far[229] and ordered him to wear green garments and to put in the sermon al-Ma'mūn's name and then after it that of his own brother 'Alī b. Mūsā. He provided him with a subvention of a hundred thousand dirhams and told him, "Fight on your brother's behalf, for the people of Kūfah will respond to your call for this cause and I shall, moreover, be at your side." After nightfall, Ḥumayd set out from Kūfah and left him there. Meanwhile, when al-Ḥasan had received the news, he had sent Ḥakīm al-Ḥārithī to Nīl. When all this came to 'Īsā's notice—he being at Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah—he and his forces got ready and then set out for Nīl. During the night of Saturday (Friday–Saturday), the fourteenth of Rabī II[230] (October 29–30, 817), a red glow appeared in the sky and then faded, leaving two red pillars in the sky which lasted till the end of the night.

On the Saturday morning, 'Īsā and his troops marched out of [1020] Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah to Nīl. Ḥakīm fell on them in battle. 'Īsā and Sa'īd actually arrived when the battle was already on. Ḥakīm was defeated, and the victors entered Nīl. While there, they received the news about the 'Alid al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. Ja'far, how he had summoned the people of Kūfah (to acknowledge al-Ma'mūn and then his own brother 'Alī b. Mūsā) and how a large number of the citizens of Kūfah had joined him. Another group of the people had, however, told him, "If you are going to place al-Ma'mūn's name in the sermon, and only after him your brother's name, then your appeal is of no concern to us; but if you will invoke your brother's name [first], or some other member of the 'Alid family or yourself, then we will join you." Al-'Abbās replied, "I am invoking al-Ma'mūn's name [first], and after his name, my brother's." Accordingly, the extremist faction (al-Ghāliyah) of the Rāfiḍah[231] and most of the Shī'ah[232] refused to support him. Al-'Abbās was also proclaiming publicly that Ḥumayd was going to come back with aid and military support for him and that al-Ḥasan was sending a detachment of his own troops as reinforcements; but not a single person of these ever reached him.

228. Actually a Wednesday.
229. I.e., the brother of the Imām 'Alī al-Riḍā and Zayd al-Nār.
230. Actually a Friday.

Sa'īd and Abū al-Baṭṭ set out from Nīl against Kūfah. When they reached Dayr al-A'war,[233] they took a road which brought them to Harthamah's encampment at Qaryat Shāhī. When Sa'īd's forces had gathered round him, they set out on Monday, the second of Jumādā I (November 16, 817). When they reached the vicinity of Qanṭarah[234] there marched out to engage them in battle the 'Alid 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Ja'far, the son of the man who had been hailed as Caliph at Mecca, and Abū 'Abdallāh, the brother of Abū al-Sarāyā, accompanied by a numerous host which his cousin the governor of Kūfah, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. Ja'far, had sent with 'Alī b. Muḥammad. They fought with their opponents for a period of time and then 'Alī and his followers fled in defeat back into Kūfah.

Sa'īd and his accompanying forces advanced until they made camp at Ḥīrah.[235] On the Tuesday morning, they set out and gave battle to 'Alī's forces in the neighborhood of 'Īsā b. Mūsā's house.[236] The members of the 'Abbāsid family and their clients

231. Originally, those who rejected (rafaḍa) the first three Caliphs. See Nöldeke, "Zur Ausbreitung des Schiitismus," Isl., XIII (1923), 73–4; Watt, index, and esp. 158–60, where the term's different denotations are given; EI[2] s.v. Ghulāt (M.G.S. Hodgson).

232. I.e., the more moderate Shī'īs, contrasted to the extremists.

233. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 499, a monastery in the environs of Kūfah, but not apparently mentioned in Shābushtī's Kitāb al-Diyārāt.

234. Often rendered as Qanṭarat al-Kūfah or al-Qanāṭir, bridge point and settlement on the Badāt Canal leading off the Euphrates to the north of Kūfah; see Le Strange, Lands, 74.

235. The ancient capital of the pre-Islamic Lakhmid kings, by now eclipsed by Kūfah, and lying just to the south of that city; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 328–31; Le Strange, Lands, 75–6; EI[2] s.v. (A.F.L. Beeston—I. Shahid).

236. I.e., that of the 'Abbāsid prince 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad, nephew of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr and one-time heir apparent to the throne, for fifteen and freedmen acceded to Sa'īd and came out from Kūfah (to join him). A battle then took place lasting all through the day till nightfall. Sa'īd's troops' battle-cry was, "For Ibrāhīm and [1021] Manṣūr, and no obedience to al-Ma'mūn;" they wore black, whereas al-'Abbās and his forces drawn from the people of Kūfah wore green. When Wednesday came, they fought again in the same spot, and every detachment of the troops was involved; whenever they secured control of something, they set fire to it. When the leading men of Kūfah perceived this, they went to Sa'īd and his confederates and asked for a guarantee of safety for al-'Abbās b. Mūsā b. Ja'far and his companions on condition that they evacuate Kūfah. Sa'īd and his confederates agreed to this. The Kūfan leaders then went back to al-'Abbās and informed him of this arrangement. They said, "The greater part of your forces is composed of the rabble [ghawghā'].[237] You must have seen what the local citizens have had to suffer—burning, plundering and slaughter—so depart from our midst, for we no longer want to be burdened with you." Al-'Abbās accepted their instructions, fearing that they were going to hand him over. He moved out of the house which he had been occupying by the open space of al-Kunāsah;[238] his followers, however, remained unaware of this arrangement. When Sa'īd and his forces fell back on Ḥīrah, al-'Abbās b. Mūsā's followers suddenly attacked those of Sa'īd's forces and the clients and freedmen of the 'Abbāsid 'Īsā b. Mūsā who had remained behind in Kūfah. Al-'Abbās's followers put them to flight, driving them back to the protective rampart and ditch (khandaq) (round the city)[239] and plundering the suburb (rabaḍ) of 'Īsā b. Mūsā; then years governor of Kūfah, died in 167 (783/4); see Lassner, The shaping of 'Abbāsid rule, index; Kennedy, 91–3; EI[2] s.v. (Sourdel).

---

237. An indication that, as in Mecca (see above, 33), the 'Alids' appeal was especially to the lower classes and mob; cf. Kennedy, 160.

238. Originally, as its name implies, a rubbish dump on the west side of the city, then an open space used for unloading caravans, for fairs, etc., but clearly by now containing buildings; see Le Strange, Lands, 75; EI[2] s.v. al-Kūfa (H. Djaït).

239. Presumably the rampart and ditch constructed in al-Manṣūr's time, but not enclosing, in Djaït's surmise, the Kunāsah and some of the suburbs; see ibid.

they set fire to the houses and killed everyone they could get hold of.

The members of the 'Abbāsid family and their clients and freedmen sent to Sa'īd informing him of these events and telling him that al-'Abbās had failed to keep his side of the guarantee of security which he had sought. Sa'īd and Abū al-Baṭṭ rode forth with their troops and reached Kūfah by the early part of the night. Every person who had been involved in the plundering whom they caught, they killed, and every possession belonging to al-'Abbās's partisans which they got hold of, they burned. Finally, they came to the open space of al-Kunāsah, and remained there for the greater part of the night, until the leading men of Kūfah came to them and informed them that the breaches of the guarantee had been the responsibility of the rabble and that al-'Abbās himself was blameless here; then they returned (to their homes). When morning came—this being Thursday, the fifth of Jumādā I (November 19, 817)—Sa'īd [1022] and Abū al-Baṭṭ entered Kūfah (proper).[240] A herald of theirs proclaimed that there was a guarantee of safety for everyone (literally, "for the white and the black"); the only measures which they took affecting people were beneficial ones. They appointed as governor of Kūfah a local citizen, al-Faḍl b. Muhammad b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Kindī.

At this point, Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī wrote instructing them to move to the neighborhood of Wāsiṭ, and he wrote specifically to Sa'īd instructing him to appoint someone other than al-Kindī as governor of Kūfah because of his bias in favor of his fellow-townsmen. So he appointed over it Ghassān b. Abī al-Faraj but then removed him after he had killed Abū 'Abdallāh, Abū al-Sarāyā's brother. Next, Sa'īd appointed over Kūfah his nephew al-Hawl. The latter remained governor until Ḥumayd b. 'Abd Ḥamīd marched on Kūfah and al-Hawl had to flee. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī also ordered 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid to make his way to the neighborhood of Wāsiṭ via the 240. Presumably the madīnah, that part of the city enclosed by the rampart and ditch.

Nīl Road, and Ibn ʿĀʾishah al-Hāshimī[241] and Nuʿaym b. Khāzim[242] to travel together; these last two set out from the region of Jūkhā, as Ibrāhīm had ordered them. This was in Jumādā I (November–December 817). Saʿīd, Abū al-Baṭṭ and al-Ifrīqī caught up with Ibn ʿĀʾishah and Nuʿaym, and they encamped at Ṣiyādah[243] near Wāsiṭ. They assembled all the forces in one place, under the leadership of ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid. They kept on making cavalry sorties each day as far as the encampment of al-Ḥasan and his troops at Wāsiṭ; but none of al-Ḥasan's forces would ever come out and engage them, remaining fortified within the town of Wāsiṭ. Then al-Ḥasan gave his troops the order to prepare to march out for battle, and they did this on Saturday, the twenty-sixth of Rajab[244] (February 7, 818). Fierce fighting raged till almost noon, but then ʿĪsā and his army were put to flight. They retreated till they came to Ṭarnāyā and Nīl, and al-Ḥasan's troops seized everything there [1023] was—weapons, beasts, etc.—in ʿĪsā's camp.[245]

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī arrested the vigilante leader Sahl b. Salāmah and then jailed and ill-treated him.

Ibrāhīm Arrests and Imprisons Sahl b. Salāmah

It is mentioned that Sahl b. Salāmah remained resident in Baghdad, adjuring people to act in accordance with the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet; he kept on urging people thus until the majority of the population of Baghdad had rallied to him and had taken up their abode around him, with the exception of those who remained within their own houses but who nevertheless agreed with and supported his views.

241. The ʿAbbāsid prince Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm al-Imām, great-great-nephew of al-Saffāḥ, active in support of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī and in 210 (825) executed by al-Maʾmūn, see below, 145–6, 147–8.

242. Presumably a brother of the Khuzaymah b. Khāzim who was also a supporter of Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī, see above, 47–8.

243. Or perhaps Ṣayyādah; unidentified, but presumably meaning, "place where traps, snares, etc., are set for game or fish."

244. Actually a Sunday.

245. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 342–4.

Ibrāhīm had intended to attack Sahl before the battle (in which 'Īsā was defeated at Wāsiṭ), but he had held back. When the battle actually took place, and 'Īsā's confederates and the troops with him were beaten, Ibrāhīm turned his attention to Sahl b. Salāmah. He now began to intrigue against Sahl and those supporters of his who had pledged their allegiance to Sahl on the basis of behavior in conformity with the Book and the sunnah and of denying obedience to anyone of God's creation who was in rebellion against his Creator.[246] Every person who had pledged himself to Sahl had constructed by the door of his house a tower of plaster and fired brick, with weapons and copies of the Qur'ān on it. These adherents of his reached as far as the Bāb al-Shām, in addition to his adherents among the people of Karkh and others.

When 'Īsā got back to Baghdad after his defeat, he, his brothers and his body of retainers proceeded against Sahl b. Salāmah, because he had been denouncing them for the most vicious of their works and activities and had been stigmatizing them as "evildoers" (fussāq);[247] he never used any other word in reference to them but this. So they fought with him over a period of several days, the leader in this struggle being 'Īsā b. Muḥam-[1024] mad b. Abī Khālid. When 'Īsā came to the streets and alleys which were near Sahl, he gave the people living along these ways a thousand or two thousand dirhams on condition that they would stand aside from the streets and alleys for him (and admit 'Īsā's troops). Thereupon they agreed to this, and each man received as his share one or two dirhams or suchlike. On Saturday, the twenty-fourth of Sha'bān[248] (March 7, 818), they prepared an onslaught from every direction. The inhabitants of the streets and alleys deserted Sahl, until the attackers penetrated to the mosque of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn and to Sahl's own house, while he himself was in the neighborhood of the mosque.

246. Lapidus, 376–8, notes that these two slogans had been used by previous revolutionary movements, the first originally by the Khārijites, the second by the 'Abbāsids themselves in their da'wah or campaign to achieve power; by adopting these, Sahl was setting himself up as the embodiment of the righteous community, if necessary against the caliphate itself, no longer regarded as the sole mouthpiece for the community or its sole representative.

247. Much theological discussion in early Islam revolved around the salvational status of the fāsiq, the man guilty of grave sins (kabā'ir); the Khārijites held that he was doomed to perpetual hell fire, and both they and the Mu'tazilah taught that a fāsiq imām or caliph should be deposed.

248. Actually a Sunday.

When they drew near to him, he concealed himself, threw away his arms and mingled with the crowd of onlookers and slipped in amongst the womenfolk. The attackers entered his house, and when they were unable to find him, set agents and informers to watch out for him. During the night, they arrested him in one of the streets near his house and brought him to Isḥāq b. Mūsā al-Hādī, the next in succession after his paternal uncle Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, who was in the City of Peace. Isḥāq questioned him and argued with him; he brought him into the presence of his companions and accused him, "You have incited the people against us, and have impugned the validity of our rule." Sahl replied, "My movement was in the name of the 'Abbāsids, and I was only adjuring people to act in accordance with the Book and sunnah; and at this present moment, I summon you to adhere to the program which I have laid down." However, they rejected his justification and then told him, "Go forth to the people and confess to them that the program to which you summoned them is invalid." He was brought out before the people, but told them, "You have been fully cognizant of what I summoned you to—to act in conformity with the Book and the sunnah—and I still summon you to it at this present moment." When he uttered these words to the people, 'Īsā's men slashed his neck and beat him in the face. When [1025] they did that to him, he cried out, "The one who has been deceived is the one whom you have deceived, O men of Ḥarbiyyah!" He was seized and taken in to Isḥāq, who put him in fetters. This was on the Sunday.

During the night of Monday (Sunday–Monday), they took him along to Ibrāhīm at Madā'in. When he came into Ibrāhīm's presence, Ibrāhīm spoke to him in the same terms as Isḥāq had done, but he still returned the same answer as before. They had captured one of Sahl's adherents called Muḥammad al-Rawwā'ī. Ibrāhīm struck him, pulled out the hairs of his beard, put him in irons and jailed him. When Sahl b. Salāmah was arrested, they jailed him also and gave out the supposed information that Sahl had been handed back to 'Īsā and that the latter had killed him. They only spread this story out of fear that the people would get to know where Sahl was and rescue him. The period between his first public appeal and his arrest and imprisonment was twelve months.[249]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn set out from Marw intending to go to Iraq.

Al-Ma'mūn's Departure from Marw

It is mentioned that the 'Alid 'Alī b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad told al-Ma'mūn about the conditions of civil tumult and fighting into which the people had been plunged since his brother had been killed; about how al-Faḍl b. Sahl had been concealing reports from him; that his own family and the people in general had condemned him for various things, saying that he was bewitched and mentally deranged; and that, when they had perceived all that, they had pledged their allegiance to his paternal uncle Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī as Caliph. Al-Ma'mūn replied that, according to what al-Faḍl had informed him, they had not pledged allegiance to Ibrāhīm as Caliph but had merely set him up as amīr to rule over and look after their interests.

'Alī then told al-Ma'mūn that al-Faḍl had misinformed and hoodwinked him, that a state of war existed between Ibrāhīm and al-Ḥasan b. Sahl and that people were condemning al-Ma'mūn for al-Faḍl's position and influence and that of his brother (al-Ḥasan), and for 'Alī's own rôle and al-Ma'mūn's requirement of homage to him as successor to the throne after al-Ma'mūn. Al-Ma'mūn asked, "Who of my military commanders knows [1026] all this?" 'Alī told him, "Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh[250] and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Imrān and a number of other leading commanders." The Caliph told 'Alī to send them into him so that he might interrogate them about 'Alī's report. So 'Alī had them—comprising Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Imrān, Mūsā, 'Alī b. Abī

249. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 345–6.

250. Of Khurasanian origin and a supporter of al-Ma'mūn; see Crone, 184. He is not to be confused with the famous ascetic and mystic of a generation later, Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh al-Rāzī, who died in 258 (872).

Sa'īd (the son of al-Faḍl's sister[251]) and Khalaf al-Miṣrī—brought into the Caliph's presence, and al-Ma'mūn asked them about what 'Alī had said. At first, they refused to say anything until al-Ma'mūn would give them a guarantee of personal safety from possible reprisals against them by al-Faḍl b. Sahl; the Caliph gave them this promise, wrote out for each one of them a guarantee in his own hand and passed it over to them.

Then they told him about the state of civil conflict into which the people had been plunged, giving a clear and detailed exposition of it, and informing him about the anger against him on the part of his own family, his mawlās (clients and freedmen) and his commanders, on account of so many things. (They pointed out) how al-Faḍl had deluded him in the affair of Harthamah, in that the latter had only come to al-Ma'mūn in order to give sincere advice and to explain clearly to him what was being wrought against his interests and how the caliphate would slip out of his hands and those of his family unless al-Ma'mūn reasserted his personal control over affairs of state; and how, nevertheless, al-Faḍl had secretly suborned someone to kill Harthamah, when the latter had only wished to offer wise counsel. (They further told the Caliph) that Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn had exerted himself to the utmost in al-Ma'mūn's service, had made numerous conquests and had secured the caliphate for him, but then when Ṭāhir had made everything smooth for al-Ma'mūn's assumption of power, he was suddenly torn away from everything and dispatched to a distant corner of the empire at Raqqah, with a denial of access to his own wealth and possessions until his position had become enfeebled and his own troops rose in revolt against him. If Ṭāhir had been the Caliph's representative in Baghdad, he would have exercised the governmental power firmly, and the assaults on al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's position would not have been ventured against Ṭāhir. All the different regions of the world had fallen apart, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn had been deliberately left in obscurity at Raqqah during these years since the killing of Muḥammad (al-Amīn), and his help had never been sought in any of these mili- [1027]

251. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 549, the son of al-Faḍl's maternal aunt.

tary campaigns; indeed, the help of people many times his inferior in worth had been sought. They asked al-Ma'mūn to go to Baghdad, adducing the argument that if the Hāshimites, their mawlās, the commanders and the troops could only see his prestige and might, they would become stilled and quiescent before it and hasten to give him full obedience.[252]

When al-Ma'mūn realized fully the truth of these allegations, he gave orders for departure to Baghdad. But when he issued this command, al-Faḍl b. Sahl realized that at least some of the responsibility for this decision stemmed from the commanders' advice; hence he treated them harshly, even having some of them flogged, jailing some others and having the hairs of the beards of yet others pulled out. 'Alī b. Mūsā then came to him repeatedly concerning them, and informed him about the guarantee of safety vis-à-vis him which they held; however, he told 'Alī that he would achieve his own aims anyway, by stealth. Then al-Faḍl set off from Marw, but when he reached Sarakhs,[253] a group of men attacked him when he was in the bath and hacked him to death with their swords. This happened on Friday, the second of Sha'bān, 202[254] (February 13, 818). They were apprehended, and the assassins proved to be men from al-Ma'mūn's retinue, numbering four persons, Ghālib al-Mas'ūdī al-Aswad, Qusṭanṭīn al-Rūmī, Faraj al-Daylamī and Muwaffaq al-Ṣaqlabī. Al-Faḍl was sixty years old when they killed him. They fled, and al-Ma'mūn sent people in pursuit of them, offering a reward of ten thousand dīnārs to whomsoever brought them back. Al-'Abbās b. al-Haytham b. Buzurjmihr al-Dīnawarī brought them back. They asserted to al-Ma'mūn, "You yourself ordered us to kill him!" The Caliph, however, ordered their heads to be cut off.[255]

---

252. 'Uyūn, 355–6; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 346–7.

253. A town of northern Khurasan, on the route through the desert from Marw to Ṭūs; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 208–9; Le Strange, Lands, 395–6; EI[1] s.v. (J. Ruska).

254. Actually a Saturday. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 350, tr. 449, has Monday, the fifth of Sha'bān (actually a Tuesday).

255. Id., Murūj, VII, 61 = ed. Pellat, § 2747; Azdī, 343. It was widely believed that the Caliph was behind al-Faḍl's assassination, now that the era of Sahlid ascendancy (marked also by al-Ḥasan's attack of acute melancholia shortly af-

It has been said that, when al-Faḍl's killers were captured, al-Ma'mūn interrogated them, and some of them said that 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd, the son of al-Faḍl's sister, had secretly suborned them, whilst others denied this. The Caliph ordered them to be executed, and then summoned 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Imrān, 'Alī, [1028] Mūsā and Khalaf for questioning. They denied having known anything at all about the affair, but he refused to believe them and ordered them to be put to death. He then sent their heads to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl at Wāsiṭ and informed him what a severe misfortune he had suffered through al-Faḍl's murder and how he had appointed al-Ḥasan to take al-Faḍl's place. The letter containing this information reached al-Ḥasan in the month of Ramaḍān (March–April 818).[256]

Al-Ḥasan and his troops continued to remain at Wāsiṭ until the tax collection became due and at least part of the land tax was gathered in. Al-Ma'mūn departed from Sarakhs for Iraq on the day of the breaking of the fast, al-Fiṭr (on the first of Shawwāl, 202 [April 12, 818]). Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī was meanwhile at Madā'in, with 'Īsā, Abū at-Baṭṭ and Sa'īd at Nīl and Ṭarnāyā making repeated military forays (literally: in the evenings and mornings). Al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abdallāh b. Mālik b. 'Abdallāh had set out from Madā'in. He now claimed to be ill, and started secretly acknowledging al-Ma'mūn as Caliph, on the plea that al-Manṣūr b. al-Mahdī was al-Ma'mūn's representative, and throwing off allegiance to Ibrāhīm. Manṣūr, Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and many commanders from the troops of the East Side (of Baghdad) followed his lead here. Al-Muṭṭalib wrote to Ḥumayd and 'Alī b. Hishām instructing them to move forward and that Ḥumayd should then encamp at the Nahr Ṣarṣar and 'Alī at Nahrawān.

When Ibrāhīm became fully apprised of this news, he set off from Madā'in to Baghdad and encamped at Zandaward[257] on Sat-terwards, see below, 85) was coming to an end; cf. Abbott, 224–5; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 208–10.

256. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 765; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 549–50; 'Uyūn, 355, 356–7; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 347–8; Donaldson, 168–9.

257. A place on the East Side of Baghdad, famed for its monastery; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 512–13 (citing a lost part of Shābushtī, see 'Awwād's edition, 337–8); Le Strange, Baghdad, 179; Lassner, Topography, 281.

urday, the fourteenth of Ṣafar (203 [August 21, 818]). He sent messages to al-Muṭṭalib, Manṣūr and Khuzaymah, but when his messenger came to them, they made excuses to him. So when Ibrāhīm perceived this, he sent ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid and his brothers to them. Manṣūr and Khuzaymah threw in their hands without a fight, but al-Muṭṭalib's clients and freedmen and his retainers put up a fight in defence of his house until the number of men against them grew too large. Ibrāhīm ordered a herald to proclaim that anyone eager for [1029] plunder should make his way to al-Muṭṭalib's house. By the time of the noon worship, the mob reached the house; they plundered everything they could find and further ransacked the houses of his kinsmen. They searched for al-Muṭṭalib but were unable to find him. This took place on Tuesday, the sixteenth of Ṣafar[258] (203 [August 23, 818]).

When the news reached Ḥumayd and ʿAlī b. Hishām, Ḥumayd sent a commander who seized Madā'in, cut the route across the bridge and encamped by it. ʿAlī b. Hishām sent a commander who encamped at Madā'in and proceeded to the Nahr Diyālā,[259] and then cut off the route there. Ḥumayd's commanders and their troops remained in Madā'in. Ibrāhīm now regretted what he had done in regard to al-Muṭṭalib, but he was still unable to get his hands on him.[260]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn married Būrān, the daughter of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl.[261]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn married his daughter Umm Ḥabīb to ʿAlī b. Mūsā al-Riḍā and another daughter, Umm al-Faḍl, to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Mūsā.[262]

---

258. Actually a Monday.

259. The Diyālā Canal ran from the Nahrawān Canal southwards to the Tigris below east Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 495; Le Strange, Lands, 59–61; EI[2] s.v. (S.H. Longrigg).

260. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 348.

261. Azdī, loc. cit.; ʿUyūn, 357; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 350. The consummation of the marriage took place in Ramaḍān 210 (December 824-January 825), see below, 153, 158. The reference here is to the Caliph's betrothal to the eight-year-old Būrān, see Abbott, 225.

262. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 61–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2747; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 565; Azdī, loc. cit.; ʿUyūn, 357; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 350; Donaldson, 167; Abbott, 224–5; Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife ʿabbāside al-Ma'-

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage and invoked his brother in the prayers as heir to the caliphate after al-Ma'mūn. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl had written to 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Julūdī, who was at Baṣrah, and the latter came to Mecca with his followers; he participated in the ceremonies of the pilgrimage, and then returned. Ibrāhīm b. Mūsā proceeded to the Yemen, which Ḥamdawayh b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān had seized.[263] mūn," 38, noting this as a sign of al-Ma'mūn's veneration for 'Alī, even after the reversal of these pro-'Alid usages after 'Alī al-Riḍā's death; Marquet, 127–8, also noting the Caliph's continued policy of sympathy for the 'Alids after 'Alī al-Riḍā's demise, displayed in several ways.

---

263. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 765; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, IX, 69–70 = ed. Pellat, § 3649; Azdī, 350; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.; Geddes, 103–4; Marquet, 111.

Events of the Year

203

(JULY 9, 818–JUNE 27, 819)

It is mentioned that one of the events taking place during this year was the death of ʿAlī b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar.

The Cause of the Death of ʿAlī b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar [1030] It is mentioned that al-Maʾmūn set out from Sarakhs until he arrived at Ṭūs. When he came to it, he halted at his father's tomb there for a few days. ʿAlī b. Mūsā then ate an inordinate quantity of grapes and suddenly died, this being at the end of Ṣafar (early September 818). Al-Maʾmūn gave orders, and he was buried at the side of al-Rashīd's grave.[264] In the month of

264. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 766; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 551, stating that he died at the village of Nūqān and giving a report that ʿAlī b. Hishām killed him with a poisoned pomegranate (for Yaʿqūbī's general attitude here, see Marquet, 127); Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 61 = ed. Pellat, § 2747; id., Tanbīh, 350, tr. 449, with the date of death given as 1 Ṣafar; Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 565–7, 571–2; Azdī, 352; Donaldson, 169, 171–2; Abbott, 226; Kennedy, 161. However, G.C. Miles, The numismatic history of Rayy, 105–8, regards this date of Ṣafar 203 for ʿAlī's death as too early, on numismatic grounds.

Rabīʿ I (September–October 818) al-Maʾmūn wrote to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl informing him that ʿAlī b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar had died and communicating to him how his death had overwhelmed him with grief and feelings of loss. He also wrote to the members of the ʿAbbāsid family, the clients and freedmen, and the people of Baghdad, announcing to them ʿAlī b. Mūsā's death, stressing that it was only his (al-Maʾmūn's) appointment of ʿAlī as his successor to the throne of which they had disapproved, and asking them to resume now their obedience to him; but they wrote back a reply to him and to al-Ḥasan couched in the toughest terms by which anyone could ever be addressed.[265] The person who led the prayers over ʿAlī b. Mūsā was al-Maʾmūn himself.

In this year, al-Maʾmūn travelled from Ṭūs en route for Baghdad. When he reached Rayy, he lowered its tax assessment by two million dirhams.[266]

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl was overcome by an attack of melancholia and depression (al-sawdāʾ). The cause of this was said to be that he suffered a severe illness, which subsequently brought about a mental disturbance, to the point that he had to be put in fetters of restraint and locked up in a house. Al-Ḥasan's commanders wrote to al-Maʾmūn about this, and a reply to their letter came back appointing Dīnār b. ʿAbdallāh as supreme commander of al-Ḥasan's army and informing them that the Caliph himself was on his way, close behind the letter.[267]

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī had ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid beaten and imprisoned.

---

265. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 351. The text of this letter is not extant, but what purports to be al-Maʾmūn's answer is reproduced by the much later Shīʿī author Majlisī, apparently going back to the historian Miskawayh; see Madelung, "New documents concerning al-Maʾmūn, al-Faḍl b. Sahl and ʿAlī al-Riḍā," 339–45.

266. Again, Miles, 105, regards this date as too early and would place this event in the year 204 (819/20).

267. ʿUyūn, 357; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 356. Shortly after this, Dīnār served briefly as governor of Jibāl for al-Maʾmūn; see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 553, and cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 223.

'Īsā b. Muḥammad is Beaten and Imprisoned

It is mentioned that 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid had been in constant correspondence with Ḥumayd and al-Ḥasan, the envoy between them being Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Ma'badī al-Hāshimī.[268] At the same time, 'Īsā was ostensibly displaying his obedience and giving his counsel to Ibrāhīm, but [1031] was never showing any fight to Ḥumayd nor opposing the latter's actions in any way. Whenever Ibrāhīm instructed him, "Get ready to go out and engage Ḥumayd!" he would make excuses to him that the army was clamoring for its pay allocations, or, on another occasion, he would say, "[Let us wait] till the tax yields are gathered in." He kept on in this vein until finally, when he became fully assured about what he wanted from the negotiations between himself and al-Ḥasan and Ḥumayd, he deserted Ibrāhīm's side, with the understanding that he would hand Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī over to them on Friday, the twenty-ninth of Shawwāl (April 29, 819). Information about this reached Ibrāhīm. On the Thursday, 'Īsā proceeded to the Bāb al-Jisr[269] and proclaimed to the people, "I have come to a peace agreement with Ḥumayd; I have solemnly pledged to him that I shall not trespass upon his administrative charge and he has guaranteed to me that he will not trespass on mine." He then ordered a defensive trench and rampart (khandaq) to be dug at the Bāb al-Jisr and the Bāb al-Shām. These words of his reached Ibrāhīm, as did news of what he had been doing. 'Īsā had previously asked Ibrāhīm if he might lead the Friday worship in the City (of Peace), and Ibrāhīm had assented. Now when 'Īsā uttered these pronouncements, and news of them was duly reported to Ibrāhīm, together with the fact that ʿĪsā was planning to seize him, Ibrāhīm was on his guard.

268. I.e., of the branch of the 'Abbāsid family descended from Ma'bad b. al-'Abbās; they owned property in Karkh, after which the Ma'badī bridge over the 'Īsā Canal was named; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 75; Lassner, Topography, 75.

269. Probably the gate leading to the main or upper bridge (jisr) constructed by al-Manṣūr to connect the district of the Khuld Palace with Ruṣāfah on the east bank, but the sources are not entirely explicit over the location; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 178, 198; Lassner, Topography, 151, 281. At all events, the defensive trench and rampart mentioned below would be along the northern perimeter of the Round City.

It is mentioned that Hārūn, ʿĪsā's brother, told Ibrāhīm what ʿĪsā was planning to do to him. Hence when Hārūn passed this information on, Ibrāhīm sent to ʿĪsā ordering him to come to him so that he might harangue and examine him about certain aspects of his intentions, but ʿĪsā adduced various reasons for not coming. Ibrāhīm kept on, repeatedly dispatching messengers to ʿĪsā, until finally he went personally to ʿĪsā's palace in Ruṣāfah.[270] When he went in, all the other people were excluded, and Ibrāhīm and ʿĪsā talked in private. Ibrāhīm started to reproach ʿĪsā, and ʿĪsā began to excuse himself from such reproof and to give the lie to some of the accusations which Ibrāhīm was making. When Ibrāhīm had forced ʿĪsā to admit to various things, he gave orders and ʿĪsā was beaten. He then imprisoned him, and arrested a number of his commanders and jailed them; he sent (men) to ʿĪsā's house and arrested the slave mother of his children and several of his young children and jailed them too. This took place in the night of Thursday (Wednesday–Thursday, the twenty-seventh–)twenty-eighth of Shawwāl (April 28–29, 819). Ibrāhīm searched for one of ʿĪsā's lieutenants called al-ʿAbbās, but the latter concealed himself.

When the news of ʿĪsā's imprisonment reached his family [1032] and his retainers, groups of them went along to each other, and members of his family and his brothers incited the people against Ibrāhīm. They gathered together under the leadership of (al-) ʿAbbās, ʿĪsā's lieutenant, and attacked Ibrāhīm's financial official at the bridge and drove him out; he crossed over to Ibrāhīm and told him the news, and Ibrāhīm ordered the bridge to be cut. They expelled every single one of Ibrāhīm's financial officials in Karkh and elsewhere. Evildoers and mobsters appeared, and took over the manning of the strong points (al-masāliḥ). (Al-)ʿAbbās wrote to Ḥumayd asking him to advance towards them so that they might hand over Baghdad to him.[271] When Friday came, the Friday worship in the mosque of the City (of Peace) comprised only four cycles of inclinations (raka'āt); the muezzin led the worship, but there was no sermon.

270. The westernmost quarter of what had been known as ʿAskar al-Mahdī (see above, 42, n. 119) on the east bank of the Tigris; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 46–7; Le Strange, Baghdad, 187–98; Lassner, Topography, 64–5, 250.

In this year, the people of Baghdad threw off allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī and mentioned al-Ma'mūn's name as Caliph in the prayers.

The People of Baghdad Throw off Allegiance to Ibrāhīm

We have just mentioned above the story of Ibrāhīm and 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid's relations, Ibrāhīm's imprisoning of 'Īsā, the banding together of 'Īsā's lieutenant (al-) 'Abbās and 'Īsā's brothers against Ibrāhīm and their message to Ḥumayd inviting him to come to them so that they might hand over Baghdad to him. It is further mentioned that this message of theirs, containing the stipulation that Ḥumayd should give each man of the Baghdad troops fifty dirhams, reached Ḥumayd, and he agreed to their terms. He moved forward till he encamped at the Nahr Ṣarṣar on the road to Kūfah on the Sunday, and (al-) 'Abbās and the commanders of the Baghdad troops went out to him. They met him on the Monday morning, and he gave them promises and hopes of reward, which they accepted. He promised them (specifically) that he would hand out the pay allotments to them on the following Saturday at [1033] Yāsiriyyah,[272] on condition that they would perform the Friday worship and would place al-Ma'mun's name in the bidding prayer and renounce allegiance to Ibrāhīm; to this they agreed.

When the news reached Ibrāhīm, he released 'Īsā and his brothers from jail and asked him to return home and take charge, on his behalf, of that side (of Baghdad); but 'Īsā refused to undertake this for him. When Friday came, (al-) 'Abbās sent to the legal scholar (faqīh) Muḥammad b. Abī Rajā',[273] and the latter led the people in the Friday worship and made the prayers in al-Ma'mūn's name. On the Saturday, Ḥumayd went to Yāsiriyyah, reviewed the army of the Baghdad troops and paid out to them the fifty dirhams which he had promised. They asked him, however, to reduce this sum by ten dirhams each and thereby pay forty dirhams each instead, because of their feeling of ill-omen stemming from the episode of 'Alī b. Hishām's offering them fifty dirhams and then tricking them by not paying out the allotments. Ḥumayd answered them, "No, I won't; on the contrary, I shall increase your pay and give you each sixty dirhams."

271. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 351–2.

272. A suburb of western Baghdad lying on the 'Īsā Canal towards Muḥawwal; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 425; Le Strange, Baghdad, 151–2; Lassner, Topography, 75, 100, 259.

When Ibrāhīm heard the news, he summoned 'Īsā and asked him to engage Ḥumayd in fighting; he agreed to do this, so Ibrāhīm let him go completely free, having however taken from him guarantors of his good faith. 'Īsā then addressed the troops and promised them the same as Ḥumayd had given, but they refused to accept this from him. On the Monday, 'Īsā, his brothers and the commanders of the troops on the East Side crossed over to them and offered the troops on the West Side an amount in excess of what Ḥumayd had given; but they greeted 'Īsā and his companions with obloquy and expostulated, "We don't want Ibrāhīm!" So 'Īsā and his companions went forward and entered the City (of Peace); they locked the gates and went up on the walls, and fought the troops for a while. When, however, the numbers opposing them became too great, they retreated till they reached the Bāb Khurāsān, and then they took to boats.[274] 'Īsā himself went back as if he intended to throw himself into the fight against them once more, but devised a stratagem so that he placed himself into his opponents' hands as if he had been taken prisoner; one of his commanders then took him to his house, whilst the rest of the troops went back to Ibrāhīm and told him what had happened. The news plunged [1034] Ibrāhīm into deep grief.

Al-Muṭṭalib b. 'Abdallāh Mālik had concealed himself from Ibrāhīm, so when Ḥumayd drew near, he tried to cross over to 273. Cf. ibid., 69, 255; this scholar is thus identified.

274. I.e., on the Tigris.

him. But the ferry man[275] arrested him and took him along to Ibrāhīm, who imprisoned al-Muṭṭalib in his house for three or four days and then freed him on the night of Monday, the first of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (Sunday–Monday, the twenty-ninth of Dhū al-Qa'dah-the first of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 203[May 30, 819]).[276]

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī concealed himself and disappeared from view after the period of warfare between him and Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd and after he had released Sahl b. Salāmah from prison.[277]

Ibrāhīm Goes into Hiding

It is mentioned that the people used to mention that Sahl b. Salāmah had been killed, when he was (in fact) held in captivity by Ibrāhīm. When Ḥumayd marched on Baghdad and entered it, Ibrāhīm brought Sahl forth, and the latter used to offer up prayers in the mosque of Ruṣāfah as formerly, and then when it was night, Ibrāhīm committed Sahl back to his imprisonment. He remained subject to this procedure for several days. Sahl's partisans came to him with the intention of joining up with him (banding together to release him); but he told them, "Stay in your houses, for I shall obtain something advantageous from this fellow [arzī hādhā]," meaning Ibrāhīm. On the night of Monday (Sunday–Monday), the first of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (May 30, 819), Ibrāhīm set him free, and Sahl went off and hid himself. When Ibrāhīm's retainers and commanders saw that Ḥumayd had encamped at the mills of 'Abdallāh b. Mālik,[278] the greater part of them transferred their allegiance to Ḥumayd, and seized Madā'in on his behalf. When Ibrāhīm real-

275. Reading, with the Addenda et emendenda, p. DCCLXVIII, al-mu'abbir "ferry man, boatman" (see Glossarium, p. CCCL); for the text's dubious al-m.'.b.d, which might, nevertheless, refer to the Ma'badī bridge, see above, 86 and n. 268.

276. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 548; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 353–4.

277. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 551; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 62 = ed. Pellat, § 2748; Barbier de Meynard, 250 ff.

278. 'Abdallāh b. Mālik's property lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris near Qarn al-Ṣarāt, where the Ṣarāt Canal joined the river near the new bridge; see Lassner, Topography, 70, 255.

ized this, he sent all the forces which he had with him forth to fight. The two sides met in battle at the bridge over the Nahr Diyālā and fought together. Ḥumayd defeated Ibrāhīm's forces. They cut the bridge, but Ḥumayd's forces pursued them right into the houses of Baghdad. This was on Thursday, the thirtieth of Dhū al-Qa'dah,[279] [203 [May 29, 819]].

When it was the day of the Festival of the Sacrifice ('Īd al-Aḍḥā) [the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 803 [June 8, 819]], Ibrāhīm ordered the judge to lead the people in the worship at 'Īsābādh;[280] he did this, and then the people returned home. Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' was in hiding, but then went over to Ḥumayd. 'Alī b. Rayṭah[281] likewise transferred to Ḥumayd's encampment, and the Hāshimites and the commanders began one-by-one to attach themselves to Ḥumayd's side. When Ibrāhīm perceived this, he was filled with self-reproach and thrown into misery. Al-Muṭṭalib had been in correspondence with Ḥumayd, undertaking to deliver to him control of the East Side of the city, while Sa'īd b. al-Sājūr, Abū al-Baṭṭ and 'Abdawayh, in company with a host of other commanders, were in correspondence with 'Alī b. Hishām, undertaking to capture Ibrāhīm for him. When Ibrāhīm got to know about their plans and that all his retainers were plotting against him, he realized that they had surrounded him, and he set about outwitting them. When nightfall came, he went into hiding on the night of Wednesday, the sixteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 203 [the night of Tuesday–Wednesday,[282] June 13–14, 819][283] [1035]

Al-Muṭṭalib sent a message to Ḥumayd informing him that he and his followers had surrounded Ibrāhīm's house, and if Ḥumayd was seeking Ibrāhīm, he was to come to him. Also,

279. Actually a Sunday.

280. This is what al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī calls al-Mahdī's pleasure palace (mustaqarr), actually built for his son 'Īsā at an unidentified spot in east Baghdad; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 194; Lassner, Topography, 81, 264.

281. Possibly a son of al-Saffāḥ's daughter Rayṭah, though not by her best-known husband al-Mahdī.

282. Actually the night of Tuesday (i.e., of Monday-Tuesday).

283. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 350, tr. 449–50, has the eleventh of Dhū al-Ḥijjah; 'Uyūn, 358, has Tuesday, the seventeenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (correctly, the sixteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah).

Ibn al-Sājūr and his companions sent a message to 'Alī b. Hishām. Ḥumayd, who was staying at the mills of 'Abdallāh (b. Mālik,) rode off immediately, and went to the Bāb al-Jisr. 'Alī b. Hishām proceeded till he halted at the Nahr Bīn and then advanced to the Kawthar mosque.[284] Ibn al-Sājūr and his companions came out to meet him, and al-Muṭṭalib came to Ḥumayd and met him at the Bāb al-Jisr. Ḥumayd showed them great favor, gave them promises of future beneficence and told them that he was going to inform al-Ma'mūn about what they had done. They came to Ibrāhīm's house and began a search for him there, but without success; Ibrāhīm remained in concealment till al-Ma'mūn arrived and after that, until events turned out for him as they did.

Sahl b. Salāmah had returned from his place of concealment to his own house. He now showed himself openly. Ḥumayd [1036] sent for him, received him with favor and treated him as an intimate. He had Sahl mounted on a mule and sent him back to his family. Sahl remained there till al-Ma'mūn entered Baghdad; then he came to the Caliph, who rewarded him with favors and presents and ordered him to remain quietly in his house.[285]

In this year, there was an eclipse of the sun on Sunday, the twenty-eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, (203[June 26, 819]), to the extent that the sun's light faded away and over two-thirds of its orb disappeared. The eclipse began when the sun was getting high and continued till it was nearly noon; then it cleared away.[286]

The total length of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī's tenure of power was one year, eleven months and twelve days. 'Alī b. Hishām secured control of the East Side of Baghdad, and Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd controlled the West Side.[287] Al-Ma'mūn pro-

284. Presumably on the property of Kawthar b. al-Yamān in Karkh; see Lassner, Topography, 258, n. 58.
285. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 354–5.
286. Ibid., VI, 356.
287. 'Uyūn, 358; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 355.

ceeded as far as Hamadhān by the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (203[late June 819]).

In this year, Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī led the pilgrimage.[288]

288. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 766; Azdī, 353. Sulaymān was an 'Abbāsid prince, descended from 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās; subsequently, in 214 (829/30), he became governor of Mecca.

The Events of the Year

204

(JUNE 28, 819–JUNE 16, 820)

The events taking place during this year included al-Ma'mūn's arrival in Iraq and the end of the (previous) increase in civil strife in Baghdad.

Al-Ma'mūn's Arrival in Iraq and What Happened There[289]

It is mentioned concerning al-Ma'mūn that when he reached Jurjān[290] he stayed there a month. Then he left and travelled to Rayy in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (203[June 819]), and stayed there for a [1037] few days.[291] Then he left Rayy and began travelling from one staging post to another, staying one or two days (in each of them) until he reached Nahrawān, this being on a Saturday, and stayed there eight days. The members of his family, the

289. The surviving part of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir's Kitāb Baghdād begins here.

290. I.e., the southeast Caspian coastland region, Persian Gurgān; see Le Strange, Lands, 376–81; Barthold, An historical geography of Iran, 115; EI[1] s.v. Gurgān (Hartmann—J.A. Boyle).

291. This must be the occasion recorded above, 85, when al-Ma'mūn lightened the assessment of the land-tax of Rayy.

commanders and the leading personalities came out (to meet him) and greeted him. Previous to this, while he was on the road, al-Ma'mūn had written to Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who was at that time at Raqqah, telling Ṭāhir to meet him at Nahrawān; and Ṭāhir duly met up with him there. On the next[292] Saturday, al-Ma'mūn entered Baghdad, as the sun was getting high, on the fifteenth of Ṣafar, 204[293] (August 11, 819), with himself and his retinue all wearing short green Persian coats (aqbiyah) and tall caps (qalānis) and bearing short lances (ṭarrādāt) (with green pennants) and green banners (a'lām).[294]

When he arrived, he halted and encamped at Ruṣāfah, accompanied by Ṭahir. He ordered Ṭāhir to encamp at Khayzūraniyyah with his troops. Then he transferred his quarters to his palace on the bank of the Tigris. He gave commands to Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamid, 'Alī b. Hishām and every one of the commanders in his army that they should remain in their military encampments. Now these commanders had been resorting to al-Ma'mūn's palace each day, and no one had been able to enter into his presence unless he wore green clothes. The people of Baghdad and the Hāshimites likewise all wore green. Al-Ma'mūn's partisans used to tear off anything black which they observed people wearing, except for caps;[295] isolated individuals used to wear them (black caps), but in fear and trembling; and as for a Persian coat or banner, no one dared to wear one at all or to carry one.

They remained in this state of affairs for eight days, but then the Hāshimites, and the members of the 'Abbāsid family in 292. Reading al-ākharu for the text's al-ākhiru.

---

293. Actually a Thursday. The date of the fifteenth of Ṣafar for al-Ma'mūn's entry given by Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 2, n. 3, tr. Keller, 1, n. 1, by Ṭabarī here, by Ibn al-Athīr following them, etc., must really be, relying on other, parallel sources (e.g., Ibn Qutaybah), Sunday, the eleventh of Ṣafar (August 7). Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 551, has Rabī' I, i.e., the following month; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 351, tr. 450, has Saturday, the eighteenth of Ṣafar (actually a Sunday). Azdī, 353, merely has the month of Ṣafar.

294. Following the ṭarrād/ṭirād of Lane's Lexicon = miṭrad, "short spear;" in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, tr. 1, Keller has for these last two terms, "Fahnen und Abzeichungen waren grün."

295. This exception is not easily explicable, unless it was that the black cap was so archetypically the 'Abbāsid symbol as to be regarded as sacrosanct.

particular, began to mumur against it and told al-Ma'mūn, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have abandoned the dress of your forefathers, the members of your family and the supporters of their dynasty, and you have adopted green!" The commanders of the Khurasanian troops also wrote to him about this. It is said that al-Ma'mūn instructed Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn to ask him for any of his requirements, and the first matter which Ṭahir raised with him was that he should cast [1038] aside the wearing of green clothes and revert to wearing black clothes and the traditional apparel of the régime of ('Abbāsid) forefathers. So when al-Ma'mūn saw that the people were obediently following his orders and wearing green, but were hating it, and Saturday came along, he took his place among them, still wearing green. When all his followers were gathered round him, he called for black garments and donned them; he then called for a black robe of honor, and presented it to Ṭāhir. Then he summoned forward a number of commanders and gave them black coats and caps to wear. When they came forth from the Caliph's presence wearing black, the rest of the commanders and the army in general threw off their green garments and adopted black ones. This was on Saturday, the twenty-second of Ṣafar[296] (204 [August 18, 819]).[297]

It has been said that al-Ma'mūn wore green garments for twenty-seven[298] days after his entry into Baghdad, and then they were torn up. It is said that he continued to stay in Baghdad at Ruṣāfah until he built residences along the Tigris bank near his own original palace and in the Mūsā garden.[299]

It is mentioned from Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās (al-Ṣūlī) al-Kātib[300] from 'Amr b. Mas'adah (al-Ṣūlī)[301] that Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid

296. Actually a Thursday.

297. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 551; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 62 = ed. Pellat, § 2748; 'Uyūn, 358–9; Abbott, 226–7.

298. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 4, tr. 2: for 29 days.

299. Cf. also ibid., 4, 22, tr. 2, 10. Concerning al-Ma'mūn's palaces, see Lassner, Topography, 84, 265–6.

300. Secretary to Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid and subsequently controller of expenditure and chancery head under al-Mutawakkil, and also a poet; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 10, 221, 266, 274, II, 734; Sezgin, GAS, II, 578–80.

301. Cousin of the above and secretary to al-Ma'mūn, and also a poet; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 234–8; Sezgin, GAS, II, 616–17.

al-Aḥwal[302] said: When we travelled from Khurasan with al-Ma'mūn, and we arrived at the pass of Ḥulwān,[303] I myself being his riding-companion, he said to me, "O Aḥmad, I detect the fragrant smell of Iraq!" I answered him with an inappropriate reply and said, "How suitable it is!" And he said, "This is not the answer to my observation, but I assume that you were somehow distracted or were deep in thought." Aḥmad went on to relate: I replied, "Yes, indeed, O Commander of the Faithful." He said, "What were you thinking about?" Aḥmad went on to relate: I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I was reflecting about our forthcoming attack on the people of Baghdad [or: the troops, ahl, of Baghdad], when we have with us only fifty thousand dirhams and there is internecine strife raging in the hearts of the people, to the extent that they positively revel in it. So what will be our position if someone stirs up trouble, or someone makes an untoward move?" Aḥmad went on to relate: He bowed his head and remained silent for quite a while, and then he replied, "O Aḥmad, you are quite right, and how correctly were you thinking! But let me tell you, people in this [1039] city can be divided into three categories: those who are the oppressors, those who are the oppressed and those who fall into neither category. In regard to the oppressor, he can only expect our forgiveness and our restraint [from punishing him]; in regard to the oppressed person, he can only expect to get justice through ourself; whilst in regard to the person who is neither an oppressor nor oppressed, his house is wide enough for him [that is, he is quite content and has no need of us]." And by God, it proved just as he said.[304]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn ordered that the proportional tax (muqāsamah)[305] levied on the produce of the cultivation of the 302. Secretary who became head of al-Ma'mūn's administration after al-Faḍl b. Sahl's death; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 218–25. As noted by Kennedy, 166, it is not entirely clear whether he was the brother of the Khurasanian military leader in Baghdad, Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid, but Shaban, 51–2, is surely right in stressing his Iranian origin, pace Sourdel's suggestion that he was a Syrian.

303. I.e., the Paytak pass through the Zagros mountains; see *EI*² s.v. Ḥulwān (Lockhart).

304. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 1–6, tr. 1–3; Azdī, 353–5, with further anecdotal material; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 357–8.

305. See on this, F. Løkkegaard, Islamic taxation in the classic period, 108 ff.

Sawād should be reduced to two-fifths, whereas they had previously been liable for a half of their produce, and he adopted the "bridled" qafīz (al-qafīz al-muljam), made up of ten *makkūk*s according to the Hārūnī makkūk, as the officially authorised measure of capacity.[306]

In this year, Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh gave battle to Bābak, but neither side gained the upper hand over the other.[307]

(In this year,) al-Ma'mūn appointed Ṣāliḥ b. al-Rashīd[308] as governor of Baṣrah, and 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib over the two Holy cities (Mecca and Madīnah).[309]

In this year, 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan (b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib) led the pilgrimage.[310]

---

306. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 22, tr. 10, with a fuller account of this event; Azdī, 353; 'Uyūn, 359; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 358. For the measures mentioned here, see Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, tr. 10, n. 1; W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 48–9; Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," JESHO, XII (1969), 149–50; but note that Ibn Abī Ṭāhir here and also Khwārazmī gives the equivalence in Iraq as being eight *makkūk*s to a qafīz.

307. Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

308. I.e., the son of the Caliph al-Rashīd.

309. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 553; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.; Geddes, 104.

310. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 767; Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

205

(JUNE 17, 820–JUNE 5, 821)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Ma'mūn's appointment of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn as governor of the lands from the City of Peace to the farthest province of the East.[311] Previously, the Caliph had appointed him governor of the Jazīrah, commander of the guard (al-shuraṭ), (in Baghdad), governor of the two sides of Baghdad and the person responsible for police duties (ma'āwin)[312] in the Sawād.[313] Ṭāhir now took up the rôle of receiving people in audience.

311. For the general background to this, see Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol invasion, 208–9; Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 108–9; id., in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 95–6; Daniel, 181–2.

312. It is not clear from the sources exactly what the ma'āwin, sing. ma'ūnah, literally "assistance," involved; as well as entailing police duties, they seem also to have denoted some kind of financial burdens, perhaps for supporting local officials; see Løkkegaard, 186–7. In some of the Cairo Geniza documents, ma'ūnah appears as a euphemism for "jail;" see S.D. Goitein, A Mediterranean society. II. The community, 368; P. Crone, EI[2] s.v. Ma'ūna.

313. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 23, tr. 11 (Ṭāhir's appointment to the offices in the Jazīrah and Baghdad, the date for this being given as Sunday, 'Āshūrā day = the tenth of Muḥarram, 205 [June 26, 820, actually a Thursday]); Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 542, 553–4; Azdī, loc. cit.; 'Uyūn, 363; G. Rothstein, "Zu aš-Šābustī's Bericht über die Ṭāhiriden," in Orientalistische Studien Theodor Nöldeke . . . gewidmet, I, 159–61.

The Appointment of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn as Governor of Khurasan

The reason for al-Ma'mūn's appointing Ṭāhir over Khurasan and the East is what is mentioned from Ḥammād b. al-Ḥasan, from Bishr b. Ghiyāth al-Mārisī[314] who related: I, together with Thumāmah (b. Ashras al-Numayrī)[315] and Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās (al-Ṭūsī)[316] and 'Alī b. al-Haytham,[317] was present at [1040] 'Abdallāh al-Ma'mūn's court. They were engaged in a disputation about Shī'ism. Muḥammad b. Abī al'Abbās argued on behalf of the cause of the imāmate (for the Imāmī Shī'ah), whilst 'Alī b. al-Haytham upheld the cause of the Zaydī Shī'ah. The discussion between the two proceeded, until a point was reached when Muḥammad said to 'Alī, "You ignorant peasant [nabaṭī],[318] what do you know about theological disputation [kalām]?" Bishr continued: Al-Ma'mūn, who was at first reclining on a cushion, then sat up and spoke out, "Hurling insults is unseemly, and unpleasant language is reprehensible. We have allowed theological disputation to take place and have staged the open presentation of [religious] viewpoints [aẓharnā al-maqālāt]. Now upon whoever speaks the truth, we bestow praise; for whoever does not know the truth, we provide instruction; and in regard to whoever is ignorant of both ways [of disputation], we make a decision as to what is appropriate for him. So, you two, come to an agreement on basic principles [aṣl], for kalām is concerned with secondary, derivative matters [furū'], and if you pursue a topic into all its second-

314. Prominent Murji'ite theologian and upholder of the createdness of the Qur'ān, died in 218 (833); see Watt, index; Sezgin, GAS, I, 616–17; EI^{2} s.v. (Carra de Vaux—Nader—Schacht).

315. Mu'tazilite theologian, highly esteemed at the 'Abbāsid court, died in 213 (828); see Watt, index; Sezgin, GAS, I, 615–16; EI^{1} s.v. (Horten).

316. Khurasanian commander in al-Ma'mūn's army, from a family which had been prominent in the 'Abbāsid revolution, and brother-in-law of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn; see Crone, 174.

317. Zaydī Shī'ī theologian; cf. Watt, 348.

318. Nabaṭī (originally referring to the Aramaic-speaking indigenous populations of Syria and Iraq) was a term of opprobrium in early Islam; see Nöldeke, "Die Namen der aramäischen Nation und Sprache," ZDMG, XXV (1817), 124–7.

ary aspects, you nevertheless come back in the end to the basics." He went on to say, "Thus we say, 'There is no god but God, the Unique One, who has no partner, and Muḥammad is His servant and His prophet.'"

The two of them discussed the topic of the divinely-ordained prescriptions and laws (al-farā'iḍ wa-al-sharā'i') in Islam, and argued together after that. Muḥammad pressed 'Alī once more with arguments similar to those used at first, but 'Alī replied, "By God, were it not for the elevated nature of his [the Caliph's] gathering, and the compassion which God has bestowed on him, and were it not a prohibited action, I woud certainly make your forehead run with sweat! Your ignorance is sufficiently demonstrated by your washing down the pulpit in the city [the City of Peace?]!"[319] Bishr continued: Al-Ma'mūn sat up, having been reclining, and said, "What's this about your washing down the pulpit? Was it the result of my falling short in some way in regard to you, or because al-Manṣūr fell similarly short in regard to your father? Were it not that the Caliph, having bestowed something, would be embarassed to take it back, the nearest thing to the ground between the two of us would be your head [cut off]! So arise, and take care not to do it again!" Bishr continued: Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās departed [1041] and went along to Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, who happened to be his sister's husband, and said to him, "So-and-so has just happened to me!"

(The eunuch [al-khādim][320] Fatḥ used to act as al-Ma'mūn's doorkeeper when the Caliph was involved in his date wine

319. The washing down of the minbar in order to get rid of the impurity and pollution left by a previous occupant of it seems to have been not infrequent in early Islamic times. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, p. CCCLXXXVIII, citing Mas'ūdī and Iṣfahānī, when, during 'Uthmān's caliphate, Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ washed the minbar of the mosque at Kūfah when he took over as governor from al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah; and see Crone, 258, n. 606, citing Kindī, on the washing down of the minbar at Fusṭāṭ on al-Ma'mūn's orders after the death of the Imām 'Alī b. Mūsā al-Riḍā, whose name had been pronounced from it. The point of the remark in the present context nevertheless remains obscure.

320. Literally "servant," but in this period virtually synonymous with the derogatory term khaṣī, "eunuch"; see D. Ayalon, "On the eunuchs in Islam," JSAI, I (1979), 67–124; EI[2] s.v. Khaṣī (Pellat).

[nabīdh][321] drinking sessions; Yāsir was in charge of the robes of honor; Ḥusayn acted as cup-bearer; and Abū Maryam, the slave boy of Sa'īd al-Jawharī, used to go to-and-fro attending to various needs.) Ṭāhir rode up to the palace. Fatḥ went in and announced, "Ṭāhir is at the door." The Caliph replied, "It isn't one of his usual times, [but] let him come in!" So Ṭāhir entered; he greeted al-Ma'mūn, and the Caliph returned the salutation. The Caliph ordered, "Give Ṭāhir a raṭl [of wine] to drink." Ṭāhir took it in his right hand. Al-Ma'mūn said to him, "Sit down!" But he went away (from the circle), drained the cup and then came back. Al-Ma'mūn had meanwhile drunk another raṭl, so he ordered, "Give him a second draught!" Ṭahir behaved exactly as when he drained the first draught. Then he came back, and al-Ma'mūn said to him (again), "Sit down!" Ṭāhir replied, however, "O Commander of the Faithful, it is not fitting for the commander of the guard to sit down in his master's presence." Al-Ma'mūn retorted, "That only applies to public sessions at court [majlis al-'āmmah], whereas in private sessions [majlis al-khāṣṣah] it is allowable."

Bishr continued: Al-Ma'mūn wept, and tears welled up in his eyes. Ṭāhir said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, why are you weeping, may God never cause your eyes to flow with tears! By God, all the lands have submitted to your rule, all the Muslims have acknowledged you as ruler, and you have achieved your desired object in everything you have undertaken." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "I am weeping on account of a matter which is humiliating to mention and whose concealment is a source of grief. No one is free from some care, so tell me about any pressing need which you may have." Ṭāhir said, "O Commander of the Faithful, Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās has committed a fault, so please pardon his error and show your favor to him." The Caliph replied, "I have this moment received him back into my favor, I have ordered gifts to be awarded to him and I have restored to him his former position. Moreover, were it not for the fact that he is not the sort of person suitable for convivial sessions, I would summon him here to court."

321. Nabīdh is properly any intoxicating drink fermented from anything but grapes; only the Ḥanafī law school regarded the drinking of it as licit in certain circumstances; see EI[1] s.v. (Wensinck); EI[2] Khamr. 1 (Wensinck).

Bishr continued: Ṭāhir went away, and told Ibn Abī al-ʿAbbās about all this. He summoned Hārūn b. Jabghūyah[322] and [1042] said to him, "The secretaries have a feeling of mutual professional interest, and the Khurasanians [that is, the military] always stick together and support each other. So take with you three hundred thousand dirhams, and give the eunuch al-Ḥusayn two hundred thousand and his secretary Muḥammad b. Hārūn one hundred thousand, and ask al-Ḥusayn to ask al-Ma'mūn why he was weeping." Bishr relates: He accordingly did that. He continued: When the Caliph had eaten his morning meal, he said, "O [al-] Ḥusayn, pour out a drink for me!" The latter replied, "No, by God, I won't let you have anything to drink unless you tell me why you wept when Ṭāhir came into your presence." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "O [al-] Ḥusayn, why are you so concerned about this, to the point that you have questioned me about it?" He said, "Because of your own grief about that." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "O [al-] Ḥusayn, it is a matter concerning which, if it goes beyond your mouth [literally, "head"], I shall kill you." Al-Ḥusayn said, "O my lord, when did I ever divulge any of your confidences?" Al-Ma'mūn said, "I called to mind my brother Muḥammad [al-Amīn] and the humiliation which he suffered; the tears suffocated me, and I only found release in copious weeping. But Ṭāhir will not escape that from me which he will find unpleasant [because vengeance on him is still due from al-Amīn's killing.]"

Bishr continued: [Al-] Ḥusayn passed on this information to Ṭāhir. Ṭāhir rode off to Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid and said to him, "Praise addressed to me is not accounted of low value, and a useful act done for me is never wasted. So get me away from the Caliph's gaze [that is, from his possible vengeance]." He re-

322. Following the correct reading of this name or title in the Addenda et emendenda, p. DCCLXVIII, and in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 31. This Hārūn must have been of Turkish extraction, perhaps a descendent of the pre-Islamic Yabghus, or rulers of Ṭukhāristān, on the upper Oxus; see Bosworth and Sir Gerard Clauson, "Al-Xwārazmī on the peoples of Central Asia," JRAS (1965), 9–10. In Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIV, 37, Hārūn is described as a "senior Khurasanian, shrewd and trustworthy."

torted, "I will certainly do that, so come back to me first thing tomorrow morning." Bishr continued: Ibn Abī Khālid rode off to al-Ma'mūn, and when he went into his presence, he said to the Caliph, "I never slept at all last night." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Why was that, you poor fellow?" Ibn Abī Khālid replied, "Because you have appointed Ghassān as governor over Khurasan, and he and his following are weak in numbers. I am afraid lest there be an outbreak of Turkish rebels against him, and they will annihilate him."[323] Al-Ma'mūn said, "You have been thinking on the same lines as myself.[324] Whom do you think is suitable?" He replied, "Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn." The Caliph exclaimed, "I am surprised at you, O Aḥmad; Ṭāhir is, by God, a person who will throw off his obedience [khalī]." Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid said, "I will stand guarantor for his loyalty." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Send him forth, then." Bishr continued: So Aḥmad summoned Ṭāhir immediately. Al-Ma'mūn appointed [1043] him to the command, and Ṭāhir departed instantly.[325] He encamped in the garden of Khalīl b. Hāshim,[326] and every day he remained there a hundred thousand (dirhams) were brought to him. He stayed there for a month, and a total of ten million (dirhams) which were regularly brought for the governor of Khurasan, was brought to him.[327]

Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī says: Ṭāhir had been granted Khurasan and Jibāl, from Ḥulwān to (the far borders of) Khurasan, and his departure from Baghdad was on Friday, the twenty-ninth of 323. For Ghassān's governorship in Khurasan, see Barthold, Turkestan, 208–10; Bosworth, Sīstān, 101–2. Ghassān in fact restored order there after a period of disturbance on al-Ma'mūn's departure from Marw, and among other things, appointed members of the Sāmānid family to local governorships. The fears expressed of the Turks doubtless reflect the help given by them to the rebellion in al-Rashīd's reign of Rāfi' b. Layth, see Barthold, op. cit., 200–1.

324. Following Keller's vocalization of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir's parallel text, 32 11. 4–5, rather than that of Ṭabarī's text; the respective meanings amount to the same in any case.

325. 'Uyūn, 360–1.

326. Apparently to be identified with the suburb (rabaḍ) of Khalīl b. Hāshim al-Bāwardī mentioned by Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 247, tr. G. Wiet, Les pays, 27.

327. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 28–32, tr. 13–15; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIV, 37–8. The arithmetic here seems strange.

Dhū al-Qa'dah, 205[328](May 6, 821), he having established his encampment[329] two months previously and having remained in his camp continuously. Abū Ḥassān continued: The reason for Ṭahir's appointment as governor, according to the generally-accepted view of people, was that 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Muṭṭawwi'ī gathered together forces in Naysābūr with the intention of using them to fight the Ḥarūriyyah[330] but without the governor of Khurasan's permission. People were afraid that this was because of some secret plan or intention which he had worked towards.[331] Ghassān b. 'Abbād was acting as governor of Khurasan at that time, having been nominated by al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, Ghassān being the paternal cousin of al-Faḍl b. Sahl.[332]

It is mentioned from 'Alī b. Hārūn that, before Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn's departure for Khurasan and his assumption of the governorship over it, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl urged him to go out and fight Nasr b. Shabath, but Ṭāhir replied, "Have I made war on a caliph, and have I handed over the caliphate to [another] caliph, that I should be given such an order as this? It is only fitting that you should send one of my subordinate commanders for a task like this!"[333] This was the reason for the breach between al-Ḥasan and Ṭāhir. He continued to relate: Ṭāhir set out for 328. Actually a Monday; according to Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 54, tr. 25, Ṭāhir departed on Sunday, the twenty-ninth of Dhū al-Qa'dah.

329. Or: "he having gathered together his troops," wa-qad kāna 'askara.

330. Since al-Rashīd's reign, Khurasan and Sīstān had been disturbed by a prolonged Khārijite rebellion under Ḥamzah b. Adharak (died in 213 [828]), and in the past 'Abd al-Raḥmān had fought the Khārijites in Sīstān; see Bosworth, Sīstān, 91–102.

331. The phrase is problematical; it reads, li-aṣlin 'amila 'alayhi.

332. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 32–3, tr. 15; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 554–5; id., Buldān, 307, tr. 136–7, both with the different account of Ṭāhir's appointment as being the result of his friend Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid's intrigue. The divergent accounts on Ṭāhir's appointment and his subsequent act of rebelliousness, seen especially sharply in the account of Ya'qūbī on one side and that of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir and Ṭabarī on the other, but with significant items of information from further sources, are discussed by Sourdel, "Les circonstances de la mort de Ṭāhir Ier au Ḫurāsān en 207/822," Arabica, V (1958), 66–9. It seems likely that Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid, known to have been corruptible and perhaps suborned by Ṭāhir, forged a letter of resignation from his governorship by Ghassān; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 222–3.

333. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 360–2.

[1044] Khurasan as soon as he assumed the governorship, without speaking to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl at all. People reproached him for that, but he replied, "I am not the man to offer a solution to a difficulty [literally, to untie a knot] which he has made for me in his hostility."

In this year, 'Abdallah b. Ṭāhir reached Baghdad, having returned from Raqqah. His father Ṭāhir had appointed him there as his deputy and had commanded him to make war against Naṣr b. Shabath. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh arrived, and al-Ma'mūn appointed him governor of the Jazīrah.[334]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid governor of Armenia and Azerbaijan, with responsibility for the war against Bābak.[335]

In this year, al-Sarī b. al-Ḥakam, governor in Egypt, died there.[336]

In this year, Dāwūd b. Yazīd (b. Ḥātim al-Muhallabī), governor and financial administrator ('āmil) in Sind, died. Hence al-Ma'mūn appointed as governor there Bishr b. Dāwūd (al-Muhallabī), with the stipulation that he should deliver to the Caliph a million dirhams each year.[337]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed 'Īsā b. Yazīd al-Julūdī to combat the Zuṭṭ.[338]

In this year, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn set out for Khurasan in Dhū al-Qa'dah (205[April–May 821]).[339] He remained (in his encampment) for two months until news of 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Naysābūrī al-Muṭṭawwi'ī's outbreak (khurūj) at Naysābūr 334. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 554; 'Uyūn, 363; Ibn al-Athīr, VI, 362.

335. 'Uyūn, 361; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

336. Ibid. Al-Sarī had been appointed governor in 200 (816); see Kindī, 161.

337. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit. Bishr remained governor, as his father's successor, till Ghassān b. 'Abbād was appointed in 213 (828/9), see below, 179–80.

338. Ibid. The Zuṭṭ were peoples from Sind, Jhats and others, established on the Persian Gulf shores since Sāssānid times. The revolt of these Zuṭṭ in the marshlands of lower Iraq was not suppressed till 220 (835); see Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 37–40; EI[1] s.v. Zoṭṭ (G. Ferrand).

339. Cf. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 33, 54, tr. 15, 25.

reached him, and then he left. The Toghuz-Oghuz[340] arrived in Ushrūsanah.[341]

In this year, Faraj (b. Ziyād) al-Rukhkhajī[342] seized 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ammār al-Naysābūrī.

In this year, 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan (b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abbās b. 'Alī), governor of the two Holy Cities, led the pilgrimage.[343]

---

340. A Turkish people of Inner Asia, from whom the Seljuqs were later to arise and who were at this time harrying the fringes of Islamic Transoxiana and assisting rebels there; see Barthold, Turkestan, 200–2; Bosworth, The Ghaznavids, their empire in Afghanistan and eastern Iran, 210 ff.; EI[1] s.v. Toghuzghuz (Barthold); EI[2] s.v. Ghuzz. i. Muslim East (Cahen).

341. The region of Transoxiana to the south of the southermost bend of the Syr Darya; see Le Strange, Lands, 474–6; Barthold, Turkestan, 165–9.

342. A mawlā, originally captured in Sīstān and overseer of the caliphal private domains under Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid; see Bosworth, Sīstān, 82–3; Crone, 190.

343. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 768; Azdī, 359; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 362.

The Events of the Year

206

(JUNE 6, 821–MAY 26, 822)

The events taking place during this year included al-Ma'mūn's [1045] appointment of Dāwūd b. Bānījūr[344] to be in charge of the war against the Zuṭṭ and to be governor of the provinces of Baṣrah, the Tigris districts, Yamāmah and Baḥrayn.[345]

In this year, there occurred the high tide which inundated the Sawād, Kaskar, the land-grant (qaṭī'ah) of Umm Ja'far and the land-grant of al-'Abbās and carried away the greater part of (the topsoil of) them.[346]

In this year, Bābak defeated (literally: cast down) 'Īsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid.[347]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir governor of Raqqah with the task of combatting Naṣr b. Shabath and Muḍar.[348]

---

344. Following the reading of the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXIX. Dāwūd was apparently a member of the Bānījūrid or Abū Dāwūdid family, later governors of Ṭukhāristān; see EI[2] Suppl. s.v. Bānīdjūrids (Bosworth).

345. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 379.

346. Azdī, 362; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

347. Ibid.

348. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 555; Azdī, 359; 'Uyūn, 362, 363. The North Arabian tribal group of Muḍar (on which see EI[1] Suppl. s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar [Kindermann]) provided much of Naṣr's support.

Al-Ma'mūn Appoints 'Abdallāh b. Ṭahīr Governor of Raqqah

According to what is mentioned, the reason for this was that al-Ma'mūn had appointed Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh as governor of the Jazīrah, but then he died in this year, having appointed as successor in his governorship there his own son Aḥmad. It is mentioned from Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Abd al-Khāliq that al-Ma'mūn summoned 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir during the month of Ramaḍān (January–February 822)—some say, however, that this was in the year 205 (820/1), others in the year (200) odd, and yet others in the year (20)7 (822/3). When 'Abdallāh came into his presence, al-Ma'mūn said, "O 'Abdallāh, I have been seeking guidance from God for a month now, and I hope that God is leading me to the right decision. I have observed a man describing his son's characteristics in order to praise the son in glowing terms, because of his own high opinion of him; and in order to exalt his status; but I have noted that you are actually better than your father's description of you. Now Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh has died, and has appointed as his successor his son Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā, who is a nonentity. I have therefore considered it fit to appoint you governor over Muḍar and the conduct of the war against Naṣr b. Shabath." 'Abdallāh replied, "I hear and obey, O Commander of the Faithful, and I hope that God will vouchsafe His favor for the Commander of the Faithful and the Muslims!"[349]

Yaḥya continues: The Caliph invested him with the insignia of office, and then he ordered the drying lines of the fullers im- [1046] peding 'Abdallāh's way to be taken down and the awnings against the sunlight to be removed from the streets so that there should be nothing which would catch on 'Abdallāh's banner as he went along them. Then, as part of the insignia of office he presented 'Abdallāh with a banner, which had as its legend, written in gold letters, the wording usually written on banners, to which he further added the phrase "O victorious one [yā Manṣūr]!"[350] 'Abdallāh went forth with his retinue and

349. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 34, tr. 16; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 363.

350. On the shi'ār or da'wah "rallying cry in battle," such as this, see Goldarrived at his house. The next morning, a host of people rode along to visit him, including al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ. The latter remained with him till nightfall and then got up to go. ʿAbdallāh said, "O Abū al-ʿAbbās, you have been generous and kind, and both my own father and your brother have adjured me not to decide any great matters without your advice. I need to know your views, and I need to find guidance through your good counsels. If you think it possible to remain here in my house till we can break the fast,[351] then please stay!" Al-Faḍl replied to him, "Various circumstances render it impossible for me to break my fast here." ʿAbdallāh said, "If you don't like the cuisine of the Khurasanians, then send along to your own kitchen and they will bring you your usual food." Al-Faḍl told him, "I have to perform several cycles of inclinations between the evening worship and complete darkness." So ʿAbdallāh retorted, "Go, with God's protection!" and went along with him as far as the courtyard of his (al-Faḍl's) house, seeking his advice on various private matters.[352]

Ṭāhir's Advice to his Son

It is said that ʿAbdallāh's actual departure for (the lands of) Muḍar[353] in order to combat Naṣr b. Shabath took place six months after his father's departure for Khurasan. When Ṭāhir appointed his son ʿAbdallāh over Diyār Rabīʿah,[354] he sent him an epistle, whose text is as follows:

> Let there be in you the fear of God, He who is one and without associate. Hold Him in awe and reverence and avert his wrath. Look after the interests of your subjects.

---

ziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 60–3, Eng. tr. Muslim Studies, I, 63–5; M. Hinds, "The banners and battle cries of the Arabs at Ṣiffīn (657 AD)," al-Abḥāth, XXIV (1971), 12–16.

351. The month being Ramaḍān.

352. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 34–5, tr. 16.

353. Diyār Muḍar was the region of the Jazīrah along the middle Euphrates and its tributaries, the lower Khābūr and Balīkh, with Raqqah as its centre; see Le Strange, Lands, 101 ff.; Canard, 86–97; EI[2] s.v. (Canard—Cahen).

354. The eastern part of the Jazīrah, centred on Mosul; see Le Strange, Lands, 86 ff.; Canard, 97–131; EI[2] s.v. (Canard—Cahen).

Hold fast to all the good fortune which God has bestowed on you, at the same time remembering the ultimate destination [the return to God for judgment] towards which you are inevitably travelling, the duties to which you are obligated and for which you will be held responsible. [Take [1047] care] to labor at everything in such a way that God will ensure your preservation and will keep you safe from His punishment and painful retribution on the Day of Resurrection.

God has been gracious to you and has accordingly made it incumbent upon you to show tenderness towards those of His creatures over whom He has appointed you shepherd. He has enjoined you to behave justly with them, to maintain His divine truth and His prescribed punishments [ḥudūd] amongst them, to protect them, to defend their womenfolk and kindred [ḥarīmihim wa-bayḍatihim], to preserve them from bloodshed, to keep the roads safe for them and to create the peaceful conditions in which they can go about their daily work. He holds you fully responsible for all the things enumerated above, whose observance has been laid upon you; He will require from you a reckoning concerning them, will question you about them and will recompense you for the good acts which you have committed and the evil acts which you have refrained from. So let your thoughts, your mind, your sharp-sightedness and your vision be entirely concentrated on these things, and let no one distract or divert you from them; for all this is the basic foundation of your authority and the fundamental support of your ruling position, and is the first thing which God bestows on you for guiding you along the right path.

Now the first thing which you must impose on yourself, and the goal towards which your actions should dispose you, is assiduous observance of the ritual prescriptions laid down by God as mandatory—the five daily acts of worship [ṣalawāt], and the assembling of the people together for worship with you at the appointed times and after due performance of the ritual ablutions [wuḍū'] required by the religious law. You must begin the ceremony with the mention of God's name; you must use the correct chant as you recite the words of the worship; you must perform the inclinations and prostrations involved firmly and decisively and pronounce the profession of faith clearly. Also, let your intention in performing the worship be sincere in the sight of your Lord. Furthermore, urge [1048] those in your retinue and under your command to be assiduous in attendance and always show keenness yourself, for as God says, the worship urges people to what is reputable and restrains [them] from what is disreputable.[355]

You must then follow this up by firm adherence to the practices [sunan] laid down by the Messenger of God and by perseverance in imitating his [noble] qualities, and you must imitate the examples left by the Prophet's successors, the virtuous early generation of Muslims [al-salaf al-ṣāliḥ]. Whenever you are faced with some problem, seek help over it by desiring God's favor, by showing piety to Him, by adhering to what He has ordained or prohibited, made lawful or forbidden, as revealed in His Book, and by following the trail indicated by the traditions from the Prophet; then act in this matter in accordance with the duties which you owe to God.

Do not incline away from justice according to your own likes and dislikes in favor of someone near to you or someone far away, but choose to be guided by the religious law [fiqh] and its practitioners, by religion and its exponents the theologians, and by the Book of God and those who act by it; for the greatest adornments which a man can have are a thorough knowledge of the religion of God, a searching desire for it, a zeal in urging others to follow it and a knowledge of that part of it by which a man is brought closer to God. Indeed, this thorough knowledge guides the way towards all that is good and is the leader thither; it ordains man towards good and restrains people from all acts of rebellion against God and from sins entailing perdition. By means of this, and with the help of God's favor, His servants increase in knowledge of Him, in glorifying Him and in following the right path towards the highest stages in man's journey back to God [ma'ād, after the Resurrection]. All this in addition to what becomes apparent of the people's regard for your rule, their respect for your authority, their close bond with you and their trust in your justice.

355. Cf. Qur'ān, XXIX, 44/45, and XXXI, 16/17.

Be careful to observe moderation [iqtiṣād, qaṣd][356] in all things, for there is nothing of more obvious value, nothing more conducive to personal security and nothing containing within itself so many merits, as moderation. Moderation is one of the forces predisposing towards right guidance, and right guidance is a guide towards divine favor and success; and this last, in turn, leads the way to happiness. Moreover, moderation is a supporting prop for religion and for those usages handed down from the Prophet by which men are guided. So choose moderation as your watchword in all affairs of your present life. Do not, however, fall short in your pursuit of the next world and a heavenly reward, in performing meritorious works, in following the accepted ways of virtuous behavior and in seeking out the waymarks towards righteousness. For the endeavor to increase in piety and the pursuit of good works can have no bounds when God's grace and approval, and the companionship of His saints in the abode of divine felicity, are being sought through them. [1049]

Know that moderation in the things of this world brings one increased prestige and preserves one from sinfulness. There is nothing more excellent than moderation as a protection for yourself and your intimates or as a force to improve and put right your affairs. So adopt it as a rule of life, and let yourself be guided by it; if you do, your affairs will all reach satisfactory completion, your power will increase, and both your personal circle of friends and the people in general [or: your personal affairs and public affairs] will benefit from it.

356. These terms here clearly mean "moderation, prudence, circumspection," the golden mean of the Greeks, and Ṭāhir is here echoing Aristotle in urging it as the foundation for all right conduct; see Bosworth, "An early Arabic Mirror for Princes," JNES, XXIX (1970), 28.

Keep your mind fixed on God's favor; if you do, your subjects will behave towards you in an honest and upright fashion. In all your affairs, seek to bring yourself closer to God; through this policy, His grace will be vouchsafed to you perpetually. Do not take action against anyone for some offence committed in the official position to which you have appointed him before you have investigated the matter under suspicion, since it is a crime to let suspicions and evil thoughts come down upon innocent people. Adopt as a conscious policy a favorable attitude towards your associates, and set aside and repudiate malevolent thoughts about them. This will assist you in attaching them firmly to your own interest and in managing them. Do not allow Satan, the enemy of God, to be able to find some defect in your conduct. He only needs [to become [1050] aware of] a minor weakness, and he will be able to introduce an element of grief into your mind through your acquiring a bad opinion [of those around you] which will make the sweetness of life bitter for you.

Know that, in holding a favorable attitude towards people, you will find a source of strength and contentment of mind, and through it you will be able to bring to a satisfactory conclusion any of your affairs you wish; you may also use it to make people love you and behave honestly in all their dealings with you. However, this good opinion of your associates and this tenderness towards your subjects should not prevent you from making use of enquiries and investigations into the way in which your affairs are being conducted, from personally supervising the actions of your agents, from protecting the interests of your subjects and from looking into whatever may be conducive to their welfare and happiness. Indeed, personal supervision of your agents' activities, protection of your subjects' interests, investigation into their needs and shouldering their burdens should be preferred by you over everything else, for they will have more effect in strengthening religion and in breathing life into the sunna. Let your intentions in all this be pure; concentrate your efforts on self-reformation, in the same way as does a person who realizes that he will be held responsible for everything which he does, will be recompensed for his good deeds and will be punished for his bad ones. God has made His faith a sure refuge and a source of strength; He exalts those who follow Him and raises them in dignity. Hence lead those over whom you rule, and act as shepherd in the path of true religion and the way of divine guidance!

Be swift to apply the penalties prescribed by God [ḥudūd], to criminals, according to their positions in society and according to their deserts. Do not neglect this duty, and do not treat it lightly or be laggardly in punishing those deserving punishment, because if you fall short in this duty, you will surely damage your good reputation in people's eyes. In this matter, always stick determinedly to the well-established practices [sunan]. If you avoid all dubious courses and innovations [al-shubah wa-al-bida'āt], your faith will be preserved unsullied and your nobility of character [muruwwah] will be kept intact.

When you make an agreement with someone, keep to it; and when you promise to perform some good deed, make [1051] sure that you fulfill it. Accept a favor gracefully and return it. Close your eyes to the minor shortcomings of petty offenders among your subjects; guard your tongue against uttering falsehood and calumny and show your detestation of those who practice this vice. Banish from your presence all slanderers, because the prime factor which will vitiate your present life and your future one is the encouragement of a notorious liar or a shameless disposition towards lying yourself. Mendacity, indeed, is the beginning of all sins, and calumny and slander set the seal on them. For the person who manufactures slander is not safe himself; nor is any friend of a man who listens to slander[357] safe; and nothing will go right for the person who acts in accordance with slander.

Make friends of the people of sincerity and righteous-357. Reading qābiluhā for the text's qā'iluhā, as according to F. Rosenthal, The Muqaddimah, an introduction to history, II, 145, n. 760.

ness. Give succor to the aristocracy [al-ashrāf] by allotting them their just due; give material help to the weak; and strengthen the bonds of kinship. In all these things desire the face of God and the strengthening of His power; through them seek a heavenly reward from Him and the abode of eternal life. Shun evil thoughts and oppressive behavior, deflecting your mind completely from them, and demonstrate openly to your subjects your freedom from these defects. Let your rule over them be graced with the exercise of justice; govern them with due equity and with the knowledge which will lead you on the way of divine guidance. Keep a grip on your temper when you are angry, and adopt rather the attitudes of forbearance and magnanimity. Take care not to succumb to hasty temper, frivolous behavior and deception in anything you undertake. Also, take care that you do not say to yourself, "I have been set in authority, I shall do what I like," because that will speedily destroy your judgment, and it further shows a lack of firm belief in God, He who is one and without associate. Make pure to God your intentions in this and your firm belief in Him!

Know that royal authority belongs to God alone; He be-[1052] stows it upon whom He wills and takes it away from whom He wills. You will not find His favors towards anyone change more completely, nor His vengeance descend more swiftly, than in regard to those holders of power and those set in authority who have been the recipients of His favor, but have shown ingratitude towards God's bounty and benevolence, and who have adopted a high and mighty attitude because of the goodness which He has bestowed on them.[358]

Lay aside any avariciousness which may be in your heart. Let the treasuries and storehouses which you pile up and accumulate be composed of piety, fear of God, justice, measures for your subjects' welfare and the prosperity of their land, acquaintance with their affairs, protection for the mass of them and assistance for those who sorrow. Know that wealth which is accumulated and then stored away in treasuries bears no fruit; but when it is expended on the improvement of the conditions of subjects, on the provision of their just dues and on removing burdens from them, it thrives and multiplies. As a result, the common people derive benefit from it, the governors bask in reflected glory from it, the whole age is made bright by it, and strength and defensive power are consolidated through it. Consequently, let the accumulated wealth of your treasuries be expended on making the world of Islam and its populace more prosperous. Further, allot part of it for what is due to those of the Commander of the Faithful's officials who preceded you[359]; and utilise another part of it to fulfill the just claims of your subjects, paying close heed to what will improve their general state and conditions of life. If you do all this, God's favor will be vouchsafed to you and you will have merited an increased reward from Him. Moreover, you will find that all these things will facilitate your levying the land-tax [jibāyat kharājika] and your collecting the taxes in kind from your subjects and from the regions under your control [jam' amwāl ra'iyyatika wa-'amalika]. Because of your all-encompassing justice and benevolent rule, the whole of [1053] these will be more obedient to your authority and will be more complaisant towards whatever you desire of them. So strive to the best of your ability to achieve what I have delineated for you under this heading, and let your esteem for it be great; for the only wealth which endures forever is that which is expended in furtherance of God's just dues.[360]

358. Or: who have used oppressively that which He of His goodness has bestowed on them, wa-staṭālū bi-mā ātāhum Allāh min faḍlihi. Keller translated the corresponding passage of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 42, tr. 19, "[wenn sie] . . . das, was ihnen Gott in seiner Freigebigkeit verleiht, für ewig halten." The lexica support all these various meanings for istaṭāla; see Lisān al-'Arab[1], XIII, 438, and Tāj al-'arūs[1], VII, 422–3.

359. Following the preference of Rosenthal, op. cit., II, 146 and n. 766, for qablaka rather than the text's qibalaka.

360. On the ruler's or governor's relations with his officials and tax collectors, a constant preoccupation of the writers of Mirrors for Princes, see Bosworth, op. cit., 28–9.

Acknowledge the gratitude of those who show thanks and recompense them appropriately for it. Beware lest this present world and its deceptions make you forget due fear for the next world, so that you treat lightly your obligations in this connection; because this insouciance will inevitably breed neglectfulness, and neglectfulness will lead to ruin. Let all your work be undertaken for God and have its being in Him, and hope only for reward. Indeed, it is He who has lavished on you His beneficence in this present world and has shown His grace to you. Accordingly, make yourself secure by showing proper gratitude; trust in Him, and He will increase your share of His goodness and benevolence. God rewards people according to the measure of their gratitude [to Him] and according to the conduct of those who act righteously; He has judged rightfully in regard to the good things which He has brought and the good fortune and exalted status which He has conferred.

Do not treat any sinful deed [dhanb] lightly; do not incline towards the envious person; do not show mercy towards the evildoer; do not give presents to an ungrateful person;[361] do not hold culpable relations with [or: treat gently] an enemy; do not give credence to a slanderer; do not trust a treacherous person; do not make friends with an evil-liver; do not follow after someone who will lead you into error; do not give praise to a hypocrite; do not treat any man with contempt; do not send away empty-handed a destitute beggar; do not deign to bandy words with a foolish person; do not pay attention to a buffoon; do not go back on your promises; do not show respect for overweening pride;[362] do not undertake anything while in a state of [1054] anger; do not go forth exhibiting haughtiness; do not walk along showing an unseemly hilarity [or:displaying arrogance]; do not commit an act of stupidity; do not fall short in your pursuit of the next life; do not pass the days in an

361. Wa-lā taṣilanna kafūran; Keller's translation in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 43, tr. 20, "tritt nicht in Verbindung mit dem Ungläubigen," hardly fits here.

362. Following the fakhr^{an} of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 44, tr. 20, instead of the text's fajr^{an}.

unthankful manner;[363] do not avert your eyes from someone who is behaving tyrannically, either from respect for him or out of fear; and do not seek the rewards of the next world by means of this present life.

Make a habit of consulting the scholars of the religious law [fuqahā'] as much as possible, and when exercising your will, show forbearance [ḥilm].[364] Learn from people with experience of the world and from people with intelligence, judgment and wisdom. Do not allow into your counsels contemptible and stingy people, and never pay heed to their words, for they will do you more harm than good. There is nothing more likely to bring to disaster any course of action regarding your subjects which you may embark upon than avarice. For know that if you are avaricious, you will want to grab everything and give nothing. If you behave thus, your rule will not go right for very long. Your subjects will only have confidence in your benevolence in as much as you refrain from arbitrary exactions on their wealth and avoid tyrannizing over them, and your subordinates will only remain sincerely devoted to your interests as long as you give them adequate allowances and good pay. Therefore shun avarice, and know that avariciousness was the first act of rebellion raised by man against his Lord, and that the abode of the rebel against God is that of abasement and disgrace, according to what God says [in His Book]; "Those who are protected from niggardliness of soul, they are the ones who prosper."[365] So be really generous. Grant to all the Muslims a share and allotment from the revenue of your captured plunder,[366] and

363. Following the 'abām^{an}. of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, loc. cit., instead of the text's 'iyān^{an}. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 370, has 'itāb^{an}, "in finding fault," which is favored in the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXX.

364. The ensemble of qualities which made up ḥilm—restraint, moderation, conciliatoriness, statecraft, magnanimity, etc.—were regarded by the early Arabs as the highest attributes for the successful leader; see Bosworth, op. cit., 28, and EI^{2} s.v. (Pellat).

365. Qur'ān, LIX, 9, LXIV, 16.

366. Following the reading preferred in the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXX.

be sure that liberality is one of the most meritorious acts [1055] of which God's creatures are capable. Account it as one of your virtues, and regard it with constant favor in your work and practice.

Maintain close supervision of the affairs of your army, the soldiers' pay registers and the government departments concerned with military matters. See that they have adequate salaries and be generous in their living allowances; by this means, God will take away their neediness. Their happy condition will become a source of strength for you, and their hearts will increase by means of it in sincerity and contentedness, in obedience to you and attachment to your cause. It is sufficient felicitousness for a ruler that his army and his subjects should find compassion in his equitable conduct, his protection, his exercise of justice, his concern for people, his solicitude, his benevolent works and his open-handedness. Avoid the unpleasantness of either of the two ways[367] [of erring on the sides of harshness or leniency] by being conscious of the merits of the other alternative and by always acting in accordance with it. You will then, God willing, achieve worldly success, spiritual merit and personal happiness.

Know that the judge's office [qaḍā'] enjoys in God's sight an importance exceeding all others. This is because it is God's balance, by means of which the affairs on earth are regulated. When justice prevails in the judge's office and in judicial procedure, the subjects' welfare is assured, the highways are kept safe, those who have been wronged are given just recompense, people receive their due rights, people's ways of life become pleasant and rightful obedience is freely vouchsafed. God gives provision for happiness and preservation of life, religion is firmly maintained, the sunna and the religious law are put into practice and, on the basis of their effectiveness, truth and justice are successfully achieved in the judge's office.

---

367. Following the reading preferred in the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXX.

Be zealous in carrying on God's work and refrain from corrupt behavior; be assiduous in applying the obligatory legal penalties for offences; never be overhasty in doing things; avoid becoming vexed and disturbed in your mind; and be content with a [moderate] share.[368] In this fashion, your successfulness will be undisturbed and your good fortune firmly established. Profit by your past experience; concentrate your thoughts while you are silent, and then when you speak be cogent and to the point. Be fair to the plaintiff; pause when you are in doubt, but exert yourself in bringing forward relevant evidence. Do not let partiality, claims to protection or fear of anyone's blame sway you in any dealings with one of your subjects. Instead, act with patience and deliberation; keep your eyes open and watch carefully; consider, reflect and ponder over things; adopt an attitude of humility towards your Lord and of clemency towards all your subjects. Make the pursuit of righteousness the dominating principle of your personal conduct and do not hasten to spill blood, for God regards bloodshed all the more seriously when it is spilt with violence and injustice. [1056]

Look carefully into this matter of the land-tax, which the subjects have the obligation to pay.[369] God has made this a source of strength and might for Islam, and a means of support and protection for His people; but He has made it a source of chagrin and vexation for His enemies and the enemies of the Muslims, and for the unbelievers in treaty relationship with the Muslims[370] a source of abasement

368. Keller in his translation of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 46, tr. 21, interprets the q.s.m. of his text and that of Ṭabarī here as qism, "begnüge dich mit dem Teile"; Rosenthal, The Muqaddimah, II, 149, interprets it as qasam, "be satisfied with an oath."

369. From what follows, kharāj here seems to have the wide definition so as to include the jizyah, normally interpreted as "poll-tax;" concerning the common confusion of terminology here, see Bosworth, op. cit., 37, n. 2.

370. Ahl al-kufr min mu'āhadatihim, i.e., the "protected peoples" or Dhimmīs.

and humiliation.[371] Apportion it amongst the taxpayers with justice and fairness, and with equal treatment and universal applicability for all. Do not remove any part of the obligation to pay land-tax from any noble person just because of his nobility; nor from any rich person on account of his richness; nor from any of your secretaries or personal retainers. Do not require from anyone more than he can bear, and do not exact an amount which is in excess of the normal rate.[372] Impose taxation on all the people in an equitable manner, for that is more likely to attach them to your interests and more certain to make the masses contented.

Know that, by your appointment as governor, you have been placed as a custodian of valuables, a watchman and a shepherd; the people in your sphere of administrative jurisdiction are only called "your flock" [ra'iyyataka] because you are their shepherd [rā'īhim] and their overseer. Take from them that which they hand over to you from their surplus income and means of subsistence, and expend it on things which will ensure their continued material well-being and welfare and which will provide for their [1057] burdens. Within the provinces under your control, appoint over the people officials of clear foresight and judgment, men who are well-tested and experienced in provincial government and who know when to show severity and when to show restraint [or: who know how to exercise statesmanship, siyāsah, and moderation]. Pay them adequate salaries, for this is one of the inescapable obligations laid upon you when you took up your governorship and when it was entrusted to your charge. Let no one distract or deflect you from this, for if you choose consciously to follow this path, and fulfill faithfully the attendant obligations, you will gain for yourself additional grace and favor

371. Dhull^{an} wa-ṣaghār^{an}, echoing Qur'ān, IX, 29/30, a phrase whose exact interpretation has been much discussed by recent scholars; see the views of Cahen, M. Bravmann and M.J. Kister in Arabica, IX (1962), 76–9, X (1963), 94–5, XI (1964), 272–8.

372. Amr^{an} fīhi shaṭaṭ, echoing Qur'ān, LXXII, 4.

from your Lord and a favorable reputation within your own province; you will secure as a protection sincere advisers from amongst your people, and you will be helped in following a policy of amelioration. As a consequence, well-being [or: charitable works] will abound in your land and prosperity will be general in your territories. The land under your rule will burgeon with fertility, the yield from the land-tax will increase and your income in kind will be proportionately expanded.[373] By this means, you will be able to strengthen the bonds linking your army to you, and you will bring contentment to the masses by distributing your personal largesse to them. In following these courses your statesmanship will be acclaimed and your justice regarded with satisfaction, even by your enemies. In all your affairs you will be characterized by justice and might, and you will have the equipment and armaments of war. Strive zealously in this, and let nothing come before it; [if you do this,] the successful outcome of your affairs will receive due praise, if God wills.

In every district of your governorship, you should appoint a trusted observer [amīn][374] who will keep you informed of the activities of your local officials and will write to you regularly about their way of life and doings, in such a way that you will be, as it were, an eyewitness of every official's complete activities within his sphere of responsibility. If you wish to instruct an official to adopt a certain course of action, have due regard for all the consequences which you expect to follow from that. If you consider it to be a safe and wholesome course of action, and hope to find in it a useful defensive measure, wise counsel or benefit, then put it into practice. But if you find the con-

373. Or: your own personal properties/your wealth in general will become extensive, wa-tawaffarat amwāluka.

374. Here obviously the equivalent of the ṣāḥib al-barīd, postmaster and intelligence officer, of the 'Abbāsid caliphate and of the later mushrif al-mamlakah of eastern Iranian states; see A. Mez, The renaissance of Islam, 495 ff.; Levy, The social structure of Islam, 299–302; EI[2] s.v. Barīd (Sourdel); Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," 141–3.

[1058] trary, renounce it, and refer the matter to far-sighted and prudent experts in the question; then make proper provision for putting it into effect. For it often happens that a man examines a certain course of action in his policy and finds it agreeable, because of his personal inclinations, and this accordingly strengthens his resolve and gratifies him; but if he neglects to examine the consequences, it may lead to his destruction or ruin his whole policy.

Employ resolution in all that you purpose to do and, after obtaining God's help, set about it with vigor. Seek to discover by prayer your Lord's will in everything which you undertake. See that you finish the day's stint of work and never leave it to finish the next day. Instead, give it your personal attention, because the morrow always has its own affairs and events, which will divert you from the work left over from the previous day. You must realize that once a day is over, it carries away with it everything which was done during that day; so, when you put off the work belonging to it, you find yourself burdened with two days' work, and this will keep you occupied until you are able to turn aside from it. When you get through each day's work on the same day, you keep your mind and body fresh and at the same time you strengthen the fabric of your rule.[375]

Look to those of noble lineage and gentle birth, and then to those concerning whom you are certain[376] of the sincerity of their intentions, of the genuineness of their love for you, of their open manifestation of good counsel and their warm devotion to your rule. [When you are sure of this,] take them into your personal service and act kindly towards them. Take care of the interests of those members of good families [ahl al-buyūtāt] who have fallen on hard times; shoulder their burdens and improve their condition, so that they do not, in their distressed state, feel the touch of misfortune so keenly.

375. This injunction to get through each day's work and not let unsolved problems pile up, is an echo of the injunction attributed to the Caliph 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb in a letter to the governor of Baṣrah, Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī, concerning the judge's duties; see R.B. Serjeant, "The Caliph 'Umar's letters to Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī and Mu'āwiya," JSS, XXIX (1984), 69.

376. Following the reading of the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXXI.

Devote yourself to looking after the affairs of the poor and destitute, those who are unable to bring their complaints of ill-treatment to you personally, and those of wretched estate who do not know how to set about claiming their rights. Ask about these people as discreetly as possible; appoint as agents, in this work of seeking out such oppressed persons, reliable people from among your [1059] subjects, and give them orders to raise before you their needs and conditions, in order that you may examine them and bring such relief as God may provide for their predicaments. Turn your attention to those who have suffered injuries and to their orphans and widows, and provide them with allowances from the state treasury, following the example of the Commander of the Faithful, may God exalt him, in showing compassion for them and in giving them financial subventions, so that God may thereby bring some alleviation into their daily lives and may by means of it bring you the spiritual food of His blessing and an increase in His favor. Give pensions from the state treasury to the blind, and give to those who know the Qur'ān text by heart or the greater part of it higher allowances than to others. Set up hospices where sick Muslims can find shelter, and appoint custodians for these places who will treat the patients with kindness and physicians who will cure their illnesses. Comply with their desires, provided that this does not lead to the state treasury being thereby squandered.

Know that people, even if they are given their due rights and the greater part of their desires, will not be satisfied with these and their minds will not be at peace unless they are able to present their needs to their rulers, in the hope of getting more attention and kinder treatment from them. The man who investigates closely the people's affairs often becomes wearied by all the things which come before him, and the trouble and hardship which he undergoes in chasing them up often completely occupy his mind and thoughts. The person who seeks after justice, and who recognizes his material advantages in this present life and the superiority of the reward which he will enjoy in the next one, is not like the person who sets his face towards that which will bring him closer to God and through it seeks His mercy.[377]

Allow people access to your person as much as possible, and show your face to them as often as you can. Order your guards to treat them peaceably; be humble towards them, [1060] and show your face of approval to them. When questioning them or speaking with them, be gentle, and grant them a share of your goodness and beneficence. Moreover, when you give, give in a generous and open-hearted manner, seeking to do a good action and to secure a future reward, and not so as to embarrass the recipient or remind him of it [in the hope of a gift or favor in return]; for a gift bestowed according to the first fashion will be regarded as a profitable transaction, if God wills.

Take careful note of everything which you observe in this present world, and consider the examples of your predecessors, the rulers and leaders of past centuries, and of nations [that have] now disappeared from the earth. Then in your affairs hold fast to God's command; keep yourself in the orbit of His love; let your actions be guided by His religious law and the examples laid down by His prophet and the successors, and maintain the supremacy of His faith and His Book. Avoid anything which departs from that or which contradicts it or which arouses[378] God's ire. Be cognizant of the amount of taxation which your officials collect, and of that which they expend of it; do not amass unlawful wealth and do not spend wealth prodigally.

Spend a lot of time with the learned scholars ['ulamā']; seek their advice, and frequent their company. Your desire

377. I.e., the first person deserves a greater reward because he is seeking to enforce God's will, here on earth, and is not just seeking his personal salvation in isolation from the needs of this present world.

378. Following the reading of the Addenda et emendenda, p. DCCLXXI.

should be that of following the established practices of the faith and of putting them into action, and that of preferring [before all else] the noble and lofty aspects of affairs. The noblest person among all those who join your circle and act as your confidants should be the person who, when he discerns a fault in you, is not held back by awe of you from privately pointing out to you the defect and from telling you about the shortcoming which lies in that defect. Such persons as these are the sincerest of your intimates and supporters in giving disinterested advice.

Keep an eye on the officials at your court and on your secretaries. Allot to each of them a fixed time each day when they can bring you their official correspondence and any documents requiring the affixing of the ruler's mark,[379] and can acquaint you of the officials' various requirements and of all the affairs of your provinces and your subjects. Then devote all your faculties—ears, eyes, understanding and intellect—to the affairs of that sort which they set before you; reflect and pore over it repeatedly. Finally, put [1061] into effect those courses which seem to you to be in accordance with good judgment and justice, and seek to know God's will in them; but where they seem to be opposed to these criteria, put them off for further consideration and more enquiries.

Do not remind your subjects or anyone else, to whom you have granted a favor, about it [in expectation of a gift in return]; accept nothing from anyone except faithfulness, honest dealing and assistance to the Commander of the Faithful's interests; do not grant any favor except on this basis.

Strive to understand this epistle of mine to you; study it at length, and always use it as a guide for your actions. In all your undertakings, ask God for help and seek to know His will, for God is with every good work of righteousness and with those who follow after it. Let your most important conduct and your best desire be what is pleasing to God and what brings order to His faith, strength and steadfastness to His people, and justice and righteousness both for the protected peoples and the community of the Muslims [al-dhimma wa-al-milla].

379. Mu'āmarah, originally a financial term, sometimes with the modern meaning of "surcharge," but one which became generalized for any file or inventory of documents requiring the ruler's or governor's signature; see Bosworth, op. cit., 126.

I myself will ask God to favor you with His aid, His help towards success, His right guidance and His safe keeping. Also, [I will ask Him] to grant you His favor and mercy through a bestowal of all His grace and generosity, so that He will make you the most fortunate of all your peers and contemporaries, the richest in possessions and the most elevated in reputation and power. Finally, [I will ask Him] to destroy your enemies, those who rise up against you and those who act wrongfully against you; to bring you prosperity from your subjects; and to keep Satan and his evil promptings away from you. As a result of this, your position will be exalted in power and might and successfulness; indeed, He is always near, always ready to answer.[380]

It is mentioned that when Ṭāhir gave this charge to his son 'Abdallāh, people struggled amongst themselves (to get a copy), wrote it out and studied it repeatedly. Its fame spread until it reached al-Ma'mūn. He ordered a copy to be brought, and it was read out to him. He exclaimed after this, "Abū al-Ṭayyib has not mentioned anything of the matters concerning the [1062] faith, the present world, the conduct of public affairs, judgment, statecraft, the improvement of the realm and of the subjects, the safeguarding of the Muslim community, obedience to

380. Qur'ān, XI, 64/61. For the original version of the text of this epistle of Ṭāhir's, see Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 35–53, tr. 16–25, with an English translation also by Bosworth, "An early Arabic Mirror for Princes," 25–41; Ibn Abī Ṭāhir was of course the basis for Ṭabarī's text. Of later authors, Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 363–77, used Ṭabarī, and Ibn Khaldūn, tr. Rosenthal, The Muqaddimah, II, 139–56, French tr. V. Monteil, Ibn Khaldûn, discours sur l'histoire universelle (al-Muqaddima), II, 616–31, used, according to Rosenthal, II, 139, n. 751, Ibn al-Athīr's text in the first place but revised it in the light of Ṭabarī's. On the place of Ṭāhir's epistle within the genre, see G. Richter, Studien zur Geschichte der älteren arabischen Fürstenspiegel, 80–5; Bosworth, op. cit., 25–30; id., "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic culture," JSS, XIV (1969), 55–6.

the Caliphs and maintenance of the caliphate, without in fact dealing with them thoroughly, making recommendations about them and giving instructions [for their execution]."[381] Al-Ma'mūn ordered that it should be copied out and sent to all the governors in the various districts 'Abdallāh then set out to take up his official appointment; he modelled his conduct on that recommended in the epistle, followed its injunctions and acted in accordance with what he had been enjoined to do.[382]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir placed Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm [al-Muṣ'abī][383] in charge of the two bridges[384] and appointed Isḥāq as his representative in the offices which his father Ṭāhir had [previously] made 'Abdallāh himself his representative—the command of the guard at Baghdad and the collection of the tax revenues from there.[385] This was at the time when he set off for Raqqah in order to combat Naṣr b. Shabath.

In this year, 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥasan, governor of the two Holy Cities, led the pilgrimage.[386]

---

381. Supplying, with the text of Ibn Abī Ṭayfūr, 54, fīhi.

382. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 53–4, tr. 25; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 377.

383. Member of the Ṭāhirid family, first cousin of Ṭalḥah and 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, and holder of the office of governor of Baghdad till his death in 235 (849/50); see Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic culture," 67–8; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 260, 265, 273.

384. The old and new bridges over the Tigris at Baghdad, the former dating back to Sāsānid times and the latter to al-Manṣūr; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 60, 91–3; Lassner, Topography, 101, 277.

385. See Bosworth, op. cit., 45–6.

386. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 769; Azdī, 362.

The Events of the Year

207

(MAY 27, 822–MAY 15, 823)

The events taking place during this year included the rebellion of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Aḥmad b. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Umar b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib in the district of the 'Akk[387] in the Yemen, summoning people in the name of The One Well-pleasing [to God] from the House of Muḥammad.

The Rebellion of 'Abd al-Raḥmān

The reason for his rebellion was that the tax officials in the Yemen had behaved in an oppressive manner, so the local people gave their allegiance to this 'Abd al-Raḥmān. When news of this reached al-Ma'mūn, he sent against him Dīnār b. 'Abdallāh with a powerful army, and sent with him a written promise guaranteeing 'Abd al-Raḥmān's security. Dīnār b. 'Abdallāh arrived at the season of the pilgrimage and made the pilgrimage

387. The Banū 'Akk were an old-established South Arabian tribe, dwelling to the north of Zabīd, according to Hamdānī; see EI[2] s.v. (W. Caskel). Five years before this, in 202 (817), the two tribes of 'Akk and A'shar had risen in revolt against al-Ma'mūn's governor in the Yemen, Ḥamdawayh b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Māhān; see Geddes, 105–6.

himself. When he had accomplished this, he went on to the Yemen until he made contact with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. He sent to him the guarantee of security from al-Maʾmūn; ʿAbd al-Raḥmān accepted this, coming into Dīnār's presence and clasping hands with him. Dīnār went back with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān to al-Maʾmūn. At this point al-Maʾmūn forbade the Ṭālibids to enter his presence and ordered them to start wearing black garments. This was on Thursday, the twenty-ninth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (April 15, 823).[388] [1063]

In this year, the death of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn took place.

The Death of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn[389]

It is related from Muṭahhar b. Ṭāhir[390] that the death of Dhū al-Yamīnayn[391] was the result of a fever and high temperature which attacked him and that he was found dead in his bed. It is also related that his two paternal uncles, ʿAlī b. Muṣʿab and the latter's brother Aḥmad b. Muṣʿab,[392] went to visit him in his sickness. They asked the servant how he was, at the point when the servant was performing the dawn worship. The servant replied that Ṭāhir was sleeping and had not yet awakened. ʿAlī and Aḥmad accordingly waited for a while, but when the dawn had unfolded itself fully and there was still no sign of any movement on Ṭāhir's part at this time when he normally used to rise for the worship, they became disquieted about this and told the servant to wake him up. The latter replied, "I daren't

388. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 381 (with the date the twenty-eighth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah); Geddes, 106–7. The date the twenty-ninth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah was actually a Wednesday.

389. The historical reports on Ṭāhir's death show considerable divergences; see Barthold, Turkestan, 208–9; Rothstein, 161; Sourdel, "Les circonstances de la mort de Ṭāhir Ier," 66–9; Bosworth, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 95.

390. This son of Ṭāhir is given the kunyah or patronymic of Abū Muḥammad in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 129, tr. 59.

391. Various explanations are given in the sources for Ṭāhir's sobriquet of "the man with two right hands;" see Goldziher, "Ueber Dualtitel," WZKM, XIII (1899), 324; Bosworth, op. cit., 92.

392. It had been this forebear, Muṣʿab b. Ruzayq al-Khuzāʿī, and his brother Ṭalḥah, who had founded the family's fortunes by their rôle in the ʿAbbāsid revolution; see Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic culture," 47–8; M. Kaabi, "Les origines Ṭāhirides dans la daʿwa ʿabbāside," Arabica, XIX (1972), 158–9.

do that." But they told him to knock at the door on their behalf[393] so that they might enter. Then they went in and found him wrapped in a coverlet which he had tucked underneath himself and with which he had covered himself securely from head to feet. They touched him, but he did not move at all; so they uncovered his face and found him dead. They had no idea exactly when he had died, and none of his servants was aware of his time of death. They questioned the servant about what had happened to him and about last thing which he (the servant) had been aware of from him. He recounted that Ṭāhir had performed the sunset and the final night worships, and then had wrapped himself up in his coverlet. The servant related that he had heard Ṭāhir utter a few words in Persian, "dar marg nīz mardī wāyadh," meaning, "manly fortitude is necessary even in death."[394]

[1064] It is related from Kulthūm b. Thābit b. Abī Sa'd, whose patronymic was Abū Sa'd,[395] that he said: I was in charge of the intelligence and postal service (barīd) in Khurasan, and the place where I usually sat each Friday was at the foot of the pulpit. In the year 207 (822/823), two years after Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn had become governor, I was present at the Friday worship. Ṭāhir ascended the pulpit, and then delivered the sermon (khuṭbah). When he came to mentioning the Caliph, he refrained from praying for him, and merely said, "O God, secure the welfare of the community of Muḥammad as you have secured it for those who are your close supporters [awliyā'aka], and relieve them of the crushing burden of those who would oppress and band together against them by repairing the disorder of affairs, preventing the shedding of blood and restoring harmonious relations between people." Kulthūm went on to relate: I said to myself, "I am going to be the first to be killed, for I cannot conceal this news." Hence I went away, performed the ablutions prescribed before death, put on the waistcloth of those about to die and a robe, and threw a cloak over myself. I took off my [official 'Abbāsid] black clothing, and wrote to al-Ma'mūn.

393. The text has uṭruq lanā; Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 130, has, alternatively, ṭarriq lanā, "clear the way for us."

394. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 129–30, tr. 59–60; 'Uyūn, 364; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 381; cf. Bosworth, op. cit., 48.

395. In Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 117, tr. 53, Kulthūm is given the nisbah or gentilic of al-Nakha'ī and described as a mawlā of Muḥammad b. 'Imrān of Fūtaq (a village of the Marw oasis, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 279), who obtained for Kulthūm the office of Ṣāḥib al-Barīd of Khurasan.

He continued: When Ṭāhir had performed the afternoon worship, he sent for me, but at that point he had some sort of attack in his eyelids and the interior corner of his eye, and fell down dead. He continued: Ṭalḥah b. Ṭāhir went forth and shouted, "Bring him back, bring him back!"—I having left—so they brought me back. He asked me, "Have you written a report about what happened [that is, about Ṭāhir's act of rebelliousness]?" I retorted that I had. Then he said, "Write a message about his death," and gave me five hundred thousand [dirhams] and two hundred sets of clothes. I then wrote a report about Ṭāhir's death and Ṭalḥah's assumption of command over the army.

He continued: There reached al-Ma'mūn the dispatch bag (kharīṭah) containing the letter announcing Ṭāhir's renunciation of obedience in the morning. He summoned Ibn Abī Khālid and told him, "Set out, and bring Ṭāhir back to me, just as you said you would and just as you guaranteed." Ibn Abī Khālid replied, "Let me stay here just this one night." Al-Ma'- [1065] mūn swore, "Nay, upon my life, you shall only spend the night on the back of a mount!" Ibn Abī Khālid kept on imploring him to relent, until al-Ma'mūn at last gave him permission to remain for one night. He continued: By night, the dispatch bag arrived bringing news of Ṭāhir's death. Al-Ma'mūn summoned Ibn Abī Khālid and told him, "Ṭāhir is dead; whom do you think [should be his successor]?" Ibn Abī Khālid replied, "His son Ṭalḥah." The Caliph said, "You have spoken correctly. Write out a diploma investing him with the governorship." So he wrote it out. Ṭalḥah remained governor in Khurasan during al-Ma'mūn's caliphate for seven years after Ṭāhir's death, and then he himself died; al-Ma'mūn thereupon appointed 'Abdallāh governor in Khurasan.[396] The latter was at that time in charge of the military operations against Babāk. He established his base at Dīnawar and sent out armies from there. The news of Ṭalḥah's death reached al-Ma'mūn; he thereupon sent Yaḥyā b. Aktham[397] with a message of condolences on his brother's death and hailing him with his appointment as governor of Khurasan, and he placed 'Alī b. Hishām in charge of the war against Bābak.[398]

396. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh II, 557; 'Uyūn, 364–5; Barthold, Turkestan, 208; Bosworth, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 98.

It is mentioned from al-'Abbās[399] that he was present at one of al-Ma'mūn's sessions when the latter had just received the announcement of Ṭāhir's death, and the Caliph exclaimed, "O [my] two hands and mouth![400] Praise to be God, who has sent Ṭāhir on [to the next life] and kept us back!"[401]

An account different from the one above has been mentioned in regard to Ṭalḥah's appointment as governor of Khurasan after his father Ṭāhir. According to what this account says, when Ṭāhir died—this event taking place in Jumādā I (September–October 822)—the army rose up in an émeute and plundered some of his treasuries. The eunuch Sallām al-Abrash assumed leadership of them; he issued an order, and they were given six months' pay allowance. Al-Ma'mūn then entrusted Ṭāhir's governorship to Ṭalḥah, as the deputy of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. The point here was that, according to the people who give this variant account, al-Ma'mūn appointed 'Abdallāh as governor after Ṭāhir's death over the whole of Ṭāhir's former area of responsibility. 'Abdallāh was at that moment stationed at Raqqah engaged in the war with Naṣr b. Shabath. Al-Ma'mūn added Syria to his responsibilities, and sent him an investiture diploma for Khurasan and his father's (other) administrative

397. Grand judge of Baghdad and counsellor of al-Ma'mūn, but who was later disgraced for his corruption and licentiousness; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 238–9.

398. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 130–2, tr. 60, (see also Rothstein, 161), with another, briefer account of Ṭāhir's act of rebelliousness and death, related from Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥasan, in ibid., 116–17, tr. 53; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh II, 556–7, with the story that Ṭāhir was poisoned by the nephew of his friend Muḥammad b. Farrukh al-'Amrakī (see also Rothstein, loc. cit.).

399. I.e., al-Ma'mūn's son.

400. For this proverbial expression, whose exact point is unclear, see Maydānī, Mu'jam amthāl al-'Arab, tr. G.W. Freytag, II, 475, no. 243.

401. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 133, tr. 61; 'Uyūn, 365; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 382.

responsibilities. 'Abdallāh then sent his brother Ṭalḥah to Khurasan,[402] and appointed as his deputy in the City of Peace Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm.[403] Ṭalḥah wrote to al-Ma'mūn in his brother's name. Al-Ma'mūn sent Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid to Khurasan in order to take over Ṭalḥah's responsibilities. Aḥmad led an ex- [1066] pedition into Transoxiana; he conquered Ushrūsanah and captured Kāwūs b. Khārākhuruh[404] and his son al-Faḍl, and sent them both to al-Ma'mūn. Ṭalḥah gave Ibn Abī Khālid three million dirhams plus moveable objects excluding gold and silver ('urūḍ) amounting to one million (dirhams), and gave Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās, Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid's secretary, five hundred thousand dirhams.[405]

In this year, prices rose high in Baghdad, Baṣrah and Kūfah, until the price of a hārūnī qafīz of wheat rose to forty dirhams and the price of a muljam qafīz of wheat to fifty.[406]

In this year, Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ was appointed governor of Ṭabaristān, Rūyān and Dunbāwand.[407]

In this year, Abū 'Īsā b. al-Rashīd led the pilgrimage.[408]

---

402. Cf. above, and Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 131, tr. 60.

403. Ibid., 35, tr. 16. The accounts of Ṭāhir's death are particularly divergent over chronology; it may be that an interval of several weeks took place between Ṭāhir's act of rebelliousness and his actual death, cf. Sourdel, "Les circonstances de la mort de Ṭāhir Ier," 68–9.

404. The father Khārākhuruh (for this Iranian name, see F. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, 170) had submitted to al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī in 178 (794), see Ṭabarī, III, 631; Kāwūs's other son Ḥaydar was to enter 'Abbāsid service as the famous general al-Afshīn, on whom see EI[2] s.v. (Barthold—Gibb).

405. 'Uyūn, 365; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 382–3; Barthold, 210–11; Rothstein, 162; Bosworth, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 96–7.

406. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 134, tr. 61; Azdī, 362; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 384. For these measures of capacity, see Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the technical terms of the secretary's art," 148–50.

407. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 385; Rabino di Borgomale, "Les préfets du Califat au Ṭabaristān," 262. Rūyān was the westernmost district of Ṭabaristān, see Le Strange, Lands, 373–4, and Barthold, An historical geography of Iran, 233–4; and Dunbāwand was the highest peak of the Elburz chain, see Le Strange, ibid., 371, Schwarz, 755 ff., and EI[2] s.v. Damāwand (Streck).

408. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 770; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

208

(MAY 16, 823–MAY 3, 824)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣ'ab's move from Khurasan to Kirmān, where he then defied the government, and Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid's expedition against him until he seized him and brought him to al-Ma'mūn, who then pardoned him.[409]

In this year, in Muḥarram (May–June 823), al-Ma'mūn appointed Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī as judge of 'Askar al-Mahdī (of Ruṣāfah).

In this year, the judge Muḥammad b. Samā'ah asked to be relieved of his office; he was accordingly released from it and Ismā'īl b. Ḥammād b. Abī Ḥanīfah appointed in his stead.[410]

[1067] In this year, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was dismissed from the office of judge after he had only just been invested

409. Op. cit., VI, 386. The Ṭāhirid al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn was the uncle of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, and subsequently acted as deputy governor for the latter in Ṭabaristān; see Sa'īd Nafīsī, Ta'rīkh-i khāndān-i Ṭāhirī, I, 29–30, citing Ẓahīr al-Dīn Mar'ashī, Ta'rīkh-i Ṭabaristān u Rūyān u Māzandarān.

410. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit. Azdī, 341, gives the name as Muḥammad b. Samāwah in recording his appointment in 201 (816/17) as judge of the West Side of Baghdad.

with it, in the same year, in Rabīʿ I (July–August 823), and Bishr b. al-Walīd al-Kindī was appointed to it. A certain poet has said:

O monarch, who proclaims the unity of his Lord, your judge Bishr b. al-Walīd is an ass!

He rejects the legal testimony of the person who holds the faith of what the Book has spoken about and what the historical traditions have brought,

And he considers as a reliable legal witness the person who says that he is a shaykh who encompasses with his body the regions of the world [that is, a universal sage]![411]

In Shaʿbān (December 823–January 824), Mūsā b. Muhammad al-Makhlūʿ (the son of the deposed Caliph al-Amīn) died, and in Dhū al-Qaʿdah (March–April 824), al-Faḍl b. al-Rabīʿ died.[412]

In this year, Ṣālih b. al-Rashīd led the pilgrimage.[413]

411. Azdī, 365; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

412. Ibid. Mūsā had been his father al-Amīn's choice as his first heir; see Abbott, 230–1.

413. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 771; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

209

(MAY 4, 824–APRIL 23, 825)

Among the events taking place during this year was ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's exertion of pressure on (or: his surrounding of) Naṣr b. Shabath, driving him into a tight corner so that he had to seek a guarantee of safety.[414] It is mentioned from Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad al-ʿĀmirī that he said: Al-Maʾmūn said to Thumāmah (b. Ashras), "Can't you point out to me a man from the people of the Jazīrah with intelligence, eloquence and knowledge, who can transmit a message from me, which I will dispatch him with, to Naṣr b. Shabath?" He replied, "Certainly, O Commander of the Faithful, [there is] a certain man from the Banū ʿĀmir called Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad." Al-Maʾmūn said, "Bring him to me!" Jaʿfar continued: So Thumāmah summoned me [1068] and brought me into the Caliph's presence. He spoke to me at great length, and then commanded me to deliver these words to Naṣr b. Shabath. Jaʿfar continued: So I went to Naṣr, who was at that moment at Kafar ʿAzūn in the neighborhood of

414. ʿUyūn, 365. For Naṣr's final efforts and surrender, see Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 91, and cf. Shaban, 52.

Sarūj,[415] and passed on to him al-Ma'mūn's message. He showed himself submissive, but laid down certain conditions, including that he should not be required to step on any of the Caliph's carpets (as a sign of supplication and submission).

Ja'far continued: I went back to al-Ma'mūn and gave him the reply. He answered, "By God, I'll never agree to these stipulations of his, even if I reach the point of having to sell my shirt in order to persuade him to step on my carpet! What's the matter with him, shrinking from us in fear?"

Ja'far continued: I said, "Because of his offences and all that he has perpetrated up till now." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "Do you imagine that he has committed greater offences, in my sight, than al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' and 'Isā b. Abī Khālid? Do you know what al-Faḍl did to me? He appropriated my commanders, my troops, my weapons and everything which my father had bequeathed to me, and went off with them to Muḥammad [al-Amīn], leaving me alone and isolated at Marw! He betrayed me, and he turned my brother against me until those events involving him took place as they did. That struck me more harshly than anything else! Do you know what 'Īsā b. Abī Khālid did to me? He drove my representative out of my own city and the city of my forefathers, went off with my receipts from the land-tax and my revenues from the cultivators of the conquered lands, razed my houses to the ground, set up Ibrāhīm as Caliph in place of me and hailed him with my rightful title!"

Ja'far continued: I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, will you allow me to speak, so that I may say something apposite?" He replied, "Speak on!" I said, "Al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' was your foster-brother and your close associate [mawlā]; the status of his forebears was the same as your, and the status of your forebears the same as his; you can make a claim on him[416] in various ways, all of which connect you with him. As for ʿĪsa b. Abī Khālid, he is a man who comes from the supporters of your dy-[1069] nasty (the ʿAbbāsids); his precedence [sābiqah][417] and the precedence of his forebears, all this constitutes a claim on him through that. Whereas this fellow [Naṣr] has never had any share of power on the basis of which he might achieve eminence, nor have any of his forebears; these last merely came from the troops of the Umayyads." Al-Ma'mun answered, "If what you say is indeed the case, what about all the rancor and ire which is involved? I shall never leave him alone until he steps on my carpet."

415. The village of Kafar 'Azūn is mentioned later in accounts of Byzantine-Arab warfare in this neighborhood, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 470, and E. Honigmann, Die Ostgrenze des byzantinischen Reiches, 108; Sarūj was a town of the Jazīrah to the west of Ḥarrān and Edessa, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 216–17, and Le Strange, Lands, 108.

416. Conjectural restoration of the text here by the editor.

Jaʿfar continued: I went back to Naṣr and told him all that. He continued: He shouted loudly for his horses, and they wheeled around. Then he said, "Shame on him! He has not the strength to subdue four hundred frogs on his own doorstep [literally: under his own wing]"—he was referring to the Zuṭṭ—"so can he overcome the assembled cohorts of swift horses of the Arabs?"[418]

Naṣr b. Shabath Seeks a Guarantee of Safety

It is mentioned that when ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir brought his full force to bear on Naṣr in battle and constricted him, and when his request for a guarantee of safety came (to ʿAbdallāh), the latter granted it and then moved out of his military camp to Raqqah in the year 209 (824/5). Naṣr now went to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.[419] Previous to this, after ʿAbdallāh had defeated Naṣr's armies, al-Ma'mūn had written a letter to Naṣr summoning him to obedience and the abandonment of his rebellion. However, Naṣr had rejected this. ʿAbdallāh himself then wrote to Naṣr. The text of al-Ma'mūn's letter to Naṣr—indited by ʿAmr b. Masʿadah—was as follows:

417. The repeated use here of the term sābiqah obviously echoes its importance in earliest Islam in regard to pre-eminence and a preferential rôle in the new ummah or Islamic community.

418. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 141–3, tr. 64–5.

419. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 388–9.

O Naṣr b. Shabath, you know about obedience to authority, its mightiness, the coolness of its shade and the sweet smell of its pasturage; and [on the other hand] the regretfulness and deprivation which result from rejecting this obedience. Even though God may grant you a long respite, He only grants a lengthy period of enjoyment of life in the case of a person whom He wishes to make a publicly-known proof, so that God's warning examples may strike home to the people concerned, according to the degree of their persistence [in such courses] and their meriting [eventual retribution]. [1070] I have deemed it good to give you due warning and to open your eyes, because I hope that what I am writing to you may have an effect on you. For truth is indeed truth, and falsity is falsity, and speech can only be judged according to the times and places of its enunciation [makhārijihi] and by those who are concerned with it [that is, have uttered it]. None of the Commander of the Faithful's governors has treated you in a manner more beneficial to your material wealth, your faith and your own person, nor has anyone been more solicitous of drawing you back and rescuing you from your errors than myself.

O Naṣr, by virtue of what first or last reason, or by what means or by what power, have you rebelled against the Commander of the Faithful? Do you seize his property and arrogate to yourself the authority which God has conferred on him, excluding him from it, and expect to remain in a state of security, with peace of mind, quietness, peaceableness and calm? By Him who knows both what is hidden and what is open, if you do not return to obedience, submitting fully to it, you will certainly experience the unpleasantness of retribution, and I shall certainly then concentrate my attention on you before everything else; for if the horns of Satan are not cut off, they are a source of strife and great corruption in the earth. Moreover, I shall certainly, with the supporters of the royal power [or: of the dynasty] who are in my forces, press down on the backs of the necks of the dregs of your followers, those who have [1071] come to you in a confused band from the near and distant corners of the lands, with their scum and worst elements, those thieves and robbers who have rallied to your side and those whom their land has spewed forth or whose tribe has expelled them because of their bad reputation within it. He who has delivered a warning is excused [from any of its consequences]! Farewell![420]

According to what has been mentioned, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir remained engaged in fighting Naṣr b. Shabath for five years, until Naṣr sought a guarantee of safety. 'Abdallāh then wrote to al-Ma'mūn informing him that he had driven Naṣr into a tight corner and was tightening the screws on him, that he had killed the leaders in his entourage and that Naṣr had sought refuge in a guarantee of safety and had asked for this. Al-Ma'mūn ordered 'Abdallāh to write a letter to Naṣr promising this guarantee. So he wrote our a guarantee of safety for him, with the following text:

Vigorous exertion in the cause of what is right is God's decisive proof and one which is linked with success, and conducting one's cause with justice is a call to God with which is connected strength. The one who continuallly strives for what is right and who conducts his cause with justice is always seeking to open the gates of succor and always calling for the means of firm control, until God gives the victory—and He is the best of those who give victory—and establishes people in firm control—and He is the best of those who establish people in firm control. With regard to the course which you have been following, you must inevitably fall into one of three classes: [that of] the one who seeks religion; [that of] the one who desires the present world; or [that of] the one who rushes forward recklessly, seeking dominance through tyrannical behavior.

Now if you are following the way of religion in your

420. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 137–8, tr. 63.

conduct, then make this clear to the Commander of the Faithful, who will [immediately] seize the opportunity to accept this, if it is really genuine; for by my life, his supreme intention and farthest aim is to incline towards what is right, whenever he inclines [towards something], and to incline away, with what is just, whenever he inclines away [that is, to make affirmative or negative decisions, according to what is right or just, in their appropriate places]. If you are aiming to follow the way of the present world, then inform the Commander of the Faithful about your aim and about the state of affairs under which you claim an entitlement to it. If you establish a deserving [1072] claim to it and he is able to grant that, then he will do it for you; for by my life, he does not permit any person to be debarred from what he justly deserves, however great this may be. But if you are rushing forward through life recklessly, then God will relieve the Commander of the Faithful of the burden of you and will speedily bring that about, just as He speedily disposed of the burden of other people who followed the same way as you, who were stronger in resources, with more numerous armies, and extensively endowed with manpower, numbers and support than you; He drove them towards the places where those who have been found wanting are left prostrated, and He brought down on them the calamities merited by those behaving tyrannically. The Commander of the Faithful seals his letter with the declaration of faith that there is no god but God, the Unique One who is without associate, and that Muḥammad is His servant and messenger. His guarantee to you, according to his religion and his protection, is the pardoning of your previous misdeeds and earlier crimes and your being established in the positions of power and exaltedness which you merit, if you come forward and respond [to his invitation], if God wills. Farewell![421]

421. Ibid., 138–40, tr. 63–4.

When Naṣr b. Shabath went forth to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir with the guarantee of safety, he ('Abdallāh) pulled down and destroyed Kaysūm.[422]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed Ṣadaqah b. 'Alī, known as Zurayq,[423] as governor of Armenia and Azerbaijan, with responsibility for the war against Bābak; Ṣadaqah invited Aḥmad b. al-Junayd b. Farzandī al-Iskāfī to take charge of the actual military operations against Bābak. Aḥmad b. al-Junayd b. Farzandī returned to Baghdad and then came back to (fight) the Khurramiyyah, but Bābak took him captive. The Caliph then appointed Ibrāhīm b. al-Layth b. al-Faḍl al-Tujībī[424] over Azerbaijan.[425]

[1073] In this year, Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī (b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās), the governor of Mecca, led the pilgrimage.[426]

In this year, there died Michael son of George, emperor of Byzantium, who had reigned for nine years. The Byzantines appointed as ruler over themselves Theophilus son of Michael.[427]

---

422. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 560; Azdī, 366; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 390; Rothstein, 163. Kaysūm lay in the upper Euphrates region, to the southwest of Adiyaman, and is the modern Keysun, Greek Kaisou; see Le Strange, Lands, 123; Honigmann, 62.

423. Thus apparently correct, following Balādhurī, Futūḥ al-buldān, 330–1: Ṣadaqah b. 'Alī b. Ṣadaqah b. Dīnār, a mawlā of the Azd tribe, pace the Zurayq b. 'Alī b. Ṣadaqah of Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 564, and Azdī, 366 ff., and the 'Alī b. Ṣadaqah of other sources, see Ṭabarī, III, 1072, n. f.

424. Editor's conjecture for this nisbah, written without dots; but we do not otherwise know of the presence of members of Tujīb of Kindah in Azerbaijan; Dr. Hinds accordingly suggests the nisbah al-Yaḥmadī (a subdivision of the Azd) as a conceivable reading. Cf. also Azdī, 366.

425. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 390.

426. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 772; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

427. As with Ṭabarī's previous recording of the death of Leo V four years too early (above, 45), Ṭabarī is some five years premature here; Michael II, founder of the Amorian line of emperors, actually died in 829, when his son Theophilus succeeded him. See Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 272, 280–1; Anastos, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire, I, 100–2.

The Events of the Year

210

(APRIL 24, 825–APRIL 12, 826)

Among the events taking place during this year was the arrival at Baghdad of Naṣr b. Shabath, whom ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir sent to al-Maʾmūn. He entered the city on Monday, the seventh of Ṣafar, 210[428] (May 30, 825); he was lodged in the City of Abū Jaʿfar (the Round City), with guards appointed to watch over him.[429]

In this year, al-Maʾmūn gained the upper hand over Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm al-Imām, who was known as Ibn ʿĀʾishah,[430] Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ifrīqī, Mālik b. Shāhī,[431] Faraj al-Baghwārī[432] and their confederates who had been active in securing allegiance to Ibrāhīm b. al-

428. Actually a Tuesday.

429. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 143, tr. 65.

430. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 558–9, gives his full nasab, or lineage, back to al-ʿAbbās through eight generations.

431. Ibid., II, 559, adds Mālik's nisbah as al-Niffarī.

432. Reading uncertain, and Samʿānī in his Kitāb al-Ansāb does not mention such a nisbah; perhaps we should read al-Baghawī, see ibid. (Hyderabad), II, 273–6.

Mahdī. The person who provided al-Ma'mūn with information about them and about what they were plotting was 'Imrān al-Qaṭrabullī. According to what is mentioned, al-Ma'mūn sent officers to arrest them on Saturday, the fifth of Ṣafar, 210[433] (May 28, 825). Al-Ma'mūn ordered Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Ā'ishah to be left (pinioned) in the sun for three days at the gateway of his (al-Ma'mūn's) palace; on Tuesday he had him flogged and then jailed him in the Maṭbaq (or: Muṭbaq) prison.[434] Then he had Mālik b. Shāhī and his confederates flogged. They wrote down [1074] for al-Ma'mūn the names of all those—commanders, troops and other persons—who had entered into the conspiracy with them. Al-Ma'mūn did not, however, make a move towards any of those who had been delated, since he was not sure that the conspirators were not accusing innocent persons.[435] The conspirators had agreed among themselves that they would cut the bridge when the troops had gone forth to meet Naṣr b. Shabath. But they were delated and then arrested. After this, Naṣr b. Shabath entered Baghdad alone, none of the troops being sent to escort him.[436] First of all, he was lodged with Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, and subsequently transferred to the city of Abū Ja'far.

Ibrāhīm al-Mahdī Is Arrested

In this year, during the night of Sunday (the night of Saturday-Sunday), the sixteenth of Rabi' II (August 5–6, 825),[437] Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī was arrested, veiled and dressed like a woman and in the company of two women.[438] A black negro guard stopped 433. Actually a Sunday; Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 176, has the sixth of Ṣafar, corrected by Keller in his tr. 80, to the fifth of Ṣafar.

434. The celebrated jail in the Round City on the street running between the Kūfah and Baṣrah gates; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 27; Lassner, Topography, 243.

435. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 391.

436. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 176–7, tr. 80.

437. Inserting, with Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 185, and the ms. cited in the editor's n. f, the word baqiyat rather than khalat; the date of the sixteenth of Rabi' II gives the correct correspondence with Sunday.

438. According to Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 63 = ed. Pellat, § 2750, in the street called "The Long" (al-Darb al-Ṭawīl); see for this, Le Strange, Baghdad, 221. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 351, tr. 450, confirms this date.

him during the night and demanded, "Who are you, and where are you going at this hour?" According to what is mentioned, Ibrāhīm offered him a ruby ring of high value from his own finger, if he would let them pass and cease questioning them. When the guard looked at the ring, he became suspicious about them and said to himself, "This ring belongs to a man of high social status." Hence, he took them along to the commander of the guard post, and the latter ordered them to unveil their faces. Ibrāhīm refused, but the commander pulled it away,[439] and Ibrāhīm's beard was revealed. He took him to the commandant of the bridge, who recognised him and took him to al-Ma'mūn's gate. The Caliph was informed, and ordered him to be kept in the palace. On the Sunday morning, he was set down in al-Ma'mūn's palace so that the Hāshimites, the commanders and the troops might gaze on him. They put the veil which [1075] he had been wearing round his neck and the mantle in which he had been wrapped across his breast, so that people might see him and know in what guise he had been taken. When it was Thursday, al-Ma'mūn had him transferred to Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid's house and had him imprisoned in his custody. Then al-Ma'mūn had him brought forth to accompany himself when he went to visit al-Ḥasan b. Sahl at Wāsiṭ. People said that al-Ḥasan spoke to the Caliph about him, and al-Ma'mūn showed his favor towards Ibrāhīm, released him and sent him back to Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid.[440] Along with Ibrāhīm, al-Ma'mūn sent Ibn Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh and Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mazyad[441] to watch over him, except that he was allowed plenty of living space there, having his mother and family with him; he used to ride to al-Ma'mūn's palace with these (two) persons guarding him as an escort.[442]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn had Ibn 'Ā'ishah killed and gibbeted.

---

439. One might have here, with the same meaning, the lectio facilior of fa-jadhabahu.

440. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.; 'Uyūn, 365; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 392.

441. Governor of Kūfah and then of Armenia, and member of an Arab family prominent under the early 'Abbāsids; from his family there later sprang the Yazīdī line of Shīrwān-Shāhs; see Crone, 169–70; V. Minorsky, A history of Sharvān and Darband, 22 ff., 116–17.

442. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 184–5, tr. 83–4.

Al-Ma'mūn Has Ibn 'Ā'ishah Killed

The reason for this was that al-Ma'mūn consigned to prison Ibn 'Ā'ishah, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ifrīqī, two men from the city mobsters called Abū Mismār and 'Ammār respectively, Faraj al-Baghwārī, Mālik b. Shāhī and also a group of those who had conspired with them to give allegiance to Ibrāhīm (b. al-Mahdī), after they had been flogged, with the exception of 'Ammār, who was given a guarantee of immunity because he had denounced the plans of the group in the Maṭbaq prison. One of the prisoners in the Maṭbaq reported that the prisoners intended to stir up a riot and bore a way through the walls of the jail. The day before, they had barricaded the door of the prison from the inside and had prevented anyone from getting access in to them. When night fell and people heard the commotion they were making, the news reached al-Ma'mūn. He rode there in person immediately, had these four men brought forth and [1076] had them beheaded while pinioned. Ibn 'Ā'ishah hurled savage insults at al-Ma'mūn. Next morning, their corpses were gibbeted on the lower bridge. On the Wednesday morning, Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'A'ishah's body was taken down; it was enshrouded, prayers were said over it and it was buried in the cemetery of Quraysh.[443] Ibn al-Ifrīqī's body was taken down and buried in the cemetery of al-Khayzurān, but the rest were left there.[444]

It is mentioned that when Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī was captured, he was taken along to the palace of Abū Isḥaq b. al-Rashīd (the later Caliph al-Mu'taṣim) at a time when Abū Isḥāq himself was with al-Ma'mūn. So Ibrāhīm was borne along, mounted behind Faraj al-Turkī. When he was brought into al-Ma'mūn's presence, the latter said to him, "So we meet again, O Ibrāhīm!" Ibrāhīm said, "O Commander of the Faithful, the 443. On the upper West Side of the city, according to al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 158, 193–4, and Lassner, Topography, 111, 285–6, who suggests that the name was also used for the cemetery of al-Khayzurān on the East Side, see ibid., 114, 287.

444. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 178–9, 206, tr. 80–1, 94; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 558–9; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 78 = ed. Pellat, § 2763; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 391–2. For the whole episode of Ibn 'Ā'ishah, see Barbier de Meynard, 251–3; Levy, A Baghdad chronicle, 95.

kinsman to whom it falls to exact vengeance [walī al-tha'r] is the one who is made to judge in respect of [the nature of] the retaliation, but forgiveness is nearer to piety.[445] The man who is made heedless and hesitant by the causes of difficulty and heart-searching placed in his way [in securing the vengeance] brings down on himself the adverse buffetings of fate.[446] God has set you above every sinner, just as He has placed every sinner below you. If you punish, then it is only in accordance with your right; but if you grant pardon, then it comes from your own graciousness." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "Nay, I pardon you, O Ibrāhīm!" Then Ibrāhīm glorified God and fell down in prostration.[447] It is said that Ibrāhīm wrote these words to al-Ma'mūn while he was still in hiding, and al-Ma'mūn made a note in the margin of his copy to the effect that "power drives away anger; contrition implies repentance; and between the two is God's forgiveness, and this is the greatest thing we can ask of Him."[448]

Ibrāhīm recited, praising al-Ma'mūn:

O best of those after the Messenger [of God] whom a Yamanī she-camel conveys gently along towards him who is in despair or who is hopeful of bounty!

And [O] most pious of those who worship God with godly fear and in earnestness,[449] and most eloquent one of those who proclaim clearly-manifest truth! [1077]

The honey of the mountain tops, so long as men give you obedience; but if you are aroused [by opposition], then you are the colocynth, mingled with deadly poison!

445. Qur'ān, II, 238.

446. The exact meaning of this difficult passage is not certain, but the general idea seems to be that the person who neglects his obligations lays himself open to the vicissitudes of fate. The text of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 184, has al-rajā', "hope," for al-shaqā', "wretchedness," and Barbier de Meynard and Pavet de Courteille translate this passage in Mas'ūdī (see next note) as "L'homme . . . plein d'une confiance aveugle dans les moyens de révolte qui s'offrent à lui, se livre tout entier aux vicissitudes de la destinée."

447. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 63–4 = ed. Pellat, § 2750.

448. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 184, tr. 83; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh II, 558; Azdī, 369.

449. An alternative reading for the text's 'ayn^{an}, "in earnestness, in reality," might be ghayb^{an}, "without seeing Him directly."

The ever-wakeful one, the one who remains watchful;
he who remains alert during the periods of sleep of the slumbering night does not have to fear any foe!

People's hearts are filled with awe of you, and you continue protecting them with a compassionate heart.

May my father, my mother and their sons be your ransom, against all calamities and vicissitudes which may arise!

[1078] How pleasant is the place in which you have set me down as a homeland, and how sweet is its herbage for the one seeking pasture!
[that is, how pleasant is life for the subjects in your land].

You have become established as an exponent of [literally: brother to] righteous deeds and godly fear, and a tender father to the humble, destitute person

May my life be your ransom! For my excuses go astray, and I take refuge from you in the bountifulness of ample beneficence,

In hope of your grace; for bountiful actions are an innate quality [of yours], which have elevated your character [literally: building] to a lofty place.

For you have lavished outstandingly generous deeds on such a scale that the widest of hearts [literally: souls] are too narrow to be able to bestow its like,

And you have pardoned a person [that is, himself] with a pardon such as never before been known for such a deed and [for which] no intercessor has ever pleaded before you previously,

Were it not that loftiness of character [recoils] from vengeance after your strong arms have seized a humiliated and abased one.

Then you have shown compassion on children, like the sand-grouse's young, and on the lamentations of a woman past her youth and not yet married, [with a sound] like the [release of an] archer's bow.[450] [1079]

You have inclined to me with affection, out of a bond of kinship, just as the bone of one limping from a broken limb heals together again after being broken for a second time.

God knows what I am saying, for it is indeed the solemnest oath which a true believer, who inclines in worship, can make,

[That] I never became a rebel against you, even when resources and allurements of the erring ones dragged me along, without retaining the inner intention of remaining obedient,

Until when the cords of my wretched state were suspended, near to death, over the dark abyss of destruction, a confused and anguished one,

I did not know that a crime like mine could be forgiven, so I halted there in order to ascertain what mode of death was to strike me down.

The piety of the Imām, the one mighty yet full of humility, [1080] has given back life to me, after it had gone.

450. Barbier de Meynard, 259, translates, "d'une jeune fille gémissante que la douleur avait courbée comme un arc;" but the comparison of lamentation with the twanging sound made by bows is not infrequent in ancient Arabic poetry.

May He who has appointed you to the position of rulership grant you life for the longest possible period, and may He strike your enemy with an incisive blade in the vein of the heart!

How many benefits from you, which my heart [literally: soul] has been unable to recount [or: did not mention] to me when I saw myself disappointed in my desires,

Have you conferred on me as an act of pardon to me and as an act of grace, hence I have given thanks to one who offers favors for the noblest of doers,

Except that it was a small thing when you granted it to me, but it is a great deal as far as I was concerned, which will never be lost.

If you are generous to me over it [the act of pardoning], well, such liberality is only fitting for you; and if you withhold it, well, you are the most just of those who withhold [benefits].

The one who allotted noble characteristics[451] gathered them all up in the loins of Adam for the seventh Imām [that is, for al-Ma'mūn, the seventh 'Abbāsid Caliph].

The One who controls people's affairs has gathered together hearts around you, and your cloak has gathered together all goodness which brings [men] together.[452]

451. Following the reading al-faḍā'il of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, the Kitāb al-Aghānī, Azdī and Ibn al-Athīr rather than Ṭabarī's al-khilāfa, the former one being in fact indicated in the editor's n. i as preferable.

452. Three of these last verses are given in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 204, tr. 93, and, apparently from there, in Azdī, 371, and four are given in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 64 = ed. Pellat, § 2751.

It is mentioned that, when Ibrāhīm recited this ode to al-Ma'mūn, the latter exclaimed, "I can only say what Joseph said to his brothers,[453] 'There is no reproach upon you today; God will forgive you, and He is the most merciful of those showing mercy.'"[454] [1081]

In this year, in the month of Ramaḍān (December 825–January 826), al-Ma'mūn consummated his marriage with Būrān, the daughter of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl.

Al-Ma'mūn's Marriage with Būrān

It is mentioned that when al-Ma'mūn proceeded to Fam al-Ṣilḥ to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's military encampment, he took with him Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī. Setting off for the ceremony there for the consummation of his marriage with Būrān, al-Ma'mūn left Baghdad in a skiff (zawraq),[455] (and sailed) until he anchored at al-Ḥasan's gate. Al-'Abbās b. al-Ma'mūn had preceded his father, travelling on a mount, and al-Ḥasan met him outside his military encampment in a place which had been specially chosen for him on the banks of the Tigris where a pavilion had been erected for him. When al-'Abbās saw him, he bent his leg (over the saddle) in order to dismount, but al-Ḥasan adjured him not to do so. Then when he had straightened it, al-Ḥasan lifted his own leg in order to dismount, but al-'Abbās exclaimed, "By the Commander of the Faithful's rights, don't get down!" whereupon al-Ḥasan embraced him while still mounted. Then he ordered that al-'Abbās's riding beast should be given precedence before him, and the two of them entered al-Ḥasan's house together. Al-Ma'mūn arrived at the time of the evening worship, this being in Ramaḍān 210 (December

453. Qur'ān, XII, 92.

454. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 186–8, tr. 84–5, giving twenty-nine verses of the poem, as opposed to Ṭabarī's twenty-seven, and with three of them further repeated, see the previous note; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IX, 60, giving seventeen verses; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, loc. cit.; 'Uyūn, 366–7; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, IV, 392–5; Barbier de Meynard, 257–60.

455. See Kindermann, "Schiff" in arabischen. Untersuchung über Vorkommen und Bedeutung der Termini, 37–8; cf. Mez, The renaissance of Islam, 486 ff.

825–January 826). He, al-Ḥasan and al-'Abbās broke their fast, [1082] while Dīnār b. 'Abdallāh was still standing (in attendance on them), until they had finished the meal and had washed their hands. Al-Ma'mūn then called for some wine; a golden goblet was brought in and the wine poured into it. Al-Ma'mūn drank from it, and then held out his hand with the goblet containing wine to al-Ḥasan. Al-Ḥasan held back from it, since he had never drunk wine before then. Dīnār b. 'Abdallāh made a discreet sign to al-Ḥasan, and al-Ḥasan said to the Caliph, "O Commander of the Faithful, I am drinking it with your permission and at your command!" Al-Ma'mūn told him, "If this were not my command, I would not hold out my hand to you!" So al-Ḥasan took the goblet and drank from it.[456]

On the second night, he brought together (in marriage) Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl and al-'Abbāsah, daughter of al-Faḍl Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn.[457] On the third night, he consummated his marriage with Būrān, who had with her (during the preceding preparations and festivities) Ḥamdūnah,[458] Umm Ja'far[459] and her grandmother. When al-Ma'mūn sat down with her, her grandmother scattered over her a thousand pearls which were on a golden platter. Al-Ma'mūn ordered them to be collected up and asked her how many pearls there were. She replied, "A thousand." He ordered them to be counted, and ten were missing. He said, "Whoever has taken them must give them back." They said, "[It was] Ḥusayn Z.j.lah."[460] He commanded him to return them, but Ḥusayn protested, "O Commander of the Faithful, the pearls were only scattered so that we might take them [or: were not the pearls scattered just so that we might take them?]! Al-Ma'mūn insisted, "Give them back, and I will give you their equivalent." So Ḥusayn returned them. Al-Ma'-

456. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 206–7, tr. 94.

457. On this laqab, "the man with the two authorities," given to al-Faḍl in 196 (812), see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 201, II, 678, 681, and on this type of title in general, Goldziher, "Ueber Dualtitel," 321–9.

458. Daughter of Hārūn al-Rashīd, married to Ja'far b. al-Hādī, hence half-sister to al-Ma'mūn; see Abbott, 157.

459. I.e., Zubaydah bt. Ja'far b. al-Manṣūr, wife of Hārūn and step-mother of al-Ma'mūn; see Abbott, 137 ff.

460. Keller, Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, tr. 95, vocalizes Zujlah.

mūn placed all the pearls together in the vessel, as they had originally been, and they were placed in her bosom. He said, "This is your wedding present, and now, ask me for any of your requests." However, she remained silent. Her grandmother said to her, "Speak to your lord and ask him for your requests, since he has commanded you to do so." Hence she asked him to show his favor to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī. He replied, "I grant this." She also asked his permission for Umm Ja'far to go on the pilgrimage, and this he granted also.[461] Umm Ja'far presented her with the (formerly) Umayyad seamless jacket.[462] Al-Ma'mūn consummated his union with her that night, (and the same night) a candle of ambergris, weighing forty manns (3.25 kg.), in a golden vessel, was lit. Al-Ma'mūn criticized them for that, saying that it was an act of extravagance.[463] [1083]

The next morning, he sent for Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, and he appeared walking from the banks of the Tigris, wearing a fur-lined robe made from cloth with a silk thread warp (mubaṭṭanah mulḥam)[464] and with a turban round his head, until he entered (the Caliph's abode). When the curtain was removed from before al-Ma'mūn, Ibrāhīm threw himself on the ground. Al-Ma'mūn cried out, "O my uncle, do not worry any more!" So Ibrāhīm came forward, greeted him in the fashion appropriate to caliphs, kissed his hand and recited his (own) poetry. Al-Ma'mūn called for robes of honor and presented him with a second robe; he summoned a mount for him and girded him with a sword. Ibrāhīm then went out, greeted the assembled people and was escorted back to his place.[465]

It is mentioned that al-Ma'mūn stayed with al-Ḥasan b. Sahl for seventeen days, and all the requirements, each day, for the Caliph and for the whole of his retinue, were taken care of (by

461. Abbott, 235, notes that al-Ma'mūn may have discouraged his stepmother from revisiting the scenes in the Hijaz of her philanthropic activities of previous years.

462. This was a special heirloom of the royal harem, formerly the property of the wives of the Umayyad Caliphs 'Abd al-Malik and Hishām; see Abbott, 12, 234.

463. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 207–9, tr. 94–5; 'Uyūn, 365–6.

464. Cf. R. Dozy, Supplément aux dictionnaires arabes, II, 522a. Mulḥam cloth was a speciality of Marw.

465. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 209, tr. 95.

al-Ḥasan's munificence).[466] Al-Ḥasan also presented robes of honor to the commanders, according to their ranks, gave them mounts and rewarded them with presents. The total sum expended on them was fifty million dirhams. The narrator says: When he was about to depart, al-Ma'mūn ordered Ghassān b. 'Abbād (al-Ḥasan's cousin) to hand over to al-Ḥasan ten million (dirhams) from the taxation of Fārs, and he granted Ṣilḥ to him as an assignment of land. This sum was brought to him on the spot, and was laid out (or: was counted out) in Ghassān b. 'Abbād's presence. Al-Ḥasan then sat down and divided it up among his commanders, his companions, his retinue and his servants. When al-Ma'mūn departed, al-Ḥasan accompanied him (for the first part of his journey) and then returned to Fam al-Ṣilḥ.[467]

It is mentioned from Aḥmad b. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, who said that his family used to talk about how al-Ḥasan b. Sahl wrote [1084] out pieces of paper with the names of his estates on them and scattered them among his commanders and among the Hāshimites, and whoever got hold of one of these pieces of paper with the name of an estate written on it, sent (to there) and took possession of it.[468]

It is mentioned from Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Abd al-A'lā al-Kātib, who said that al-Ḥasan b. Sahl spoke to him one day about various things relating to Umm Ja'far, and described the weightiness of her intelligence and understanding. Then al-Ḥasan said: Al-Ma'mūn questioned her one day at Fam al-Ṣilḥ, when he came to visit us, regarding how much the expenditure on Būrān's festivities had amounted to, and he questioned Ḥamdūnah bt. Ghaḍīḍ about the amount which she had spent on that affair. The narrator (al-Ḥasan b. Sahl) continued: Ḥamdūnah replied, "I spent twenty-five million [dirhams]!" The narrator continued: Umm Ja'far then exclaimed, "You didn't do anything at all! I spent between thirty-five and thirty-seven million dirhams!" The narrator continued: We prepared for al-Ma'mūn two candles of ambergris. He continued: Al-Ma'mūn consummated his marriage with Būrān by night, and the two candles were lit in his presence. But they smoked badly, so that he said, "Take them away, the smoke is bothering us, and bring ordinary [wax] candles." The narrator continued: That day, Umm Ja'far gave her as a wedding present Ṣilḥ. He continued: This was how Ṣilḥ reverted to my possession. I had owned it previously. Then one day, Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī came into my presence and recited to me four verses of poetry in which he eulogized Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn [al-Ḥasan's brother al-Faḍl b. Sahl]. I said to him, "We will pass on the verses to Dhū al-Ri'āsatayn on your behalf, and I myself will make you a grant of Ṣilḥ as an interim measure until you get your full reward directly from him." Thus I made him a grant of Ṣilḥ. Then al-Ma'mūn gave it to Umm Ja'far, and she gave it as a wedding present to Būrān.[469]

466. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 66 = ed. Pellat, § 2752.

467. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 209–10, tr. 95.

468. Ibid., 210, tr. 95; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 559; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 65–6 = ed. Pellat, § 2752; 'Uyūn, 367; Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif, 120–2, tr. Bosworth, The Book of curious and entertaining information, 99–100. This episode especially caught the fancy of later adab writers, see e.g., Niẓāmī 'Arūḍī Samarqandī, Chahār maqāla, maqāla i, anecdote 7.

'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn relates that al-Ḥasan b. Sahl used not to [1085] have the curtains taken away from round him, nor were the candles removed from his presence, until the sun rose and he could distinguish it clearly when he looked at it. Also, he was superstitious and believed in omens (kāna mutaṭayyiran). He used to like people to say to him, when someone came into his presence, "We have left happiness and enjoyment behind;"[470] and he used to dislike being told about a funeral bier or someone's death.

The narrator ('Alī b. al-Ḥusayn) continued: I went into his[471] presence one day, and someone had told him that 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn (the narrator) had sent his son al-Ḥasan to the Qur'ān school that day. He continued: He expressed his felicitations to me, and I went away and found in my house a gift of twenty 469. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 210–11, tr. 95–6; cf. Abbott, 230–4.

470. I.e., we are awe-stricken and feel completely at his mercy.

471. The most natural referent of the pronoun would be al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, mentioned immediately previously by name; Keller, however, takes it in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir's text—as ambiguous as Ṭabarī's—as referring to the Caliph al-Ma'mūn, and this seems the more suitable inference in the general context.

thousand dirhams for (my son) al-Ḥasan and a draft for twenty thousand more. He continued: He had already given me as a present an estate from his own lands at Baṣrah valued at fifty thousand dīnārs, but (subsequently) Bughā al-Kabīr[472] deprived me of it and added it to his own lands.[473]

It is mentioned from Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī[474] that he said that when al-Ma'mūn visited al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, he stayed with him for several days after the consummation of his marriage with Būrān. The total time which he spent on his stay and on the journey, both the outward journey and the return amounted to forty days, and he re-entered Baghdad on Thursday, the eighteenth of Shawwāl (210 [February 1, 826]). It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Khwārazmī[475] that he stated that al-Ma'mūn set out for Fam al-Ṣilḥ to visit al-Ḥasan b. Sahl on the eighth of Ramaḍān, (210 [December 23, 825]) and journeyed back from Fam al-Ṣilḥ on the twentieth of Shawwāl, 210 (February 3, 826).[476]

In this year, Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd (al-Ṭūsī) perished on the day of the breaking of the fast (on the first of Shawwāl [January 15, 826]). His slave girl 'Adhal recited:

[1086] He who set out on the morning of the day of the breaking of the fast with a light heart, at a time when we had no envious feelings towards him,
God be praised!

---

472. The Turkish slave commander who played a great rôle in politics and military affairs during the middle years of the third/ninth century; see *EI*² s.v. (Sourdel).

473. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 211, tr. 96.

474. A judge by profession who was later involved in the miḥnah (see below, 210, 211), and who was also a significant historical source for Ibn Abī Ṭāhir; see Keller, II, Intro., pp. XIV–XVII.

475. The famous mathematician and astronomer, who in his youth worked in al-Ma'mūn's research and translation center, the Bayt al-Ḥikmah, see *EI*² s.v. al-Khʷārazmī, Abū Dja'far Muḥammad b. Mūsā (J. Vernet); but he was also a historian and a source for Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, see Keller, loc. cit.

476. The reading adopted here of the eighteenth of Shawwāl follows the text of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 212, against Ṭabarī's text with the eleventh of Shawwāl (baqiyat against khalat); as Keller points out, tr. 96, n.1, the date of the eighteenth of Shawwāl gives a period of forty days from the departure date of the eighth of Ramaḍān. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 559, simply mentions al-Ma'mūn's total absence as being forty days.

Or else he was waiting for his master at the time of the breaking of the fast, while our master was in fact already laid in his sepulchre in the earth.

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir conquered Egypt and 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī b. al-Ḥakam[477] sought a guarantee of security under his protection.

'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir Goes Forth from Raqqah to Egypt; Ibn al-Sarī Goes Out to Him under a Guarantee of Security

It is mentioned that when 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir had finished with the campaign against Naṣr b. Shabath al-'Uqaylī and had sent him on to al-Ma'mūn, letters from al-Ma'mūn reached him at Baghdad ordering him to march to Egypt. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Makhlad[478] related to me that he was at that time in Egypt and that when 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir drew near to it and was only one stage's journey away, he sent out one of his commanders in order to reconnoitre for a good place in which his army could encamp. Ibn al-Sarī had dug a defensive trench round it (the capital Fusṭāṭ).[479] The latter got news about 'Abdallāh's commander's reconnaissance to the close vicinity of the capital, hence he marched out with a force of supporters who had flocked to his standard against the commander whom 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir had deputed to find a camping-place for his army. Ibn al-Sarī's army and 'Abdallāh's commander and his accompanying force, which was only a small one, made battle

477. 'Ubaydallāh had been ṣāḥib al-shurṭah in Egypt since 205 (820/1) under his brother Abū Naṣr and then himself governor in Sha'bān 206 (January 822), resisting attempts by al-Ma'mūn to replace him; see Kindī, 172–4; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm al-zāhirah, II, 178, 181 ff.

478. Presumably a member of the family of secretaries and viziers, of Christian origin, who served the caliphs in the second half of the century; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 309 ff., 316 ff; EI[2] s.v. Ibn al-Makhlad (id.).

479. From Kindī, 180, it appears that 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir encamped at Bilbays on entering Egypt and then moved to Zufaytā some twenty miles north of Fusṭāṭ (modern Zifta), whilst 'Ubaydallāh fortified himself within Fusṭāṭ by building the ditch and rampart (khandaq) further referred to in ibid., 174.

contact. 'Abdallāh's commander and his troops wheeled away in an evasive action, and he sent a dispatch by mounted mes-[1087] senger to 'Abdallāh informing him about what he had been doing and about Ibn al-Sarī's actions. 'Abdallāh mounted his foot soldiers on mules, two men on each mule, with all their arms and equipment. They led the horses along by the side of the mules and travelled as speedily as possible till they caught up with 'Abdallāh's commander and Ibn al-Sarī. 'Abdallāh and his troops only had to make a single charge and Ibn al-Sarī and his forces were routed. Most of Ibn al-Sarī's forces fell successively into the ditch, and more of them perished in the trench by their bodies falling one on top of another than were killed by the swords of the opposing army. Ibn al-Sarī himself fled; he retired into Fusṭāṭ and closed the gate, with himself, his followers and the resident population all inside it. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir besieged him, but Ibn al-Sarī did not continue fighting back against him after this; in the end, he came forth to 'Abdallāh under a guarantee of safety.

It is mentioned from Ibn Dhī al-Qalamayn[480] (the son of 'Alī b. Abī Sa'īd, cousin of al-Faḍl b. Sahl), who stated that when 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir came to the capital of Egypt and Ibn al-Sarī barred him from entry, Ibn al-Sarī sent him a thousand male and female slaves, each slave boy having with him a thousand dīnārs in a silken purse; these he sent by night. The narrator continued: However, 'Abdallāh sent all these back to him and wrote, "If I were able to accept your present by day, then I would certainly accept it by night, but 'Nay, it is you who rejoice in your gift. Return to them; indeed, we shall come to them with hosts which they will have no power to withstand and we shall certainly expel them from it abased and in a state of humiliation'"[481] The narrator continued: At that point, Ibn al-Sarī sought a guarantee of security from 'Abdallāh and went forth to him.[482]

480. For suggestions on the meaning of this honorific, see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 202–3.

481. Qur'ān, XXVII, 36–7.

482. In Abī Ṭāhir, 148–9, tr. 67–8; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 560–1; Kindī, 180–3, giving the date of 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī's submission to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir as in Aḥmad b. Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar mentioned from Abū al-Samrā', who said: We set out with the amīr 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, travelling in [1088] the direction of Egypt. When we were at a point between Ramlah and Damascus, a tribesman suddenly appeared before us. He turned out to be an old man, of obvious intelligence and piety [baqiyyah],[483] mounted on a greyish-colored camel. He greeted us, and we returned the greeting. Abū al-Samrā' continued: I was with Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Rāfiqī and Isḥāq b. Abī Rib'ī, and we were accompanying the amīr in his journey. It happened that on that particular day we had more spirited mounts than he, and we were wearing finer-quality clothes. He continued: The tribesman started peering intently at our faces. He continued: I therefore said, "O shaykh, you are eyeing us very persistently; have you recognized something, or is there something of which you disapprove?" He replied, "No, by God, I never knew you before today, and I have not discerned in you any evil characteristic which I should condemn; but I possess a very keen ability of knowing people's character and fates through physiognomy [firāsah],[484] and am able to discern a great deal about them." He continued: I then pointed out Isḥāq b. Abī Rib'ī to him and said, "What can you say about this man?" He thereupon recited:

I see a secretary, whose skill in the secretary's art is clearly to be discerned, and with his training in Iraq shining forth.[485]

The movements which he makes amply bear witness to the fact that he is knowledgeable and far-sighted about the assessment of the land-tax.

Ṣafar 211 (May–June 826); 'Uyūn, 367–8; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 396–7; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm, II, 181, 191–2. On al-Ma'mūn's Egyptian policy in general, see Shaban, 52–3, 59–61.

483. This is the meaning which this word acquired from the traditional interpretation of the phrase ūlū baqiyyah in Qur'ān, XI, 118/116; see Lane, Arabic-English lexicon, Part 1, 238c.

484. On this skill, see EI^{2} s.v. (T. Fahd).

485. The complexity of the administrative and fiscal system of the Sawād of Iraq made it the training ground par excellence for secretaries.

Then he looked at Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Rāfiqī and recited:

Many a person who outwardly manifests piety does not reveal externally his inner character, loves presents [that is, he is corrupt] and acts deceitfully with men.

I discern in him cowardliness, avarice and a personal character which tells one about him that he is indeed a vizier.

Then he looked at me and began to recite:

This man is one of the amīr's boon companions and confidants, from whose intimacy the amīr derives joy.

I recognise him as a transmitter of poetry and the religious sciences, and also at times a boon companion and storyteller at nocturnal literary sessions.

Then he looked at the amīr and began to recite:

This one is the amīr, the bounty of whose hands is hoped for;
among all those I have ever seen, there is none like him.

He wears a cloak of seemliness and dignity, and has a face which bears the good tidings of the attainment of success.

Through him, Islam has been made secure from the outset; through him, goodness has flourished and evil has withered away.

Is not ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir indeed a father to us, a benefit for us as well as being an amīr?

He continued to relate: All this made an extremely favorable impression on ʿAbdallāh. The shaykh's words delighted him, so he ordered that he should be given five hundred dīnārs and that he should accompany him.[486] [1090]

It is mentioned from al-Ḥasan b. Yaḥyā al-Fihrī, who said: We met al-Buṭayn, the poet of Ḥimṣ,[487] while we were accompanying ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, at a spot between Salamiyyah[488] and Ḥimṣ. He halted in the roadway and recited to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir:

A twofold welcome and greetings to the son of the munificent one, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn!

A twofold welcome and greetings to the son of the man with two noble characteristics [ghurratayn] in the two missions [daʿwatayn]![489]

A twofold welcome to the one whose palm is a sea [of bounty] when it overflows like the foaming waters over the two sides of a well!

Al-Maʾmūn, may God strengthen him, does not have to worry as long as he has the two of you [Ṭāhir and ʿAbdallāh] remaining in his service.

You are a West, and he is an East, established there against whatever breach may occur from the two sides [of the empire].

It is only right, since the two of you are from a long time back the descendants of Ruzayq,[490] Muṣʿab and Ḥusayn,

---

486. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 158–60, tr. 71–2; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 397–8; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm, II, 193–4.

487. Al-Buṭayn b. Umayyah al-Bajalī; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 477.

488. A town to the northeast of Ḥimṣ; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 240–1; Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 510, 528; R. Dussaud, Topographie historique de la Syrie antique et médiévale, 272–3; EI[1] s.v. Salamīya (Kramers).

489. I.e., the ʿAbbāsid revolution and the movement to place al-Maʾmūn on the throne, sometimes referred to by contemporaries as al-daʿwah al-thāniyah; cf. on the latter, Daniel, 177–80.

490. Both Ṭabarī's text and that of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, loc. cit., have, wrongly,

That you should both reach the peak of glory which you have in fact reached and that you should attain a position of superiority over the two heavy creations [men and jinn].[491]

[1091] 'Abdallāh said, "Who are you, may your mother be bereft of you?" He replied, "I am al-Buṭayn, the poet of Ḥimṣ." 'Abdallāh said, "Ride with us, lad, and reflect how may lines of verse you have just recited." He replied, "Seven." So 'Abdallāh ordered that he should be given seven thousand dirhams or seven hundred dīnārs. Al-Buṭayn journeyed with 'Abdallāh all the way to Egypt and Alexandria, until the time when a drainage outlet (makhraj) opened up in the ground and swallowed him and his mount, and he died in it at Alexandria[492]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir captured Alexandria—according to other reports, in the year 211 (826/7)—and expelled from it the Andalusians who had taken the city over.[493]

The Activities of 'Abdallāh and the Andalusians

Several of the people of Egypt related to me that some ships approached on the Mediterranean (Baḥr al-Rūm) from the direction of Andalus, containing a large number of men, at the time when the local people were distracted from their approach by the insurrection of al-Jarawī[494] and Ibn al-Sarī. Finally, they an-

---

Zurayq. The ancestor Ruzayq had been a mawlā of the Umayyad governor of Sīstān Ṭalḥah b. 'Abdallāh al-Khuzā'ī; see Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic culture," 47; Kaabi, 148–51.

491. See Bosworth, op. cit., 60–1.

492. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 160–1, tr. 72–3; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm, II, 194–5.

493. These Andalusian corsairs and adventurers included considerable elements from the rebels expelled from the suburb of Cordova in 202 (818) by the Umayyad amīr, al-Ḥakam I, the so-called al-Rabaḍiyyūn; see E. Lévi-Provençal, Histoire de l'Espagne musulmane, I, 165–73.

494. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 555–6, Kindī, 169 ff., and Severus b. al-Muqaffa', Ta'rīkh Baṭāriqat al-kanīsah al-miṣriyyah, ed. and tr. B. Evetts, History of the Patriarchs of the Coptic Church of Alexandria, IV, 428, give accounts of 'Alī b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Jarawī's revolt in lower Egypt and then his submission to al-Ma'mūn's commanders, sent to Egypt to re-establish caliphal authority, Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mazyad al-Shaybānī (see above, 147) and 'Umar b. Faraj al-Rukhkhajī.

chored their ships at Alexandria, their leader at that time being a man called Abū Ḥafṣ ['Umar b. Ḥafṣ al-Ballūṭī], and they remained there till 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir entered Egypt.[495]

Yūnus b. 'Abd al-A'lā told me: A young man—he meant 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir—came to us from the direction of the east at a time when our whole world had been plunged into strife; various usurpers had seized power in every part of the land, and had terrorized the people; but he set the world to rights, brought peace and security to the innocent and struck fear into the evil-minded, and the subjects flocked to him tendering their obedience. Then he continued: 'Abdallāh b. Wahb related [1092] to us from 'Abdallāh b. Lahī'ah, who said (I do not know whether he carried the transmission back to an earlier generation or not; we have not found [it] in any of the books which we have read): God has an army in the east, and none of His creation has rebelled against Him without His having sent this army against them and His having wrought vengeance on them by means of it (or some other form of words with this meaning).

When 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn entered Egypt, he sent a message to the Andalusians there and to those who had joined up with them, announcing that he was going to attack them unless they submitted. They (that is, the authorities on events in Egypt) related to me that the Andalusians agreed to submit, and sought a guarantee of safe-conduct from him, on condition that they were to depart from Alexandria to some other region of the land of Rūm (the Byzantine territories) which was not part of the lands of Islam. 'Abdallāh granted them a guarantee on this condition, hence they set sail from Alexandria and landed on one of the islands in the (Mediterranean) Sea called Crete. They established a colony and settled there, and there are the remains of their progeny on that island to this day.[496]

---

495. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 541–2, Kindī, 158, 161–5, 169–70, and Severus, IV, 429 ff., give the circumstances of the Andalusians' seizure of the city from the Banū Mudlij and the Lakhm in 199 (814/15).

496. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 560–1; Kindī, 183–4 (both placing 'Abdallāh's recovery of Alexandria in the early part of 212 [summer 827]; Severus, IV, 455 ff.,

In this year, the people of Qumm threw off their allegiance to the ruling authority and withheld payment of the land-tax.

The People of Qumm Throw off the Ruling Authority

It is mentioned that the reason for their renunciation of it was that they considered the burden of the land-tax imposed on them as being excessively high. The tax required amounted to two million dirhams. Al-Ma'mūn had reduced the people of Rayy's assessment when he had entered the city on his journey from Khurasan to Iraq by the amount which I mentioned previously. Hence the people of Qumm were eager for al-Ma'mūn to lighten their burden and decrease their taxation just as he had done for the people of Rayy. They made petition to him, requesting a reduction in taxation and complaining of its heavi-[1093] ness upon them. But al-Ma'mūn refused to grant their request. Thereupon they withheld payment of taxes, so al-Ma'mūn sent against them 'Alī b. Hishām and then reinforced him with 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah. One of Ḥumayd's commanders called Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-K.ḥ b.q.w.ṣ[497] came from Khurasan, and al-Ma'mūn wrote to him to head towards Qumm and attack its people in concert with 'Alī b. Hishām. 'Alī fought with them and gained a victory over them, killing Yaḥyā b. 'Imrān and razing the town walls of Qumm. He imposed on them a tax assessment of seven million dirhams, after they had (previously) complained of two millions.[498]

In this year, Shahriyār, the son of Sharwīn, died. His son Sābūr took his place, but Māzyār b. Qārin disputed the succes-

---

465 ff.; 'Uyūn, 369; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 398–9; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm, II, 192. The Andalusian control over Crete, under members of the family of Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar, lasted until the Byzantine reconquest of 961; see Canard, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire. I, 709; Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 49–61, 287; EI[2] s.v. Iḳrīṭish (Canard).

497. Reading uncertain here, and equally so in the death notice (year 236 [850/1]) of this commander in Ṭabarī, III, 1407 (where he is given the nisbah of al-Marwazī).

498. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 399; Shaban, 55. Al-Ma'mūn's destruction of the town walls is noted in Ḥasan b. Muḥammad Qummī, Ta'rīkh-i Qum, 35, 163, 189–90.

sion with him, and captured and killed him. The mountain region (the inland parts of Ṭabaristān) now passed into the hands of Māzyār b. Qārin.[499]

In this year, Ṣāliḥ b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, the governor of Mecca at that time, led the pilgrimage.[500]

---

499. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 401; EI[1] s.v. Māzyār (Minorsky); EI[2] s.v. Ḳārinids (Rekaya).

500. Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, II, 773; Azdī, 372.

The Events of the Year

211

(APRIL 13, 826–APRIL 1, 827)

Among the events taking place during this year was 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī's journeying forth to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir under a guarantee of safe-conduct and 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir's entering Egypt. It is said that this (actually) took place in the year 210 (825/6). A certain authority mentions that Ibn al-Sarī went forth to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir on Saturday, the twenty-fourth of Ṣafar 211[501] (June 5, 826),[502] was brought to Baghdad on the twenty-third of Rajab, 211 (October 29, 826) and lodged in the [1094] City of Abū Ja'far.[503] 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir remained in Egypt as

501. Actually a Monday.

502. Keller, Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, tr. 68, n.1, points out that, from mentions elsewhere (e.g., text 145, tr. 66) of this author's concern with Egyptian events in 210, the date of 'Ubaydallāh's going forth to 'Abdallāh must have been on Saturday, the twenty-sixth of Rajab, 210 (November 12, 825—but this was actually a Sunday). Ṭabarī's ms. O has Rajab, and the preferable date 210 of mss. C and O was rejected by the editor as wrong. But Kindī, 182, in a detailed account of events, with several circumstantial dates, has Ṣafar 211 as the date for 'Ubaydallāh's formal acceptance of the amān.

503. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 561, says that 'Abdallāh appointed 'Ubaydallāh over upper Egypt for two months before sending him to Baghdad.

governor of the province and over the whole (sā'ir) of Syria and the Jazirah.[504] It is mentioned from Ṭāhir b. Khālid b. Nizār al-Ghassānī, who said that al-Ma'mūn wrote to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir when the latter was in Egypt at the time of his conquest of the province, and at the foot of one of his letters (were the words):

You are my brother and my friend (mawlāyā), and the one for whose benefits I give thanks.

Whatever thing you may love,
I will show my desire for it eternally.

While whatever thing you may dislike,
I shall find it displeasing.

You have God's word for this,
you have God's word, you have God's word!

Al-Ma'mūn Tests 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir

It is mentioned from 'Aṭā', the official charged with hearing complaints (ṣāḥib al-maẓālim)[505] for 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, who related that one of al-Ma'mūn's brothers spoke to al-Ma'mūn thus, "O Commander of the Faithful, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir has an inclination towards the progeny of Abū Ṭālib, just as his father had before him." He continued: Al-Ma'mūn pushed this suggestion aside and gave it no credence. Then the brother came back and repeated the same allegation. So al-Ma'mūn sent a man secretly to 'Abdallāh instructing him, "Go forth to Egypt in the guise of one of the Qur'ān reciters[506] and ascetics, and summon a group of the great men of state there to the allegiance of al-Qāsim b. Ibrāhīm b. Ṭabāṭabā (al-Rassī),[507] recounting his virtues, his learning and his merits. After that, get in touch with one of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir's confidants and then go to 'Abdallāh himself, summoning him and making attractive to him the giving of allegiance to the 'Alid. Ferret out in a manner which dispels doubt about his innermost intentions, and report back to me what you hear from him."

504. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 149, tr. 68; Azdī, 368, 373; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 402.

505. Concerning this function, see H.F. Amedroz, "The mazālim jurisdiction in the Ahkam Sultaniyya of Mawardi," JRAS (1911), 635–74; Levy, The social structure of Islam, 348–51; EI[2] s.v. Maẓālim (J.S. Nielsen).

506. al-qurrā', also in Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 402; Ibn Abī Ṭahir, 146, tr. 66, and 'Uyūn, 369, have al-ghuzāt, "frontier warriors for the faith."

He continued to relate: The man did what al-Ma'mūn had told and instructed him to do. He summoned to allegiance a group of the leading men and notables, and then he sat down one day at 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir's gate, at a moment when the latter had ridden to visit 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī after he had made peace with him and granted him a guarantee of security. When 'Abdallāh returned, the man rose up before him and brought [1095] out of his sleeve a paper, and handed it to him. 'Abdallāh took it in his hand. 'Abdallāh had hardly gone in, when the chamberlain came out to the man and escorted him inside, where he found 'Abdallāh seated on his carpet with nothing else between it and the ground, with his legs stretched out and his boots still on. 'Abdallāh said to him, "I have understood what is in your paper, the whole of what you have said—so out with what you really mean!" The man said, "Do I have your guarantee of safety and the protection of God in regard to you?" He replied, "Certainly."

He related: He then revealed to 'Abdallāh his intention, and summoned him to give allegiance to al-Qāsim, telling him all about his merits, his learning and his ascetic way of life. 'Abdallāh asked him, "Will you give me a fair hearing?" He replied that he would. 'Abdallāh then asked him, "Is gratitude to God incumbent on all His servants?" He agreed that it was. He further asked, "Is gratitude incumbent on one person to another in return for beneficence, favors and acts of kindness?" He agreed that it was. 'Abdallāh said, "Yet you come to me, when I am in this exalted position which you see, with my seal efficacious in the East as in the West, and my command obeyed and my word accepted in the lands between? I have only to turn to my right or left, or to look behind me or before me, and I see manifestations of acts of liberality from a man who has heaped them upon me, favor with which he has laid a seal on my neck, and unsolicited, clear beneficence [literally: a white, shining hand, yad lā'iḥah bayḍā'] which he bestowed upon me from the outset of graciousness and nobility of character! And you now invite me to display ingratitude for favor and for this beneficence, and you say, 'Betray the one who was the first and the last mover in all this, and bend your efforts to sever the vital cord of his neck and shed his blood!'? Do you yourself think that, even if you were to invite me directly into the Garden of Paradise, so that I could see it before my very eyes, as I know Paradise to be, God would like me to betray him, display ingratitude for his beneficence and favors, and break my oath of allegiance to him?"

507. Brother of the Ḥasanid Ibn Ṭabāṭabā whose revolt in Kūfah in 199 (815) was managed by Abū al-Sarāyā, see above, 13 ff., and founder of the Rassid line of Zaydī Imāms in the Yemen, died in 246 (860), see EI[1] s.v. Rassids (A.S. Tritton).

The man remained silent. Then 'Abdallāh said to him, "Moreover, I have heard all about your activities, and by God, I am only afraid for your life. So depart from this land, for if the supreme ruling authority gets to hear about your doings—and I [1096] cannot give you a guarantee of security concerning that—you will bring down disaster on both yourself and others."

Thus when the man had despaired of acheiving anything of his intentions, he came to al-Ma'mūn and told him the whole story. The Caliph rejoiced greatly and exclaimed, "That man is the tender shoot nurtured by my own hand, the intimate companion from my process of upbringing and the sprig of my fertilization and grafting!" He never divulged anything of this to anyone, and 'Abdallāh only knew about it after al-Ma'mūn's death.[508]

It is mentioned from (or: concerning, 'an) 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir that, while he was besieging 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī in Egypt, he recited these verses:

508. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 145–8, tr. 66–7; 'Uyūn, 369–70; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 402–3, identifying the brother who denounced 'Abdallāh as al-Mu'taṣim.

She shed copious tears in the morning, when she saw how near was the moment of my departure,

And I exchanged by richly-embroidered sash for a gleaming Yemeni sword,

And spent a long time in journeying both in the mornings and the evening [that is, in perpetual travelling].

She considered it foolish, in that I was weary and without rest,

[But I said to her,] Cut short your dalliance with me, for I am setting out on the road in search of my fortune.

I am one of al-Ma'mūn's servants, in the shadow of [his] protective wing.

If God one day grants success, then the attainment of my place of refreshment and repose will be near;

But if it be destruction, then proclaim with lamentation and cries,

"A slain one has found his last resting-place in Egypt," and leave off your complaining and querulousness.[509]

It is mentioned from 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Yūsuf that his father[510] wrote to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir at the point when 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī submitted to him congratulating him on that success [in the following words]:

509. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 148, tr. 67.

510. Aḥmad b. Yūsuf was a secretary and confidant of al-Ma'mūn, occupying in effect the position of vizier after the death in 211 (827) of Aḥmad b. Abī Khālid; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 225–31.

I have heard the news, may God strengthen the amīr, of the victory which God has granted you and Ibn al-Sarī's submission to you. So praise be to God, who upholds the cause of His faith, who strengthens the secular power of His Caliph appointed over His servants, and who humbles [1097] the one who deviates from His way and His rightful due and who throws off obedience to Him! We implore God to strengthen him with acts of favor and to assist him in conquering the lands of polytheism. Praise be to God for the authority which he has given to you[511] since you departed from your specified purpose! Indeed, we and all our dependents remind ourselves with pride of your conduct in engaging in battle and granting peace, and we show immense wonder at the qualities bestowed on him ['Abdallāh] [by God] of severity and leniency in their appropriate places. We do not know of any ruler over a body of soldiers or subjects who acts so equitably between them as you do, nor of anyone who grants forgiveness, to persons who have caused harm or shown rancor towards him, from a position of superior strength as you do. How rarely do we see a nobly-descended person who does not give up control of his affairs [that is, throw away his own personal talent or potential], relying rather upon what his forefathers have passed on to him! And the one who is given good fortune, material sufficiency, ruling authority and governmental power does not simply cleave to[512] what has fallen to his share in abundant quantity,[513] so that he falls short in being able to cope with what is before him.[514] Furthermore, we do

511. This seems to be the sense, and Keller, Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, tr. 68, adopts a similar interpretation of the parallel passage in this author, "was er dir erwiesen hat."

512. Lam yukhlid, following the sense of akhlada ilā al-arḍ, "he clung to the ground," in Qur'ān, VII, 175/176.

513. Mā 'afā lahu, echoing the sense of 'afā given by some commentators, "be luxuriant," where it occurs in Qur'ān, VII, 93/95.

514. This seems to be the sense of a difficult passage with tortuous syntax, whose general meaning depends largely on the interpretation of the phrase lam yulqi bi-yadihi, here translated as "does not cast away by his own hand," following Dozy, II, 547a.

not know any person exercising power who deserves success on account of his good conduct and his restraining of the arbitrary conduct of his retainers as you do. Nor does any one of our dependants consider it appropriate that he should prefer before you anyone whom he would like to have in the face of affliction or some calamitous happening. So may God's beneficence and His augmentation of favor reward you, and may God grant you this favor which He has brought together for you, by keeping firm hold of that by means of which the bond with your Imām and master and the master of all the Muslims will be completely strengthened for you. May He also grant you and us perpetuation of life! For you yourself well know that you have never ceased to be, in our eyes and in those of our dependents, in an honored status, assured of primacy and magnified in our sight. God has bestowed on you an increase of glory and honor in the eyes of the high and the [1098] low, so that they focus all their personal hopes on you and regard you as their bulwark against the adverse events and vicissitudes which come upon them. I hope that God will guide you to those things which He loves, just as His benefits and favor have helped you to success. Indeed, you have comported yourself well in achieving the protection of divine favor; for it has not led you into arrogance and presumption, and you have only grown in humility and self-abasement. So praise be to God for what He has secured for you, has conferred on you of benefits and has entrusted to you! Farewell![515]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn arrived in the City of Peace from the western lands,[516] and al-'Abbās b. al-Ma'mūn,[517] Abū Isḥāq al-Mu'taṣim and the rest of the men of

515. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 150–1, tr. 68–9.

516. Kindī, 184, says that 'Abdallāh sailed down the Nile from Fusṭāṭ, en route for Iraq, on the twenty-fifth Rajab, 212 (October 20, 827).

517. Claimant to the caliphate after his father's death in 218 (833) and especially during the rebellion of 223 (838) against his uncle al-Mu'taṣim; see Ṭabarī, III, 1249–50, 1257–68, tr. E. Marin, The reign of al-Mu'taṣim (833–842), 71, 76–85.

state came out to meet him. He brought with him the rebels who had previously seized control over Syria, such as Ibn al-Sarī, Ibn Abī al-Jamal and Ibn Abī al-Ṣaqr.[518]

(In this year,) Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ died, and Muḥammad b. Mūsā took over the governorship of Ṭabaristān in his father's stead.[519]

(In this year,) Ḥājib b. Ṣāliḥ became governor of India, but Bishr b. Dāwūd (al-Muhallabī) defeated him in battle and he retreated to Kirmān.[520]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn ordered a herald to proclaim, "No protection for anyone who mentions the name of Mu'āwiyah favorably or who accords him superiority over any one of the Messenger of God's Companions."[521]

In this year, Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās, governor of Mecca, led the pilgrimage.[522]

In this year, the poet Abū al-'Atāhiyah died.[523]

---

518. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 149, tr. 68; Azdī, 378; 'Uyūn, 370; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil., VI, 406.

519. Ibid.; Rabino di Borgomale, "Les préfets du Califat au Ṭabaristān," 264.

520. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 557, records that Ḥājib b. Ṣāliḥ was originally sent out by al-Ma'mūn to quell the rebellious Bishr.

521. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 90–1 = ed. Pellat, § 2775; 'Uyūn, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.; Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, II, 46–7, Eng. tr. II, 54; Pellat, "Le culte de Mu'âwiya au III[e] siècle," SI, VI (1956), 55. According to Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 93 = ed. Pellat, § 2776, cf. Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbāside al-Ma'mūn," 39, the Caliph was dissuaded from this course on the grounds that it would cause discontent among the people.

522. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 774; Azdī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

523. Ibid.; Sezgin, GAS, II, 534–5; EI[2] s.v. (A. Guillaume).

The Events of the Year

[1099]

212

(APRIL 2, 827–MARCH 21, 828)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Ma'mūn's dispatching Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī[524] via the Mosul Road to campaign against Bābak, and his reinforcing Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd for this purpose. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd seized Ya'lā b. Murrah and other rebels like him in Azerbaijan and sent them back to al-Ma'mūn.[525]

In this year, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-'Umarī, known as the Red-eyed One, rebelled in the Yemen.[526]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed as governor in the Yemen Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, known as Abū al-Rāzī.[527]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn proclaimed the doctrine of the 524. Son of Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, and a poet as well as a soldier, cf. Sezgin, GAS, II, 583.

525. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 564 ff., with a very detailed account of events in Arrān, Azerbaijan and Armenia and the war against Bābak; Azdī, 378 ff., with a detailed account of events in the region of Mosul; 'Uyūn, 373; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 407; Shaban, 56–9.

526. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 561–2; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 408.

527. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

createdness of the Qur'ān and the pre-eminence (tafḍīl) of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, saying that he was the best of mankind after the Messenger of God. This was in the month of Rabī' I (June 827).[528]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage.[529]

528. 'Uyūn, 370; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.; Sourdel, op. cit., 38–41; cf. Marquet, 127.

529. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 775; Azdī, 385; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

213

(MARCH 22, 828–MARCH 10, 829)

Among the events taking place during this year was the renunciation of allegiance by 'Abd al-Salām (or: al-Sallām) and Ibn Jalīs in Egypt with a throng of Qaysīs and Yamanīs and their rebellion there.[530]

In this year, Ṭalḥah b. Ṭāhir died in Khurasan.[531]

[1100] In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed his brother Abū Isḥāq as governor of Syria and Egypt, and his son al-'Abbās b. al-Ma'mūn over the Jazīrah, the frontier regions and the defensive fortresses (al-thughūr wa-al-'awāṣim),[532] and he ordered five hundred thousand dīnārs to be given to each of them and to

530. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 567, and Kindī, 185–6, give 'Abdallāh b. Jalīs al-Hilālī as the leader of the Qays and 'Abd al-Salām b. Abī al-Māḍī al-Judhāmī al-Jarawī as leader of the Yaman.

531. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 173–4, tr. 78, with a much fuller account; 'Uyūn, 371; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 409; Rothstein, 162; Bosworth, in Cambridge history of Iran, IV, 98.

532. I.e., the much fought-over frontier zone of northern Syria and the Jazīrah separating the Dār al-Islām from Byzantium; see Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 94 ff.; EI[2] s.v. al-'Awāṣim (Canard).

ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. It is said that he had never before divided out a sum of money of this magnitude in a single day.[533]

In this year, he appointed Ghassān b. ʿAbbād as governor of Sind.

Al-Maʾmūn Appoints Ghassān b. ʿAbbād Governor over Sind

According to the reports which have reached me, the reason for that was that Bishr b. Dāwūd b. Yazīd [al-Muhallabī][534] rebelled against al-Maʾmūn. He levied the land-tax, but did not forward any of it to al-Maʾmūn. It is mentioned that al-Maʾmūn said to his courtiers one day, "Tell me about Ghassān b. ʿAbbād, for I want him for an important office;" he had, in fact, already decided to appoint him governor of Sind because of the rebelliousness of Bishr b. Dāwūd. Those present spoke and went on at great length in Ghassān's praise. Then al-Maʾmūn looked towards Aḥmad b. Yūsuf, who remained silent, and said to him, "What do you say, O Aḥmad?" The latter replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, here is a man whose virtues are more numerous than his bad qualities. He is not sent[535] to any class of people without his rendering justice to them. Whatever fears you may have regarding him, he will never embark on any affair which needs excusing [or: from which he has to exculpate himself];[536] for he has divided up his days into days of beneficence [al-faḍl] [or possibly: he has divided up his time in the service of al-Faḍl (b. Sahl)], and for every person he allots a special time [for approaching him with petitions or complaints]. When you examine his conduct, you do not know which of his personal modes of conduct is the more remarkable—that 533. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, loc. cit.; Azdī, loc. cit.; ʿUyūn, 371, 373; Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif al-maʿārif, 141, tr. 110; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 409.

534. Son of the former governor of Sind Dāwūd, and great-great-great-grandson of the famous Umayyad general al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah.

535. Interpreting the consonant ductus here as lā yuṣrafa bihi, as seems allowable by n. g.

536. The text given here by the editor is very conjectural, hence the present translation must be equally so; furthermore, there is a variant text in Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 238, tr. 109.

which his intelligence directs him towards, or that which he acquires through his education." Al-Ma'mūn said, "You have [1101] eulogized him, despite your personally unfavorable opinion of him." Aḥmad b. Yūsuf replied, "[That is] because he is, in regard to what I have just stated, like what the poet has said:

May it be sufficient thanks for what you have bestowed on me that I have praised you in regard to both friends and enemies.[537]

He related: Al-Ma'mūn was delighted at his words and found his learning and wit impressive.[538]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage.[539]

---

537. Reading here, with ibid., 239, and the Addenda et emendanda, p. DCCLXXII, 'udātī.

538. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 238–9, tr. 108–9, adding a second verse; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 557; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 409–10.

539. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 776; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 410.

The Events of the Year

214

(MARCH 11, 829–FEBRUARY 27, 830)

Among the events taking place in this year was the killing of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī by Bābak at Hashtādsar[540] on Saturday the twenty-fifth of Rabīʿ I[541] (June 2, 829); Bābak scattered Muḥammad's army and killed a large number of his troops.[542]

In this year, Abū al-Rāzī was killed in Yemen.[543]

In this year, ʿUmayr b. al-Walīd al-Bādhghīsī, financial administrator (ʿāmil) in Egypt for Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd, was

540. Literally, "the eighty peaks;" apparently this lay in northern Azerbaijan, in the mountainous region south of the Araxes, where lay also Babak's headquarters of al-Badhdh; see Schwarz, 970–1.

541. Actually a Wednesday.

542. ʿUyūn, 373–4, and Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 412–13, with a much more detailed account of these events; Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 92–3.

543. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 561–2, with a detailed account of how Abū al-Rāzī captured the rebel al-ʿUmarī but was himself subsequently killed by Ibrāhīm b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Ḥimyarī, called al-Manākḥi, who seized power in the Yemen; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 415.

killed in the Ḥawf[544] in the month of Rabī' I (May-June 829).[545] Abū Isḥāq marched into Egypt and brought it into submission. He seized 'Abd al-Salām and Ibn Jalīs and executed them,[546] while al-Ma'mūn had Ibn al-Jarawī[547] beaten and then sent him back to Egypt.[548]

In this year, Bilāl al-Ḍabābī al-Shārī (the Khārijite) came out in revolt. Al-Ma'mūn set off for al-'Alth,[549] and then returned to Baghdad, and sent (instead) his son 'Abbās, together with a [1102] body of commanders, including 'Alī b. Hishām, 'Ujayf (b. 'Anbasah) and Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid. Hārūn then killed Bilāl.[550]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir set out for Dīnawar.[551] Al-Ma'mūn dispatched to him Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm (al-Muṣ'abī) and Yaḥyā b. Aktham, who offered him the choice between Khurasan on the one hand, and Jibāl, Armenia, Azerbaijan and the conduct of the war against Bābak on the other; 'Abdallāh chose Khurasan, and set off towards it.[552]

In this year, Ja'far b. Dāwūd al-Qummī became active (that is, became rebellious), but 'Azīz the freedman of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir seized him; Ja'far had fled from Egypt, but was now sent back to there.[553]

---

544. Literally "flank," the region stretching from the eastern Nile delta to the fringes of Sinai; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 322.

545. Kindī, 186, gives the date of the battle in which the rebels (see above, 178) killed 'Umayr as Tuesday, the thirteenth of Rabī' II, 814 (June 20, 829: actually a Sunday).

546. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 567; Kindī, 185–9, giving the date of the rebels' execution as Monday, the eighteenth of Dhū al-Qa'dah, 214 (January 17, 830); Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 409.

547. Text, al-Ḥarūrī, but see above, 178 and n. 530.

548. According to Kindī, 189–90, 'Alī b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Jarawī was tortured by al-Ma'mūn's general, the Afshīn Ḥaydar, to make him disgorge his wealth, but held out and was therefore executed on the fourteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 215 (February, 1, 831).

549. A town on the Tigris above 'Ukbarā; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 145–6; Le Strange, Lands, 50.

550. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 415. Azdī, 395, gives this rebel's name as al-Ṣanābī.

551. Cf. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 268–9, tr. 122.

552. Azdī, loc. cit.

553. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

In this year, al-Ma'mūn appointed 'Alī b. Hishām as governor of Jabal, Qumm, Iṣfahān and Azerbaijan.[554]

In this year, Isḥāq b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage.[555]

554. Ibid.
555. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 777; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 416.

The Events of the Year 215

(FEBRUARY 28, 830–FEBRUARY 17, 831)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-Ma'mūn's setting out from the City of Peace to raid the Byzantines, this being, reportedly, on Saturday, the twenty-seventh of Muḥarram (March 26, 830). Other reports say that he travelled from Shammāsiyyah[556] to Baradān[557] on Thursday, after the noon worship, the twenty-fourth of Muḥarram, 215[558] (March 23, 830). When al-Ma'mūn departed from the City of Peace, he appointed as his deputy over it Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, who was further entrusted with the Sawād, Ḥulwān and the districts of the Tigris. When al-Ma'mūn arrived at Takrīt,[559]

556. The quarter of East Baghdad northeast of Ruṣāfah; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 199–216.

557. A town lying just to the north of Baghdad, which gave its name to the Baradān Gate leading out of Shammāsiyyah; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 375–6; Le Strange, Lands, 32.

558. Actually a Wednesday.

559. A town on the Tigris above Sāmarrā; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 38–9; Le Strange, Lands, 57; Barthold, A historical geography of Iran, 205–6; EI[1] s.v. (Kramers).

Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib (the son of the Imām ʿAlī al-Riḍā) arrived from Madīnah in Ṣafar, during the night of Friday (Thursday-Friday night), in the same year, and met the Caliph there. Al-Maʾmūn bestowed gifts on him, and ordered him to consummate his union with his (al-Maʾmūn's) daughter [1103] Umm al-Faḍl, whom he had (previously) given in marriage to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī. She was brought into his presence in the house of Aḥmad b. Yūsuf, which was situated on the banks of the Tigris. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī remained there. When the time of the pilgrimage came round, he set off with his household and family back to Mecca; then he went on to his house at Madīnah, and remained there.[560]

After this, al-Maʾmūn took the road for Mosul until he got as far as Manbij,[561] and then went on to Dābiq,[562] to Antioch and to Maṣṣīṣah.[563] Then he set off from there for Tarsus,[564] and then into the land of the Byzantines in the middle of Jumādā I (July 10, 830), while al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn set out from Malaṭyah.[565] Al-Maʾmūn next besieged a fortress called Qurrah[566] until he captured it by storm and ordered the fortress to be destroyed, this being on Sunday, the twenty-sixth of Jumādā I (July 21, 830).[567] Previous to this, he had conquered a fortress called Mājidah,[568] but had spared its occupants. It is said that when al-Maʾmūn halted before Qurrah and then attacked

560. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 262–3, tr. 119.

561. A town on the Euphrates above Raqqah where there was a bridge of boats; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 205–7; Le Strange, Lands, 107; id., Palestine, 501–2; Canard, 87–8; EI[1] s.v. Manbidj (Honigmann).

562. A town in northern Syria on the road from Manbij to Antioch; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 416–17; Le Strange, Palestine, 426, 503; EI[2] s.v. (Sourdel).

563. A town in Cilicia, classical Mopsuestia; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 144–5; Le Strange, Lands, 130–2; id., Palestine, 505–6; EI[1] s.v. Miṣṣīṣ (Honigmann).

564. The town, famed since classical times, in Cilicia; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 28–9; Le Strange, Lands, 132–4; EI[1] s.v. Ṭarsūs (F. Buhl).

565. A frontier fortress near the course of the upper Euphrates, classical Melitene; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 192–3; Le Strange, Lands, 120; Honigmann, 58–9, 72 ff.; EI[2] s.v. (Honigmann—S. Faroqhi).

566. A fortress in Cappadocia, Greek Koron; see Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 101–2; Honigmann, 45.

567. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 263, tr. 119.

568. A fortress in Cappadocia; see Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 101; Honigmann, 46.

its defending garrison, they sought a guarantee of security. Al-Ma'mūn granted this to them, and he then sent Ashināṣ to the fortress of Sundus,[569] and Ashināṣ brought back to the Caliph its commander. He further sent 'Ujayf and Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ to the commander of the fortress of Sinān,[570] and the latter harkened to the Caliph and gave his obedience.[571]

In this year, Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd returned from Egypt. He met up with al-Ma'mūn before the latter reached Mosul, and Manuel[572] and his (al-Ma'mūn's) son 'Abbās met up with him at Ra's al-'Ayn.[573]

In this year, after leaving the land of the Byzantines, al-Ma'mūn set off for Damascus.[574]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage.[575]

---

569. The Greek Soanda, perhaps the modern Turkish town of Nevşehir, according to Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 102.

570. A fortress which probably lay near Heracleia and Tyana; see ibid., I, 103.

571. Azdī, 399; 'Uyūn, 374; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 417. For the whole campaign, see Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 94–103, 287–8, 370, 391–2.

572. Byzantine patricius who had fled to the Muslims in the reign of the Emperor Michael II; see Canard, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire, I, 709–10.

573. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 264, tr. 120, with a much fuller account; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 418; Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 288, 392.

574. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

575. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh (Damascus), II, 778; Azdī, 405; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year [1104]

216

(FEBRUARY 18, 831–FEBRUARY 6, 832)

The events taking place during this year included al-Ma'mūn's return to the land of the Byzantines.

Al-Ma'mūn's Return to the Land of the Byzantines

There are varying reports about this. It is said, the reason for it was that al-Ma'mūn received reports about the king of Byzantium's slaughter of people of Tarsus and Maṣṣīṣah—according to what has been mentioned, amounting to sixteen hundred in all.[576] When he got this news, he set off on an expedition till he entered the land of the Byzantines on Monday, the nineteenth of Jumādā I of this year[577] (July 4, 831), and he remained there till the middle of Sha'bān (September 26 or 27). But it is also said that the reason for it was that Theophilus son of Michael wrote to al-Ma'mūn and put his own name first in his letter 576. According to the 'Uyūn, 374, two thousand were killed. Cf. Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 103–4.

577. Actually a Tuesday.

(bada'a bi-nafsihi). When the letter reached al-Ma'mūn, he did not read it, and set off for the land of the Byzantines. The envoys of Theophilus, son of Michael, met him at Adana, and Theophilus sent along to al-Ma'mūn five hundred Muslim captives. When al-Ma'mūn entered the Byzantine lands, he halted before Anṭīghū[578] and besieged it, and its garrison marched out to him after securing peace terms (without fighting). Al-Ma'mūn then proceeded to Heraclia,[579] and its garrison marched out to him after securing peace terms. He sent off his brother Abū Isḥāq, who captured thirty fortresses and subterranean strongholds and storehouses (maṭmūrah),[580] and he sent off from Ṭuwānah[581] Yaḥyā b. Aktham, who raided, killed, burned, seized and enslaved captives, and then returned to the main body of the army. Al-Ma'mūn next set off towards Kaysūm, and remained there for two or three days and then turned back to Damascus.[582]

[1105] In this year, 'Abdūs al-Fihrī rose in rebellion, and he and his partisans attacked Abū Isḥāq's tax officials and killed several of them, this being in Sha'bān (September-October 831). Al-Ma'mūn set out from Damascus for Egypt on Wednesday, the fifteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah[583] (January 23, 832).[584]

In this year, al-Afshīn arrived from Barqah,[585] on his way back from there, and remained in Egypt.[586]

---

578. A fortress in Cappadocia; see Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 111–12; Honigmann, 46.

579. Arabic Hiraqlah, modern Eregli, a town in the Taurus region; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 398–9; Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 110; EI[2] s.v. Eregli (J.H. Mordtmann—Taeschner).

580. Pl. maṭāmīr, subterranean grottoes or emplacements, placed by Le Strange, Lands, 138, in the region of Malacopia, Arabic Malaqūbiyah; see also Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 112; Honigmann, loc. cit.; EI[2] s.v. Maṭmūra (Pellat).

581. The town in Cilicia, classical Tyana; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 45–6; Le Strange, Palestine, 547; id., Lands, 139.

582. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 264–5, tr. 120; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 567–8; Azdī, loc. cit.; 'Uyūn, 374–5; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 419. For this campaign, see Canard, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire, I, 710; Vasiliev. op. cit., I, 109–14, 272–3, 288–9, 371, 409.

583. Actually a Tuesday.

584. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 265, tr. 120; Kindī, 192; Azdī, 406; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 419.

585. The port in modern Cyrenaica; see EI[2] s.v. Barḳa (J. Despois).

586. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 568, he had been suppressing a re-

In this year, al-Ma'mūn wrote to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm (al-Muṣ'abī) ordering him to oblige the troops to pronounce the takbīr[587] when they performed the worship. So they first put this into practice in the mosque of the City (of Peace) and at Ruṣāfah on Friday, the sixteenth of Ramaḍān of this year (October 27, 832), at the moment when they had completed the worship; they all remained standing and pronounced the takbīr three times. Subsequently, they followed this procedure at every prescribed session of the worship.[588]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn became angry with 'Alī b. Hishām; he sent 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah and Aḥmad b. Hishām to him, and ordered the confiscation of his property and weapons.[589]

In this year, Umm Ja'far (Zubaydah, mother of al-Amīn) died at Baghdad in Jumādā I (June–July 831).[590]

In this year, Ghassān b. 'Abbād arrived from Sind, after Bishr b. Dāwūd al-Muhallabī had come to him seeking a guarantee of security. Ghassān restored order in Sind, and appointed as chief financial officer (ista'mala) there 'Imrān b. Mūsā al-Barmakī.[591] A poet said:

The gleam of battle is in Ghassān's sword, and a deadly fate lies in two edges of its point.

When he brings it along to the land of Sind, [1106]
Bishr shows his submission [literally: lets himself be led] to him, bellion at Barqah; see also Kindī, 190–1; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 420; Ibn Taghrībirdī, al-Nujūm, II, 212. Al-Afshīn remained in Egypt, suppressing unrest among the Arabs of the Ḥawf and in Alexandria.

---

587. I.e., the formula Allāh akbar, "God is most great."

588. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 265–6, tr. 120; Azdī, 405; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit. The ordering of supplementary *takbīr*s was apparently in accordance with Shī'ī practice, and is considered by later Sunnī historians as one of al-Ma'mūn's bida' or heretical innovations; see Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbāside al-Ma'mūn," 41–2, 46.

589. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

590. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 568; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.; Abbott, 247.

591. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, II, 557–8, giving considerable detail, including about Ghassān's first appointing Mūsā b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī as his deputy there after Bishr, then Mūsā's death and the appointment of his son 'Imrān; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

Swearing that he will never again, while ever any worshipper makes the pilgrimage in duty to God and hurls his pebbles from the two [sic] piles of stones [actually, three piles, in the rajm of Satan at Minā],

Act treacherously, throwing off allegiance to rulers and suddenly attacking troops which seek refuge in his nobility [dhurwatayhi, literally, "his two peaks"].

Ghassān then came back to al-Ma'mūn.

(In this year,) Ja'far b. Dāwūd al-Qummī fled to Qumm and threw off his allegiance there.[592]

In this year, there was an excessively cold spell.

In this year, according to what some people say, Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās led the pilgrimage, but according to what others assert, it was 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās who led the pilgrimage this year; al-Ma'mūn had appointed him governor of the Yemen and had given him the governorship of all the regions which he would pass through till he reached the Yemen. Accordingly 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh left Damascus and came to Baghdad; he led the people in the worship there on the day of the breaking of the fast (the first of Shawwāl [November 11, 831]), and then set off from Baghdad on Monday the second of Dhū al-Qa'dah (December 11, 831) and performed the rites of the pilgrimage for the people.[593]

---

592. Ibid.

593. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 266, tr. 120, giving 'Abdallāh b. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-'Abbās as leader of the pilgrimage, and Monday, the first of Dhū al-Qa'dah (actually a Sunday) as the date of his departure from Baghdad; Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 779, also naming him; Azdī, 407, naming Sulaymān; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year

217

(FEBRUARY 7, 832–JANUARY 26, 833)

The events taking place during this year included al-Afshīn's victory at Bīmā, a place in the land of Egypt. Its people came forth under a guarantee of security granted on al-Ma'mūn's authority. The proclamation announcing its capture was read out on the twenty-eighth of Rabī' II (June 2, 832).[594] [1107]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn came to Egypt during Muḥarram (February–March 832). 'Abdūs al-Fihrī was brought before him and executed, and then he returned to Syria.[595]

---

594. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 267, tr. 120; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 569; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 421. This is presumably al-Afshīn's quelling of a rebellion of the Copts at Basharūd in the Lower Delta, described by Kindī, 192, and Severus, IV, 486–502. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 534, however, describes Bīmā as a place on the borders of Upper Egypt and the lands of the infidels. See also Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 114–15.

595. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, loc. cit., giving the exact dates for al-Ma'mūn's stay of forty-seven days in Egypt as being from the tenth of Muḥarram to the twenty-sixth of Ṣafar, 217; Kindī, loc. cit., making it forty-nine days; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 94 = ed. Pellat, § 2778; 'Uyūn, 376; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit. 'Abdūs was leader of the Coptic revolt.

In this year, al-Ma'mūn had the two sons of Hishām, 'Alī and Ḥusayn,[596] killed at Adana[597] in Jumādā I (June–July 832).

Al-Ma'mūn Has 'Alī Killed

The reason for this was because reports reached al-Ma'mūn about 'Alī's tyrannical conduct with the people within the governorship entrusted to him by al-Ma'mūn—the regions of Jibāl—including his killing of people and his seizure of property. 'Ujayf was therefore sent against him. 'Alī hoped to fall upon him suddenly and then join up with Bābak, but 'Ujayf got hold of him and sent him back to al-Ma'mūn. The Caliph ordered him to be decapitated. Ibn al-Jalīl was in charge of 'Alī's execution and Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, his brother's ('Alī's) son,[598] was in charge of al-Ḥusayn's decapitation at Adana on Wednesday, the sixteenth of Jumādā I (June 19, 832). 'Alī b. Hishām's head was sent (first) to Baghdad and Khurasan, where it was paraded in the streets; then it was sent back to Syria and the Jazīrah, where it was publicly paraded in district after district. After this, it was brought to Damascus during Dhū al-Ḥijjah (December 832–January 833), and then it was sent to Egypt, where it was finally thrown into the Nile (or: the sea, al-baḥr).[599]

It is mentioned that, when al-Ma'mūn had 'Alī b. Hishām executed, he ordered a paper to be written out and hung from his head so that the people might read it. He had the following words written:

[1108] In the past, the Commander of the Faithful summoned 'Alī b. Hishām among the group of Khurasanians whom he summoned to give support and to establish his rightful claims during the time of the deposed one [al-Amīn]. 'Alī

596. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 267, tr. 121, gives their nisbah or gentilic of al-Marwazī.

597. The modern capital of Cilicia; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 133; Le Strange, Lands, 131; EI[2] s.v. (R. Anhegger).

598. I.e., Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Marwazī, often mentioned in the pages of Ṭabarī.

599. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 267–8, tr. 121; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 570–1, mentioning that 'Alī's head was finally sent to Barqah and then hurled by catapult into the sea; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

was one of those who responded, answered the call speedily and gave help enthusiastically. Hence, the Commander of the Faithful acknowledged this to his credit and took him into his service as his protégé, thinking that 'Alī was filled with the fear of God and obedience to Him, and would be whole-heartedly devoted to the interests of the Commander of the Faithful in any administrative office if it were entrusted to him, displaying praiseworthy conduct and incorruptibility in regard to the mode of gain. The Commander of the Faithful heaped favors on him from the outset, and conferred on him the governorship of prestigious provinces, and showered on him munificent gifts, regarding whose value the Commander of the Faithful ordered an enquiry; he found that they amounted to more than fifty million dirhams. Yet 'Alī stretched out his hand into treachery and reckless wastefulness in regard to the office which the Caliph had asked him to watch over in a trustworthy manner. The Caliph therefore removed him from office and banished him from his presence to a remote spot. But then 'Alī besought the Commander of the Faithful to overlook his misdeeds, so the latter vouchsafed to him his forgiveness for them, and appointed him as governor of Jibāl, Azerbaijan and the districts of Armenia, and gave him responsibility for carrying on the war against God's enemies the Khurramiyyah on condition that he did not revert to his former misdeeds. Yet he returned to his old ways more violently than before by his preferring dīnārs and dirhams to actions pleasing to God and to His religion; he behaved tyrannically and oppressed the subject population, and he shed prohibited blood. So the Commander of the Faithful sent 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah with full responsibility to deal with his affair and with a call to restore the situation which 'Alī had brought about. 'Alī attacked 'Ujayf and tried to kill him, but God gave 'Ujayf strength because of his pure-hearted devotion in service to the Commander of the Faithful, so that he was able to ward him off. If 'Alī had been able successfully to wreak what he intended on 'Ujayf, there would have arisen a situation which could not have been put right or reversed.

However, when God desires a matter, it is as good as done. When the Commander of the Faithful put into effect God's [1109] decree concerning 'Alī b. Hishām, he realized that he ought not to punish 'Alī's offspring for his offences, so he ordered that the same sums as had been paid during 'Alī 's lifetime to his children, his family, all those in their household and those to whom he used to give allowances, should continue to be paid out to them. If it had not been that 'Alī b. Hishām intended the gravest onslaught on 'Ujayf, he would merely have been counted amongst those of al-Ma'-mūn's army who had rebelled and acted treacherously like 'Īsā b. Manṣūr[600] and his ilk.[601] Farewell![602]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn invaded the Byzantine lands, and halted before and besieged Lu'lu'ah[603] for a hundred days. Then he withdrew from there and left as his deputy for the siege 'Ujayf, but the people of Lu'lu'ah outwitted 'Ujayf and captured him, so that he remained a prisoner in their hands for eight days until they set him free. (The Emperor) Theophilus[604] advanced on Lu'lu'ah and surrounded 'Ujayf; but al-Ma'mūn dispatched further troops to Lu'lu'ah, and Theophilus fell back before making any contact with the Muslim army. So the people of Lu'lu'ah marched forth to 'Ujayf under a guarantee of security.[605]

600. Presumably 'Īsā b. Manṣūr al-Rāfi'ī, governor of Egypt in 216 (831) and again in 229 (843); see Kindī, 189–93, 196.

601. I.e., and possibly would have been pardoned.

602. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 269–70, tr. 122.

603. The Greek Loulon, on the ancient site of Faustinopolis, a fortress whose site is marked today by Ulu Kişla northwest of Adana; see Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 116–17; Honigmann, 44–5.

604. The second ruler of the Amorian line, who reigned 829–42; see Vasiliev, History of the Byzantine empire, I, 276.

605. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 570–1; Azdī, 408; 'Uyūn, 375–6; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 421; Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 115–18, 273–4, 289, 371; Canard, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire, I, 710.

The Ruler of Byzantium Asks for Peace

In this year, the ruler of Byzantium, Theophilus, wrote to al-Ma'mūn asking for peace.[606] He put his own name first in his letter, and al-F.ṣ.l[607] the vizier of Theophilus brought the letter, seeking peace and offering a tribute (literally: a ransom). The actual text of Theophilus's letter to al-Ma'mūn was as follows:

> It seems more sensible that the two opposing sides should come together over their respective shares [of good fortune] than adopt courses injurious to themselves. You are not the sort of person who would relinquish such a share which you possess for yourself in favor of a share which might pass to another person. You already know this well enough without my having to tell you. I have written to you inviting you to make a peace agreement and as one desirous of the advantage of a truce in military operations, so that you may remove the burdens of war from upon us and so that we may be to each other friends and a band of associates, in addition to the accruing of benefits [1110] > and widened scope for trading through commercial outlets, the release of those who have been carried off into captivity and the security of the highways and heartlands of the realms. If you reject this [peace offer], I shall not bamboozle you [literally: creep up on you secretly in an ambush[608]], nor shall I speak to you in an ingratiating, misleading manner; but I shall penetrate into the innermost recesses of your land, take over against you its barriers and scatter its cavalry and infantry alike. And if I do this, it will only be after setting forth a valid excuse [for adopting this course of action] and after setting up between us the standard of decisive argument. Farewell![609]

606. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit., adding, "but did not succeed in getting it."

607. For this cryptic name, Canard, in Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 289 n. 1, suggests a deformation of Syncellus, originally perhaps written "al-S.q.l."

608. A proverbial saying, see Maydānī, tr. II, 913.

609. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 284, tr. 128–9.

Al-Ma'mūn wrote back to him as follows:

There has reached me your letter, in which you ask for a truce in the fighting and call for the making of a mutual peace treaty. In your letter also, you mingle soft words with harsh ones in that you are seeking to achieve conciliation [with me] in regard to the opening-up of commercial outlets, the achieving of advantageous dealings, the release of captives and the cessation of killing and fighting. If it were not that what I am working towards involves proceeding with deliberation and seizing a favorable opportunity through turning things over in the mind, and were it not that I do not formulate any opinion [ra'y] on a future contingency except on a basis of an informed opinion taking into account the welfare of the community [istiṣlāḥ] as to what I prefer in regard to its outcome,[610] I should make the answer to your letter [the dispatch of] cavalry horses bearing steadfast, courageous and keen-sighted riders, who would contend with you over your destruction [thuklikum], to seek God's favor by spilling your blood and to make light, as a means of obtaining nearness to God, of the suffering which they will have endured from your military might. Then I should provide them with reinforcements and send them a sufficiency of matériel and military equipment. They are more eager to go forward to the [1111] watering-places of death than you are to preserve yourselves from the fearful threat of their onslaught upon you. They have the promise of one of the two best things:[611] a speedy victory or a glorious return [to God as martyrs in battle]. But I consider that I should proffer you a warning, with which God establishes clearly for you the decisive proof [of Islam], involving the summoning of you and your supporters to knowledge of the divine unity and the divine law of the religion of the ḥanīfs.[612] If you refuse [to accept

610. This passage of the letter seems to echo legal terminology.

611. Cf. Qur'ān, IX, 52.

612. al-Sharī'ah al-ḥanīfiyyah, i.e., the religion of the *ḥanīf*s or pre-Islamic monotheist seekers after righteousness, regarded as proto-Muslims, so that al-dīn al-ḥanīfī/al-sharī'ah al-ḥanīfiyyah = Islam; see EI[2] s.v. Ḥanīf (Watt).

this offer], then you can hand over tribute [literally: a ransom] which will entail the obligation of protection [dhimmah] and make incumbent a respite [from further warfare]. But if you choose not to make that [payment or ransom], then you will clearly experience face-to-face our [martial] qualities to an extent which will make any effort [on my part] of eloquent speaking and an exhaustive attempt at description superfluous. Peace be upon him who follows the divine guidance![613]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn went to Salaghūs[614]

In this year, 'Alī b. 'Īsā al-Qummī sent along Ja'far b. Dāwūd al-Qummī, and Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd had him executed.[615]

In this year, Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī led the pilgrimage.[616]

---

613. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 285, tr. 129, Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 568; Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 118–21, 289–91; Canard, in Cambridge medieval history. IV. The Byzantine empire, I, loc. cit.; Shaban, 56, 61.

614. 'Uyūn, 375; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 422. Salaghūs was a fortress beyond Tarsus; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 238; Le Strange, Palestine, 528.

615. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

616. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 780; Azdī, 411; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, loc. cit.

The Events of the Year 218

(JANUARY 27, 833–JANUARY 15, 834

The events taking place during this year included al-Ma'mūn's journeying from Salaghūs to Raqqah and his executing there Ibn Ukht al-Dārī.

In this year, he ordered the clearing of the population from Rāfiqah so that he might quarter his personal entourage (ḥasham) there; but the people there raised an outcry, so al-Ma'mūn allowed them to stay.[617]

In this year, al-Ma'mūn sent his son al-'Abbās to the Byzantine lands and ordered him to encamp at Ṭuwānah and to embark on a building program there. He had already dispatched thither workmen and detachments of regularly-paid troops (furūḍ).[618] He set to work on this building program, and constructed it to occupy a mile square.[619] He made its wall three farsakhs (eighteen km) in circumference, with four gates, each gate having a fortified tower. Al-Ma'mūn's dispatch of his son al-'Abbās for this purpose was on the first of Jumādā (I [May 25, 833]).[620] He also wrote to his brother Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd to the effect that he had made a levy on the armies of Damascus, Ḥimṣ, Urdunn and Filasṭīn of four thousand men, with the pay allocations of one hundred dirhams for each cavalryman and forty dirhams for each infantryman.[621] He further made a levy on the troops of Egypt, and he wrote to al-'Abbās about the numbers of troops which he had levied from (the armies of) Qinnasrīn and the Jazīrah, and to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm (al-Muṣ-'abī) about those levied from the army of Baghdad, these last amounting to two thousand men. Some of them marched off till they reached Ṭuwānah and encamped there with al-'Abbās.[622] [1112]

617. Azdī, 412. Rāfiqah was the new garrison town just outside Raqqah (hence its name, "the companion") built by al-Manṣūr on the pattern of the Round City at Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 15; Le Strange, Lands, 100–1; Canard, H'amdânides, 90–1. The two places are sometimes referred to by the geographers as "the two Raqqahs."

618. For this sense of farḍ, pl. furūd, see Lane, 2374b.

The Interrogation of the Judges and Traditionists

In this year, al-Ma'mūn wrote to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm that he should interrogate the judges and traditionists, and he ordered a group of them to be sent to him at Raqqah.[623] This was the first letter which he issued on this topic, and the text of his letter to Isḥāq was as follows:

> God has made incumbent upon the imāms and caliphs of the Muslims that they should be zealous in establishing

619. The Arab mile (mīl) has been variously estimated, but was probably just over two thousand yards, and three of these made up a farsakh (six km). The wall three farsakhs in circumference must accordingly have been an outer wall, and not that of the madīnah itself; at all events, these operations must have been on an enormous scale.

620. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 94 = ed. Pellat, § 2778; Azdī, 412.

621. Ibid.; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 440–1.

622. Azdī, loc. cit.; Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 121–2, 291.

623. See in general on the miḥnah: Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 572–3; Azdī, 412–14; Abū al-'Arab al-Tamīmī, Kitāb al-Miḥan, 436–53; 'Uyūn, 376–7; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 423–7; W.M. Patton, Aḥmed ibn Ḥanbal and the Miḥna; Goldziher, Introduction to Islamic theology and law, 98–100; Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbāside al-Ma'mūn," 42–4; Watt, 178–9, 242–5, 253, 280–1, 292; EI[1] s.v. (Wensinck); EI[2] s.v. (Hinds).

God's religion, which He has asked them to guard faithfully; in the heritage of prophethood of which He has made them inheritors; in the tradition of knowledge which He has entrusted to their keeping; in acting justly with the government of their subjects; and in being diligent in obeying God's will in their conduct towards those subjects. Now the Commander of the Faithful asks God to direct him to firmness and resolution in the right way, and to just actions in the exercise of political authority over his people which God, with His compassion and grace, has entrusted to him.[624]

The Commander of the Faithful has realized that the broad mass and the overwhelming concentration of the base elements of the ordinary people[625] and the lower strata [1113] of the commonalty are those who, in all the regions and far horizons of the world, have no farsightedness, or vision, or faculty of reasoning by means of such evidential proofs as God approves along the right way which He provides, or faculty of seeking illumination by means of the light of knowledge and God's decisive proofs. [These persons are] a people sunk in ignorance and in blindness about God, plunged into error regarding the true nature of His religion and His unity and faith in Him; [they are] too far off the right track from His clear marks for guidance and the obligation of following in His way; [they are] a people who fall short of being able to grasp the reality of God as He should be recognized, to acknowledge Him exactly as He should be acknowledged and to distinguish between Him and His creation.[626] This is because of the feebleness of their judg-

624. The Caliph, while avoiding the claims to infallibility and immaculateness ['iṣmah] of the Shī'ī Imāms, nevertheless claims a high status for himself as bearer of the Prophet's charge to guide his people; see Sourdel, op. cit., 44.

625. Ḥashw al-ra'iyyah. F. Steppat sees here a possible influence from the terminology of one Middle Persian wisdom text, as known from its later Arabic version, and more generally a strand in al-Ma'mūn's religious policy here deriving from earlier Persian imperial governmental attitudes; see "From 'ahd Ardasīr to al-Ma'mūn: a Persian element in the policy of the Miḥna," in Studia arabica et islamica, Festschrift for Iḥsān 'Abbās, 451–4.

626. Here the Caliph's contempt for the intellectual powers and judgment of the masses of his subjects distances him from the Sunnī veneration for the ment, the deficiency of their intellects and their lack of facility in reflecting upon things and calling them to mind; all this arises from the fact that they consider as perfectly equal God Himself and the Qur'ān which He has revealed; they have agreed with one voice and have asserted unequivocally that it is eternal and primordial, not created nor originated nor invented in any way by God. Yet God has said in the clear and unambiguous parts of His Book, which He has set forth as a healing for what there is [of anguish] in people's breasts and as an act of mercy and guidance for the believers, "Indeed, we have made it an Arabic Qur'ān."[627] Now everything which God made He must have created. He has also said, "Praise be to God who has created the heavens and earth and has made the darkness and the light."[628] He has further said, "In this way, We recount to you some of the stories of the past,"[629] and He gives the information that this is an account of events which He brought into existence subsequently to those events happening, and with it He followed up the beginnings of the events. He has also said, "Alif, lām, rā'. A book, whose miraculous signs have been clearly set forth and then made distinct, from One wise and well-informed."[630] Now everything which has been clearly set forth and made distinct must necessarily have an agent who brings these actions to pass; God is the One who has clearly set forth His Book and made it distinct, and He is its creator and originator. [1114]

Furthermore, those are the people who dispute about vain and useless things and then invite others to adopt their views.[631] They consider themselves adherents of the sunnah, whereas in every section of the Book of God there community, jamā'ah, and its corporate will or validatory consensus, ijmā', and approaches him in some measure towards the Shī'ī stress on the need for an authoritative Imām.

627. Qur'ān, XLIII, 2/3.

628. Qur'ān, VI, 1.

629. Qur'ān, XX, 99.

630. Qur'ān, XI, 1.

631. I.e., those who should give instruction and provide a lead for the masses are themselves purveyors of false teaching.

is an account related by Him which invalidates their words and gives the lie to their claims, turning their sayings and their call to adopt their professed beliefs back on themselves. Despite all this, they go on to make an outward show of being people of the divine truth, the [real] religion and the community of Muslims, and assert that all others are people of false beliefs, infidelity and schism. They raise themselves up importunately against the people with these assertions, and thereby deliberately lead astray the ignorant, to the point that a group of adherents of the false way, who display submissiveness to someone other than God and who lead an ascetic life—but for another cause and not the true faith—have inclined towards agreement with them and accordance with their evil opinions, thereby acquiring for themselves glory in their eyes and securing for themselves leadership and a reputation for probity amongst them. These people have forsaken the divine truth for their own delusions and have adopted for themselves a supporter for their error to the exclusion of God. Thus their testimony had been accepted because they [the ignorant ones or the people of the false way] have declared them [those who claim to be the people of truth] to be veracious witnesses, and the prescriptions of the Book have been put into effect through them [those who claim to be the people of truth], despite the suspect nature of their religion, the corruptness of their honor and the depraved nature of their intentions and their faith.

That has been their ultimate aim, to which they have urged others and which they have sought after in their own course of action and in their mendaciousness towards their Lord, even though the solemn covenant of the Book has been laid upon them, that they should not say anything against God except what is true, and even though [1115] they have studied intently its contents. These are the people whom "God has made deaf and has blinded their eyes. Do they not consider the Qur'ān, or are there locks on their hearts?"[632]

632. Qur'ān, XLVII, 25–6/23–4.

The Commander of the Faithful considers that these people are the worst of the Muslim community and the chief ones in error, the ones who are defective in their belief in the divine unity and who have an imperfect share in the faith. They are vessels of ignorance, banners [or: milestones, a'lām] of mendaciousness and the tongue of Iblīs, who speaks through his companions and strikes terror into the hearts of his adversaries, the people of God's own religion. They are the ones most fittingly considered as suspect in their truthfulness, whose witness is to be discarded and whose words and deeds are alike to be mistrusted. For there can be no good works except after sure faith, and no sure faith except after fully apprehending the true nature of Islam and a sincere profession of faith in the divine unity. Whoever is too blind to perceive his own right course and his share of faith in God and in His unity has, in other respects in regard to his conduct and endeavors to bear witness to the faith, become even more blind and even more errant from the right road.

By the life of the Commander of the Faithful! The person who most properly deserves to be branded as a liar in his utterances and as a forger of false testimony is the one who utters lies against God and His divine revelation and who does not recognize God as He really is. Indeed, the person who most appropriately deserves to be rejected when he bears witness about what God ordains and about His religion is the one who rejects God's testimony to His Book and who makes slanderous statements about God's truth through his vain lying.

Therefore, summon together all the judges in your sphere of jurisdiction and read out to them this letter from the Commander of the Faithful to you. Begin by testing them out concerning what they say and by finding out from them their beliefs about God's creating and originating the Qur'ān in time. Inform them too that the Commander of the Faithful will not seek the assistance in any of his administrative tasks of anyone whose religion, whose sincerity of faith in God's unity and whose own religious beliefs are not deemed trustworthy, nor will he [1116] place any reliance on such a man in the responsibilities laid on him by God and in the affairs of his subjects which have been entrusted to him. Then when they have publicly declared that [the Qur'ān is created] and have shown full agreement with the Commander of the Faithful concerning it, and are on the road of right guidance and salvation, order them to interrogate closely the legal witnesses within their sphere of jurisdiction and to question them about their knowledge of the Qur'ān; then [they are] no longer to recognize the validity of the testimony of those failing to affirm or hold the view that the Qur'ān was created and originated in time, and [they are] to prevent the admission and countersigning of such testimony in the judge's own court. Write back to the Commander of the Faithful what you learn from the judges over the people within your administrative province as to the results of their enquiries and their ordering these processes to be set in motion. Then keep a close oversight of them and search out what they have been doing, to such a point that God's decrees are only put into execution on the testimony of people clear-sighted in religion and wholly sincere in belief in the divine unity. Write to the Commander of the Faithful about what happens in regard to all this, if God wills.

He wrote this in Rabī' I 218 (March–April 833).[633]

Al-Ma'mūn wrote to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm about sending (to him) seven persons, including Muḥammad b. Sa'd,[634] the secretary of al-Wāqidī;[635] Abū Muslim, the one charged with the task of writing down dictated information (mustamlī) from Yazīd b. Hārūn;[636] Yaḥyā b. Ma'īn;[637] Abū Khaythamah Zuhayr b. Ḥarb;[638]

633. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 338–43, tr. 153–5; Patton, 56–61.

634. The historian and traditionist, died in 230 (845); see EI[2] s.v. Ibn Sa'd (J.W. Fück); Sezgin, GAS, I, 300–1.

635. The historian Muḥammad b. 'Umar, died in 207 (823); see EI[1] s.v. (J. Horovitz); Sezgin, GAS, 1, 294–7.

636. Qur'ān commentator and traditionist, died in 206 (821); see ibid., I, 40.

637. Traditionist, died in 233 (847); see ibid., I, 106–7.

638. Traditionist, died in 234 (848); see ibid., I, 107.

Ismā'īl b. Dāwūd; Ismā'īl b. Abī Mas'ūd; and Aḥmad b. (Ibrāhīm) al-Dawraqī.[639] These seven persons were sent to him (at Raqqah),[640] and he put them to the test (imtaḥanahum) and interrogated them about the creation of the Qur'ān. They all replied to him that the Qur'ān was created. Hence he dispatched them to the City of Peace, and Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm summoned them together at his house. He announced publicly their opinion and their judgement to a gathering of experts in the religious law (fuqahā') and senior traditionists, and they affirmed exactly what the seven persons had replied to al-Ma'mūn. So Isḥāq let them go. What Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm did in this matter was by the command of al-Ma'mūn.[641] [1117]

After this, al-Ma'mūn wrote to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm as follows:

> That which God has a right to expect from His representatives [or: caliphs, khulafā'] on earth and from those entrusted by Him with authority over His servants, upon whom He has been pleased to lay the setting up of His religion and upon whom He has laid the burden of caring for His creatures, the putting into effect of His ordinance and His laws (sunanihi), and the conscious imitation of His justice among His creation, is that they should exert themselves earnestly for God; render Him sincere service in that which He has asked them to keep safe and has laid upon them; make Him known through that excellence of learning which He has entrusted to them and the knowledge which He has placed within them; guide back to Him the one who has turned aside from Him and bring back the one who has turned his back from His command; trace out for their subjects the way of salvation for them; draw their attention to the limits of their faith and the way to their heavenly success and protection from sin; and reveal to them those of their affairs which are hidden from them and those which are dubious and obscure by means of what will remove doubt from them and bring back illumination and clear knowledge to them all. [God also claims from them as of right] that they should bring this about by guiding the subjects aright and giving them clear vision, since this involves all the different kinds of their actions and systematically gathers together their shares of fortune in this present life and in the next. They [God's representatives, the caliphs] should reflect how God is the one who holds himself ready to question them about what they have been made responsible for, and to reward them for what they have done in advance and have laid up with Him. The Commander of the Faithful's way to success comes through God alone, and his sufficiency is in God, who is all-sufficient for him.

639. Traditionist, died in 246 (860); see ibid., I, 112.
640. See above, 198.
641. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 343–4, tr. 155–6; Patton, 64–5.

Among those things which the Commander of the Faithful has made plain to himself by reflection, and has [1118] studied intently by his thinking so that the great danger attending it has become obvious, as well as the seriousness of the corruption and harm which will rebound on religion, are the sayings which the Muslims are passing round among themselves about the Qur'ān, which God has established as an exemplar for them and an enduring legacy to them of the Messenger of God and His chosen one, Muḥammad. [Another thing is] the confusedness of opinion about the Qur'ān in the minds of many people, to the point that it has seemed good to them and attractive to their intellects that it is not created. They thereby lay themselves open to the risk of rejecting God's creative power, by which He is distinguished from His creation and remains apart in His splendor in the bringing into existence of all things by means of His wisdom and their being originated by His power, and in His priority in time over them by reason of His primordial existence, whose beginning cannot be attained and whose extent cannot be comprehended. Everything apart from Him is a created object from His creation and a new thing which He has brought into existence. [They hold this erroneous view about the uncreatedness of the Qur'ān] even though the Qur'ān itself speaks about God's creating power, sets forth its proof and decisively confutes all difference of opinion about it.

[These people] talk just like the Christians when they claim that Jesus son of Mary was not created, because he was the Word of God.[642] But God says, "Indeed, We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān,"[643] meaning, "We have created it," just as He also says,[644] "And He made from him his spouse, that he might dwell with her."[645] He also says, "We have made the night a garment and have made the daylight as a means of sustenance,"[646] and, "We have made every living thing from water."[647] Thus God places the Qur'ān and these created things, which He mentions with the [1119] indications of the act of making, on an equal footing, and He gives the information that He alone is the one who made it, saying, "Indeed, it is a glorious Qur'ān, [recorded] on a preserved tablet."[648] Now He says that on the supposition that the tablet encompasses the Qur'ān, and only something which is created can be encompassed by something else. He likewise says to His prophet, "Do not move your tongue in it in order to get through it quickly,"[649] and also, "No new reminder comes to them from their Lord."[650] He further says, "Who does greater wrong than the one who forges a lie against God or accounts His miraculous signs false?"[651] He speaks too about a group of people whom He blames for their mendacity, in that they have said, "God has not sent down anything to a human being."[652] Then, by the tongue of His messenger, He brands

642. Cf. Qur'ān, CXII.
643. Qur'ān, XLII, 2/3.
644. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 344–6, tr. 156–7 (here the manuscript of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir breaks off at f. 130b, with a lacuna, resuming at f. 131a with a short section of similar theological polemic regarding the createdness of the Qur'ān, not in Ṭabarī; the lacuna caused by the lost folios is obviously a considerable one, and the text of Ṭabarī corresponding with Ibn Abī Ṭāhir does not resume till p. 1134, 1.2. See Keller's Introduction to his vol. II, pp. XV–XVI).
645. Qur'ān, VII, 189.
646. Qur'ān, LXXVIII, 10.
647. Qur'ān, XXI, 31/30.
648. Qur'ān, LXXXV, 21–2.
649. Qur'ān, LXXV, 16.
650. Qur'ān, XXI, 2.
651. Qur'ān, VI, 21.
652. Qur'ān, VI, 91.

them as liars, and says to His messenger, "Say, who has sent down the Book which Moses brought?"[653] Hence God calls the Qur'ān a collection to be recited, a reminder, and item of faith, a light, a right guidance, a blessed thing, a composition in Arabic and a story. For He says, "We shall narrate to you the finest of stories, in that We have revealed to you by inspiration this Qur'ān."[654] He also says, "Say, indeed, if men and jinn agree together to produce a Qur'ān like this one, they will not be able to produce its like."[655] He says additionally, "Say, bring forth ten sūras like it which have been invented,"[656] and, "Falsehood does not come to it either from before or from behind it."[657]

In this way, God places [at least putatively] something before it and after it, and indicates that it is finite and created. But by their utterances concerning the Qur'ān, these ignorant people have enlarged the breach in their religion and the defect in their truthworthiness; they have made the way easy for the enemy of Islam, and have confessed perversion of the Qur'ānic text and heresy against their [1120] own hearts; they have made known and described God's work of creation and His action by that form of description which belongs to God alone and have compared Him with it, whereas it is only His creation that is the fitting subject of comparison. The Commander of the Faithful does not consider that the person professing this doctrine has any share in the true religion, nor any part in the real faith and the certainty of revealed truth. Nor does he consider that he should regard any of them as suitable for an office of confidence like that of trusted depository, person in good legal standing, legal witness, person veracious in speech or report, or one involving the exercise of any aspect of authority over the subjects. Moreover, even if any of them is outwardly known for his equitable behavior and is

653. Ibid.
654. Qur'ān, XII, 13.
655. Qur'ān, XVII, 90/88.
656. Qur'ān, XI, 16/13.
657. Qur'ān, XLI, 42.

recognised for his straightforwardness, as one who pursues a just course among the subjects, nevertheless, the branches must be traced back to their roots and must be classified among the categories of praise or blame according to these roots. A man who is ignorant in the matter of his religion, that which God has commanded him in regard to His divine unity, is even more sunk in ignorance in regard to other things, more blind in finding right guidance concerning other matters and more erring from the right road.

So read out the Commander of the Faithful's letter, and what he has instructed you in it, to Ja'far b. 'Īsā and the judge 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq,[658] and question them both about their knowledge of the Qur'ān. Inform them that the Commander of the Faithful will not seek the aid, in any affairs of the Muslims, of anyone except those in whose sincerity of faith and belief in God's unity he has full trust, and that belief in God's unity cannot be imputed to anyone who does not affirm that the Qur'ān is created. If Ja'far b. 'Īsā and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq profess the Commander of the Faithful's view in this regard, then command them both to test those who are in their courts for purposes of giving evidence about claimant's rights and to cite them to answer for their professions regarding the Qur'ān. If any of them will not profess that the Qur'ān is created, then the two of them are to declare that person's legal witness invalid and to refrain from pronouncing sentence on a basis of what he says, even though his probity of life be firmly established by his equity and straightforwardness. Do this with all the judges in the remainder of your sphere of administrative authority and watch over them with such a careful watch as God may by means of it [1121] cause an increase in the clearsightedness of the clearsighted person and may prevent the one in doubt from neglecting his religion. Then, if God wills, write to the Commander of the Faithful what you are doing in this matter.[659]

658. Scholar of the Ḥanafī law school; see Watt, 286.
659. Patton, 65–9.

He continued to relate: Acting on these instructions, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm summoned to his presence a number of the faqīhs, judges (ḥukkām) and traditionists. These included Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī, Bishr b. al-Walīd al-Kindī, 'Alī b. Abī Muqātil, al-Faḍl b. Ghānim, al-Dhayyāl b. al-Haytham, (al-Ḥasan b. Ḥammād) Sajjādah, ('Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar) al-Qawārīrī, Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Qutaybah (b. Sa'īd), Sa'dawayh al-Wāsiṭī, 'Alī b. al-Ja'd, Isḥāq b. Abī Isrā'īl, Ibn al-Hirsh, Ibn 'Ulayyah al-Akbar, Yaḥyā b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-'Umarī and another shaykh from the progeny of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb who was judge of Raqqah, Abū Naṣr al-Tammār, Abū Ma'mar al-Qaṭī'ī, Muḥammad b. Ḥātim b. Maymūn, Muḥammad b. Nūḥ al-Maḍrūb and Ibn al-Farrukhān. He further summoned another group, which included al-Naḍr b. Shumayl, Ibn 'Alī b. 'Āṣim, Abū al-'Awwām al-Bazzāz, Ibn Shujā' and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq.[660] All of these were brought into Isḥāq's presence en masse, and he read out to them twice this letter of al-Ma'mūn's until they comprehended it. Then he asked Bishr b. al-Walīd,[661] "What is your view about the Qur'ān?" He replied, "I have acquainted the Commander of the Faithful with my views about this on more than one occasion." Isḥāq replied, "But this letter from the Commander of the Faithful is something new, as you can see." Bishr retorted, "I say that the Qur'ān is the word of God." Is-[1122] ḥāq said, "I didn't ask you about this. Is it created?" Bishr responded, "God is the creator of everything." Isḥāq said, "Is not the Qur'ān a thing?" Bishr replied, "It is a thing." Isḥāq said, "Then it must be created?" Bishr replied, "It is not a creator." Isḥāq said, "I didn't ask you about this; is it created?" Bishr replied, "I cannot do better than what I have said to you, and I have already secured from the Caliph a promise that I do not have to speak about it; I have no views other than what I have told you." Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm took up a document which lay before him and read it out and explained it to him. Then he went on to say, "Bear witness that there is no god but God, the One, the Solitary, before whom there was nothing and after whom 660. See concerning various of these figures, ibid., 70; Watt, 281, 286.

661. See ibid., 281; Sezgin, GAS, I, 438.

there shall be nothing, and whom nothing of His creation resembles in any meaning or sense whatsoever." Bishr retorted, "I bear witness to that, and I have been having people beaten for less than that ['alā dūni hādhā]." Isḥāq turned to the clerk and said, "Set down what he has said."

Then Isḥāq said to 'Alī b. Muqātil "What do you say, O 'Alī?" 'Alī replied, "I have let the Commander of the Faithful hear my words about this on several occasions, and I have nothing to add to what he has already heard." Isḥāq then put 'Alī to the test with the document, and 'Alī gave his assent to its contents. Then Isḥāq said, "Is the Qur'ān created?" 'Alī replied, "The Qur'ān is the word of God." Isḥāq said, "I didn't ask you about this." 'Alī responded, "It is the word of God, but if the Commander of the Faithful commands us with the doing of a thing, we hear and obey." Isḥāq said to the clerk, "Set down his views." Then he said to al-Dhayyāl more or less what he had said to 'Alī b. Abī Muqātil, and al-Dhayyāl replied in the same vein.

Then Isḥāq said to Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī,[662] "What is your opinion?" He replied, "Ask about anything you like." Then Isḥāq read out the document and explained it to him, and Abū Ḥassān gave his assent to the contents. Then Isḥāq said, "Any person who does not agree with these doctrines is an unbeliever," and asked him, "Is the Qur'ān itself created?" Abū Ḥassān replied, "The Qur'ān is the word of God, and God is the [1123] creator of everything; all things apart from him are created. But the Commander of the Faithful is our Imām, and by means of him we have heard the whole sum of knowledge. He has heard what we have not heard, and he knows what we do not know. God has invested him with the rule over us; he upholds the pilgrimage and the worship for us, we hand over to him the poor-tax levied on our wealth, we fight at his side in the holy war and we recognize his imāmate as a true one. So if he commands us, we obey his orders; if he forbids us from doing something, we desist; and if he calls upon us, we respond to him." Isḥāq said, "Is the Qur'ān itself created?" In answer, Abū Ḥassān repeated his views as given above. Isḥāq said, "This is the Commander of the Faithful's doctrine." Abū Ḥassān retorted, "But sometimes the Commander of the Faithful's view is one concerning which he gives the people no explicit command and does not call upon them to adopt it. If, however, you tell me that the Commander of the Faithful has commanded you that I should say this, I will say whatever you command me to say, for you are a trustworthy person, one on whom reliance is to be placed regarding anything which you convey to me from him; hence if you convey to me any command from him about anything, I will hasten to do it." Isḥāq said, "He has not given me the order to convey anything to you." 'Alī b. Abī Muqātil said, "The Commander of the Faithful's words may conceivably be like the variation in views amongst the Companions of the Messenger of God concerning the obligatory shares [farā'iḍ] and inheritances,[663] and he has not given any injunction to the people about them." Abū Ḥassān said to him, "I have no idea but to hear and obey; command me, and I shall obey his orders." Isḥāq said, "The Commander of the Faithful has not commanded me to give you any orders, but only that I should put you to the test."

662. Judge and traditionist who died in 243 (857/8) and who is frequently quoted by Ibn Abī Ṭāhir (see concerning this, above, 158 n. 474); see Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, tr. B. Dodge, I, 241–2.

He then came back to Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal[664] and said to him, "What is your view concerning the Qur'ān?" Aḥmad replied, "It is the word of God." Isḥāq said, "Is it created?" Aḥmad retorted, "It is the word of God; I cannot add any more to these words." Isḥāq then put him to the test with the contents of the document. When he came to the words "There is nothing like Him, and He is the hearing and seeing one," he held back from the phrase " . . . whom nothing of His creation resembles in [1124] any meaning or sense whatsoever." Ibn al-Bakkā' al-Aṣghar interrupted him and said, "May God grant you righteousness! It speaks of 'a hearing one' because of ears and 'a seeing one' because of eyes!" Isḥāq said to Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, "What do the words 'a hearing and seeing one' mean?" Aḥmad replied, "God is even as He has described Himself." Isḥāq said, "But what does it mean?" Aḥmad responded, "I don't know; He is even as He has described Himself." Then Isḥāq summoned them, one by one, and they all said that the Qur'ān was the word of God except for this group of people: Qutaybah, 'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, Ibn 'Ulayyah al-Akbar, Ibn al-Bakkā', 'Abd al-Mun'im b. Idrīs b. Bint Wahb b. Munabbih, al-Muẓaffar b. Murajjā, a blind man who was not a faqīh and about whom nothing was known except that he had been introduced into there, the judge of Raqqah who was descended from 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and Ibn al-Aḥmar. In regard to Ibn al-Bakkā' al-Akbar, he replied that the Qur'ān was something made [maj'ūl] because of God's words, "Indeed, we have made it [ja'alnāhu] an Arabic Qur'ān,"[665] and something originated [muḥdath] because of His words,"No recently-originated [muḥdath] warning has come to them from their Lord."[666] Isḥāq said to him, "Is, then, what is made, created?" Ibn al-Bakkā' replied, "Yes." Isḥāq said, "So the Qur'ān is created?" Ibn al-Bakkā' replied, "I don't say that it is created, but that it is something made." Isḥāq then wrote down what he had said.[667]

663. See J. Schacht, An introduction to Islamic law, 170 ff.; EI[2] s.v. Farā'iḍ (T.W. Juynboll).

664. Spearhead of the conservative and traditionalist opposition to al-Ma'mūn's religious policy here and founder of the subsequent Ḥanbalī law school; see Patton, passim; Watt, index; EI[2] s.v. (H. Laoust).

When he had finished putting the members of the group to the test and had recorded their replies, Ibn al-Bakkā' al-Aṣghar broke in, saying, "May God grant you righteousness! These two judges are leading scholars, why don't you order them [to affirm their views on the Qur'ān?" He kept on urging this. Isḥāq said to him, "These two men are the ones who held their position through the Commander of the Faithful's nomination." Ibn al-Bakkā' kept on, "Why don't you order them to let us hear their views, so that we might pass these down directly from them?" Isḥāq replied, "If you will serve as a witness before them, you will know their views, if God wills." He wrote [1125] down the views of all the group one after the other, and these were sent to al-Ma'mūn. The group remained there for nine days.[668] Then Isḥāq summoned them together again, the Caliph's letter having arrived in answer to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm's communication regarding the affair. Its text was as follows:

665. Qur'ān, XLIII, 2/3.
666. Qur'ān, XXI, 2.
667. Patton, 69–74.

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. There has reached the Commander of the Faithful your letter, comprising an answer to his letter sent to you about that doctrine which the ostentatious ones among the people of qiblah [the Muslims] and those among the people of the faith who seek a leadership for which they are not qualified, profess about the creation of the Qur'ān. The Commander of the Faithful also commanded you in that letter to put them to the test, investigate their various positions and set them down in their appropriate places. You mention summoning to your presence Ja'far b. 'Īsā and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq on the arrival of the Commander of the Faithful's letter, together with your summoning those who have been classed as experts on the religious law, who have been recognized as transmitters of tradition and who have set themselves up as competent to give judicial decisions in the City of Peace; [you mention] your reading the Commander of the Faithful's letter out to the assembled group; [you mention] interrogating them about their religious convictions regarding the Qur'ān; [you mention] pointing out to them how they could best serve their own interests; [you mention] their agreement to reject anthropomorphism [tashbīh][669] and their differences of view concerning the Qur'ān. [You also mention] your giving orders to those of them who would not profess that the Qur'ān was created to refrain from transmitting traditions and from giving judicial decisions, whether in private or in public; and [you mention] your giving instructions to al-Sindī and to 'Abbās, the Commander of the Faithful's client, to the same effect as the instructions concerning them which you gave to the two judges, even the same which the Commander of the Faithful prescribed to you, namely, the testing of the legal witnesses who attend their courts. [You also mention] the dispatch of letters to the judges in the outlying parts of the areas of your administrative jurisdiction, instructing them to come to you so that you might constrain them and test them according to what the Commander of the Faithful has defined; and [you mention] your listing at the end of your letter the names of those who were present and their professed doctrines.

668. Ibid., 74.

669. See for this, also called tajsīm, Watt, 246–9, 290, 295; EI[1] s.v. Tashbīh [R. Strothmann].

The Commander of the Faithful has understood what [1126] you have recounted, and he gives God abundant praise, as indeed befits Him, and asks Him to grant a blessing upon His servant and His messenger Muḥammad, and he desires earnestly of God success in obeying Him and, through his mercifulness, effective aid to realize his good intentions. The Commander of the Faithful has also pondered over what you have written to him concerning the names of those whom you interrogated about the Qur'ān, the replies which you got back from each one of those persons in regard to it, and the explanations which you have given of their views.

As for what the deluded Bishr b. al-Walīd has said about rejecting anthropomorphic conceptions and as for what he has held back from in connection with the createdness of the Qur'ān, and also what he has claimed concerning his not having to speak about that and his having obtained an agreement to this effect from the Commander of the Faithful—he has lied about it and shown himself an unbeliever, and has uttered deceit and falsehood. For there has not passed between him and the Commander of the Faithful any agreement or exchange of views on this topic or on any other beyond his telling the Commander of the Faithful that he believed in the doctrine of exclusive devotion to God [ikhlāṣ][670] and profession of the Qur'ān's createdness. So summon him before you and tell him what the Commander of the Faithful has just told you about this matter; require him to answer about what he has said regarding the Qur'ān and ask him to recant his beliefs. For indeed, the Commander of the Faithful believes that you should ask someone who holds views like his to recant, since such views are unalloyed infidelity and sheer polytheism in the Commander of the Faithful's opinion. If he then repents of these views, proclaim his action publicly and leave him alone; but if he persists in his polytheism and refuses, in his unbelief and heresy, to admit that the Qur'ān is created, then have him decapitated and, if God wills, send his head along to the Commander of the Faithful. Do likewise with Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī. Test him in the same terms as you tested Bishr, for he used to profess [1127] Bishr's views, and reports about him have reached the Commander of the Faithful. If he acknowledges that the Qur'ān is created, proclaim his action publicly and disclose it fully; but if not, then have him decapitated and, if God wills, send his head along to the Commander of the Faithful.

670. See for this, EI[2] s.v. (L. Gardet).

As for 'Alī b. Abī Muqātil, say to him, "Are you not the person who said to the Commander of the Faithful, 'You are the one who declares what is permissible and what is not permissible,' and who spoke to him about what you have spoke to him about." The recollection of this cannot yet have left him. As for al-Dhayyāl b. al-Haytham, tell him that what should occupy his mind is the corn which he used to steal at Anbār and what he used to appropriate for himself in the city of the Commander of the Faithful Abū al-'Abbās [al-Saffāḥ], and that if he were a follower in the footsteps of his forefathers, walking in their ways and keeping to their identical tracks,[671] he would certainly not go off into polytheism after having believed. As for Aḥmad b. Yazīd, known as Abū al-'Awwām, and his saying that he cannot answer well regarding the Qur'ān, tell him that he is a child in intellect, if not one in years, and an ignoramus, and that unless he sees his way to answer properly about the Qur'ān, he will certainly see his way to do it properly when punishment befalls him; then if he still does not do it, there is the sword beyond that, if God wills. As for Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal and what you write about him, tell him that the Commander of the Faithful has understood the significance of that view and his conduct regarding it, and from it he deduces as proven his ignorance and defective intelligence. As for al-Faḍl b. Ghānim, tell him that what he did in Egypt and the riches which he amassed for himself in less than one year have not been hidden from the Commander of the Faithful, nor has the legal imbroglio over those doings which went on between him and al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh;[672] for one cannot but believe that a man who behaved as he did, and who showed himself as avid [1128] for dīnārs and dirhams as he did, would barter his faith out of lust for money and out of a preference for deriving an immediate advantage from it. [Remind him,] moreover, that he is the one who said to ʿAlī b. Hishām what he said and who opposed him in that in which he opposed him, and [remind him] what it was that caused him to abandon that doctrine and brought him over to another one. As for al-Ziyādī, tell him that he is alleging a connection with the first false claimant over lineage in Islam, in whose case the Messenger of God's ordinance was set aside;[673] it is only fitting that he should behave as he does. [But Abū Ḥassān denied that he was a client of Ziyād (b. Abīhi),[674] or indeed that he was anyone's client, and stated that he simply had a nisbah relating to Ziyād for some other reason.] As for the person known as Abū Naṣr al-Tammār, the Commander of the Faithful compares the insignificance of his intellect with the insignificance of his trade.[675]

671. Following the reading of the Addenda et emendanda., p. DCCLXXII.

As for al-Faḍl b. al-Farrukhān, tell him that, through the doctrine which he professes on the Qur'ān, he has tried to appro-

672. Al-Faḍl was appointed chief judge in Egypt by the governor al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khuzāʿī in 198 (813), but was dismissed after ten months in office; see Kindī, 422–3.

673. I.e., a connection with Ziyād b. Abīhi, who claimed to be a son of the Meccan leader Abū Sufyān by the notorious whore Sumayyah and whom the Caliph Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān endeavored to adopt into the Umayyad family; see H. Lammens, Etudes sur le siècle des Omayyades, 27–161; EI[1] s.v. (Lammens).

674. I.e., that a forebear of his had been a client of Ziyād b. Abīhi.

675. Tammār = "seller of dates" (tamr).

priate the deposits which 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq and others entrusted to him, waiting for a favorable moment when someone will ask him to act as a depository and hoping to add to what has already come into his hands; furthermore, there is no way of securing redress from him, because of the extended duration of the agreement and the prolongation of the period of its existence. But say to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq, "May God not recompense you with good for your giving strength to a man like this and your reposing trust in him, seeing that he is firmly bound up with polytheism and has completely thrown off belief in God's unity." As for Muḥammad b. Ḥātim, Ibn Nūḥ and the man known as Abū Ma'mar, tell them that they [1129] are too much occupied with devouring usury properly to grasp the concept of the divine unity and that, if the Commander of the Faithful had sought legal justification in combatting them for the sake of God and launching a holy war against them solely on the grounds of their taking usury and that which has been revealed in the Qur'ān regarding their likes, he would surely have found it lawful. How will it be with them now, when they have added polytheism to their practice of usury and have become just like the Christians? As for Aḥmad b. Shujā', tell him that you were in close contact with him only recently and extracted from him what he himself had confiscated as being licit of 'Alī b. Hishām's wealth, and [tell him] that he is one of those people whose religion is made up of dīnārs and dirhams. As for Sa'dawayh al-Wāsiṭī, say to him, "May God make vile a man whose ostentatious preparation of himself for transmitting traditions, his self-glorification by means of it and his avidity in seeking a leading position in that field have reached such a pitch that he looks forward to the coming of the miḥnah and proclaims his desire to ingratiate himself with me through it. Let him be put to the test, and [if he assents to the createdness of the Qur'ān,] he may still teach traditions.

As for the person who is known as Sajjādah and his denial that he has ever heard the doctrine that the Qur'ān is created from any of the traditionists and faqīhs with whom he used to study, tell him that, in his concern to prepare datestones and his rubbing [his forehead] in order to make the callosity on his forehead [sajjāda] look more imposing,[676] and similarly in his care for the deposits which ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā and others commited to his keeping, lies that which has diverted his attention from the idea of God's unity and made him unmindful of it. Then ask him about what Yūsuf b. Abī Yūsuf and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan used to say, if he really did have contact with them and attend their sessions for study. As for al-Qawārīrī, what shows up clearly his real beliefs, his evil conduct and the feebleness of his intellect and religion can be discerned in what has become open and notorious about his proclivities and his taking of bribes and presents offered to influence his decision favorably. It has also reached the Commander of the Faithful that he has taken upon himself responsibility for [the settling of] legal questions for Jaʿfar b. ʿĪsā al-Ḥasanī; so command Jaʿfar b. ʿĪsā to set him aside and no longer place any reliance on him [1130] or confidence in him. As for Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿUmarī, if he were genuinely from the progeny of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, it is well-known how he would answer. As for Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. ʿĀṣim, if only he really did imitate his ancestors,[677] he would not profess that spurious doctrine which has been related of him. He is still a child who needs instruction.

Now the Commander of the Faithful has also sent to you a certain person called Abū Mus'hir after the Commander of the Faithful had required him to answer in his testing about the Qur'ān. He mumbled indistinctly over it and kept on repeating himself in it, until the Commander of the Faithful ordered the sword to be brought out for him; then he made his profession in the manner of one worthy of censure. So require him to make his affirmation about it, and if he stands fast in it, proclaim it publicly and divulge it openly, if God wills. But those who refuse to abandon their polytheism, from amongst those whom you named to the Commander of the Faithful in your letter and whom the Commander of the Faithful has either mentioned to you or else has refrained from mentioning in this letter of his, and who will not profess that the Qur'ān is created, with the exceptions of Bishr b. al-Walīd and Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, send them all in bonds to the Commander of the Faithful's encampment, together with someone who will be responsible for watching over and guarding them on the journey; then bring them to the Commander of the Faithful's encampment and hand them over to the person to whom their delivery has been entrusted, so that the Commander of the Faithful may require them to give their answer. If they do not then recant and repent of their errors, he will consign them en bloc to the sword, if God wills; and there is no power except in God. The Commander of the Faithful has dispatched this letter by a special courier's letter bag [kharīṭah bundāriyyah],[678] and has [1131] not considered [awaiting] the collection of letters for the regular letter bag service [kutub kharā'iṭiyyah], thereby expediting it and seeking to advance in God's favor through the decree which he has issued, expecting to achieve his purpose and thereby gaining a hoped-for generous reward from God. So put into effect the Commander of the Faithful's order which comes to you, and hasten to give a reply to him about what you are doing by special courier's letter bag, sent separately from the rest of the letter bags, so that you may inform the Commander of the Faithful what they are doing, if God wills.

676. Such a callosity when caused by repeated prostration [sujūd] was regarded as a sign of great piety, but could be fabricated by rubbing the forehead.

677. Muḥammad was presumably either the descendant of the traditionist and author on the Prophet's maghāzī, or raids, ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Qatādah, died in 120 (738) (see A.A. Duri, The rise of historical writing among the Arabs, 27, 34) or else of ʿĀṣim b. Bahdalah al-Asadī, Kūfan author of one of the seven canonical systems of Qur'ān reading, died in 127 or 128 (745) (see EI[2] s.v. [A. Jeffery]).

(This) was written in the year 218 (833).[679]

When Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm put the question to them again, all of the group now confessed that the Qur'ān was created, except for four of them—Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, Sajjādah, al-Qawārīrī and Muḥammad b. Nūḥ al-Maḍrūb. Accordingly, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm ordered these last to be loaded with iron fetters. The next day, he sent for (the four of) them together, and they were thrust forward in irons. He put them to the test once more, and this time Sajjādah responded that the Qur'ān was indeed created. Isḥāq therefore ordered his fetters to be struck off and set him free. The others, however, maintained their original position. On the day after that, he had (the three of) them brought out once more and repeated the question. This time, al-Qawārīrī acknowledged that the Qur'ān was created, so Isḥāq ordered his fetters to be struck off and set him free. But Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal and Muḥammad b. Nūḥ persisted in their original profession and would not recant. Hence they were both loaded with fetters and sent to Tarsus, accompanied by a letter from Isḥāq with instructions that they should be sent onwards. He further wrote a separate letter giving an explanation of what the group had finally assented to. The group remained (in Baghdad) for a few days, and then Isḥāq summoned them. At this juncture, a letter had just reached him from al-Ma'mūn to the effect that:

678. I.e., by express courier service. For the Persian term bundār, here meaning "rapid courier," see Ṭabarī, Glossarium, pp. CXLI–CXLII.

679. Patton, 74–80.

> The Commander of the Faithful has understood what the group assented to. The postmaster and intelligence agent [ṣāḥib al-khabar] Sulaymān b. Ya'qūb has reported that [1132]
> Bishr b. al-Walīd has furnished an interpretation of the verse which God Most High revealed in connection with 'Ammār b. Yāsir,[680] " . . . except him who is compelled, while his heart is still at peace in belief,"[681] but his interpretation is erroneous; God merely refers in this verse to the person who holds fast [in his heart] to the faith, while outwardly professing polytheism. As for the person who holds fast [in his heart] to polytheism, while outwardly showing the faith, the verse does not refer to him at all. Hence, send them all to Tarsus, where they are to wait until the time when the Commander of the Faithful will leave the Byzantine lands.

Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm took guarantors from the group, that they would meet up at the army camp at Tarsus, and accordingly

---

680. Companion of the Prophet, famed for his piety and knowledge of traditions; see EI[2] s.v. (H. Reckendorff), noting that various passages of the Qur'ān were interpreted by anti-Umayyad polemicists as referring to 'Ammār.

681. Qur'ān, XVI, 108/106.

sent forward Abū Ḥassān, Bishr b. al-Walīd, al-Faḍl b. Ghānim, ʿAlī b. Abī Muqātil, al-Dhayyāl b. al-Haytham, Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-ʿUmarī, ʿAlī b. al-Jaʿd, Abū al-ʿAwwām, Sajjādah, al-Qawārirī, Ibn al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. ʿĀṣim, Isḥāq b. Abī Isrāʾīl, al-Naḍr b. Shumayl, Abū Naṣr al-Tammār, Saʿdawayh al-Wāsiṭī, Muḥammad b. Ḥātim b. Maymūn, Abū Maʿmar, Ibn al-Hirsh, Ibn al-Farrukhān, Aḥmad b. Shujāʿ and Abū Hārūn b. al-Bakkāʾ. When they approached Raqqah, the news of al-Maʾmūn's death reached them, and the governor of Raqqah, ʿAnbasah b. Isḥāq, ordered them to enter the town; but then he sent them back to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm at the City of Peace in the company of the envoy who had been charged with escorting them to the Commander of the Faithful. The envoy delivered them to Isḥāq, who instructed them to remain in their houses. He subsequently relented towards them and allowed them to go out. However, Bishr b. al-Walīd, al-Dhayyāl, Abū al-ʿAwwām and ʿAlī b. Abī Muqātil set out (from Raqqah) without having obtained permission, and reached Baghdad. As a penalty [1133] for that, they received punishment from Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm. The rest of the group arrived with Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm's envoy, and he then set them free.[682]

In this year, letters from al-Maʾmūn were dispatched to his governors in the provinces, (with the heading,) "From the slave of God ʿAbdallāh, the Imām al-Maʾmūn, Commander of the Faithful, and his brother, the Caliph in succession to him, Abū Isḥāq, son of the Commander of the Faithful al-Rashīd."[683] It is also said that al-Maʾmūn did not have it written just like that, and that it was only set down in a period of lucidity which al-Maʾmūn regained from the general state of unconsciousness which came over him during his illness at Budandūn,[684] on al-Maʾmūn's instructions to al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn, to Isḥāq (b. Ibrāhīm al-Muṣʿabī) and to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, to the effect that, if death should supervene during this illness of his, then 682. Patton, 83–4.

683. ʿUyūn, 377.
684. A river and place in Cilicia to the north of Tarsus, Greek Podandos; see Honigmann, 44–5, 82.

the next Caliph in succession to him should be Abū Isḥāq, son of the Commander of the Faithful al-Rashīd. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd wrote that out, sealed the letters and dispatched them.

Abū Isḥāq wrote to his governors, (with the heading,) "From Abū Isḥāq, brother of the Commander of the Faithful and Caliph after the Commander of the Faithful." Then there arrived a letter from Abū Isḥāq Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Rashīd to Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh, his governor over the jund[685] of Damascus, on Sunday, the thirteenth of Rajab[686] (August 4, 833). Its heading was: "From the slave of God 'Abdallāh, the Imām al-Ma'mūn, Commander of the Faithful, and the Caliph in succession to the Commander of the Faithful [al-Ma'mūn], Abū Isḥāq, son of the Commander of the Faithful al-Rashīd," (and its text was as follows,) "The Commander of the Faithful has commanded in the letter to you that you should instruct your [subordinate] governors ['ummāl] that they should conduct themselves well, lighten the financial burdens and avoid harming the people within your administrative district. So in- [1134] struct your governors concerning this in the strongest possible terms, and write to the officials charged with levying and collecting the land-tax ['ummāl al-kharāj] in the same vein." He wrote a similar letter to all his governors in the various junds of Syria—those of Ḥimṣ, Urdunn and Filasṭīn—and then when Friday, the nineteenth of Rajab[687] (August 10, 833), came round, Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh led the Friday worship in the mosque at Damascus and proclaimed in his khuṭbaḥ, after prayers for the Commander of the Faithful, "O God, grant righteousness to the Amīr, the brother of the Commander of the Faithful Abū Isḥāq, son of the Commander of the Faithful al-Rashīd."

In this year, al-Ma'mūn died.

685. Here with the meaning of the administrative region around Damascus, originally settled in the conquest period by an Arab army group (jund); see EI[2] s.v. Djund (Sourdel).

686. Actually a Monday.

687. Actually a Sunday.

The Cause of al-Ma'mūn's Fatal Illness

It is mentioned from Sa'īd al-'Allāf the Qur'ān reciter, who related: Al-Ma'mūn sent for me, at the time when he was in the Byzantine lands, having entered them from Tarsus on Wednesday, the sixteenth of Jumādā II (July 9, 833).[688] I was brought to him at Budandūn. He used often to ask me to recite, and one day he summoned me. I found him sitting on the bank (of the river) of Budandūn with Abū Isḥāq al-Mu'taṣim seated at his right hand. He bade me, and I sat down near him, and behold, at that moment, he and Abū Isḥāq were dangling their feet in [1135] the water (of the river) of Budandūn. He said to me, "O Sa'īd, dangle your feet in this water too, and taste it; have you ever seen water more cool, more sweet and more clear than this?" I did (as he instructed), and replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have never seen its like." He said, "What comestible would go well with this water, to follow it?" I replied, "The Commander of the Faithful knows best." He said, "Fresh green dates of the āzādh variety!"[689]

At the very moment when he was uttering these words, the clinking noise of the bridles of the mounts of the postal and intelligence service (barīd) could be heard. He turned round and looked, and behold, there were some of the mules of the postal and intelligence service with panniers over their hindquarters in which were gifts. He said to one of his servants, "Go and see if there are any fresh dates amongst these gifts, and if there are in fact any fresh dates, see whether there are any of the āzādh variety and bring them here." The servant came hurrying back with two baskets of fresh āzādh dates, as if they had been gathered from the palm tree that very moment. He vouchsafed thanks to God Most High, and we were most astonished at all this. Al-Ma'mūn said, "Come forward and eat some!" He and 688. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 94–6 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2778–9, cf. Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 122–3, describes the coming of an envoy from the Emperor Theophilus to al-Ma'mūn, seeking to buy him off with tribute and an exchange of captives, but failing in his mission, after which the Caliph invaded Byzantine territory, returning to Budandūn.

689. Āzādh = Persian "free, noble," hence here "excellent;" see Dozy, I, 19a-b.

Abū Isḥaq ate some, and I ate with them, and we all drank some of that water; but by the time we got up, each one of us had contracted a fever. That illness proved fatal for al-Ma'mūn; al-Mu'taṣim continued to be ill till he reached Iraq; but I myself remained ill only for a short while.[690]

When al-Ma'mūn's illness grew worse, he sent for his son al-'Abbās, although he imagined that he would not arrive (in time). But al-'Abbās came to him, by which time al-Ma'mūn was extremely ill, with mind impaired; the letters containing his instructions regarding Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd had already been sent off. Al-'Abbās stayed with his father for some days, al-Ma'mūn having already made his last testament, concerning the succession, to his brother Abū Isḥāq previously to that. [1136]
Others say that he did not make this testament until al-'Abbās, the judges, the faqīhs, the army commanders and the secretaries were all present.

(The text of) his last testament was as follows:

> This is what 'Abdallāh b. Hārūn, the Commander of the Faithful, asks witness to be borne to, in the presence of those who have gathered round him. He asks all of them to bear witness to himself, that he and those present testify that God is one, that He has no associate in His power and no controller sharing His authority except Himself, and that He is the creator, and everything else apart from Him is created, so that the Qur'ān must be a thing which can have a likeness, whereas there is nothing resembling God. Also, that death, the physical resurrection and the final reckoning are realities, and that the reward of him who does good will be Paradise but the punishment of him who does evil will be hell fire. Also, that Muḥammad has delivered from his Lord the prescriptions of His religion and has conveyed His wise counsels to His community, until the time when God took him to Himself—may God bless him with the finest of blessings which He has ever given to those angels of His brought near to His presence and the prophets whom He has sent as messengers. Also, that I confess freely my sinfulness, and I both hope [for forgiveness] and fear [the divine punishment],[691] except that when I mention God's forgiveness, I am filled with hope.

690. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 349–50, tr. 157–8 (the surviving part of Abī Ṭāhir's historical narrative ends here); Azdī, 414–15; 'Uyūn, 377–8; Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 291–2. In Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 94–101 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2779–83, cf. Vasiliev, op. cit., I, 329–30, a different, equally anecdotal account of al-Ma'mūn's fatal illness on the banks of the Budandūn is given, on the authority of the judge Abū Muḥammad 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Zayd al-Dimashqī.

When I die, turn my face [towards God], close my eyes, perform the lesser ablution and the rites of purification over me, and see that I am properly shrouded. Then give repeated promises to God for the Islamic faith and for the knowledge of His necessary beneficence to you concerning Muḥammad, when he made us part of his community, meriting God's mercy. Then lay me on my side in my litter and hasten along with me, and when you set me down for the worship,[692] let the one among you who is nearest to me in kinship and the eldest in years come forward to lead the worship. Let the leader utter the takbīr five times, and on the first occasion begin with the formula, "Praise be to God and eulogies on Him, and blessing upon our master and the master of all the messengers who have been sent," as the opening words. Then should come a prayer for the men and the women believers, those still alive and those now dead; and then a prayer for those who have preceded [1137] us in the faith. Then let him utter the takbīr for the fourth time, and then let him praise God, proclaim the confession of faith to Him, magnify Him and ask Him to grant peace on the fifth occasion. Then load my corpse on your shoulders and bear me along to my grave; once there, let the one of you nearest in kinship to me and the one who has the deepest feeling of affection go down into the grave. Render profuse praises to God and mentions of His name. Place me on my right side and turn me in the direction of the

691. Arjū wa-akhāfu, echoing Qur'ān, XVII, 57/55. On the concept of contrasting hope and fear (rajā' wa-khawf) as a factor in human behaviour and human religious consciousness, see Rosenthal, "Sweeter than hope", complaint and hope in medieval Islam, 79, 141 ff.

692. I.e., for the ṣalāt al-mawt; see EI[1] s.v. Ṣalāt. IV (Wensinck).

qiblah. Unwind my shroud from my head and feet, and then wall up the niche with mud bricks and sprinkle earth over me.[693] [Finally,] depart from me and leave me with my own affair. For indeed, none of you will avail me at all, nor will you be able to keep back from me anything unpleasant which may befall me.

Then all of you together are to stand there, and to say good things [about me], if you know of any, but refrain from mentioning unfavorable things if you have known about any of them, for I [alone] among you shall be held responsible for what you may say and what you may enunciate.[694] Do not allow any weeping woman to be near me, for the person who is lamented over is thereby troubled. May God have mercy on a man who takes heed of warnings and who reflects on the annihilation which God inevitably brings down on all His creation and the inescapable death which He decrees for them! So praise be to God who has made eternal existence a quality solely for Himself alone and has decreed annihilation for the whole of His creation! Next, let [such a heedful man] consider what my own state once was, with the might of the caliphate—has that been of any avail for me when God's command has come for me? No, by God! Indeed, I shall have to give a double accounting [at the last day] because of this responsibility. So would that 'Abdallāh b. Hārūn [that is, himself] had not been created as a human being, yea, would that he had not been created at all! O Abū Isḥāq, come close to me and derive a warning from what you see!

Follow your brother's policy regarding the Qur'ān, and when God invests you with the caliphate, strive in it as one earnestly desiring God's favor and as one fearing His retribution and punishment. Do not be deluded in regard to God and the respite [from death and judgment] which He grants, for death has already established itself within you. Do not neglect the affairs of the subjects; keep your 693. For these burial practices, see T.P. Hughes, A dictionary of Islam, 44–7; EI[2] s.v. Djanāza (Tritton).

694. I.e., don't say anything detrimental to me, which might send me to hell!

[1138] subjects and the common people perpetually in mind! For the maintenance of royal power comes only through them and through your continual concern for the Muslims and their welfare. So watch over them and the other Muslims, and do not let any matter which involves any advantage or benefit for the Muslims come along without giving it a priority and preference over any other of your inclinations. Take from the powerful subjects and give to the weak ones. Do not impose any intolerable burden upon them, and ensure that justice is meted out between all individuals with fairness; keep them near to you and treat them in a gentle manner.

Hurry away from me quickly on your journey and head speedily for the seat of your authority in Iraq. Look to these people in whose land you find yourself, and do not neglect them at any time. Launch against the Khurramiyyah expeditions led by a commander who is resolute, fierce and firm, and support him with finance, arms and troops, both cavalry and infantry. If they are away campaigning for a long time, concentrate your attention on them and send them reinforcements from the auxiliaries and retainers whom you have around you. In all this, act just like a person putting his whole heart into it, hoping for God's reward in return for it. Know, too, that exhortation, when it becomes prolonged, renders obligatory a demonstrable justification for it on the one who hears it and one the one giving the exhortation. Fear God in all your affairs and do not be seduced [from the path of duty]![695]

Then after a while, when his affliction grew intense and he felt the imminence of God's command (that is, death), al-Ma'mūn summoned Abū Isḥāq and he said to him:

695. Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbāside al-Ma'mūn," 44–5, has underlined the importance of this waṣiyyah or testament as an exposition of several pro-Shī'ī and Mu'tazilī attitudes, such as the need to show kindness to the 'Alids, the emphasis on the divine unity (tawḥīd), the use of the Shī'ī quintuple takbīr during his obsequies, etc.

O Abū Isḥāq, take care to observe God's covenant and contractual agreement, and the Messenger of God's protection, in order that you may maintain God's right among His servants and that you may choose obedience to Him in preference to disobedience, since I have conveyed it [the Messenger of God's protection] to you from someone else.

Abū Isḥāq replied, "By God, I certainly will." Al-Ma'mūn said:

Also, look to the person whom you have heard me putting forward [giving preferment] in my express words, and increase his prominent position [or, less probably: double the financial reward for him, al-taqdimah], that is, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Confirm him in his governorship and do not disquiet him in any way, for you have recognized what the two of you achieved in the past during my own lifetime and at my court. Endeavor to conciliate him with all your heart and single him out with your benevolence, for you have known well his bravery and his ability to be able to do without your brother [that is, his ability to act independently and his freedom from entanglements]. [In regard to] Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm [al-Muṣ'abī], associate him in the above policy also, since he is indeed worthy of it. [In regard to] your own family [the 'Abbāsids], you have well realized that there are no outstanding qualities [baqiyyah][696] among them, even though an odd one of them retain a regard for personal honor [al-ṣiyānah li-nafsihi]. [In regard to] 'Abd al-Wahhāb,[697] pay particular attention to him among the members of your family; make him their leader, and entrust all matters concerning them to him. [In regard to] Abū 'Abdallāh b. Abī Duwād,[698] make sure that he does not abandon your side, and associate him as an adviser in all [1139]

696. Cf. Qur'ān, XI, 118/116.

697. Presumably 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Ibrāhīm al-Imām b. Abī 'Abdallāh Muḥammad, nephew of al-Saffāḥ and governor of Syria in the time of al-Manṣūr, although by now he must have been extremely old.

698. The Mu'tazilī scholar, chief judge for al-Mu'taṣim and head of the miḥnah under him; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 258–60; EI[2] s.v. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād (K.V. Zetterstéen—Pellat).

your affairs, for he is indeed a repository of good advice for you. After I am gone, do not take for yourself any vizier to whom you might impute any fault [who has not got an unimpeachable reputation], for you have known with what troubles Yaḥyā b. Aktham burdened me through his treatment of the people and his infamous conduct, to the point when God made these activities of his clear to me, my own integrity remaining intact [fī ṣiḥḥah minnī], and I then proceeded to dispense with him, feeling detestation and disapproval towards him for what he had done with the money meant for God and the alms collected on His behalf. May God not reward him with any goodness from Islam! [In regard to] these, your paternal cousins who are the descendants of the Commander of the Faithful ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib [the ʿAlids], make them welcome in your court circle, overlook the transgressions of those who act wrongfully and welcome those who act honestly. Do not neglect giving them presents each year on the appropriate occasions, for the rights due to them demand recognition on several grounds of consideration. "Fear God, your Lord, with the respect due to Him, and do not die except as Muslims."[699] Fear God, and labor on his behalf. Fear God in all your affairs. I commend you, as also myself, to God. I seek pardon from God for what has gone before, and I further seek pardon from Him for what I myself have committed; indeed, He is the all-forgiving one. Of a certainty, He [1140] knows the extent of my contrition for my sins; hence I place my confidence in Him from [the effects of] the worst of these sins, and to Him I turn in repentance. There is no strength except in God; God is my sufficiency, and how excellent He is as an advocate! May God grant blessings on Muḥammad the prophet of right guidance and mercifulness![700]

699. Qur'ān, III, 97/102.
700. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 428–31.

The Time of al-Ma'mūn's Death, the Place where He Was Buried, the Person Who Prayed over Him, His Age and the Duration of His Caliphate

In regard to the time of his death, there have been varying reports. Some authorities have said that his term of life expired on Wednesday the eighteenth of Rajab, 218[701] (August 9, 833) after the afternoon worship. Others have denied this, and say that his term of life came to an end on that same day at the time of the midday worship. When he expired, his son al-'Abbās and his brother Abū Isḥāq Muḥammad b. al-Rashīd bore him to Tarsus and buried him in a house belonging to Khāqān, al-Rashīd's eunuch (khādim), and his brother Abū Isḥāq al-Mu'taṣim prayed over him. Then they entrusted the task of watching over him to a guard composed of men from the garrison of Abnā' (Khurasanians) in Tarsus and others, a hundred men all told, each man being allotted ninety dirhams.[702]

His caliphate lasted for twenty years, five months and thirteen days, excluding the two years when he was hailed as ruler in the khuṭbah of Mecca and while his brother Muḥammad al-Amīn b. al-Rashīd was being besieged in Baghdad. He was born in the middle of Rabī' I (on the 15th) 170 (September 14, 786) and given the patronymic, according to Ibn al-Kalbī,[703] of Abū al-'Abbās.[704] He was of middle stature, pale-complexioned, handsome and with a long beard which had become whitened with advancing age. It has (also) been said that

---

701. Actually a Saturday.

702. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 573, placing his death on Thursday, the seventeenth of Rajab; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, I, 396, placing his death on Wednesday, the eighth of Rajab, aged forty-nine; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 2, 101 = ed. Pellat, §§ 2694, 2783; id., Tanbīh, 351, tr. 450 (with date given wrongly here); 'Uyūn, 378, placing his death on the eighth of Rajab, aged forty-eight; Vasiliev, Byzance et les Arabes, I, 123–4.

703. The historian Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī (died in 204 [819] or two years later), an important source for Ṭabarī, or else his son 'Abbās; see Sezgin, GAS, I, 268–71; EI[2] s.v. al-Kalbī (W. Atallah).

704. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 573–4, states that he died aged forty-eight years, four months, and that his caliphate lasted twenty-two years, with twenty years five, months and twenty-five days since the death of al-Amīn; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 1–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2694, that he died at the age of forty-nine.

[1141] he was swarthy-complexioned, but with a yellowish tinge, with a bowed back, with large, dark pupils to his eyes, a long beard with the thinner parts growing white, a narrow forehead and with a black mole on his cheek.[705] He was hailed as Caliph on Wednesday, the twenty-fifth of Muḥarram, [198 [September 25, 813]].[706]

Some of the Stories about al-Ma'mūn and His Conduct[707]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. al-Haytham b. 'Adī[708] that Ibrāhīm b. 'Īsā b. Burayhah b. al-Manṣūr[709] said: When al-Ma'mūn wanted to set out for Damascus, I prepared a speech to be delivered to him which occupied me for two whole days and part of a third one. When I stood respectfully before him, I said:

> May God prolong the days of the Commander of the Faithful in the most enduring state of might and most ample state of nobility, and may he make me his ransom against any evil which may befall him! The person who goes about early and late [literally, in the evening and in the morning, that is, continuously] discovering for himself God's favor [may He be abundantly praised!] through the Commander of the Faithful's [may God strengthen him!] favorable opinion of him and affability towards him, must necessarily seek the prolongation of this favor and ask for an increase in it, with gratitude to God and to the Commander of the Faithful [may God extend his life in that state of fa-

705. 'Uyūn, 378–9; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 431–2.

706. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 538–9, with details of the astral conjunctions at this moment.

707. Various anecdotal details about al-Ma'mūn and his confidants, with emphasis on their great liberality, are given by Ya'qūbī in his Mushākalat al-nās li-zamānihim, ed. W. Millward, 27–31, tr. id., "The adaptation of men to their time," JAOS, LXXXIV (1964), 340–2.

708. Son of the Kūfan historian, who died in or after 206 (821) and was a prime source for historians like Ṭabarī, Ya'qūbī and Mas'ūdī; see Sezgin, GAS, I, 272; EI[2] s.v. al-Haytham b. 'Adī (Pellat).

709. A second cousin of al-Ma'mūn's.

vor!] [Such a person] has furthermore earnestly wanted the Commander of the Faithful to know that I do not desire for myself any letting-up or ease of life which might distract me from my service to the Commander of the Faithful, since he takes upon himself the burden of rough travelling conditions and painful journeyings. The most suitable of all persons to share these hardships with him and to devote his life to him is myself, for God has given me knowledge of his state of mind, and has given me a sense of obedience to him and a knowledge of the recognition of his rights which God necessarily requires. Hence, if the Commander of the Faithful [may God make him noble!] sees fit to honor me by taking me into his service as a permanent companion and letting me be with him, let him so ordain!

Al-Ma'mūn answered me, speaking immediately and without pausing to reflect:

The Commander of the Faithful has not yet come to any decision at all in regard to that, but if he chooses anyone from the members of your family as a travelling companion, he will select you in the first place and you will be the person put forward to be at his side for that, above all if you willingly let yourself be set down in the same place as the Commander of the Faithful chooses to place you in relationship to him [that is, if you show yourself as adaptable]. And if he does not fulfill this intention, this will not imply any dissatisfaction with your position and capabilities, but because he has need of you [elsewhere]. [1142]

Ibrāhīm b. 'Īsā commented, "By God, the Caliph's words delivered on the spur of the moment were more incisive than my carefully-prepared speech."[710]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ al-Sarakhsī, who related: A man thrust himself forward on several occasions before al-Ma'mūn when the latter was in Syria and said to the Caliph, "O Commander of the Faithful, look after the interests of the Arabs of Syria just as you look after the interests of the Persians from the people of Khurasan." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "O brother from the people of Syria, you have reproached me in strong terms! By God, I have never made Qays dismount from the backs of their horses [that is, dismissed them from service] except at times when I saw that there was not a single dirham left in the public treasury [in times of great financial stringency]. As for Yaman, I have never liked them and they have never liked me. As for Quḍā'ah, their chiefs live in the messianic expectation of the Sufyānī and his appearance, so that they might join his party.[711] As for Rabī'ah, they have been angry with God ever since He sent His prophet from Muḍar,[712] and there have never been two of them going out [in rebellion] without one of them being a Khārijite [Shārī]. Now get out, may God wreak [evil] on you!"[713]

710. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 261–2, tr. 118–19.

It is mentioned from Sa'īd b. Ziyād that when he went into al-Ma'mūn's presence at Damascus, the Caliph said to him, "Show me the document which the Messenger of God wrote out for your family." He related: So I showed it to him. He related: Al-Ma'mūn said, "I should very much like to know what this covering is over this seal." He related: Abū Isḥāq said to him, "Untie this knot so that you may know what it is." He related: But al-Ma'mūn then said, "I do not doubt that the [1143] Prophet tied this knot himself, and I am not the person who is going to unloose a knot tied by the Messenger of God." Then he said to [his nephew] al-Wāthiq, "Take it and lay it on your eye; perhaps God will heal you." He related: Al-Ma'mūn began to lay it on his eye and to weep.[714]

It is mentioned from al-'Ayshī, the confidant of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, that he said: I was with al-Ma'mūn at Damascus, at a time when the amount of money which he had with him had 711. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 830, year 195 (810/11), recording the revolt in Syria in Dhū al-Ḥijjah 195 (August–September 811) of the Sufyānid 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, expelling al-Amīn's governor Sulaymān b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr from Damascus; Lammens, "Le 'Sofiānī', héros national des Arabes syriens," in Etudes sur le siècle des Omayyades, 391–408.

712. Quraysh and Kinānah were considered as part of the Muḍar branch of the North Arabs.

713. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 266–7, tr. 121; Azdī, 408–9; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 342–3.

714. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 271, tr. 123; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 433.

become very low, until he found himself in a tight spot. He complained about this to Abū Isḥāq al-Mu'taṣim, and the latter said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, you have as good as got money; it will have reached you after Friday." He related: There was brought to him the sum of thirty million (dirhams) from the land-tax for whose collection, on his behalf, Abū Isḥāq al-Mu'taṣim was responsible. He related: When that sum of money reached him, al-Ma'mūn said to Yaḥyā b. Aktham, "Let us go along and look at this wealth." He related: So the two of them set off until they came to an open space and halted to look at it. It had been arranged in the most attractive way possible: the camels carrying the money were adorned with figured silk saddle cloths and caparisons dyed in rich colors, and with woollen streamers draped round their necks. The money bags were made from Chinese silk, red, green and yellow, and their necks were sticking out (from under the cover). He related: Al-Ma'mūn looked at what was a fine sight and accounted it a splendid amount of wealth. It made a great impression on him, and the people (with him) strained their gaze at it, looking at it and marvelling at it. Then al-Ma'mūn said to Yaḥyā, "O Abū Muḥammad, are these companions of ours, whom you have seen just a moment ago [wondering at the sight], to go back to their homes disappointed, while we are going back with all this wealth which has come into our possession but to their exclusion? In such circumstances, we would indeed be contemptible persons." He thereupon summoned Muḥammad b. Yazdād[715] and told him, "Set down in the register a million [dirhams] for the family of so-and-so, and the same for the family of so-and-so and for the family of so-and-so." He related: By God, he kept on in this fashion until he [1144] had allocated twenty-four million dirhams, while his very foot was in the stirrup. Then he said, "Hand over the remainder to al-Mu'allā[716] for him to pay our troops." Al-'Ayshī related: I went along until I stood before his eyes, and I did not take away

715. The Khurasanian official and secretary who was, in effect, the chief executive for al-Ma'mūn at the time of his death; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 214, 232–4.

716. The secretary al-Mu'allā b. Ayyūb.

my gaze from his eyes. He did not notice me till he saw me thus. Then he said, "O Abū Muḥammad, set down in the register for this man fifty thousand dirhams out of the six millions, and then I will not be deprived of my sight!" He related: Before two nights had elapsed, I had received the money.[717]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. Ayyūb b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān[718] that there lived in Baṣrah a man from the Banū Tamīm who was a poet and wit, but who used unseemly language[719] and did not enjoy any fame. I was at that time the governor of Baṣrah, in close contact with him, and I found him pleasant company. I wanted to deceive him and to bring him down a peg or two.[720] So I said to him, "You are a poet and wit, and al-Ma'mūn is more generous than an abundantly-flowing rain cloud and a rain-bearing wind; what then keeps you away from him?" He replied, "I do not possess means to transport me[721] [thither]." I said, "I will give you a sprightly, nobly-bred horse and an ample sum for living expenses, and you can go to him. You have already praised al-Ma'mūn, and if you obtain favor through your encounter with him, you will have attained your desire." He replied, "By God, O Amīr, I think you are not far from the truth! So get ready for me what you have promised." He related: I called for a noble, high-spirited horse to be brought for him and told him, "This is yours to do as you like with it, so ride off on it." He replied, "This is just one of the two pieces of bounty [which you promised to me]; what about the other?" So I then called for three hundred dirhams to be brought for him and told him that these were his living expenses. But he complained, "O Amīr, you have been stingy over these!" I protested, "No, these are adequate, even though I [1145] have stopped short at being extravagant." He replied, "When

717. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 271–3, tr. 123; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 434.

718. Mentioned in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 129–30.

719. Kāna shā'iran . . . khabīthan, presumably in the sense of "foul-mouthed;" cf. ibid., XX, 183, where 'Umārah b. 'Aqīl is characterised similarly as khabīth al-lisān.

720. Astanzilahu. This seems to give the best sense. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, p. DX, suggests, less fittingly, "he tried to persuade him," for istanzalahu, presumably with the meaning that he could expect no further bounty from the governor (!).

721. Mā yuqillunī, following ibid., p. CDXXXI do you see extravagance among the great men of the [Banū] Sa'd?[722] You only see that among the lesser of them." He thereupon took the horse and the money, and then composed a poem in rajaz metre which was not very long and recited it to me, but omitted any mention of me or praise for me and showed himself as discontented. So I told him, "You haven't composed anything [worthwhile]!" He enquired, "How is that?" I said, "You are going to the Caliph, but you don't have a word of praise for your Amīr!" He replied, "O Amīr, you wanted to deceive me, but you have found me to be a deceiver [in showing myself discontented and not praising and thanking you adequately]! The proverbial saying 'He who copulates with a wild ass copulates with one who is a really experienced copulator'[723] [that is, he meets more than he has bargained for] was coined for an occasion like this. For by God, it wasn't out of honor for me that you gave me your noble horse as a mount, nor were you generous to me with your money, [a sum] which no one would ever desire unless God had made his rank in society the lowest [totally down-and-out and grateful for anything]. Nevertheless, I will certainly mention you in my poetry and praise you before the Caliph; be certain of this!" I said, "Have you spoken truly?" He replied, "Since you have revealed what was in your mind, I have [now] mentioned your name and praised you." I said, "Recite to me what you have composed." He then recited it, and I congratulated him on it. Thereupon he bade me farewell and set off.

He came to Syria, at a time when al-Ma'mūn was at Salaghūs. Muḥammad b. Ayyūb related: The poet [subsequently] told me the story, saying: I was joining up with the Qurrah campaign, riding that noble horse of mine and wearing my ordinary garments [muqaṭṭa'ātī],[724] and I was heading for the army camp, when I suddenly found myself with an elderly man on a high-spirited mule which was too restive to stand still and which could not be overtaken in its swift flight. He related: While I was reciting to myself my rajaz poem, he met me brow-to-brow and face-to-face. He greeted me with the words, "Peace be upon you!" in a loud voice and with an unforced mode of expression. I returned the greeting, "Upon you be peace, and the mercy and blessings of God!" He said, "Halt [1146] there, if you please," so I halted. There diffused from him a sweet perfume of amber and pungent-odored musk. He said, "What is your first [genealogical name]?" I replied, "I am a man of Muḍar." He said, "We come from Muḍar too." Then he said, "And after that, what?" I replied, "I am a man of the Banū Tamīm." He said, "And after Tamīm, what?" I replied, "From the Banū Sa'd." He replied, "Tell me more! What has impelled you to come to this land?" He related: I said, "I have headed for this kingdom, of whose like I have never heard for abundance of sweet odors, wideness of living space, richness in resources of power and extensiveness of hills." He replied, "What have you brought with you to this land?" I said, "Some fine poetry which is pleasant on the lips, which the rhapsodists can repeat and which is sweet in the ears of its hearers." He said, "Recite some of it to me, then." Thereupon I grew angry with him and said, "O ignoble fellow, limited in your mind [yā rakīk]! I have told you that I am making my way towards the Caliph with a poem which I have composed and a eulogy which I have put together with skill, and you ask me to recite it to you?" He related: He gave the appearance, by God, of not having heard my words, and remained with lowered eyes at them, making no answer. Then he said, "What do you hope to gain by means of it?" I replied, "If the state of affairs is as it has been reported to me, then one thousand dīnārs." He said, "I will give you one thousand dīnārs if I consider the poetry to be good and the speech sweet, and I will spare you the trouble and the continued repetition [of the verses] and the fact that, when you arrive at the Caliph's presence, [you will find there] ten thousand spearmen and archers between you and him!" I interjected, "Do I have your word that you will do that?" He retorted, "Yes, you do have my word." Then I said, "Do you have the money with you at this precise moment?" He replied, "This is my [1147] mule, which is worth more than one thousand dīnārs; I will dismount from its back and hand it over to you." He related: I grew angry again, and there came over me the hasty temper of the Banū Sa'd and their quickspiritedness; I told him that this mule was not equal in value to my noble horse. He replied, "Leave the mule, then, and I undertake before God as witness against me on your behalf to give you the one thousand dīnārs immediately."

722. Keller, Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, tr. 124, erroneously sees here sa'd as a common noun; but the Tamīmī poet's affiliation to the component Banū Sa'd is explicitly mentioned below, 238.

723. Maydānī, Amthāl al-'Arab, tr., II, 674–5, no. 293.

724. Literally, "Garments sewn together from several pieces," perhaps here with the denotation of non-military dress. Cf. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, p. CDXXIX, "garments which are sewn together like the qamīṣ, jubbah, sarāwīl;" Dozy, II, 375a, "worn, used clothes."

He related: So I then recited to him:

O Ma'mūn, bestower of exalted favors and occupier of the loftiest rank,

Commander of the most numerous military forces, would you like to hear an elegant rajaz poem?

One more elegantly-constructed than the legal system of Abū Ḥanīfah?
Nay, by Him whose deputy [khalīfah] you are,

No weak female person suffers oppression in our land, and the burdens laid on us by our amīr are light.

He does not exact for himself anything above the official rate of taxation, so that the wolf and the ewe can remain under one roof,

And the thief and the merchant can lie down together under one coverlet.

He related: By God, I had hardly finished reciting it when suddenly a host of around ten thousand cavalrymen filled the horizon, crying, "Peace and the mercy and blessings of God be upon you, O Commander of the Faithful!" He related: Terror gripped me, and he saw me in that state and said, "No harm will come to you, my brother!" I replied, "O Commander of [1148] the Faithful, may God make me your ransom, do you know the various modes of speech of the Arabs?" He replied, "Yes, by God's life." I said, "And those of them who pronounce the kāf in place of qāf?" He replied, "These are the Ḥimyar." I said, "May God curse them and anyone who uses this mode of speech after today!"[725] Al-Ma'mūn laughed at this, and realized what I wanted; he turned to the servant at his side and said, "Give him all that you have with you here." The servant pulled out for me a bag containing three thousand dīnārs. Al-Ma'mūn said, "Take it!" Then he said, "Peace be with you," and went on his way; and that was the last contact I ever had with him.[726]

Abū Sa'īd al-Makhzūmī[727] recited:

Have you seen that the stars were of any use to al-Ma'mūn or to his solidly-based royal power?

[On the contrary,] they left him at the two open spaces of Tarsus, just as they left his father at Ṭūs.[728]

'Alī b. 'Ubaydah al-Rayḥānī[729] recited:

How inadequate are tears for al-Ma'mūn!
I am not satisfied with anything but blood dripping from my eyelids.

Abū Mūsā Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl b. Mūsā al-Hādī[730]
[1149] has mentioned that 'Alī b. Ṣāliḥ[731] related to him as follows: One day, al-Ma'mūn said to me, "Obtain for me a man from

725. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 436, adds a gloss to this: that he meant to say yā raqīq, "O tender, elegant one!" but said yā rakīk, "O feeble, vile one!" (i.e., the poet is exonerating himself from having unwittingly stigmatised al-Ma'mūn previously as "ignoble, limited in mind" [above, 238] and implying that he really meant to describe him in favorable terms as "tender, elegant").

726. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 273–8, tr. 123–5; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 434–6.

727. Abū Sa'd (thus in Sezgin, GAS, II, 575) 'Īsā b. Khālid al-Makhzūmī was a poet of al-Ma'mūn's court circle.

728. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 101–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2784. Al-Rashīd had died near Ṭūs in Khurasan.

729. The author of works on rhetoric and belles-lettres, who died in 219 (834); see Sezgin, GAS, II, 58, 83.

730. I.e., a descendant of the fourth 'Abbāsid caliph.

731. A poet of al-Ma'mūn's time; see I. Guidi, Tables alphabétiques du Kitâb al-Aġânî, II, 497.

the people of Syria who has the ways of polite society [adab] and who can act as my intimate companion and provide conversation for me." So I made enquiries about such a person and found him. I then summoned him and told him, "I am going to bring you into the Commander of the Faithful's presence. You are not to ask him for anything until he has himself taken the initiative in speaking; for indeed, I am very well acquainted with your importunings, O people of Syria!" He replied, "I shall not overstep the bounds which you have commanded me to observe." Then I went in to al-Ma'mūn's presence and informed him, "I have found the required person, O Commander of the Faithful!" He said, "Bring him in!" At that the man entered and gave a greeting. Then al-Ma'mūn invited him to draw near; he was at that moment involved in a drinking session. Then he said to the man, "I would like you to be one of my intimates and to converse with me." The Syrian said, "O Commander of the Faithful, when a boon-companion's clothes are inferior to those of his associate, this gives him a feeling of inferiority." He related: So al-Ma'mūn ordered him to be given a robe of honor. He related: At that, a feeling came over me such as God only knows! He related: When the Syrian had put on the robe of honor and gone back to his place in the circle, he said, "O Commander of the Faithful, since my mind is preoccupied with my family, you will not derive much benefit from conversation with me." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Fifty thousand [dirhams] are to be conveyed to his house!" Then the Syrian said, "O Commander of the Faithful, and a third thing . . . ". Al-Ma'mūn replied, "And what is that?" The Syrian said, "You have introduced something which interposes between a man and his understanding [to rob him of his peace of mind.] If I should have committed any minor fault, please forgive it." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "That also [will be done]." 'Alī said: It was as if this third thing dispelled from my mind what I had been apprehensive about [and I breathed more easily now that nothing further was to be asked for by the Syrian].[732]

Abū Ḥashīshah Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Umayyah b. 'Amr[733] has

732. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 279–80, tr. 126–7.

733. A secretary, poet and musician of the third (ninth) century, who had mentioned: We were at Damascus, before the presence of the Commander of the Faithful, and 'Allawayh[734] sang, [1150] May I renounce the Islamic faith [or alternatively: I will renounce . . .], if that which my traducers report to you is as they allege;

But when they have seen how swift you are to [reward] me, they have urged each other to slanderous talk and have devised trickery.

Al-Ma'mūn said, "O 'Allawayh, who is this poetry by?" He said, "By the judge." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Which judge, shame on you?" 'Allawayh said, "The judge of Damascus." Al-Ma'mūn said, "O Abū Isḥāq [al-Mu'taṣim], dismiss him from office!" Abū Isḥāq replied, "I will do this immediately." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Let him be brought in straight away." He related: An old man, short of stature, his hair and beard dyed with henna, was brought in. Al-Ma'mūn said to him, "Who are you?" He replied, "So-and-so, son of so-and-so, with so-and-so nisbah." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Are you a poet?" He replied, "I used to be a poet." Al-Ma'mūn said, "O 'Allawayh, recite the verses to him." So 'Allawayh recited them. Al-Ma'mūn said, "Are these verses by you?" He replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful, but may the poet's wives all be divorced, and may he give all his possessions away for pious purposes, if he has composed any poetry during the last thirty years except on the theme of asceticism or in order gently to reproach a friend." Al-Ma'mūn said, "O Abū Isḥāq, dismiss him from his job; I am not going to give power over the necks of the Muslims to a man who begins, in his jesting, to speak about throwing off the Islamic faith." Then he continued, "Give him something to drink," And they brought the poet-judge a beaker of wine. He took it, all the time trembling with fear, but then protested, the nisbah of al-Ṭunbūrī; see H.G. Farmer, A history of Arabian music, 158; Sezgin, GAS, II, 608.

---

734. A musician who flourished at the caliphal courts from al-Rashīd's time onwards, and who was originally a mawlā of the Umayyads (see below, 243–4); see Farmer, 123; EI[2] Suppl. s.v. (E. Neubauer).

"O Commander of the Faithful, I have never tasted it before." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Would you perhaps prefer another kind [of wine]?" The judge said, "I have never touched any of it before." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Is it forbidden, then?" He replied, "Certainly, O Commander of the Faithful!" Al-Ma'mūn said, "Good for you! Through this answer you have escaped [punishment for an infringement of the sharī'ah]. Be off with you!"[735] Then al-Ma'mūn said, "O 'Allawayh, do not say the words, 'May I renounce the Islamic faith . . . ', but say instead:

May I be deprived of the object of my desires in you [that is, of your love; or alternatively: I will be deprived . . .], if that which my traducers report to you is as they allege.[736]

He related: We were with al-Ma'mūn at Damascus. He rode [1151] off, with the intention of going to Mount Hermon,[737] and passed by a large cistern, one of those constructed by the Umayyads. On its banks stood four cypresses and the water would flow up to them and then flow back. Al-Ma'mūn found the spot pleasing, and called for bazmāward[738] and a raṭl (of wine). He mentioned the Umayyads, and then spoke of them in a deprecatory fashion and belittled them. Then 'Allawayh came forward with his lute ('ūd) and began to sing:

These are my people; after being once powerful and rich, they have all passed to destruction. Should I not therefore let my eyes weep, and feel sadness?

At this, al-Ma'mūn lashed out at the food with his foot and sprang up, saying to 'Allawayh, "O son of a whore, was there no other suitable time than this for you to mention your ancient masters [mawālīka]?" 'Allawayh replied, "Your client

735. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, X, 124, gives three verses as sung by 'Allawayh.
736. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 281–3, tr. 127–8; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, X, 123–4; Azdī, 409–10.
737. The Arabic Jabal al-Thalj; see Le Strange, Palestine, 79–80, 418–19.
738. Cf. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, p. CXXXIII, defining it as a Persian term (bazmāward, "what is brought away from a feast") denoting a kind of confection of pastry, meat, etc., pace Keller's translation, 128, "eine Flasche Rosenwasser."

[mawlākum] Ziryāb[739] is at this moment with my masters [mawāliyya],[740] riding with an escort of a hundred slave boys, while I am dying of hunger here with you." Al-Ma'mūn was angry with him for twenty days, but then took him back into favor. The narrator says: Ziryāb was originally the client of al-Mahdī who went first to Syria and then to the Western lands (al-Maghrib) and joined the Umayyads there.[741] Abū 'Alī al-Salīṭī has mentioned from 'Umārah b. 'Aqīl,[742] who said: I once recited to al-Ma'mūn an ode containing a eulogy of him and comprising a hundred verses. I began with the first hemistich, but he quickly forestalled me (in adding the remaining hemistich of each verse) right up to the rhyme letter, exactly as I myself had completed the rhyme. I accordingly commented, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, no one has ever heard this ode from me before." He replied, "It must nevertheless be thus." Then he came up to me and said, "Have you not heard that 'Umar b. Abī Rabī'ah[743] recited to 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās his ode in which he said:

In the morning, the encampment of our neighbours will be far away

[1152] and Ibn al-'Abbās continued (and completed the verse),
. . . and the day after that it will be even further away until 'Umar had recited to Ibn al-'Abbās the whole ode, with the latter completing each second hemistich." Then al-Ma'mūn remarked, "I am the successor [literally: the son] of that one [Ibn al-'Abbās]."[744]

739. The famed musician who, during al-Ma'mūn's reign, entered the service of the Umayyad amīrs of Spain; see Farmer, 128–30; EI[1] Suppl. s.v. (id).

740. I.e., the Spanish Umayyads.

741. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 283–4, tr. 128; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, X, 131–2.

742. A tribal poet of northeastern Arabia, the great-grandson of Jarīr, who also frequented the courts of al-Ma'mūn and his successors; see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XX, 183–8; Sezgin, GAS, II, 559–60.

743. The famed lyric poet of Mecca and Madīnah in the Umayyad period; see ibid., II, 415–17; EI[1] s.v. 'Omar b. Abī Rabī'a (I. Kratschkowsky).

744. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 289–90, tr. 131; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 436. Al-Ma'mūn was of course the direct physical descendant of Ibn al-'Abbās as well as being, as he claimed, the inheritor of this feel for poetry.

It is mentioned from Abū Marwān Kāriz[745] b. Hārūn that Al-Ma'mūn once recited:

I sent to you, out of passion, so that you had the good fortune to gain a glance, and then you neglected me, until I acquired a bad opinion of you.

Then you were in intimate contact with the one whom I love, while I was far away;
so would that I knew what would relieve me of wanting you near!

I see a clear trace of him in your eyes;
your eyes have indeed taken beauty from his eye!

Abū Marwān related: In expressing this meaning in his verses, al-Ma'mūn relied upon (that is, was alluding to) the poem of al-'Abbās b. Aḥnaf,[746] who produced the following:

If my eye is afflicted because of her, the eye of my messenger has become happy, and I have experienced good fortune from his news.

Whenever the messenger from her comes to me,
I deliberately direct my gaze again and again at his glance.

Her beauties are revealed in his face;
they have left on it the most beautiful of impressions.

O messenger, take freely my eye's orb, look with it and give judgement with my glance![747]

Abū al-'Atāhiyah related: Al-Ma'mūn sent for me one day. I [1153] went along to him, and found him with bowed head and sunk

745. Following the correct reading of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 290, pace the text's Kāzir.

746. A court poet of al-Rashīd; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 513–14; EI[2] s.v. (Blachère).

747. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 290–1, tr. 131–2; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 436–7.

in thought. I accordingly refrained from approaching him while he was in that state. Then he raised his head, looked at me and beckoned me with his hand to come near; so I drew near. He remained downcast for a considerable while, and then raised his head and said, "O Abū Isḥāq, the natural state of the soul is a feeling of tedium and a love of something strange and new; it comes to find solitude congenial just as it does sociability." I replied, "Assuredly, O Commander of the Faithful, and I have composed a verse on this theme." He said, "What is that?" I then recited:

When the soul is disquieted, the only remedy for it is changing from one state of mind to another.[748]

It is mentioned from the poet Abū Nizār al-Ḍarīr,[749] that he said: 'Alī b. Jabalah[750] told me: I once said to Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamid, "O Abū Ghānim, I have praised the Commander of the Faithful with a eulogy so fine that no one on the whole earth could produce its like; so mention my name to the Commander of the Faithful." Ḥumayd said, "Recite it to me!" So I recited it to him. Ḥumayd exclaimed, "I bear witness that you are speaking the truth!" So he took the panegyric and presented it to al-Ma'mūn. Al-Ma'mūn said, "O Abū Ghānim, the answer to all this is clear. If he wishes, we will pardon him and consider this as a reward for his panegyric. But if he wishes otherwise, we will bring together for comparison his poetry on you and on Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim b. 'Īsā [al-'Iǰlī].[751] If what he has written on you and on Abū Dulaf is finer than his eulogy on us, we will flog him on his back and prolong his imprisonment. But if what he has written is finer, I will reward him with a thousand dirhams for every verse of his panegyric, and if he 748. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 293, tr. 133; Mas'ūdī, Murūǰ, VII, 31–2 = ed. Pellat, § 2720.

749. This blind poet is mentioned in conjunction with 'Alī b. Jabalah in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 105.

750. A poet of the time of al-Rashīd and al-Ma'mūn, known as al-'Akawwak; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 572–3; EI[2] s.v. al-'Akawwak (Blachère).

751. Famed contemporary military leader, poet and patron of the arts; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 632–3; EI[2] s.v. al-Ḳāsim b. 'Īsā (J.E. Bencheikh).

wishes, we will let him go free."[752] I replied, "O my master, who are Abū Dulaf and myself, that he should eulogize us in finer words than those in your praise?" Al-Ma'mūn said, "These words are no answer at all to the question; lay my propositions before the man." 'Alī b. Jabalah related: Ḥumayd said to me, "What do you think about it?" I replied, "In my estimation, being pardoned is better." This was reported to al-Ma'mūn, and he commented, "He knows best [what he is doing!]!" Ḥumayd related: I said to 'Alī b. Jabalah, "What words was the Caliph thinking of in your eulogies of Abū Dulaf and of myself?" He replied, "About my words on Abū Dulaf, [1154]

The present world is nothing but Abū Dulaf,
[in the time which is] between his coming into the world naked and his being at the point of death.

So when Abū Dulaf turns his back [on life], the world turns its back [on life] also, following in his track.

and about my words on you,

If it were not for Ḥumayd, no outstanding merit or noble lineage could be enumerated.

O unique one of the Arabs, through whose greatness the Arabs have become great!"

'Alī b. Jabalah related: Ḥumayd remained with bowed head for a while, and then said, "O Abū al-Ḥasan, the Commander of the Faithful has already allotted a sum of money for you, and has ordered me [to give you] ten thousand dirhams, a beast for bearing these presents, a robe of honor and a slave." Abū Dulaf heard about this, and doubled the gift to me. Both of them did this in secret, and no one has ever known about it, O Abū Nizār, until I have told you about this.

752. Wa-in shā'a, aqalnāhu. This translation gives good parallelism with the phrase in shā'a, 'afawnā 'anhu, "if he wishes, he will pardon him," a few lines further up. Keller's translation of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir's parallel text, 133, "Will er dies, so lasse er uns wissen," seems to take aqāla here as form IV of root q-w-l and not of q-y-l and seems less plausible.

Abū Nizār related: I imagined that al-Ma'mūn viewed 'Alī b. Jabalah with disfavor[753] because of this verse on Abū Dulaf:

[1155] The water of liberality flowed down from Adam's loins,[754] and then the Merciful One fixed it in the loins of [Abū Dulaf al-] Qāsim.[755]

It is mentioned from Sulaymān b. Razīn al-Khuzā'ī,[756] the nephew of Di'bil,[757] as follows. He said: Di'bil once satirized al-Ma'mūn, saying:

Al-Ma'mūn is imposing on me the office of diviner;
did he not see only yesterday the head of Muḥammad [al-Amīn, his brother]?

He looks down on the skulls of the caliphs[758] just as the mountains look down on the low-lying hills,

And he lurks in the refuge-places of every inaccessible spot, until he brings low a lofty mountain, which has never before been ascended.

The one who seeks revenge is kept awake at nights and is sleepless; so keep your spittle away from the spittle of the black one [the venomous viper]![759]

---

753. See for this sense of ta'aqqada, Ṭabarī, Glossarium, p. CCCLXX
754. Cf. Qur'ān, LXXXVI, 6–7.
755. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 294–6, tr. 133–4.
756. Cf. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 36.
757. The Shī'ī poet and satirist, hence generally hostile to the 'Abbāsids and Ṭāhirids; see Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic culture," 52–4; Sezgin, GAS, II, 529–32; EI[2] s.v. (L. Zolondek).
758. The Dīwān of Di'bil, 145, has the inferior reading khalā'iq, "creatures," for the khalā'if of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir and Ṭabarī.
759. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 296, tr. 134; Di'bil, Dīwān, 144–5 (fragment of seven verses); Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 55 (the first verse only).

Someone said to al-Ma'mūn, "Di'bil has satirized you." Al-Ma'mūn replied, "[No,] he is satirizing Abū 'Abbād [Thābit b. Yaḥyā],[760] and not me," alluding to Abū 'Abbād's passionate temper. Whenever Abū 'Abbād went into al-Ma'mūn's presence, the latter would frequently laugh and say to him, "What did Di'bil really mean regarding you when he was saying:

It is as if he had escaped from the Dayr Hizqil,[761] [1156] a deranged and violent one, who still drags along the chains of his fetters."[762]

Al-Ma'mūn used to say to Ibrāhīm b. Shaklah (Ibrāhim b. al-Mahdī)[763] when the latter came into his presence, "Di'bil has caused you pain when he says,

If Ibrāhīm is able to bear the burden of it [the caliphate], then it will certainly be suitable for al-Mukhāriq after him,

And it will certainly be suitable after that one for Zulzul, and likewise after Zulzul for al-Māriqī.[764]

How can it be? Nay, it cannot be and it never has been possible for an evildoer [fāsiq] to take over from [another, previous] evildoer."[765] Muḥammad b. Haytham al-Ṭā'ī has mentioned that al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad al-Ṭayfūrī related to him saying: (Abū Mu-760. Al-Ma'mūn's secretary; see ibid., XVIII, 39; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 214, 231–2.

761. The principal madhouse in Baghdad; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 540–1; A. Mez, Abulḳâsim, ein bagdader Sittenbild, p. XLVIII and the references there.

762. Di'bil, Dīwān, 148; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 30.

763. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī is frequently referred to pejoratively in the sources as the son of his black slave mother Shaklah, from whom he acquired his swarthy visage; see Ibn Khallikān Wafayāt al-a'yān, I, 39, tr. de Slane, I, 17.

764. The text here and Ibn Khallikān have al-Māriq, but Ibn Abī Ṭāhir and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 20–1, XIII, 31, have the apparently more correct al-Māriqī. For the singers and musicians mentioned here, see Farmer, 118–19, 121.

765. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 296–7, tr. 134, with the first three of the latter verses also at 194, tr. 88, with a variant third verse; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 58, with verses one and three; Ibn Khallikān, I, 40, tr. 18, with all four of these verses.

ḥammad] al-Yazīdī[766] complained to al-Ma'mūn about a financial loss which he had suffered and about some debt which he was now required to settle. Al-Ma'mūn said, "We do not have by us at this moment a sum which, if we handed it over to you, would be sufficient for your needs." Al-Yazīdī replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I am in straitened circumstances just now, and my creditors are pressing me hard." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Suggest a way out for yourself, from which you might derive advantage." He replied, "Among your boon-companions is one from whom, if I move him to respond, I will get what I desire; so give me free rein to devise a stratagem with them." Al-Ma'mūn said, "Say what you have in mind." He replied, "When both they and I are present [in the Caliph's palace], order your servant so-and-so to bring you my petition, and when [1157] you have read it, send back to me the message 'Your entry at this moment [into the Caliph's circle of boon-companions] is not possible; but choose for yourself [as a companion] whomsoever you like.'" He related: When Abū Muḥammad [al-Yazīdī] knew that al-Ma'mūn was holding a convivial session, with his boon-companions gathered round him, and when he was certain that they were befuddled from their wine drinking, he came to the door and handed over to that servant a petition which he had written out. The servant conveyed it to the Caliph on his behalf, and the Caliph read it out, and behold, it contained the words,

O best of my brothers and companions, this intruder at the feast is at the door!

He has been told that the members of the circle are all in a state of enjoyment, in which every comer yearns to share.

So make me one of your number, or else let one of my equals come out to me!

766. Presumably Yaḥyā b. al-Mubārak, a poet from this well-known family; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 610; M. Fleischhammer, in ZDMG, CXII (1962), 299–308.

He related: Al-Ma'mūn read these words out to those assembled round him, and they said, "It is not fitting that this parasite should come in under the present circumstances." So al-Ma'mūn sent back to him, "Your entry at this moment is not possible; but choose for yourself whomsoever you would like to make your companion." He said, "I don't consider that there is anyone whom I would like to choose except 'Abdallah b. Ṭāhir." Al-Ma'mūn said to 'Abdallāh b. Tāhir, "His choice has fallen on you, so off you go to him!" 'Abdallāh protested, "O Commander of the Faithful, must I be the parasite's companion?" Al-Ma'mūn replied, "Abū Muḥammad cannot be refused both of his requests. If you wish to go out [and join him, well and good]; but if not, then purchase your freedom [from this commitment]." He related: 'Abdallāh said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I will pay him ten thousand dirhams." [1158]
Al-Ma'mūn replied, "I don't think that that sum from you will satisfy his claim on you, nor compensate for companionship with you." He related: 'Abdallāh kept on increasing the sum offered by ten thousand dirhams at a time, with al-Ma'mūn telling him each time, "I am not satisfied with that for him." Finally, he reached the figure of a hundred thousand (dirhams). He related: Al-Ma'mūn then told him, "Hand it over to him immediately!" He related: He thereupon wrote out for him an order to his financial intendant for the money, and sent a messenger along with him. Al-Ma'mūn wrote a message to al-Yazīdī, "In your present circumstances, getting this sum of money is better to you than enjoying the companionship of him in his kind of position, and has a more useful end-product!"[767]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, the master of the caliphal stables and conveyances (ṣāḥib al-marākib), that he said: My father related to me from Ṣāliḥ b. al-Rashīd, who said: I once went into al-Ma'mūn's presence, having with me two verses by al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk.[768] I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I should like you to hear from me two verses." He said, "Recite them." He related: Ṣāliḥ then recited to him:

767. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 303–5, tr. 137–8; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 467–8.
768. Court poet of various 'Abbasid caliphs of the time, who was called al-Khalī', "The Debauched One"; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 518–19; EI[2] s.v. (Pellat).

We praise God, O Commander of the Faithful, out of thankfulness, since He has bestowed on us your help.

You are truly the representative [khalīfah] of the Merciful One, and have united in yourself generosity and religion.

Al-Ma'mūn found them to be good, and asked, "O Ṣāliḥ, who is the author of these two verses?" I replied, "Your servant, O Commander of the Faithful, al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk." He said, "He has done well." I replied, "But he has written even better poetry than this, O Commander of the Faithful!" He said, "Such as?" So I recited to him:

Can the one whose goodness is unique, and whose [noble] characteristics are unique, be miserly [1159] towards me, when I have devoted to him exclusively a unique love?

God has seen that 'Abdallāh [al-Ma'mūn] is the best of His servants, hence has given him kingly power—and God is the most knowing one about His servant.[769]

It is mentioned from 'Umārah b. 'Aqīl that he related: 'Abdallāh b. Abī al-Simṭ[770] said to me, "Did you know that al-Ma'mūn has little taste for poetry?" He related: I replied, "But who is there, nevertheless, who is more knowledgeable about poetry than him? By God, you shall see us recite the first part of a verse to him, and he will complete its latter part before we ourselves can." He said, "I once recited a verse to him, which I had composed very well, but I could not detect any re-

769. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 312, tr. 141; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VI, 72 (where, however, it is stated that these verses did not counterbalance, in al-Ma'mūn's eyes, the poet's previous eulogies of his brother al-Amīn and satires on himself).

770. Apparently a member of the famous Abū Ḥafṣah poetic family; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 583.

action to it on his part." He related: I said, "What was it you recited to him?" He said, "I recited to him,

The Imām of right guidance, al-Ma'mūn, has become fully occupied with religion, whereas the people devote themselves to the affairs of the present world."

He related: I said to him, "By God, what you have composed is worthless! Have you added anything [to his status] in making him [like] an old woman in her prayer niche, with her rosary in her hand? Who can be responsible for the affairs of the world, when he has been invested [by God] with its direction, if he is unconcerned about it? Why didn't you say of him like your forebear [literally: your paternal uncle] Jarīr[771] said of 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd,[772]

He does not let his share in this present world go to waste, yet on the other hand, the concerns of this world do not deflect him from religion.

He commented: At that moment, I realized that I had made an error.[773]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Sabārī[774] that he said: When [Kulthūm b. 'Amr] al-'Attābī[775] came to al-Ma'mūn in the City of Peace, he was given permission to enter. So he went into the Caliph's presence, the latter having with him at that time Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī.[776] Al-'Attābī was at this time a highly-respected elderly man. He greeted the Caliph, who returned the greeting and ordered al-'Attābī to approach him, and brought him near until he was close to him. Al-'Attābī kissed his hand. The Caliph then ordered him to [1160] 771. See above, 244 and n. 742.

772. The Umayyad prince, son of al-Walīd I.

773. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 313, tr. 141–2; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 438.

774. The correct reading for this nisbah is unclear; al-Sayyārī would be possible, whilst Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 3, has al-Yasārī. Sam'ānī (Hyderabad), VII, 22, connects al-Sabārī with a village of the Bukhara oasis.

775. The secretary and poet, eulogist of al-Rashīd and al-Ma'mūn; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 540–1; EI[2] s.v. al-'Attābī (Blachère).

776. The great musician, singer and poet, and favorite of al-Ma'mūn; see Farmer, 124–6; Sezgin, GAS, II, 578; EI[2] s.v. (Fück).

be seated, so he sat down, and then the Caliph came up to al-'Attābī and questioned him about his present circumstances. Al-'Attābī began to answer him in an eloquent voice, which al-Ma'mūn found pleasing, and he came up to al-'Attābī, making jests and pleasantries. The old man thought that al-Ma'mūn was mocking him, and exclaimed, "O Commander of the Faithful, does assembling beasts for milking come before making yourself familiar to them?"[777] He related: Al-Ma'mūn did not comprehend the allusion to "assembling beasts for milking" (al-ibsās); he looked at Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, and then said, "Yes! O slave boy, [bring] one thousand dīnārs!" The sum was brought and then poured out in front of al-'Attābī.

They then began to talk together and tell stories. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm made a surreptitious sign with his eye to al-Ma'mūn. He would not allow al-'Attābī to embark on any topic without starting to dispute with him over the greater part of it. Al-'Attābī was left mystified by this, but then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, give me permission to ask this old man what his name is!" Al-Ma'mūn answered, "Certainly, do ask him." Al-'Attābī said, "O old man, who are you, and what is your name?" Isḥāq replied, "I am a human being and my name is Kul baṣal."[778] Al-'Attābī said, "As for the name of attribution [nisbah], that is known, but with regard to the name proper [ism], that is still unknown [to me]; Kul baṣal is not a recognized name." Isḥāq answered him, "You are quite unjust here! Is not Kul thūm a recognized name, then? Onions are pleasanter than garlic!" Al-'Attābī said, "What an excellent fellow you are! How persuasively you have argued! O Commander of the Faithful, I have never before seen an old man like this one! Would you permit me to make him a gift of what [1161] the Commander of the Faithful bestowed on me [earlier]? For by God, he has got the better of me!" Al-Ma'mūn retorted, "Nay, you shall keep the whole of it, and I shall order him to be given an equivalent sum." Isḥāq then said to al-'Attābī, "Since

777. An allusion to the proverb, "Make yourself known to beasts before milking them," cf. Maydānī, tr. I, 94.

778. Kul baṣal, literally, "eat onions!"—al-'Attābī's ism being interpretable as kul thūm "eat garlic!"

you have acknowledged this [superiority of mine in debate], make a guess about me, and you will find me out!" He said, "By God, you must be none other than the shaykh, concerning whom reports reach us from Iraq and who is known as Ibn al-Mawṣilī." Isḥāq replied, "I am that person, just as you imagined." He then went up to him to give him the greetings of long life and of peace. Al-Ma'mūn commented, after the conversation between the two shaykhs had gone on for a considerable time, "Since the two of you have come to a peaceful and amicable understanding, arise, and go off together as boon-companions!" So al-'Attābī went off to Isḥāq's house and stayed there with him.[779]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Jasham al-Rib'ī that 'Umārah b. 'Aqīl said: One day, when I was drinking with him, al-Ma'mūn said to me, "What poor company you are, O bedouin!" He related: I protested, "That is not the case, O Commander of the Faithful, but my heart is troubled." He enquired, "How is that?" I replied:

Mufaddāt said, when she saw that I was sleepless and that the phantom of care was visiting me repeatedly, as an obsession,

You have dissipated your wealth on acts of favor to people both near and far, to the point that indigence now encompasses you.

Seek out these people, and you will see what a fine state you once enjoyed;
you shower them with gifts, so that they have now already got whole herds of camels!

But I replied, Away with your reproaches! You have blamed me too much; [1162] neither Ḥātim nor Harim died from extreme poverty.

779. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 316–17, tr. 143; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 26–8 = ed. Pellat, § 2715; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 3–4.

Al-Ma'mūn said to me, "What are you thinking of, setting yourself up in comparison with Harim b. Sinān, the lord of the Arabs, and Ḥātim al-Ṭā'ī?[780] They did so-and-so and so-and-so," and he began to overwhelm me with a heap of examples of their generosity. He related: I replied, however, "O Commander of the Faithful, I am better than both of them, because I am a Muslim and they were infidels, and I am an Arab as well."[781]

It is mentioned from Muḥammad b. Zakariyyā' b. Maymūn al-Farghānī that he said: Al-Ma'mūn said to Muḥammad b. al-Jahm,[782] "Recite to me three verses of poetry which are on the respective themes of eulogy, satire and elegy, and I will give you a tract of land for each verse." So he recited to him as an example of eulogy:

He yields up his life, when even the [ordinary] generous person is tenacious of it;
giving up one's life is the highest point of generosity.

He recited to him as an example of satire:

Their external appearance is hateful, but when you get to know them, their external appearance appears beautiful because of the extreme hatefulness of their inner character.

He recited to him as an example of elegy:

They wished to conceal his grave, but the sweet odor of the grave's earth indicated the way to the tomb.[783]

It is mentioned from al-'Abbās b. Aḥmad b. Abān b. al-Qāsim[784] al-Kātib, who said, al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk related to me, 780. The two tribal chiefs, of Dhubyān and Ṭayyi' respectively, who were famed in pre-Islamic times for their liberality; see R.A. Nicholson, A literary history of the Arabs, 85–7, 116–17, cf. 288.

781. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 317–18, tr. 144; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XX, 184–5.

782. Apparently a client of the Barmakīs; see Guidi, II, 598; G. Lecomte, "Muḥammad b. al-Ǧahm al-Barmakī . . . ," Arabica, V (1958), 263–71.

783. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 318–19, tr. 144.

784. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 320, has here Abū al-Qāsim.

saying: 'Allawayh said to me, I will tell you about an episode that once happened to me when I would have despaired of continuing in al-Ma'mūn's favor had it not been for his nobility of character. He summoned us, and when the effects of the wine had got a hold of him, he said, "Sing to me!" Mukhāriq preceded me, and started off by singing a melody by Ibn Surayj[785] to a poem by Jarīr, [1163]

When I recalled to mind the two monasteries, where the noise of the domestic fowls and the beating of the wooden clappers kept me awake,

I said to the party of riders, at a time when we were weary from the journey
"How far is Yabrīn[786] from the gates of the gardens of paradise!"

He related: I was given the instruction to start singing at that moment, when al-Ma'mūn had in fact just had the idea of setting out for Damascus with the intention of proceeding to the (Byzantine) frontier region,

The moment of time has urged [us] on to Damascus, even though
Damascus is no fitting place for our people.[787]

He thereupon dashed his drinking-cup to the ground and exclaimed, "What's the matter with you? May God's curse be upon you!" Then he said, "O slave boy, give Mukhāriq three thousand dirhams!" I was taken by the hand and set down in my place, whilst his eyes were overflowing with tears and he was saying to al-Mu'taṣim, "This is, by God, my last expedition and I don't think that I shall ever see Iraq again." He related: By God, it was indeed his last contact with Iraq, at the time of this expedition, just as he said.[788]

---

785. Famed singer in the Hijaz during the Umayyad period; see Farmer, 79–80; EI[2] s.v. (Fück).

786. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 427, a sand dune region of eastern Arabia.

787. Following the li-ahlinā of Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 320, and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, X, 132, instead of the text's li-ahlihā.

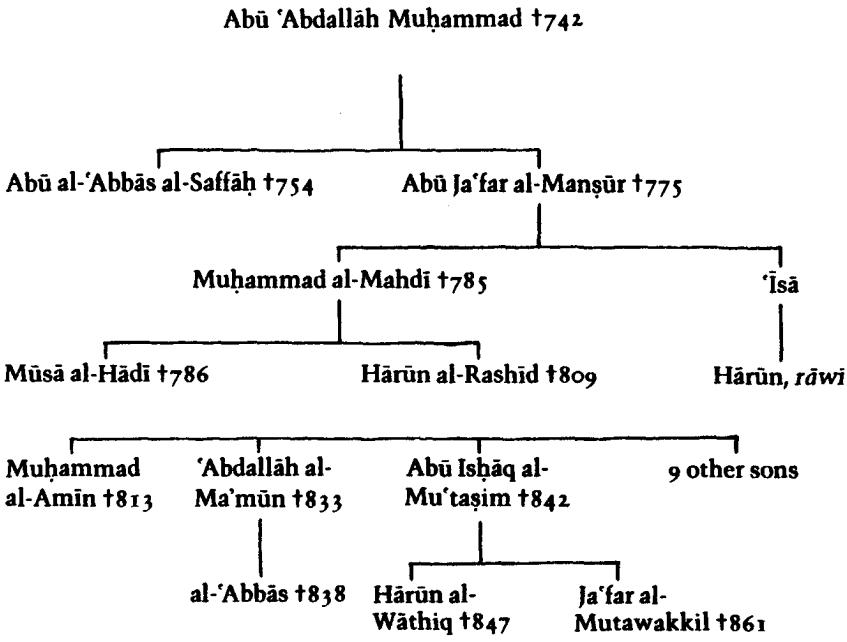
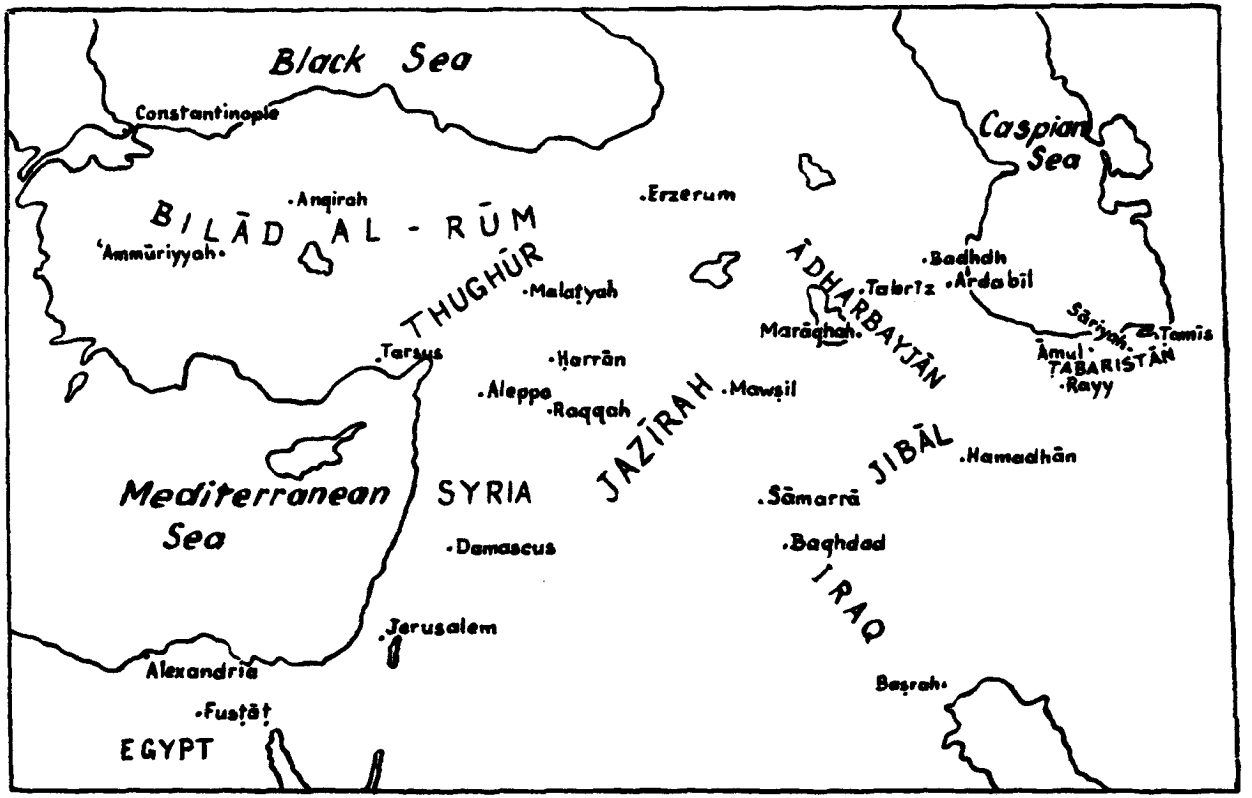
788. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir, 320–1, tr. 145.

The History of al-Ṭabarī



VOLUME XXXIII



Storm and Stress along the Northern Frontiers of the 'Abbāsid Caliphate

TRANSLATED BY C. E. BOSWORTH

Table I.
Genealogy of the 'Abbāsids, with Special Reference to Members of the Family Mentioned in This Section of al-Ṭabarī's History

Map I.
The Central Lands of the Caliphate during the Reign of al-Mu'taṣim

The Events of the Year [1164]

218 (cont'd)

(JANUARY 27, 833–JANUARY 15, 834)

The Succession of Abū Isḥāq al-Muʿtaṣim on His Brother al-Maʾmūn's Death

In this year, on Thursday, the eighteenth of Rajab 218 (August 9, 833),[1] allegiance was given to Abū Isḥāq Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Rashīd b. Muḥammad al-Mahdī b. ʿAbdallāh al-Manṣūr as caliph. It has been mentioned that the populace (al-nās) had been perturbed lest al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn dispute with al-Muʿtaṣim over the caliphate, but they had been spared that. It has been mentioned that the army (al-jund) rioted when allegiance was given to Abū Isḥāq as caliph; they sought out al-ʿAbbās and hailed him with the name of caliph. Hence Abū Isḥāq sent for al-ʿAbbās and summoned him to his presence, and the latter gave allegiance to him. Then al-ʿAbbās went forth to the army and said, "What is the use of this pointless devotion? I have already given allegiance to my paternal uncle and have handed over the caliphate to him." The army thereupon became calm again.[2]

---

1. Actually a Saturday, though stated by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 575, to be a Friday.
2. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 575, says that the army regarded al-ʿAbbās's backing down as feeble and inadequate; hence they reviled him for his weakness before

In this year al-Muʿtaṣim ordered the destruction of all the construction work that al-Maʾmūn had commanded to be done at Ṭuwānah.[3] He carried away all that was transportable there of arms, equipment, and so on, and what he was unable to transport he burned. He also ordered the removal back to their original home territories of all those whom al-Maʾmūn had settled at Ṭuwānah.[4]

In this year, al-Muʿtaṣim, accompanied by al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn, returned to Baghdad, entering it, according to what has been mentioned, on Saturday, the first of Ramaḍān (September 20, 833).[5]

[1165] An Expedition Sent against the Khurramiyyah

In this year, according to what has been mentioned, a great number of the people of al-Jibāl, from Hamadhān, Iṣfahān, Māsabadhān and Mihrajānqadhaq,[6] embraced the Khurramī faith (dīn al-Khurramiyyah).[7] They banded together and then en-finally acquiescing in al-Muʿtaṣim's succession. See Dīnawarī, Kitāb al-akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 401; Masʿūdī, Murūj al-dhahab, VII, 102–3 = par. 2786; Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 380; Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil, VI, 439; Ibn al-ʿAdīm, Bughyat al-ṭalab, I, 68. Although, while dying, al-Maʾmūn had nominated his brother as his heir (Ṭabarī, III, 1133), in a later tradition it was alleged that al-Maʾmūn had, at least at some point in his caliphate, expected his son al-ʿAbbās to succeed him (Ṭabarī, III, 1469). Certainly al-ʿAbbās had experience of fighting on the Byzantine marches and had been governor of Syria and al-Jazīrah for his father, an office in which al-Muʿtaṣim confirmed him (Ibn al-ʿAdīm, op. cit., I, 68); and in 223 (838) he was to be the focus of an abortive plot against al-Muʿtaṣim by discontented commanders during the march against Anqirah and ʿAmmūriyyah, being subsequently arrested and killed at Manbij after that campaign had been successfully concluded (Ṭabarī, III, 1249–50, 1256–67; pp. 112–13, 121–33, below). See also M. A. Shaban, Islamic History, 61.

3. The classical Tyana in Cilicia. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam al-buldān, IV, 45–46; G. Le Strange, Palestine, 547; idem, Lands, 139. Al-ʿAbbās had fortified it on al-Maʾmūn's orders earlier in the same year; see Ṭabarī, III, 1111–12.

4. Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 415; see also Shaban, op. cit., 61–62.

5. This date is confirmed by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 575, with more details of the new Caliph's journey than Ṭabarī in fact gives: that he traveled via al-Raqqah and while there appointed Ghassān b. ʿAbbād, the former governor of Khurāsān, governor of al-Jazīrah and the frontier fortresses (al-ʿawāṣim) there. See also Ṭabarī, trans. Balʿamī, IV, 523.

6. These two last being districts of the province of al-Jibāl, in modern Luristān, to the northeast of the Pusht-i Kūh. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 41, 233; Le Strange, Lands, 202; P. Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter, 464–73.

7. Khurramī unrest in the mountainous regions of northern Persia, in the three distinct regions of Khurāsān, al-Jibāl, and Ādharbayjān, is mentioned from the camped in the province of Hamadhān. Al-Mu'taṣim accordingly sent troops against them, the last army sent against them being that which he dispatched under the command of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab,[8] whom he appointed governor of al-Jibāl in Shawwāl of this year (October–November 833). Isḥāq set out against them in Dhū al-Qa'dah (November–December 833), and his dispatch announcing victory was read out (in the capital) on the "Day of Refreshment" (Yawm al-Tarwiyah, the eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [December 25, 833]).[9] He killed 60,000 of them in province of Hamadhān, and the rest fled to Byzantine territory.[10] middle years of the second (eighth) century onward, but the major outbreak, which convulsed northwestern Persia for more than twenty years under the leadership of Bābak, began around 201 (816–17), in al-Ma'mūn's reign; cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1015. See B. Scarcia Amoretti, "Sects and Heresies," 504–6; EIr, s.v. "Bābak Ḵorramī" (Ḡ.-Ḥ. Yūsofī).

---

8. Abū al-Ḥasan Isḥāq was the most distinguished of what might be called the Muṣ'abid line, parallel to the Ṭāhirid line of Ṭāhir Dhū al-Yamīnayn, and was first cousin to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. He was ṣāḥib al-shurṭah, or governor, of Baghdad and Sāmarrā, and deputy for the Caliph when he was absent from Iraq, for nearly thirty years, until his death in 235 (849–50). Having been one of al-Ma'mūn's right-hand men (see Ṭabarī, III, 1328; p. 214, below), he had taken a prominent part in the opening interrogations of the Miḥnah, or Mu'tazilī inquisition; see Ṭabarī, III, 1116, 1121 ff., 1131–32; on his role in general, see E. Herzfeld, Geschichte der Stadt Samarra, 107; C. E. Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic Culture," 67–68; M. Kaabi, Les Ṭāhirides, I, 315–25.

9. The day during the sequence of Pilgrimage ceremonies when the participants move from Mecca to Minā and 'Arafāt. See M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pèlerinage à la Mekke, 236ff.; *EI*², s.v. "Ḥadjdj" (A J. Wensinck [-J. Jomier]).

10. Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 523; Azdī, op. cit., 415; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 380; Nizām al-Mulk, Siyāsat-nāmah, 292–93, trans. 233–34 (detailed account with several original details); Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 441. Poetry written by Abū Tammām (on whom see p. 92 n. 258, below) in praise of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm includes the names of various places in Ādharbayjān and al-Jibāl where clashes with the Khurramiyyah took place, for example, Qurrān and Ashtar; see A. Haq, "Historical Poems in the Diwan of Abū Tammām," 21.

A detailed analysis of this Khurramī rising is given by M. Rekaya in his "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 42–48, emphasizing the need to distinguish this rising in al-Jibāl and Kurdistān from Bābak's parallel movement in Arrān and Ādharbayjān and the important fact that it was the numerous body of refugees fleeing from Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm's repressions to Byzantine territory who then became the Persian and Kurdish contingent of the Emperor Theophilus's army under their leader Naṣīr/Nuṣayr (Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 136 = par. 2818; Ṭabarī never gives this name) or Naṣr the Kurd (Michael the Syrian), who became a convert to Christianity and adopted the Greek name Theophobus. He was eventually killed in 225 (839–40) fighting the Muslims in the thughūr, or frontier regions, around al-Maṣṣīṣah in Cilicia; see p. 119 n. 334, below. Naṣīr/Nuṣayr's followers formed part of the Byzantine army that attacked Zibaṭrah in 223

In this year Ṣāliḥ b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad[11] led the Pilgrimage.[12] The people of Mecca made the sacrifice of the ʿĪd al-Aḍḥā on the Friday, and the people of Baghdad on the Saturday.[13]

(837–38) (see Ṭabarī, III, 1234–35; pp. 93–95, below), and it must have been they who shortly afterward, at the battle of Anzen (see Ṭabarī, III, 1242; p. 105 n. 305, below), made up the 2,000 Persian troops mentioned in both the Christian and Arabic sources (these being numbered by Masʿūdī, Kitāb al-tanbīh, 169, trans., 230–31, as "several thousands" and specifically described as the Kurds and Persians who had fled from al-Jibāl some five years before). See also J. Rosser, "Theophilus' Khurramite Policy," based entirely on Greek sources and Arabic sources in translation. Rosser fails to distinguish between the various Khurramī revolts but does correctly observe (267) that Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm's victory in al-Jibāl caused Khurramī elements to flee westward and enter the Byzantine Emperor's service.

11. Member of the ʿAbbāsid family and first cousin of the Caliph al-Mahdī. The Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAbbāsī subsequently mentioned by Ṭabarī, e.g., at III, 1362–63, was however a Turkish soldier, presumably a mawlā of the ʿAbbāsid family, and it was after this last person that the street in Sāmarrā where his palace stood was named. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 262, trans., 55; Herzfeld, op. cit., 111.

12. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 442; but, according to Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, II, 781, it was Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī who led it.

13. This latter day was actually the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 218.

The Events of the Year

219

(JANUARY 16, 834–JANUARY 4, 835)

The Rebellion of the 'Alid Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim at al-Ṭālaqān

Among the events taking place during this year was the rebellion, at al-Ṭālaqān[14] in Khurāsān, of Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim b. 'Umar b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib,[15] summoning people to the cause of "the well-pleasing one from the family of Muḥammad" (al-riḍā[16] min āl Muḥammad). A considerable number of people there rallied to his side, and military encounters took place in the vicinity of al-Ṭālaqān and the mountains there between him and 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir's[17]

14. A town in Khurāsān between Marw al-Rūdh and Balkh, to be distinguished from others of the same name in Ṭukhāristān and on the borders of al-Jibāl and Daylam. See Ḥudūd al-'ālam, 107, 335; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 6–7; Le Strange, Lands, 423–24; EI[1], s.v. Ṭālaḳān (Cl. Huart).

15. This 'Alid, a descendant of al-Ḥusayn through the Fourth Imām, 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn (see K. Öhrnberg, The Offspring of Fatima, Table 47), is described by Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 384, as an adherent of the Jārūdiyyah subsect of the Zaydī Shī'ah (on the Jārūdiyyah, see C. Van Arendonck, Les débuts de l'Imāmat Zaidite, 78–90).

16. Or, perhaps, al-raḍī.

17. The son of al-Ma'mūn's governor in Khurāsān Ṭāhir Dhū al-Yamīnayn and himself holder of this office in 215–30 (828–45). See Kaabi, op. cit., I, 221–91; EI[2] commanders. [In the end] he and his followers were defeated, and he fled, seeking a certain district of Khurāsān whose people had been in correspondence with him. He reached Nasā,[18] where the father of one of his followers lived, and this follower of his at that point went along in order to greet his [the follower's] father. When he met his father, the latter asked him the news, so the man told his father about what had happened to them and how they were making for so-and-so district. The man's father thereupon went to the governor of Nasā and told him about Muḥammad b.

[1166] al-Qāsim's plans. It has been mentioned that the governor gave the father 10,000 dirhams for information that would lead him to Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim. The father accordingly gave him information about Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim's whereabouts.

So the governor went along to Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim, arrested him, placed him in firm custody, and dispatched him to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. The latter sent him to al-Muʿtaṣim; he was brought to him on Monday, the fourteenth of Rabīʿ II [April 28, 834] and was then imprisoned, so it has been mentioned, at Sāmarrā in the house of Masrūr al-Khādim al-Kabīr[19] in a narrow cell some three by two cubits only. He remained there for three days and was then transferred to a more commodious place than the previous cell, food was given to him regularly, and a group of persons was appointed and charged with the task of guarding him. When it was the night of the ʿĪd al-Fiṭr [the thirtieth of Ramaḍān 219, the night of October 8–9, 834 and everybody was distracted by the festival and the rejoicings, he devised a stratagem for escaping.

It has been mentioned that he fled from jail by night and that a rope was let down for him from an aperture [in the wall of] the upper part of the house, through which light penetrated to him. When his jailers came next morning with food for his breakfast, s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāhir [E. Marin]; EIr, s.v. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāher [C. E. Bosworth].

---

18. Or Nisā, a town on the northern fringes of Khurāsān near the beginning of the Qara Qum Desert. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 281–82; Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, 103, 326; Le Strange, Lands, 394; W. Barthold, Historical Geography, 89–90; EI[1], s.v. Nasā [V. Minorsky].

19. Eunuch slave of of Hārūn al-Rashīd's who acted as the Caliph's executioner [e.g., for the killing of Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī in 187 [803]; Ṭabarī, III, 678–79]; see P. Crone, Slaves on Horses, 192–93.

he was missing. It has been mentioned that a reward of 100,000 dirhams was offered for whomever might give information that would lead to Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim; the public herald proclaimed this, but no further news was heard of him.[20]

In this year Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm [b. Muṣ'ab] entered Baghdad, [returning] from al-Jibāl, on Sunday, the eleventh of Jumādā I (May 24, 834), accompanied by Khurramī captives and those who had sought a guarantee of security (al-musta'minah). It has been said that, in the course of his fighting with the Khurramiyyah, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm killed around 100,000, apart from the women and children (taken captive and enslaved).[21]

The Campaign against the Zuṭṭ

In this year, in Jumādā II (June–July 834), al-Mu'taṣim sent 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah[22] to combat the Zuṭṭ,[23] who had been creating [1167]

20. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 576; Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Maqātil, 382–92; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 116–18 = pars. 2799–2800; Gardīzī, Kitāb zayn al-akhbār, ed. Ḥabībī, 76; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 382; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 442–43. Uncertainty about Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim's fate is reflected in stories given by Mas'ūdī, including the one that he returned to al-Ṭālaqān and was expected by the Zaydīs to return as a Mahdī after his death; Iṣfahānī regards it as most probable that he escaped to Wāsiṭ.

21. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 575–76, according to whom Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm had to be sent out after the rebels had defeated al-Mu'taṣim's commander Hāshim b. Bānījūr (read thus for the text's Bātījūr, as also at II, 465); on this family of commanders from the upper Oxus region, also called the Abū Dāwūdids, see EI[2] Suppl., s.v. Bānīdjūrids (C. E. Bosworth); Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 445.

22. Khurāsānian commander of Arab origin, prominent in al-Ma'mūn's reign and commander of the guard (ṣāḥib al-ḥaras) for al-Mu'taṣim but later to be involved in the plot to dethrone the latter, in 223 (837–38); see Ṭabarī, III, 1256–58, 1264–66; pp. 121–23, 130–32, below. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 576, Aḥmad b. Sa'īd (b. Salm b. Qutaybah) al-Bāhilī was first sent against the Zuṭṭ but was defeated; hence the decision to send 'Ujayf. See also Herzfeld, op. cit., 107.

23. Zuṭṭ is an Arabization of the Indian ethnic term Jhāt. Members of this group were transported from India to the Gulf region by the Sāsānid emperors and their numbers reinforced in the Umayyad period by Indian troops whom the governor al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf brought back from Sind and settled in the Baṭā'iḥ or marshlands of lower Iraq. Under al-Ma'mūn, in 205 (820) we hear of a rebellion by the Zuṭṭ, which would be contemporary with that of Bābak and the Khurramiyyah in northwestern Persia and, like that movement, probably directed at the central government and irksome caliphal control (Ṭabarī, III, 1044). Efforts to put an end to their terrorizing of the region of al-Baṣrah were not however successful until this expedition of 'Ujayf's. See Ch. Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, 37–40; EI[1], s.v. Zoṭṭ (G. Ferrand).

disturbances on the road to al-Baṣrah. They attacked traffic along the road, carried off the crops from the threshing floors at Kaskar[24] and adjacent districts of al-Baṣrah, and made the roads unsafe. On every one of the postal and intelligence service roads al-Muʿtaṣim set up relays of horsemen (sikak al-burud) who could gallop and bring the news; in this way, information would come from ʿUjayf and reach al-Muʿtaṣim the same day. The person appointed by al-Muʿtaṣim to take charge of the expenses and supplies of ʿUjayf's campaigns was Muḥammad b. Manṣūr, Ibrāhīm al-Bakhtarī's secretary.

When ʿUjayf reached Wāsiṭ he pitched his camp with 5,000 men at a village in the district below Wāsiṭ called al-Ṣāfiyah.[25] Then he went to a canal that leads off the Tigris called Bardūdā[26] and remained there until he had blocked it up. It has been said, however, that ʿUjayf pitched his camp at a village in the district below Wāsiṭ called Najīdā and that he sent Hārūn b. Nuʿaym b. al-Waḍḍāḥ,[27] the Khurāsānian commander, to a place called al-Ṣāfiyah with 5,000 men, while ʿUjayf himself proceeded with another 5,000 troops to Bardūdā and remained there until he had blocked it. He furthermore blocked other waterways by means of which the Zuṭṭ used to slip through and issue forth, and thus encircled and put pressure on them from all sides. Among the waterways that ʿUjayf blocked was a canal called al-ʿArūs ("the Bride"). When he had cut their lines of communication, he attacked them and captured 500 of their menfolk, killing an additional 300 men in the battle. He struck off the heads of the 24. An ancient settlement on the right bank of the Tigris in lower Iraq, facing al-Ḥajjāj's new garrison town of Wāsiṭ, and also the name of the surrounding district. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 461; Le Strange, Lands, 39, 42–43; EI[2], s.v. Kaskar (M. Streck- [J. Lassner]).

25. Not apparently the al-Ṣāfiyah ("the Pure," e.g., of water) mentioned by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 389, as being near al-Nuʿmāniyyah, to the northwest of Kaskar.

26. The Nahr Bardūdā was one of the five navigable waterways by means of which the Tigris below Wāsiṭ flowed into the Baṭāʾiḥ or Great Marshes; see Le Strange, Lands, 41.

27. Khurāsānian commander whose father Nuʿaym was, according to Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 256, trans., 45, the first owner of the Turkish slave commander Ashnās, on whom see p. 98 n. 281, below. On Hārun b. Nuʿaym and his family, see further Herzfeld, op. cit., 107, and p. 113 n. 315, below.

prisoners and sent the heads of the whole lot of them to al-Mu'taṣim's court. Then 'Ujayf remained in his position facing the Zuṭṭ for fifteen days and seized a great many more of them as captives. The chief of the Zuṭṭ was a man called Muḥammad b. [1168]
'Uthmān, with S.m.l.q as his chief executive and in charge of the conduct of warfare. 'Ujayf stayed there, engaged in fighting the Zuṭṭ, for nine months, according to the reports.[28] In this year Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the Pilgrimage.[29]

28. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 576; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 443–44.
29. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 783.

The Events of the Year

220

(JANUARY 5–DECEMBER 25, 835)

The Deportation of the Captured Zuṭṭ

Among the events taking place during this year was 'Ujayf's entry into Baghdad with the Zuṭṭ and his crushing them to the point that they had sought from him a guarantee of security, which he had granted them. They came forth to him [in surrender] in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the year 219 (December 834–January 835), on condition that he would guarantee the security of their lives and possessions. They numbered, according to what has been mentioned, 27,000, of whom 12,000 were fighting men. 'Ujayf enumerated them at 27,000 persons, men, women, and children. He put them in boats and went forward with them until he encamped at al-Za'farāniyyah.[30] There he gave his troops a donative of two dīnārs each and remained for a day. He formed up the Zuṭṭ in their skiffs (zawārīq),[31] in their full battle order and

30. A village to the southeast of Baghdad and near Kalwādhā; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 141.

31. Sing. zawraq. See H. Kindermann, "Schiff" im Arabischen, 36–37; Darwīsh al-Nukhaylī, al-Sufun al-islāmiyyah, 59–62.

with trumpets, and then he entered Baghdad with them on 'Āshūrā' Day of the year 220 (the tenth of al-Muḥarram [January 14, 835]). Al-Mu'taṣim was at this moment at al-Shammāsiyyah,[32] in a boat of the type called zaww,[33] when the Zuṭṭ passed before him in their battle order, blowing trumpets; the first of them were at al-Quṣf[34] and the last of them opposite al-Shammāsiyyah. They remained in their boats for three days and then were taken across the river to the eastern side and handed over to the charge of Bishr b. al-Sumaydi', who took them to Khāniqīn.[35] After this they were transported to 'Ayn Zarbah[36] [1169] in the Byzantine marches (al-thaghr). But the Byzantines swept down on them and exterminated them, not a single one escaping.[37] One of their poets said:

O people of Baghdad, die! May your frustrated rage, out of longing for barnī and suhrīz dates,[38] be prolonged!
We are the ones who struck you in open defiance and violently and who drove you on like weaklings.
You did not thank God for His previously vouchsafed goodness and were not mindful of His benefits, duly extolling [Him].
So summon help from the slaves, made up of the supporters of your state (abnā' dawlatikum),[39] of Yāzamān,[40] of Balj and of Tūz,[41]

---

32. The northernmost quarter of East Baghdad, running down to the Tigris banks; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 199–216.

33. See Kindermann, op. cit., 36–37; al-Nukhaylī, op. cit., 58–59.

34. A village on the Tigris between Baghdad and 'Ukbarā, famed as a pleasure spot; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 382.

35. A town on the road linking Baghdad with Ḥulwān and the interior of Persia. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 340–41; Le Strange, Lands, 62–63; *EI*², s.v. Khāniḳīn (Schwarz).

36. One of the 'awāṣim, or frontier fortresses, guarding al-Jazīrah, Greek Anabarzo, the Crusaders' Anazarbus. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 177–78; Le Strange, Palestine, 387–88; idem, Lands, 128–29; *EI*², s.v. 'Ayn Zarba (M. Canard).

37. Balādhurī, Futūḥ al-buldān, 171, 375–76; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 446.

38. Superior varieties of dates; see the references given by Pellat in the glossary of terms to his translation of Jāḥiẓ, Kitāb al-bukhalā', 313–14, 319.

39. A sarcastic reference to the designations ahl al-dawla, abnā' al-dawla, etc., for the supporters of the early 'Abbāsid state; see p. 17 n. 74, below.

40. On chronological grounds, this is unlikely to be the Yāzmān al-Khādim mentioned later by Ṭabarī as active as a military commander under al-Mu'tamid, i.e., some fifty years later.

41. These two names are unidentified, but the name Tūz at least, like Yāzmān, indicates a Turkish slave commander.

Of ShināS (Ashnās), of Afshīn and of Faraj,[42] those who are conspicuous in silk brocade and pure gold, Those who wear garments of Chinese silk velvet,[43] with the seams of their gored fringes fastened to their sleeves, Those who carry sharp daggers, with their hilts fastened to unsewn, fine linen belts.
The sons of Bahallah[44] leading the sons of Fayrūz will slash their skulls with gleaming Indian swords.
[1170] [They are] riders, whose steeds are black and are bedecked with seashells on their noses' rims (i.e., their steeds are ships with decorated bows),
With detachments rendered subject to them, in the water, which are like ebony and shīz wood[45] when they are hurled forward!
Whenever you are eager to seek us out in the depths of our boundless open sea, well, beware, for we shall hunt you down like those who trap birds with snares[46]

---

42. Perhaps Faraj al-Rukhkhajī, a commander of al-Ma'mūn's (Ṭabarī, III, 1044) and governor of Ahwāz in al-Mu'taṣim's reign (Ibrāhīm al-Bayhaqī, Kitāb al-maḥāsin, ed. Schwally, 447 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 148), though Faraj was a common euphuistic name for slaves. For the other two commanders mentioned in this hemistich, see pp. 98 n. 281, 14 n. 54, below.

43. Kamkhān al-Sīn. This term (also kamkhā, kimkhā, kamkhāw) was used in medieval Islamic times to denote Chinese figured silk; see Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif, 221, trans., 141; and R. B. Serjeant, Islamic Textiles, 69, 218. Thence it passed to medieval western Europe as a term for damask or brocade, cammoca; see H. Yule and A. C. Burnell, Hobson-Jobson, 484–85, s.v. Kincob.

44. Apparently a reference to Bahallah al-Hindiyyah, wife of the Umayyad governor al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah and mother of his son Yazīd; see Ṭabarī, II, 1210. Al-Muhallab himself may have been of mawlā origin; see Crone, op. cit., 39. The Zuṭṭ poet is referring to his own people's Indian origins, and, in "the sons of Fayrūz," to the transplantation westward of the Zuṭṭ by the Sāsānids, which gave the Zuṭṭ a Persian as well as an Indian, connection (see p. 7 n. 23, above). It is also notable that Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 355, trans., 455, speaks of a westward migration of the Zuṭṭ into southern Persia after they were driven out of India by famine, possibly to be regarded as a comparatively recent movement.

45. A dark-colored hardwood, perhaps walnut, from which bowls were made; see E. W. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon, s.v. shīz.

46. Following Addenda et emendanda, CDVI, with its suggested reading of this dubious last word as al-maqāfīz, the plural of a putative miqfāz for miqfās "trap, snare." The Cairo edition, IX, 11, has the meaningless al-ma'ātīz.

Or with a rapid and violent snatching, just as the birds seeking refuge in overhanging river banks are seized by hunters using swift falcons.[47]
Fierce fighting—fighting the Zuṭṭ—you must acknowledge, is not like just eating tharīd[48] or drinking from goblets!
We are the ones who gave war its milk to drink, and we shall certainly follow it up with the violent onslaught of warriors who fight in the sea.[49]
And we shall indeed assault you with an assault[50] that will make the Master of the Throne[51] take heart and inspirit the lord of Tīz![52]
So weep for the dates! May God make your eyes flow with tears on every Day of Sacrifice, every Day of the Breaking of the Fast, and every New Year (nayrūz)![53]

---

47. Following Glossarium and Addenda et emendanda, CCCXVII, DCCLXXIII, and the Cairo edition, IX, 11, with their reading in the second hemistich of al-diḥal; and Glossarium, CCCXVII, for the interpretation of al-shanāqīz as "falcons."

48. A dish of meat minced with bread, grain, or dates, a favorite food of the Quraysh in Mecca at the time of the Prophet. See M. Rodinson, "Recherches sur les documents arabes," 133 and n. 5; Jāḥiẓ, Kitāb al-bukhalā', trans., 320.

49. Al-kawālīz; see Glossarium, CDLVII.

50. Echoing Qur'ān XCVI: 15.

51. Rabb al-sarīr. In the light of M. J. de Goeje's interpretation in Glossarium, CCLXXXIX, E. Marin (Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 8 n. 66) may be correct in regarding this as a reference to Bābak, for possession of such a throne had connotations of power and authority; see p. 57 n. 171, below. But it is equally possible that the allusion is not to him but to the Caucasian ruler known in the Arabic sources (e.g. Balādhurī, op. cit., 196) as the ṣāḥib al-sarīr, who ruled over a group of Avars in southern Dāghistān and after whom the region of Sarīr was subsequently named. See Ḥudūd al-'ālam, 161, 447–50; V. Minorsky, History of Sharvān and Darband, 97ff.; EI[2], s.v. al-Ḳabḳ (C. E. Bosworth).

52. Tīz was the main port of Makrān, probably near the modern Chāhbahār. See Ḥudūd al-'ālam, 123; Le Strange, Lands, 329–30. But it is difficult to see who is meant by ṣāḥib al-Tīz or what his contemporary fame was.

53. More correctly nawrūz, the festival of the beginning of the Persian solar new year, originally at the summer solstice but now on 21 March. This holiday continued to be observed by Islamic princes and viziers in the ancient Sāsānid lands of Persia and Iraq and to be celebrated by exchanges of gifts and other festivities. It came to have practical, as well as ceremonial, significance, in that subsequent caliphs, beginning with al-Mutawakkil, proposed to adopt Nawrūz as the beginning of the solar year for financial and taxation purposes. Al-Mu'taḍid was the first who actually did so. Hence Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, writing in the fourth (tenth) century, considered it important enough to devote a special section of his work on history and chronology to the correspondences of the date of nayrūz with

In this year al-Muʿtaṣim appointed the Afshīn Khaydhar[54] b.
[1171] Kāwūs governor of al-Jibāl and sent him to combat Bābak, this being on Thursday, the second of Jumādā II (June 3, 220). He pitched his camp at the muṣallā of Baghdad[55] and then proceeded to Barzand.[56]

The Affair of Bābak and His Outbreak

It has been mentioned that Bābak's (first) rebellion was in the year 201 (816/817) and that the settlement and town that was his headquarters was al-Badhdh.[57] (On that occasion) he put to flight the dates of the Hijrī calendar from A. H. 1 to A. H. 350; see his Taʾrīkh sinī mulūk al-arḍ wa-al-anbiyāʾ, 130–43. See further A. Mez, Die Renaissance des Islâms, 400–1, trans., 425–26; D. S. Margoliouth, "The Historical Content of the Diwan of Buhturi," 253–54; G. E. von Grunebaum, Muhammadan Festivals, 54–55; EI², s.v. Nawrūz (R. Levy).

---

54. Corrected to this reading in Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIII, the reading also in Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 259, trans., 51, adopted by de Goeje and followed by F. Justi in Iranisches Namenbuch, 253, but often assimilated by Arabic copyists to the more familiar Arabic name Ḥaydar. On al-Afshīn, who plays such a dominant role in the affairs of al-Muʿtaṣim's caliphate, see EI², s.v. Afshīn (Barthold- [H. A. R. Gibb]) and EIr, s.v. Afšīn (C. E. Bosworth); for the circumstances in which he came to enter ʿAbbāsid service, see Barthold, Turkestan, 211; and on the title Afshīn, Justi, op. cit., 252–53; and Bosworth and Clauson, "Al-Xwārazmī on the Peoples of Central Asia," 7–8.

55. I.e., the extensive open site usually used for the ṣalāt, or public worship, on the great festivals and on other special occasions; see EI², s.v. Muṣallā (A. J. Wensinck and R. Hillenbrand). The Baghdad muṣallā lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris, in the Shammāsiyyah quarter (on which see p. 11 n. 32, above), near the Baradān cemetery and close to where the highway to Hamadhān, al-Rayy, and Khurāsān passed. In the historical sources for the fourth (tenth) century (e.g., Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ and Miskawayh), it is frequently mentioned as the place where discontented troops massed for rioting and hatching plots. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 204–5; M. Canard, Histoire, 163 and n. 207. For muṣallā in its other technical sense of "prayer rug," see Ṭabarī, III, 1327; p. 214 and n. 638, below).

56. A town in Mūqān (on which see p. 19 n. 77, below), hence adjacent to the mountainous center of Bābak's power and a suitable place for al-Afshīn to establish his field headquarters. See Le Strange, Lands, 175–76; Schwarz, op. cit., 1094–95; Gh. H. Sadighi, Les mouvements religieux iraniens, 252–53 n. 7; EI², s.v. Barzand (R. N. Frye).

57. Bābak's capital lay in the modern Qaraja Dagh region, north of Ahar and south of the Araxes, in northern Ādharbayjān. A Tehran archaeological team seems now to have identified the actual fortified site at Qalʿa-yi Jumhūr. See Abū Dulaf, Second Risalah, 35–36, 75; Schwarz, op. cit., 970–74, 1126–34; EI², Suppl., s.v. al-Badhdh (C. E. Bosworth); EIr, s.v. Badd (Ḡ.-Ḥ Yūsofī).

forces sent by the central government and killed a number of its commanders. When the supreme power passed to al-Muʿtaṣim, he sent Abū Saʿīd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf[58] to Ardabīl[59] and ordered him to rebuild the strongholds between Zanjān[60] and Ardabīl that Bābak had destroyed and to put armed men in them as garrisons to hold the road, in order to ensure safe passage for those bringing provisions to Ardabīl. So Abū Saʿīd embarked on this and rebuilt the strong points that Bābak had destroyed. In one of his incursions Bābak sent a detachment of troops against him [Abū Saʿīd] under the command of a man called Muʿāwiyah, who then sallied forth, raided some of the neighboring districts, and withdrew to his base. News of this reached Abū Saʿīd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, so he gathered his forces together and marched out against Muʿāwiyah, to intercept him at some point along the road. [Abū Saʿīd] attacked [Muʿāwiyah], killed a number of his followers, took a number of them captive, and he recovered what Muʿāwiyah had amassed [in the raids]. This was the first reverse that Bābak's partisans had suffered. Abū Saʿīd sent the severed heads [of the fallen enemy] and the prisoners to al-Muʿtaṣim billāh.[61]

The next defeat of Bābak that followed was at the hands of Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth.[62] This came about because Muḥammad

58. I.e., al-Marwazī (also called al-Thaghrī, presumably because of his experience fighting on the Byzantine marches), in al-Maʾmūn's reign commander under Ḥumayd b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Ṭūsī, d. 236 (850–51).

59. A town of eastern Ādharbayjān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 145–46; Le Strange, Lands, 168; Schwarz, op. cit., 1026–47; Barthold, Historical Geography, 215–17; EI[2], s.v. Ardabīl (R. N. Frye); EIr, s.v. Ardabīl (C. E. Bosworth et al.).

60. A town on the road between Ardabīl and Qazwīn. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 152–53; Le Strange, Lands, 221–22; Schwarz, op. cit., 729–31; Barthold, Historical Geography, 213; EI[1], s.v. Zandjān (V. Minorsky).

61. See Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 49–51. Abū Tammām, who addressed eulogies to the commander Abū Saʿīd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, states in one of his poems that this clash took place behind Sindbāyā in Ādharbayjān (placed by the geographers in the region of al-Badhdh; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 267, and Schwarz, op. cit., 1125–26) and that Muʿāwiyah was able to flee under cover of night, when the encounter must have taken place; see Haq, op. cit., 21–22.

62. Muḥammad's father had been a soldier in the service of the Rawwādids (see p. 17 and n. 68, below) and had established himself in Marand. Muḥammad himself expanded his power at the expense of the Rawwādids and subsequently rebelled against the caliphs; he was defeated only in 235 (849), by al-Mutawakkil's general Bughā al-Ṣaghīr. See R. Mottahedeh, "The ʿAbbāsid Caliphate in Iran," 78;

b. al-Baʿīth was in a strongly defended fortress of his called Shāhī [1172] ("the Royal")[63] which Ibn al-Baʿīth had seized from al-Wajnā' b. al-Rawwād,[64] which was situated on a rocky ridge (ʿarḍ, ʿurḍ) approximately two farsakhs long and which fell within the administrative district of Ādharbayjān. He had another fortress in the province of Ādharbayjān called Tabrīz,[65] but Shāhī was the more impregnable of the two. Ibn al-Baʿīth had made peace with Bābak, so that when Bābak's raiding parties went forth they used to halt [at his fortress], and he would give them hospitality and treat them kindly, to the point that they became completely at ease with him and this became an established custom of theirs. On one occasion, Bābak sent out one of his followers called ʿIṣmah,[66] who was one of his senior commanders (min iṣbahbadhīhi),[67] with a raiding party. He halted by Ibn al-Baʿīth, and the latter providing ʿIṣmah, according to the custom then current, with sheep and goats, other foodstuffs fitting for guests, and various items of hospitality. He sent a message to ʿIṣmah for him to go up to him, accompanied by his personal guard and leading commanders. ʿIṣmah accordingly went [to Ibn al-Baʿīth], and Ibn al-Baʿīth plied [ʿIṣmah] and his companions with food and drink until he rendered them all drunk, whereupon he pounced on ʿIṣmah, secured him firmly in bonds, and killed those of his companions who were with him. He then ordered [ʿIṣmah] to and Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffārids," 101; *EI*², s.v. Marand (V. Minorsky-[C. E. Bosworth]).

---

63. This lay on an island in Lake Urmiya, though it could be reached on foot when the water level was low. See Le Strange, Lands, 160–61; Schwarz, op. cit., 990; *EI*¹, s.v. Urmiya (V. Minorsky). For the descriptive phrase used just below, ʿarḍuhā/ʿurḍuhā naḥwan min farsakhayn, the translation suggested by A. Dietrich, in BiOr, XI, 35, has been adopted.

64. A member of the Kurdicized Arab family of the Rawwādids, who in the later fourth (tenth) and early fifth (eleventh) centuries dominated Ādharbayjān from Tabrīz. See Minorsky, Studies in Caucasian History, 167–69; Bosworth, Islamic Dynasties, 88–89; W. Madelung, "Minor Dynasties," 227, 236–39; Bosworth, "Political and Dynastic History," 32–34.

65. Only a few years, later, however, when the geographer Ibn Khurradādhbih wrote (middle third [eighth] century), Tabrīz was in the hands of Muḥammad b. al-Rawwād; see *EI*¹, s.v. Tabrīz (V. Minorsky).

66. Called by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 577, "al-Kurdī" and lord of Marand.

67. For this ancient Persian term, Middle Persian spāhpat, see *EI*², s.v. Ispabadh (C. E. Bosworth).

enumerate each man of [the remainder of] his followers, one by one and by individual name, at which the man in question would be summoned by name, and he would mount [to the fortress], where Ibn al-Ba'īth would give an order and he would be beheaded. [This process continued] until the remainder of them became aware of that trick so that they fled. Ibn al-Ba'īth sent 'Iṣmah on to al-Mu'taṣim. Abū Muḥammad al-Ba'īth (Muḥammad b. al-Ba'īth's father) had been one of Ibn al-Rawwād's freebooters and desperadoes (ṣu'lūk).[68] Al-Mu'taṣim interrogated 'Iṣmah about Bābak's territory, and the latter provided him with information about the roads of access into it and the possible modes of fighting there. 'Iṣmah remained in captivity until the reign of al-Wāthiq.[69]

When al-Afshīn arrived at Barzand he encamped there and repaired the fortresses between Barzand and Ardabīl. He stationed Muḥammad b. Yūsuf at a place called Khushsh,[70] and there Muḥammad b. Yūsuf dug a protective trench (khandaq).[71] He stationed al-Haytham al-Ghanawī, a commander who originated [1173] from the people of al-Jazīrah,[72] in a rural district (rustāq) called Arshaq,[73] and al-Haytham repaired its fortress and dug a protective trench around it. He stationed 'Alawayh al-A'war ("the One-Eyed"), one of the commanders of the Abnā',[74] at a fortress

68. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 577–78, states that al-Mu'taṣim first sent the Muṣ'abid Ṭāhir b. Ibrahīm b. Muṣ'ab, brother of the governor of Baghdad Isḥāq, against Bābak. Muḥammad b. al-Ba'īth, after having married 'Iṣmah's daughter as part of the strategy against him, brought him and his followers in chains to Ṭāhir. Al-Mu'taṣim was angry because it was Muḥammad b. al-Ba'īth, and not Ṭahir himself, who had been successful; he therefore sent al-Afshīn against the Khurramiyyah. See Sadighi, op. cit., 251–52; Kaabi, op. cit., I, 322. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 447–48, follows Ṭabarī on this point.

69. Al-Mu'taṣim's son and successor, who reigned as caliph in 227–32 (842–47). Cf. on this episode, Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 526–27.

70. This place lies roughly midway between Ardabīl and Barzand and is known today as Kushā. See Schwarz, op. cit., 1160–61; Sadighi, op. cit., 25–52.

71. It was the normal practice to dig such trenches when warfare entered a static phase. See R. Levy, The Social Structure of Islam, 437–38.

72. Tribes of Qays such as Ghanī (a tribe associated with Bāhilah; see *EI*², s.v. Ghanī b. A'ṣur [J. W. Fück]) had settled extensively in northern Syria and al-Jazīrah, the homeland of this otherwise unknown commander.

73. Also in Mūqān, between Ardabīl and Barzand. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 152; Schwarz, op. cit., 1164–65.

74. I.e., the descendants of the Khurāsānian supporters of the 'Abbāsid da'wa, the ahl Khurāsān (largely descended from the original Arab tribesmen settled in near Ardabīl called Ḥiṣn al-Nahr.[75] Groups of travelers and caravans used to set off from Ardabīl accompanied by an escort until they reached Ḥiṣn al-Nahr, and then the commander of Ḥiṣn al-Nahr would escort them to al-Haytham al-Ghanawī. [Al-]Haytham, in turn, would set off with those who had come from his own district until he handed them over to the garrison force at Ḥiṣn al-Nahr, who would escort those travelers coming from Ardabīl until they reached al-Haytham. Under this arrangement the commander of Ḥiṣn al-Nahr was exactly halfway along the road, and he would hand over those in his protection to [al-]Haytham, and the latter would hand over those in his protection to the commander of Ḥiṣn al-Nahr. One commander would go with the one group and the other commander with the other group. If one group arrived at the meeting place before the other, they would not go on beyond that point until the other group arrived. Then each commander would entrust to the other the group of travelers whom he had escorted, so that the one could escort them as far as Ardabīl and the other could escort them to al-Afshīn's camp. Likewise, al-Haytham al-Ghanawī would escort the group under his protection as far as Abū Saʿīd's men, who themselves meanwhile had set forth and halted at the halfway meeting point along the road with their group of travelers. Then Abū Saʿīd and his men would hand over that group to al-Haytham, and the latter would hand over the group accompanying him to Abū Saʿīd's men. Then Abū Saʿīd and his men would escort those in the caravan to Khushsh, while al-Haytham and his men would go back to Arshaq with the [1174] travelers entrusted to them so that they would arrive with them the next day. Then they would be able to hand them over to the east since the Umayyad period). Many of these had come west with Abū Muslim and settled above all in Baghdad, though also in other garrison cities of the central and western Islamic lands. In the early years of the previous reign, that of al-Maʾmūn, the Abnāʾ of Baghdad had been the mainstay of the opposition in Iraq to al-Maʾmūn and his Persian entourage at Marw; but during al-Muʿtaṣim's caliphate their military importance was considerably reduced, as he shifted his dependence to slave troops (see Ṭabarī, III, 1179–81; pp. 27–28, below). On the Abnāʾ, see Crone, op. cit., 65–67; A. Arazi and A. El'ad, "L'epître à l'armée," 52–61.

---

75. Or Maṣlaḥat al-Nahr, two farsakhs to the northwest of Ardabīl on the Barzand road; see Schwarz, op. cit., 1168.

ʿAlawayh al-Aʿwar and his men, who would convey them to their intended destination. Abū Saʿīd and those accompanying him would proceed to Khushsh and thence to al-Afshīn's camp, where the leader of a caravan from al-Afshīn met him and that leader would receive from him those in the caravan and send them on to al-Afshīn's camp. This arrangement was in constant use.[76]

Whenever any spy came to Abū Saʿīd or any of the garrisons they would dispatch him to al-Afshīn. The latter used not to kill or beat such spies but on the contrary would give them sums of money and gifts and would question them about what sum of money Bābak was accustomed to give them. Thereupon he would double it for them and say, "Act as a spy for us now!"

In this year a battle took place between Bābak and Afshīn at Arshaq, in which al-Afshīn killed a large number of Bābak's followers—it has been said more than a thousand. Bābak fled to Mūqān[77] and from there proceeded to the town of his that was called al-Badhdh.

The Reason for This Battle between al-Afshīn and Bābak

It has been mentioned that the reason for this was that al-Muʿtaṣim sent with Bughā al-Kabīr[78] a sum of money to al-Afshīn for the latter to use as pay for his troops and for expenditure on supplies. Bughā brought that money to Ardabīl, but when he halted there reports about this reached Bābak and his followers, so they prepared to intercept him before he could reach al-Afshīn. The spy Ṣāliḥ came to al-Afshīn and informed him that Bughā al-Kabīr had arrived with a sum of money and that Bābak

76. This involved description of the procedure merely shows how al-Afshīn established a relay system, with Ḥiṣn al-Nahr as its central point, to protect Muslim travelers and caravans from Khurramī raids.

77. The low-lying steppe region to the south of the lower course of the Araxes. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 225–26; Le Strange, Lands, 175–76; Schwarz, op. cit., 1086–91; EI[1], s.v. Mūḳān (V. Minorsky).

78. A Turkish general of successive caliphs in the middle years of this century; he died in 248 (862). He is not to be confused with Bughā al-Ṣaghīr, or al-Sharābī, who was no relation. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 110–11; EI[2], s.vv. Bughā al-Kabīr, Bughā al-Sharābī (D.Sourdel).

and his followers had prepared to intercept him before he could reach al-Afshīn. However, it has also been said that Ṣāliḥ [1175] approached Abū Saʿīd and that Abū Saʿīd then sent him to al-Afshīn.

Bābak prepared ambushes in various places. Al-Afshīn in turn wrote to Abū Saʿīd, ordering him to employ stratagems to check on the authenticity of the information about Bābak, so Abū Saʿīd and a group of his men sallied forth disguised until they saw the lights and the fires in the places described to them by Ṣāliḥ. Meanwhile, al-Afshīn wrote to Bughā, instructing him to remain in Ardabīl until details of al-Afshīn's plans should come to him. Abū Saʿīd wrote to al-Afshīn, telling him that Ṣāliḥ's information was authentic; hence al-Afshīn promised Ṣāliḥ largesse and heaped favors on him. He then wrote to Bughā with the instructions that Bughā was to give out that he was ostensibly about to set forth on a journey and was to fasten the sum of money on the camels' backs, tie the beasts together and form a file with them, and set out from Ardabīl as if he were heading for Barzand. But when he should arrive at the stronghold (maṣlaḥah) of a al-Nahr, or to within about two farsakhs from it, he was to hold back the convoy of animals until those travelers who were accompanying the money should reach Barzand, and then when the caravan had passed on he was himself to return with the money to Ardabīl.

Bughā did that, and the caravan traveled on until it halted at al-Nahr. Bābak's spies went back to him, informing him that the money had been transported and that they had seen it with their own eyes being carried along until it had reached al-Nahr. But in reality Bughā returned to Ardabīl with the money.

Al-Afshīn rode out from Barzand on the afternoon of the day that he had agreed upon with Bughā and at sunset reached Khushsh, where he encamped with his forces outside the protective trench dug by Abū Saʿīd. When morning came he rode off secretly, without having a drum beaten or displaying a banner, and he ordered that the banner should be kept furled and that the troops should keep silent and proceed swiftly on their journey.

[1176] The caravan that set out on that same day from al-Nahr to the vicinity of al-Haytham al-Ghanawī departed; and al-Afshīn traveled from Khushsh, heading for the vicinity of al-Haytham, to meet him along the road. But al-Haytham was unaware of this; hence he and those with him in the caravan pressed onward in the direction of al-Nahr. Bābak deployed his cavalry, foot soldiers, and troops in war formation and proceeded along the road to al-Nahr, imagining that the money would come into his hands. The commander of al-Nahr went out to escort those in his charge as far as al-Haytham, but Bābak's cavalry launched an attack on him, never doubting that the money was with him. The commander of al-Nahr fought with them, but Bābak's partisans killed both him and the troops and travelers who were accompanying him. They seized all the baggage and other things that they had with them and realized that the actual money had eluded them. They further seized the commander of al-Nahr's banner and also the clothing of the garrison of al-Nahr, their durrā'ahs,[79] pennants,[80] and caftans,[81] and they donned them and disguised themselves so that they might capture al-Haytham al-Ghanawī and also his companions. They were at this point unaware of al-Afshīn's departure, and they proceeded as if they were the garrison of al-Nahr. But when they arrived they did not know the place where the banner and insignia of the commander of al-Nahr habitually stood and hence took up their position in a different spot.

Al-Haytham arrived and took up his position; but he was disquieted at what he saw, so he sent forward a paternal cousin of his, saying to him, "Go to this detestable character and tell him, 'Why have you halted there?'" Al-Haytham's cousin went along, but when he saw the group of persons he failed to recognize them, even when he drew near to them. Hence he returned to al-Haytham and informed him, "Indeed, I do not recognize these people!" Al-Haytham said to him, "May God confound you! How cowardly you are!" and he sent out five cavalrymen whom he [1177]

79. I.e., a woolen garment that buttoned up the front; see p. 31 n. 120, below. But, according to n. f in the text, ms. O has a variant reading, probably mazāriqahum, "their short spears or javelins."

80. Ṭarrādātihim, which could have the meaning "lances, javelins"; cf. R. P. A. Dozy, Supplément, II, 34; ms. O has the variant form ṭarā'idahum, as if it were the plural of ṭarīdah.

81. Khafātīn; for this garment, see Dozy, Vêtements, 162–68.

detached from his entourage. When they went along and drew near to Bābak two men from the Khurramiyyah sallied forth. They encountered the two men and failed to recognize them [as being really 'Alawayh's men] but gave the latter to understand that they had recognized them [as being ostensibly members of the Muslim caravan]. They galloped back to al-Haytham and told him, "The unbeliever has killed 'Alawayh and his companions, and they have taken their banners and their clothing."

[Al-]Haytham thereupon rode off and went back and came to the caravan that he had brought along under his escort. He ordered them to ride hard and return, lest they be captured. He himself remained with his troops, traveling with them for a few stages and then halting with them for a while, to divert the attention of the Khurramiyyah away from the caravan and acting as a protective force for them, as it were, until the caravan reached the fortress that was al-Haytham's base; that is, Arshaq. He said to his companions, "Whoever among you will go to the Amīr [al-Afshīn] and to Abū Sa'īd and will inform them of what has happened shall get 10,000 dirhams and a [new] horse to replace his own, and if his horse becomes exhausted, he will get a fresh one, just like the original one, on the spot!" So two of his men set out on sprightly horses at a gallop, while al-Haytham went back inside the fortress.

Bābak, accompanied by his troops, went forward until he halted at the fortress. A seat was set down for him there, and he sat down on an eminence opposite the fortress. He sent a message to al-Haytham, saying, "Clear out of the fortress and depart, for I intend to demolish it." But al-Haytham refused and delivered battle to him instead. Al-Haytham had with him in the fortress 600 foot soldiers and 400 cavalry, and the fortress had a strongly fortified trench, so he attacked Bābak. The latter sat down, in the midst of his followers, and wine was set before him to drink while the battle was raging, as was his custom.[82]

The two horsemen [those sent by al-Haytham] met al-Afshīn at

82. It is unclear whether a practice like this has any connection with the licentiousness attributed to the Khurramiyyah or Khurramdīnān, "devotees of the religion of joy," by their orthodox opponents. See E. M. Wright, "Bābak of Badhdh and al-Afshīn," 49; Scarcia Amoretti, op. cit., 504.

less than a farsakh from Arshaq, and the moment he saw them from afar he said to the commander of his vanguard, "I perceive two riders galloping at full tilt." Then he added, "Beat the drums [1178] and unfurl and banners, and gallop out toward the two riders." So his men did that; they sped onward, and al-Afshīn said to them, "Shout to the two of them, 'At your service, at your service!'"[83] The troops continued in a single gallop forward, vying in urging their horses onward, their mounts jostling each other, until they came up to Bābak, who was still seated. He did not have a chance to remove himself or to ride away before the cavalrymen and the body of troops reached him, and a closely fought battle, with the two sides locked together, was engaged. Not one of Bābak's foot soldiers escaped, but he himself escaped with a small group of men and withdrew into Mūqān, by which time his companions had become separated from him. Al-Afshīn remained in that place and spent the night there. Then he returned to his encampment at Barzand.[84]

Bābak remained in Mūqān for a certain number of days; then he sent a message to al-Badhdh, and during the night a force of troops, including foot soldiers, came to him. He traveled with them from Mūqān until he reached al-Badhdh. Al-Afshīn, meanwhile, continued to encamp at Barzand.

Some days later, a caravan passed by him (Bābak), going from Khushsh to Barzand, which had with it a man appointed by Abū Sa'īd named Ṣāliḥ Āb-kash, which means "the Water Carrier" (al-saqqā').[85] Bābak's general (iṣbahbadh) attacked him and seized the caravan, killing those who were in it and those in Ṣāliḥ's force. Ṣāliḥ himself escaped bootless (barefoot) with those who managed to get away, but all the people in the caravan were killed and their goods and possessions plundered. Thus al-Afshīn's army suffered deprivation (literally, "lacked water," qaḥaṭa) because of that caravan's being captured from al-Āb-

83. Labbayka, labbayka, the talbiyah or cry—meaningless by Islamic times—of the pilgrims, uttered during the wuqūf on 'Arafāt and at other points in the Ḥajj ceremonies. See J. Wellhausen, Reste, 79–80; M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Le pèlerinage, 179–85, 249.

84. Abū Tammām mentions this defeat of Bābak's in his poems; see Haq, op. cit., 22.

85. From Persian āb kashīdan, "to draw water."

kash,[86] for it had been carrying supplies and provisions. Al-Afshīn thereupon wrote to the commander of al-Marāghah,[87] ordering [1179] him to bring supplies and provisions and to send them to him with all possible speed because the troops were suffering from lack of water and food. The commander in al-Marāghah sent to him a huge caravan, having in it about a thousand steers, as well as asses and riding beasts and mules and the like, bearing supplies and provisions and accompanied by a body of troops as escort. But once again a detachment of Bābak's forces, commanded by either Ṭarkhān[88] or Ādhīn,[89] attacked them and treated the whole caravan, from front to end, and everything in it as their lawful plunder, leaving al-Afshīn's men reduced to dire straits. So al-Afshīn wrote to the commander in al-Sīrawān,[90] ordering him to send food, and he (the commander) accordingly dispatched a large quantity of food to al-Afshīn and brought succor to the people in that year. Also, Bughā came to al-Afshīn with money and men.[91]

In this year, in the month of Dhū al-Qa'dah (October–November 835), al-Mu'taṣim set out for al-Qāṭūl.[92]

---

86. With an ironical juxtaposition of the opposing concepts in qaḥaṭa and āb-kash.

87. One of the chief towns of Ādharbayjān, lying to the southeast of Lake Urmiya, and capital of the Arabs after their first invasions of that province. See Yāqut, Mu'jam, V, 93–94; Le Strange, Lands, 164–65; Schwarz, op. cit., 1005–23; Barthold, Historical Geography, 214–15; *EI*², s.v. al-Marāgha (V. Minorsky).

88. It is curious to see what was in origin an ancient, pre-Turkish title of Inner Asian political and tribal structures used by a presumably Iranian (but conceivably Khazar Turkish?) commander of Bābak's. On this title, see Bosworth and Clauson, op. cit., 11–12. According to R. N. Frye, the title Ṭarkhān should be distinguished from a personal name Ṭarkhūn found in early Islamic sources on the history of Central Asia; see "Ṭarxūn-Türxün," 105–29.

89. Literally, "custom, manner; adornment."

90. The chief town of the district of Māsabadhan in al-Jibāl (see p. 2 n. 6, above). See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 296–97; Le Strange, Lands, 202; Schwarz, op. cit., 466–67.

91. See also Dīnawarī, op. cit., 402–3; Azdī, op. cit., 422; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 382–83; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 447–51; Sadighi, op. cit., 252–53; E. M. Wright, op., cit., 50–51; S. Nafīsī, Bābak-i Khurram-dīn, 67 ff.

92. The name of canals flowing southward from the Tigris at Dūr just north of Sāmarrā, said to have been dug by Anūshirwān and Hārūn al-Rashīd. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 297–98; Le Strange, Lands, 57. Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 256–57, trans., 45–47, gives a detailed account of al-Mu'taṣim's attempts (apparently following earlier efforts by Hārūn al-Rashīd; see below) to establish a new military

The Reason for al-Mu'taṣim's Departure for al-Qāṭūl

It has been mentioned from Abū al-Wazīr Aḥmad b. Khālid[93] that he said: Al-Mu'taṣim sent for me in the year 219 (834) and told me, "O Aḥmad, purchase for me in the vicinity of Sāmarrā land on which I can build a city—for I am afraid lest these troops of the Ḥarbiyyah quarter[94] raise a great clamor and kill my slave retainers (ghilmānī)—in order that I may be above them (ḥattā akūna fawqahum).[95] But [once I am installed there], if anything emanating from them disquiets me, I shall come upon them by land and by sea until I overcome them." And he further said to [1180] me, "Take this 100,000 dīnārs." He related: I said, "I'll take 5,000 dīnārs, and whenever I need any additional money I'll send to you and ask for more." He agreed to that. So I went to the place in question and bought Sāmarrā for 500 dirhams from the Christians settlement for his slave troops outside Baghdad, starting in the east-bank suburb of Shammāsiyyah and gradually moving north, after rejecting various sites, to the Qāṭūl Canal, where construction was begun along the canal and the Tigris. It is not completely clear where al-Qāṭūl lay within the general area of the new town of Sāmarrā. See N. al-Asil, "La ciudad de al-Mu'taṣim en al-Qāṭūl," 339–57 (inconclusive); Herzfeld, op. cit., 71 ff.; J. M. Rogers, "Sāmarrā," 130; A. Northedge and R. Faulkner, "The 1986 Survey Season at Sāmarrā'," 158–60, noting that the site adjacent to al-Qāṭūl, al-Qādisiyyah of Sāmarrā (to be distinguished from the Qādisiyyah near al-Kūfah, site of the great battle between the Arabs and Persians), has been fairly certainly pinpointed within the Sāmarrā complex.

---

93. Secretary under al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq, said by Mas'ūdī to have acted briefly as vizier, perhaps without the specific title, at the outset of al-Mutawakkil's reign. See Murūj, VII, 197 = par. 2881; Herzfeld, op. cit., 108; D. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 263, 271.

94. I.e., the suburb to the north and northwest of al-Manṣūr's Round City, originally settled in the early 'Abbāsid period by the caliphs' Khurāsānian troops and subsequently the center of the Abnā'. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 107–35; J. Lassner, The Topography of Baghdad, index, s.v. Ḥarbiyya; Ṣ. A. al-'Alī, Baghdād, 165–84.

95. The meaning would appear to be that, by constructing his new military center upstream from Baghdad, at Sāmarrā, the Caliph would be placing a reasonable distance (actually about seventy-five miles) between his Turkish slave guards and their opponents, the Khurāsānian Arab nobility of the Abnā' (who, as mentioned in n. 94, above, formed the main population element in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter of Baghdad). He would be able further to swoop south on the latter from his position upriver. This seems a more probable translation than that in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 15: "kill my pages and me on top of them." Nor did Marin realize that here Ḥarbiyyah designates a specific group, not the common noun "warriors".

who dwelt in the monastery,[96] and I purchased the site of the Khāqānī garden[97] for another 5,000 dirhams plus a number of other places until I had fully accomplished what I had set out to do. Then I traveled down [the Tigris] with the deeds of sale (al-ṣikāk).[98] Al-Muʿtaṣim resolved to move there in the year 220 (835). He set out until, when he drew near to al-Qāṭūl, the pavilions and tents (al-qibāb wa-al-maḍārib) were pitched there for him, and all the troops pitched their tents (al-akhbiyah).[99] Thereafter he continued to put into practice his intentions, and tents were set up for him until buildings were erected at Sāmarrā in the year 221 (836).[100]

It has been mentioned from Abū al-Ḥasan b. Abī ʿAbbād al-Kātib that Masrūr al-Khādim al-Kabīr said: Al-Muʿtaṣim once asked me, "Where did al-Rashīd use to have his pleasure ground when he grew fed up with staying in Baghdad?" He related: I replied to him, "At al-Qāṭūl." Al-Rashīd had built a city there, the vestiges and walls of which still remained, for he had been afraid of what his troops might do, just as al-Muʿtaṣim feared. But when the people of Syria rose up and rebelled in Syria al-Rashīd

96. There are said to have been no fewer than eight monasteries in the area.

97. Presumably the garden of the Jawsaq al-Khāqānī palace, the modern Qaṣr al-Khalīfah, to the north of the modern town of Sāmarrā. It was named for the Caliph's Turkish general, the Khāqān Abū al-Fatḥ ʿUrtūj, to whom, as to other commanders, a qaṭīʿah, or concession of land was granted; see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 258, trans. 48–50.

98. Sing. ṣakk, a commercial, legal, and above all financial term. Here the ṣikak brought back by Aḥmad would attest the disbursement of the price paid to the original owners of the land. For the term, see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī," 125–26. 127.

99. On the terminology for tents and their components—the nuances in significance of the various types of tent often being obscure today—see *EI*², s.v. Khayma (Ch. Pellat et al.).

100. The bibliography on the foundation of Sāmarrā and the attempts to identify specific buildings within the urban site is very extensive. For the history of Sāmarrā during the fifty odd years of its occupation by the caliphs, see Herzfeld, op. cit., 86–270. For a general consideration of Sāmarrā and its environs as an expression of caliphal self-glorification, see Rogers, op. cit., 119–55. For the most recent excavations on the site, now considerably eroded by urbanization and agricultural development, see Northedge, "Planning Sāmarra'"; idem and Faulkner, op. cit., 143–73.

went off to al-Raqqah.[101] He stayed at this latter place, and the city at al-Qāṭūl remained uncompleted.

When al-Mu'taṣim set out for al-Qāṭūl he left his son Hārūn al-Wāthiq as his deputy in Baghdad.

Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. Bawwāzah al-Farrā' related to me that the reason for al-Mu'taṣim's departure for al-Qāṭūl was that his Turkish slave retainers were continually finding (their comrades), one after the other, slain in their quarters. This arose from the [1181] fact that they were rough-mannered barbarians ('ujm)[102] who used to ride their steeds and gallop through the streets and roads of Baghdad, knocking down men and women and trampling children underfoot. As a result, the men of the Abnā' would seize them, drag them off their steeds, and inflict wounds on some of them; on occasion, some of them would perish through their wounds. The Turks complained of that to al-Mu'taṣim, and because of them the general populace suffered. Ja'far further mentioned that he saw al-Mu'taṣim riding back from the muṣallā on the day of the Festival of the Sacrifice or that of the Breaking of the Fast, and when he reached the square of al-Ḥarashī[103] he perceived that an old man had planted himself in his path and cried out, "O Abū Isḥāq!" He related: The troops hastened forward to strike him, but al-Mu'taṣim motioned to them and restrained them from him, saying to the old man, "What do you want?" The old man answered, "May God not recompense you with good for your stay here among us! You have dwelt among us and have brought in these untutored foreigners ('ulūj)[104] and have set them down to dwell in our midst. Through them you have made our children orphans, you have made our womenfolk 101. The main center of the Diyār Muḍar district of al-Jazīrah, which al-Rashīd in effect made his capital during his later years. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 58–60; Le Strange, Lands, 101–2; Canard, Histoire, 90–91; EI[1], s.v. al-Raḳḳa (E. Honigmann).

102. Literally, "those speaking Arabic indistinctly," a'jam.

103. The murabba'ah of (Sa'īd) al-Ḥarashī, which included within it a market and a palace, marked the site of Sa'īd's qaṭī'ah in the Mukharrim quarter on the east side of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 221–22; Lassner, op. cit., 79, 262–63. Sa'īd stemmed from a Qaysī family prominent as military commanders under both the Umayyads and early 'Abbāsids; see Crone, op. cit., 144–145.

104. Literally, "stout, coarse-bodied," 'ilj, but applied especially to non-Arabs, usually those who were country dwellers.

widows, and you have killed our men!" Al-Mu'taṣim listened to all of that. He related: Then he went back into his palace and was not seen again out riding until the very same day of the following year. When it was the next year, on exactly the same day, al-Mu'taṣim went forth and led the people's worship at the celebration of the Festival; however, he did not go back to his residence in Baghdad but turned his steed's face toward the vicinity of al-Qāṭūl and left Baghdad, never to return thither.[105]

In this year al-Mu'taṣim became angry with al-Faḍl b. Marwān and imprisoned him.

The Reason behind al-Mu'taṣim's Anger against al-Faḍl b. Marwān and His Imprisoning of the Latter, and the Reason for al-Faḍl's Connection with al-Mu'taṣim

It has been mentioned that al-Faḍl b. Marwān, who was a man 1182] from al-Baradān,[106] was connected with one of the financial officials, for whom he used to indite correspondence; he had a beautiful hand. Then he joined one of al-Mu'taṣim's secretaries

---

105. Al-Mu'taṣim's prime motive for moving from the 'Abbāsids' ancestral capital to the new town of Sāmarrā—where there was probably some form of settlement around the monasteries even before al-Rashīd's time—does seem broadly to have been a desire to separate his professional slave troops (Turks, Maghribīs, etc.) from the longer-established Abnā' military elements in the Ḥarbiyyah and other parts of Baghdad, as Ṭabarī (followed also by trans. Bal'amī, IV, 523–25; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 381–82; and Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 451–52) states here. It is likewise the motive put forward by the other early sources, including Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 255–64, trans., 44–57; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 118–23 = pars. 2801–5; idem, Tanbīh, 356–57, trans., 457–58; cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., 88 ff. As D. Ayalon has remarked ("Preliminary Remarks," 53–56), there seems no reason to doubt these assertions. Nor is there any sound reason for adopting the skeptical attitude of Shaban, op. cit., 63, toward the idea that the new troops were proving a rowdy and uncontrollable element in the city of Baghdad itself. See also on the topic of the motive behind the transfer to Sāmarrā, O. S. A. Ismail, "Founding of a New Capital," 3–6; and H. Kennedy, The Prophet and the Age of the Caliphates, 158–60, who attempts, on the questions of the legal status and the ethnic origins of the new troops (see also p. 49 n. 159, below), to steer a middle course between the views of Shaban, on the one hand, and those of Crone (op. cit., especially, 78–79) and D. Pipes (Slave Soldiers and Islam, especially, 150–58), on the other.

106. A small town on the left bank of the Tigris just north of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 375–76; Le Strange, Lands, 32, 50; *EI*², s.v. Baradān (M. Streck-[S. H. Longrigg]).

called Yaḥyā al-Jurmuqānī, and al-Faḍl b. Marwān used to indite letters directly for him. When al-Jurmuqānī died al-Faḍl succeeded to his place,[107] and ʿAlī b. Ḥassān al-Anbārī used then to indite correspondence for al-Faḍl. This arrangement continued until al-Muʿtaṣim attained his high office,[108] with al-Faḍl as his secretary. Then al-Faḍl accompanied al-Muʿtaṣim to al-Maʾmūn's field headquarters and after that went with him to Egypt, where he gathered in the taxes of Egypt. Before al-Maʾmūn's death al-Faḍl returned to Baghdad, where he used to deal with al-Muʿtaṣim's business affairs and used to write down, in al-Muʿtaṣim's name, whatever he himself desired until al-Muʿtaṣim came [to Baghdad] as caliph. From that point on, al-Faḍl became the effective director of the caliphate: All the government departments came under his control, and he stored up all the collected taxes. When Abū Isḥāq [al-Muʿtaṣim] entered Baghdad he ordered al-Faḍl in the first place to give largesse to singers and musicians, but al-Faḍl failed to carry out that order; this made Abū Isḥāq resentful.[109]

Ibrāhīm b. Jahrawayh related to me that Ibrāhīm, who had the cognomen al-Haftī ("the Foolish"), was a jester and buffoon (muḍḥik) and al-Muʿtaṣim ordered him to be given a sum of money. He instructed al-Faḍl b. Marwān to pay out that sum to Ibrāhīm, but al-Faḍl would not give him what al-Muʿtaṣim had commanded that he was to get. Some time afterward, al-Haftī was with al-Muʿtaṣim one day—this being after his palace in Baghdad had been built and a garden there had been made for his use—and al-Muʿtaṣim got up and walked around the garden, looking at it and at the various kinds of aromatic herbs and trees growing 107. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 248 n. 1.

108. I.e., when he became governor in Egypt and suppressed the rebellion there in 214–15 (829–30). See Ṭabarī, III, 1101; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 567; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 409; A. H. Saleh, "Les Bédouins d'Égypte," 157.

109. On al-Faḍl, who was the first of the many secretaries of Iraqi Christian origin to serve the caliphs during this century, see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 246–53; and *EI*², s.v. al-Faḍl b. Marwān (D. Sourdel). It seems that, as is implied here and in the next anecdote, al-Faḍl endeavored during his three-year vizierate, 218–21 (833–36), to restore financial stability and to satisfy the pay demands of the troops by restricting the caliph's personal expenditure and prodigality. Unusually, after his fall he filled lesser administrative offices under al-Wāthiq and other caliphs, dying in 250 (864) at an advanced age.

there, accompanied by al-Haftī. Meanwhile, al-Haftī—who had been al-Mu'taṣim's companion since before the caliphate came to [1183] him[110]—was saying to him, among the pleasantries he was exchanging with the caliph, "By God, your affairs will never prosper!" He related: Al-Haftī happened to be a plumpish person of middle height, whereas al-Mu'taṣim was a lean man with little flesh on him. Al-Mu'taṣim would begin to outstrip al-Haftī when they were walking, and when he got ahead of al-Haftī and did not see the latter still with him he would turn to him and say, "Why don't you get a move on?" at the same time urging al-Haftī to catch up with him.

When this sequence of events involving al-Mu'taṣim and al-Haftī had taken place on several occasions al-Haftī said to him jokingly, "May God guide you in an upright way! I used to visualize myself ambling around with a caliph, but I never saw myself striding along with a courier![111] By God, I am sure your affairs will never prosper!" Al-Mu'taṣim laughed at all this and said, "Woe on you! Is there anything of success remaining that I have not already attained? Can you say this to me after my having attained the caliphate?" But al-Haftī replied, "Do you really think that you have now attained success? In reality, you have nothing of the caliphate except the mere name! By God, your commands do not go farther than your own ears! The real caliph is al-Faḍl b. Marwān, who issues commands that are immediately put into execution." Al-Mu'taṣim said to him, "And what command of mine has not been carried out?" Al-Haftī responded, "Two months ago you commanded that I should be given so-and-so, but since that time I have not been given even a single grain[112] of what you commanded." He related: As a result, al-Mu'taṣim held this in his mind against al-Faḍl until he pounced upon him.[113]

It has been said that the first thing that al-Mu'taṣim did concerning al-Faḍl when his attitude toward him changed was to 110. Following the Cairo edition, IX, 19, qabla an tufḍiya.

---

111. Fayj, the Arabized form of Persian payk, "messenger, courier."

112. Habbah, literally "a grain of corn," but used as a weight—the smallest one distinguished—for gold and silver coins, canonically something like .0445 gr. but varying among different provinces of the Islamic world and at different periods. See W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 12–13.

113. Cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., 93.

appoint Aḥmad b. 'Ammār al-Khurāsānī[114] as financial controller (zimām)[115] over him in regard to the privy-purse expenditure and Naṣr b. Manṣūr b. Bassām as financial controller over him in regard to the land tax and all other taxes collected. And he continued like that.[116]

Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt[117] used to be responsible, just as his father had been responsible in the time of al-Ma'mūn, for the manufacture of the parasol (al-mushammas),[118] the large tents (al-fasāṭīṭ),[119] and the equipment for swift riding camels (ālat al-jammāzāt), and in return for that, he ('Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt) used to write about what Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt was doing (i.e., acted as a spy on his son's activities). Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik used to wear a black durrā'ah[120] and a sword with its belts and fastenings

---

114. A native of al-Mādhar in lower Iraq, he became chief secretary to al-Mu'taṣim in Ṣafar 221 (February 836); after al-Faḍl's disgrace, he seems to have acted for a while as vizier, in practice if not in name. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 252, 253, II, 726.

115. On this term, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 601–2. At various epochs under the 'Abbāsids there was a special Dīwān al-Zimām/al-Azimmah to control the accounts of the financial departments. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 106; *EI*², s.v. Dīwān. i. The Caliphate (A. A. Duri).

116. Cf. Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 252.

117. Literally, "the dealer in oil" (zayt); hence the reference below to Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik as a trader or tradesman (tājir).

118. I.e., the miẓallah, Persian chatr, which was one of the insignia of royal power. See *EI*², s.v. Miẓalla (C. E. Bosworth et al.); Bosworth, Ghaznavids, index s.vv. chatr, chatr-dār.

119. Fusṭāṭ, from Late Latin fossatum, "trench (and rampart)," originally denoted the armed camps of earliest Islam (as in the name Fusṭāṭ for the Arabs' new center in Egypt after transfer of the capital from Alexandria); see Glossarium, CDIII. The term seems then to have come to denote the large tents that must have been a feature of these camps in their early stages; see Dozy, Supplément, II, 266.

120. The durrā'ah, a robe that seems to have had a slit fastened with buttons in the front, was worn on ceremonial occasions by the 'Abbāsid caliphs from the time of al-Manṣūr to the mid-third (ninth) century, when it was replaced by a shorter jacket (qabā') of Persian origin. It was also worn by civilian and military members of the ruling elite, as distinct from the religious classes (for whom the ṭaylasān was regarded as the distinguishing garment; see p. 192 n. 553, below) and the lower classes. Cf. the geographer Maqdisī's use of the term ahl al-durrā'ah, cited in Mez, op. cit., 75, trans., 83–84, and his experience of the greater prestige conferred by the wearing of a durrā'ah, cited in D. A. Agius, Arabic Literary Works, 217–20; for information on the garment in general, see Dozy, Vêtements, [1184] whenever he was present at court. Al-Faḍl b. Marwān said to him, "You're only a trader; what right have you to wear black and carry a sword?" So Muḥammad had to stop wearing these. When Muḥammad had done this al-Faḍl moved against him by bringing his accounts to the attention of Dulayl b. Ya'qūb al-Naṣrānī,[121] and then he arraigned him. But Dulayl acted kindly in the matter of Muḥammad and did not confiscate anything from him. Muḥammad offered Dulayl presents, but the latter refused to accept anything at all from Muḥammad.[122]

When it was the year 219 (834)—or, it has been said, (2)20 (835), but in my opinion this is a mistake—al-Mu'taṣim set out toward al-Qāṭūl, intending to undertake building operations at Sāmarrā. But the excessively high level of the Tigris waters deflected him from this, and he was unable to continue his move; hence he turned back to Baghdad and to al-Shammāsiyyah. Then he set out again after that. When he reached al-Qāṭūl in Ṣafar (February–March 834) he showed his anger at al-Faḍl b. Marwān and his household and ordered them to give an accounting of what had passed through their hands. Al-Faḍl was arrested, as the object of [al-Mu'taṣim's] anger regarding the conduct of his accounts. When al-Mu'taṣim had completed this accounting process he made no further investigation into his affairs, but he ordered him (al-Faḍl) to be imprisoned and conveyed to his house at Baghdad in the street of the Maydān.[123] He further imprisoned al-Faḍl's associates and appointed in his place Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt.[124] He jailed Dulayl and exiled al-Faḍl to 177–81; idem, Supplément, I, 434. At this point in Ṭabarī's History al-Faḍl b. Marwān is ridiculing Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik's pretensions to membership in the secretarial class. Black was, of course, the official 'Abbāsid color (whence the name al-Musawwidah, "wearers of black," applied to their partisans at the time of the 'Abbāsid Revolution). See Hilāl al-Ṣābi', Rusūm dār al-khilāfah, 91–92, trans., 74; Mez, op. cit., 80, trans., 89; F. Omar, 'Abbāsiyyāt, 148–49.

---

121. A Christian official who was later secretary to the Turkish general Bughā al-Ṣaghīr; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 256, 304.

122. Ibid., 255–56.

123. Naturally, there were many squares and open places (mayādīn) in Baghdad, but it is unclear which particular one is meant here.

124. According to Ibrāhīm al-Bayhaqī, op. cit., ed. Schwally, 567 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 332–33, when al-Faḍl was disgraced and imprisoned, he was made to disgorge (isti'dā') 1.6 million dīnārs.

a village called al-Sinn[125] on the road to al-Mawṣil, where he thenceforth remained. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik now acted as vizier and secretary, and the greater part of the building operations that al-Muʿtaṣim undertook at Sāmarrā, both on the eastern and western banks [of the Tigris], passed through his hands. He continued to enjoy his high position until al-Mutawakkil became caliph and then killed Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik.[126]

It has been mentioned that when al-Muʿtaṣim appointed al-Faḍl b. Marwān as his vizier the latter came to occupy a position so close to al-Muʿtaṣim's heart that no one could hope to gain his attention, much less to dispute with him or to thwart him [1185] regarding his commands and prohibitions, his requirements and decisions. This continued to be his manner of acting and his exalted status until overconfidence and a sense of his own great prestige impelled him to oppose al-Muʿtaṣim in regard to certain of the latter's commands and to refuse him money that he was needing for his important affairs.

It has been mentioned from Ibn Abī Duwād[127] that he said: I used to be present at al-Muʿtaṣim's court sessions, and I often used to hear him say to al-Faḍl b. Marwān, "Bring me so-and-so amount of money," and al-Faḍl would reply, "I haven't got it," at which al-Muʿtaṣim would say, "Then devise some means or other of procuring it!" Al-Faḍl would answer, "Where am I going to be able to light upon such a sum, who will give me this amount of money, and with whom shall I find it?" That used to displease al-Muʿtaṣim, as I could discern from his face. When al-Faḍl had behaved thus on several occasions I rode over to him one day and said to him, after having sought a private word with him, "O Abū al-ʿAbbās, people are coming between us with what I dislike and you dislike, too. You are a man whose character I have well understood, but those who come between us understand it equally. If I am compelled to take action against you[128] justifiably, then set it down as devoid of real animus (do not hold it against me). Despite that, I shall not cease giving you sincere advice and doing what is incumbent upon me to perform or justly owed to you. Now I have often observed you returning the Commander of the Faithful a brusque answer that sears him and pierces his heart. A ruling authority (sulṭān)[129] will not tolerate this even in his own son, especially when it happens frequently and in an abrupt manner." He asked, "O Abū ʿAbdallāh, what exactly is this?" I replied, "I have often heard him say to you, 'We need such-and-such an amount of money for expending on so-and-so matter,' and you retort, 'And who will give me this sum?' This sort of thing is what caliphs will not tolerate." He [1186] said, "But what, then, am I to do when he demands from me what I don't have?" I said, "Be prepared to say, 'O Commander of the Faithful, we will devise some means or other for getting that,' and you will secure for yourself a delay of a few days until he is prepared, and then you will take to him part of what he seeks and put him off in regard to the remainder." He replied, "Yes, I'll do that, and I'll adopt the procedure that you advise me." He related: Yet, by God, it was as if I had been urging him on to refuse (even more), for, when the caliph once more repeated to him his

125. At the junction of the Tigris and Lower Zāb rivers, about halfway between al-Mawṣil and Sāmarrā. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 268–69; Le Strange, Lands, 90–91.

126. Ibn al-Zayyāt was to serve al-Muʿtaṣim as his second vizier, in 221–27 (838–42), and his successor al-Wāthiq as his first vizier, in 227–32 (842–47). He also briefly served al-Mutawakkil in 232–33 (847) until he was executed, after having been tortured in an instrument of his own devising, a spiked cylinder similar to the Nuremburg Iron Maiden. He left behind him a reputation for harshness and cruelty. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 254–69; *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Zayyāt (D. Sourdel).

127. Chief judge under al-Muʿtaṣim and the guiding spirit behind the Muʿtazilī inquisition, or miḥnah, established by al-Maʾmūn toward the end of his reign. His influence on al-Muʿtaṣim seems to have been as great as that of the Caliph's viziers, and in fact he grew increasingly hostile to Ibn al-Zayyāt (Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 258–60, 265, 269). See the extensive biography in al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, IV, 141–56 no. 1825; *EI*², s.vv. Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād (K. V. Zetterstéen and Ch. Pellat), Miḥna (M. Hinds).

128. Following the voweling of the Cairo edition, IX, 21, fa-idhā ḥurriktu fīka. The passage is, however, difficult; one might read fa-idhā ḥarrakat fīka, with the word "character" (akhlāqaka) considered as the subject of the verb and with a meaning like "if it stirs up in you a charge (against me), then consider it false, and on that basis, I shall not cease . . . ."

129. Or perhaps this is an early instance of the abstract noun in its later sense of "the holder of power > ruler," as sulṭān is at least personified here as having a son; see EI[1], s.v. Sulṭān (J. H. Kramers).

demand with the same words, al-Faḍl returned an answer of the same sort as the caliph resented.

He related: When al-Mu'taṣim had endured this treatment on several occasions al-Faḍl came into his presence one day bearing a bunch of freshly plucked narcissus. Al-Mu'taṣim took them and toyed with them, and then he said, "O Abū al-'Abbās, may God preserve you alive!" Al-Faḍl took them in his right hand, and al-Mu'taṣim drew his seal ring from the finger of al-Faḍl's left hand, saying to him in a low voice,[130] "Give me my seal ring," and then pulled it from al-Faḍl's hand and placed it in Ibn 'Abd al-Malik's hand.[131]

In this year Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the Pilgrimage.[132]

---

130. Or perhaps "in words full of hidden meaning," bi-kalām khafī.

131. Kitāb al-'uyūn, 383–84; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 453–54; Herzfeld, op. cit., 93–94. According to Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 356, trans., 456, al-Mu'taṣim's seal had the motto "Glory to God, Who has no equal, Creator of all things," but, according to Kitāb al-'uyūn, 410, the motto was "God is the Trusted One of Muḥammad b. al-Rashīd, and in Him he believes." See the discussion on the caliphs' seals in Herzfeld, op. cit., 156–57.

132. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 784; Azdī, op. cit., 424; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 454.

The Events of the Year

221

(DECEMBER 26, 835–DECEMBER 13, 836)

Among the events taking place during this year was the battle that took place in the vicinity of Hashtādsar[133] between Bābak and Bughā al-Kabīr, in which Bughā was defeated and his camp laid open to plundering. Also in this year al-Afshīn fell upon Bābak and defeated him.

[1187] ### The Clashes of Bughā al-Kabīr and al-Afshīn with Bābak, and the Reasons behind Them

It has been mentioned that Bughā al-Kabīr reached al-Afshīn with the money which has previously been mentioned and that al-Mu'taṣim also sent with him to al-Afshīn pay for the troops accompanying him and for his own expenses. Furthermore, Bughā reached him with the troops for al-Afshīn that were being sent out with him [as reinforcements]. Al-Afshīn was thus able to pay the money to his troops, and after the New Year celebrations he fitted out his troops in readiness and sent Bughā with a force to circle round Hashtādsar and encamp at the Trench of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd[134] and excavate it further, strengthen it, and station himself there. Bughā set out and made his way to the Trench of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd. Al-Afshīn left Barzand, and Abū Sa'īd left Khushsh in search of Bābak. They met up at a place called Darwadh.[135] There al-Afshīn dug a trench and built a rampart round it, and he and Abū Sa'īd, together with those volunteers (muṭṭawwi'ah)[136] who had joined his forces, encamped within the perimeter of the trench. Between him (or: it) and al-Badhdh was six miles.

133. In Persian literally "eighty peaks." This must have lain in the mountain region of northern Ādharbayjān; see Schwarz, op. cit., 990–91. It may well be, as the editor Houtsma conjectured, the name that lies behind the very corrupt rendering (Sādār.s.b ?) of the name of the place where al-Afshīn is said by Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 578, to have established himself; see also Herzfeld, op. cit., 139 n. 3.

Bughā now made his preparations and took with him traveling provisions of a different kind from those about which al-Afshīn had written to him and a kind that he had not ordered him to take. He circled round Hashtādsar until he entered the settled area (qaryah) of al-Badhdh[137] and halted in its center, remaining there for one day. Then he sent out 1,000 men as a foraging party ('allāfah). But one of Bābak's detachments came out and put to plunder the foraging party, killing all those who resisted them

---

134. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī was the grandson of 'Abd al-Ḥamid al-Ṭā'ī, one of the leaders of the 'Abbāsid da'wah; the family seems subsequently to have kept up its links with and residence in Khurāsān. See Crone, op. cit., 174–75; Arazi and El'ad, op. cit., 61 n. 79. Muḥammad had been killed at Hashtādsar in 214 (829) by Bābak's army, after he had constructed this defensive khandaq. See Ṭabarī, III, 1101; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 373–74; Niẓām al-Mulk, op. cit., 291–92, trans., 233; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 412–13; Schwarz, op. cit., 971–72, 1167–68.

135. Apparently the Dū al-Rūd mentioned by Ibn Khurradādhbih, al-Masālik wa-al-mamālik, 121, as one farsakh from al-Badhdh but here placed by Ṭabarī at six miles' distance. It would appear to be the D.r.w.dh al-Rūdh of Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 578 (reading the defective text thus). See Schwarz op. cit., 1131; Sadighi, op. cit., 254 n. 3.

136. I.e., those irregular troops who were not originally registered on the dīwān, hence in receipt of 'aṭā' or salary, but who joined up with the professional forces and received a share of captured plunder; see Levy, op. cit., 415. On the role of volunteers and ghāzīs in the society and affairs of Transoxania and Khurāsān see Barthold, Turkestan, 214–15. Men from these regions almost certainly would have followed al-Afshīn from the eastern Islamic provinces to the campaigns against Bābak here in Ādharbayjān.

137. If the recent identification of the site of al-Badhdh (see p. 14 n. 57, above) is correct, this must have been the urban area in the valley around the approximately 8,000-foot-high mountain on which Bābak's citadel and residence were situated.

and taking prisoner all whom they could. Bābak's force selected some of the captives and sent two men, who were especially close [1188] to al-Afshīn, from among them and instructed them, "Go to al-Afshīn and inform him about what has befallen your comrades." The two men hove in sight, and the chief of the force of watchmen placed on the mountaintops (al-kuhbāniyyah)[138] spotted them. He waved the signal flag, and at that the troops in the encampment shouted "To arms, to arms!" and rode out in the direction of al-Badhdh. The two men, reduced to a state of nakedness, met them. The commander of the vanguard took them and brought them to al-Afshīn, and they told him about the calamity that had befallen them, and al-Afshīn commented, "Bughā did something without authorization from us."

Bughā returned to the Trench of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd in something resembling a rout and wrote to al-Afshīn, telling him about it and asking him for reinforcements, explaining that his army had been shattered. Al-Afshīn sent to him his brother al-Faḍl b. Kāwūs, Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl b. Hishām,[139] Ibn Jawshan, Janāḥ al-Aʿwar al-Sukkarī, the commander of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's[140] police guard (shurṭah), and one of two brothers, kindred of al-Faḍl b. Sahl.[141] They circled round Hashtādsar, and the troops in Bughā's camp were inspirited by their approach. Then al-Afshīn wrote to Bughā, informing him that he himself would lead out an expedition against Bābak on a day that he specified to him and ordering Bughā also to lead [another] expedition on that same day to attack Bābak from both sides.

---

138. See Glossarium, CDLXI, literally "mountain keepers." According to Herzfeld, op. cit., 141 n. 2, the term stems from Middle Persian kōhbān* < Old Persian kaufa-pāna* "mountain guard, watcher". There is nothing in Ṭabarī or in any other source to support Shaban's conjecture, op. cit., 66–67, that these mountain watchmen were from al-Afshīn's native province of Ushrūsanah; it is more probable that they were recruited on the spot in Ādharbayjān, as experts on the local terrain and conditions.

139. Later to be involved in the conspiracy to depose al-Muʿtaṣim in favor of al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn; he was punished by death at Sāmarrā. See Ṭabarī, III, 1260–67 (pp. 125–33, below).

140. I.e., al-Maʾmūn's old commander and secretary, and the Caliph's father-in-law through his marriage to Būrān; see *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl (D. Sourdel).

141. I.e., al-Ḥasan's brother and vizier to al-Maʾmūn; see *EI*², s.v. al-Faḍl b. Sahl b. Zadhānfarūkh (D. Sourdel).

Al-Afshīn accordingly went forth on the specified day from Darwadh intending to attack Bābak; and Bughā set out from the Trench of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd, ascended to Hashtādsar, and encamped within hailing distance[142] at the side of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd's grave.[143] But a cold wind and violent rain raged, and the troops were unable to hold the position on account of the excessive cold and strong wind, so that Bughā returned to his camp.

The next morning, after Bughā had already gone back to his camp, al-Afshīn fell upon Bābak's troops; he put Bābak to flight, [1189] captured his camp, his tent, and also a woman who was with him in the camp. He then established himself in Bābak's encampment.

In the morning Bughā again got his forces ready and went up to Hashtādsar, but he found that the force that had been established opposite him at Hashtādsar had already gone back to join Bābak; so Bughā pushed on to the place where the force had been, finding there, however, only simple utensils and pieces of clothing. He descended from Hashtādsar toward al-Badhdh, and on the way found a man and a youth sleeping. Dāwūd Siyāh,[144] the commander of Bughā's vanguard, seized them and interrogated them. They related that an envoy from Bābak had come to them on the night in which Bābak had fled in defeat and had ordered them to meet up with him at al-Badhdh. The man and youth were both drunk, and sleep had overcome them, so that they had no other information except this. This incident took place before the afternoon worship. At this point Bughā sent a message to Dāwūd Siyāh, saying, "We are now in the midst of the place with which we are already familiar (he meant the place where they had been the first time). It is now evening, and the infantrymen are tired out; so look for a naturally defensible mountain that will accommodate our army, so that we may encamp there tonight." Dāwūd Siyāh sought for such a site. He ascended one of the mountains and made for its summit and from there looked down. He saw al-Afshīn's banner and his encampment almost opposite and said, "This will be our place until early next morning, and at that time we will swoop down upon the unbelievers (i.e., Bābak and his followers), if God wills."

142. 'Alā da'wah. Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIII, suggest the possible reading 'alā raghwah "on a rocky area."

143. A possible reading from ms. O, signaled in n. p of the text, is "Trench" (khandaq, instead of qabr), this being followed in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 23.

144. I.e., in Persian "the Black One."

However, during that night clouds came down upon them, accompanied by cold and rain and heavy snow, so that when morning arrived no one was able to descend the mountain to fetch water or to water the riding beasts because of the intense cold and excessive snow. The heavily overcast sky and the mist were such that it was as if they were still in the night. At the third day the troops said to Bughā, "The provisions that we had with us [1190] are now exhausted, and the cold has been harmful for us. So go down, whatever course of action is to be adopted, whether for us to return or to press on toward the unbeliever." The days remained misty; Bābak harried al-Afshīn by night and hammered his army so that al-Afshīn disengaged his forces and withdrew into his encampment.

Bughā then beat his drums and went down, still seeking to reach al-Badhdh, until he reached the plain. There he saw the sky clear and the terrain passable everywhere, except for the mountaintop where he had been. Bughā now deployed his troops in battle formation, with a right wing, a left wing, and a vanguard, and moved forward in the direction of al-Badhdh, never doubting that al-Afshīn was in his encampment. He proceeded onward until he came to the side of the mountain of al-Badhdh, and there only a half-mile ascent remained between where he was and the point where he would be overlooking the houses of al-Badhdh. In his vanguard were a number of soldiers, including a youth (or slave, ghulām) of Ibn Baʿīth's, who had relatives in al-Badhdh. Scouts of Bābak's met them, and the youth recognized one and said to him, "So-and-so!" The man replied, "Who's this here?" So the youth named to the man those of his kinsmen who were with him. The man said, "Draw near, and let me speak with you!" So the youth went up to him, and the man said, "Go back, and tell the person in charge to withdraw, for we have attacked al-Afshīn by night, and he has fled to his defensive trench, and against you, moreover, we have prepared two armies. Hence return quickly, and you may be able to escape!"

The youth went back and informed Ibn al-Ba'īth about all this. He named the man to him, and Ibn al-Ba'īth knew the man in question; so he informed Bughā about this. Bughā halted and took counsel with his companions. One of them expostulated, however, "This is a fraud, this is a trick, there can't be anything in it!" At this, one of the mountain watchman said, "This is a mountaintop with which I am familiar! Anyone who ascends to its summit will be able to see al-Afshīn's camp." Bughā, al-Faḍl b. [1191] Kāwūs, and a group of their men who were agile and nimble climbed up and were able to look down on the place; but they could not discern al-Afshīn's camp there and were convinced that he had moved away. They consulted together again and came to the opinion that the troops should go back in the early part of the daytime before the night enveloped them. Bughā ordered Dāwūd Siyāh to return, and he set out, traveling swiftly and avoiding the road by which he had previously approached Hashtādsar, fearful of the defiles and mountain tracks. Instead, he took the road that he had taken the first time, circling round Hashtādsar, as there were no defiles along it except at one place. He traveled with the troops and sent the infantrymen on ahead. The latter threw away their spears and weapons along the road (i.e., to travel more swiftly), and a great fear and terror came over them.

Bughā, al-Faḍl b. Kāwūs, and a group of the commanders traveled in the rear guard. Bābak's scouts appeared, and, whenever Bughā's troops went down a mountain slope, Bābak's scouts went up it (to spy on them). Sometimes the scouts came into their sight and sometimes they were out of their view; and the scouts, comprising about ten horsemen in all, were following the army's tracks until the period between the noon and afternoon worships (i.e., the early afternoon). Bughā dismounted to do the minor ablutions and perform the worship. Bābak's scouts drew near them and came out into the open within their field of vision. Bughā performed the worship and stood there, within their sight, and when they saw him they halted. Bughā was afraid for his army, lest the scouts should fall upon it from one side and a further body of Bābak's forces should encircle them in some of the mountains and defiles. He sought the advice of those who were with him and said, "I am not sure that these people have not planned a diversionary attack that will prevent us from [1192] continuing along the road, and then they will send forward their forces to seize the defiles against our own troops."

But al-Faḍl b. Kāwūs told him, "These people do not fight by day, but only by night, and one need fear for our troops only at night; so send to Dāwūd Siyāh [a message telling him] to speed up his march and not to halt, even if it should not be midnight before he gets through the defile. Meanwhile we will wait here, for as long as the enemy forces continue to keep us in their view, they will not go onward. In that way, we shall delay them and keep them off to some extent until darkness falls. Then, when it is dark, they will not know our position, and our troops will go forward and pass through one by one; and, if the defile is closed against us, we will reach safety by means of the Hashtādsar road or some other route."

Someone else, however, gave Bughā advice and pointed out, "The army has become divided into separate groups, and its front portion will not be able to join up with the rear portion. Moreover, the troops have thrown down their weapons, although money and arms still remain on the mules. There is no one with this money and arms, and we cannot be sure that someone may not make a dash for it and seize the money and the captive," meaning Ibn Jawīdhān,[145] who was a prisoner with them and by means of whom they sought to ransom a secretary of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥabīb who had been captured by Bābak.

When the [additional factors of the] money, arms and captive were mentioned to Bughā, he decided to encamp with his troops; and he sent a message to Dāwūd Siyāh saying, "Wherever you see an easily defensible mountain, encamp there." Dāwūd turned aside and went obliquely up the side of a mountain, but there was no place on it for the troops to rest because of its excessively steep slopes. Dāwūd nevertheless pitched his camp and put up a tent for Bughā on the flank of the mountain in a spot that resembled a walled enclosure with no path into it. Bughā arrived and halted and made the troops encamp, for they were weary and tired, and their provisions were exhausted. They passed the night deployed ready for action and on guard against the direction of the slope; but the enemy came upon them from another direction and went up the mountainside until they reached Bughā's tent. They [1193] surrounded and attacked the tent and fell upon the army by night. Bughā fled on foot and escaped safely. Al-Faḍl b. Kāwūs was wounded; Janāḥ al-Sukkarī, Ibn Jawshan, and one of the two brothers who were kindred of al-Faḍl b. Sahl were killed. Bughā had indeed fled from the camp on foot, but he found a mount and rode on it, passing by Ibn al-Ba'īth. He made the latter go up [with him] to above Hashtādsar until he brought him down to Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd's camp (i.e., his Trench), which they reached in the middle of the night. The Khurramiyyah seized the money, the encampment, and the weapons and rescued the prisoner Ibn Jawīdhān; but they did not pursue the [Muslim] troops, and these last made their way, routed and in disarray, till they came to Bughā, who was within the Trench of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd.

145. Clearly the son of the leader of the Khurramī movement in its pre-Bābak phase, Jawīdhān b. Shahrak or Sahl [the latter in Ṭabarī, III, 1015], whose wife Bābak married after Jawīdhān had been killed in battle, thus consolidating his own role as the new leader of the sect. It would seem that Bābak was able to set aside any claims in leadership that Jawīdhān's son might have had. See E. G. Browne, Literary History, I, 324–28; Sadighi, op. cit., 242–45; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 45–47; Scarcia Amoretti, op. cit., 505, 517–18.

Bughā remained within the Trench of Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd for fifteen days. Then a letter reached him from al-Afshīn, ordering him to return to al-Marāghah and to send back the reinforcements that he had sent to strengthen him. Bughā proceeded to al-Marāghah, while al-Faḍl b. Kāwūs, together with all those of al-Afshīn's troops who had gone with him, rejoined al-Afshīn. The latter allocated to them their winter quarters for that year until the spring of the following year arrived.[146]

In this year one of Bābak's commanders called Ṭarkhān was killed.

The Killing of Bābak's Commander Ṭarkhān

It has been mentioned that this Ṭarkhān held a prominent position in Bābak's entourage, being one of his commanders.

146. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 578–79; Dīnawarī, op. cit., 403; Azdī, op. cit., 422; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 382–85; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 456–59; Sadighi, op. cit., 254–55; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 52; Nafīsī, Bābak-i Khurram-dīn, 104–8.

When the winter of this year set in he sought permission from Bābak to pass the winter in a village of his in the vicinity of al-Marāghah. Al-Afshīn, meanwhile, was lying in wait for him [1194] and hoping to capture him because of his high position with Bābak. Bābak accordingly gave Ṭarkhān permission, so he went off to his village in the neighborhood of Hashtādsar to spend the winter. Al-Afshīn now wrote to Turk, the mawlā of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, who was then at al-Marāghah, ordering him to make a nocturnal raid on that village—which he described to him—with the aim of either killing Ṭarkhān or else sending him back to al-Afshīn as a prisoner. Turk therefore mounted a nocturnal raid against Ṭarkhān. He went to him in the middle of the night, killing him, and sending his head to al-Afshīn.[147]

In this year, Ṣūl Er-tigīn and people from his country arrived in fetters. The fetters were struck off them, and they were transported on mounts, there being about 200 men all told.[148]

In this year, al-Afshīn became angry with Rajā' al-Ḥiḍārī[149] and sent him forward in fetters.

---

147. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 459; Sadighi, op. cit., 255; Nafīsī, Bābak-i Khurram-dīn, 108.

148. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 460. The occasion of this event is otherwise unknown but appears related to the bringing into caliphal service—probably after defeat in a revolt or as the result of a punitive expedition into the steppes—of a member of the ancient Iranized Turkish rulers of the Gurgān and Dihistān steppes to the southeast of the Caspian Sea, who had the family or tribal name of Chöl, Arabized to Ṣūl, and a band of his retainers. The correct form of the man's name is more likely that given in the text n. e, from ms. O, Ṣūl-Tigīn "Ṣūl the Prince." A Ṣūl is mentioned as dihqān of Gurgān and Dihistān in 97 (715–16); see Ṭabarī, II, 1320. The famous family of Arabic littérateurs in the third-fourth (ninth-tenth) centuries, that of al-Ṣūlī, was descended from this local dynasty. See J. Marquart, Ērānšahr, 73; Barthold, History of the Turkman People, 87–88. At all events, Ṣūl-Tigīn now rapidly achieved favor with al-Mu'taṣim, for he is mentioned in Ṭabarī, III, 1313 (p. 194, below) as governor of Damascus in 226 (840–41).

149. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 460. Ḥiḍār (thus vocalized explicitly in Ibn al-Athīr, pace Caskel's spelling Ḥaḍār) b. Ḥarb b. 'Āmir were a clan of the South Arabian tribe of al-Ash'ar b. Udad; see Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharat al-nasab, I, Tafel 273, II, Register, 290. The cause of Rajā''s digrace is not specified here but cannot have been permanent; he was sent against the rebel al-Mubarqa' in Syria and Palestine in 227 (841–42); Ṭabarī, III, 1320–22 (pp. 204–6, below), and again in 240 (854) he or his son Muḥammad was recommended to be sent against rebels in the Syrian town of Ḥimṣ. He died in 244 (858–59), according to Ibn 'Asākir, Tahdhīb, V, 312.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās led the Pilgrimage, he being at that time governor of Mecca.[150]

150. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 885; Azdī, op. cit., 424; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 460.

The Events of the Year 222

(DECEMBER 14, 836–DECEMBER 2, 837)

Among the events taking place during this year was al-[1195] Mu'taṣim's sending Ja'far b. Dīnār al-Khayyāṭ[151] to al-Afshīn as a reinforcement for the latter and then his sending Aytākh[152] subsequently to follow him, accompanied by 30 million dirhams as pay for the army and for supplies and expenses.

In this year a battle took place between the forces of al-Afshīn and one of Bābak's commanders called Ādhīn.

The Engagement between al-Afshīn's Forces and Bābak's Commander Ādhīn and Its Causes

It has been mentioned that, when the winter of 221 (835/836) was over and spring came along and the year 222 had begun,

---

151. Ja'far had fought on the Byzantine frontier (Ṭabarī, III, 1103) and was to be governor of Yemen 224–25 (839–40) (Ṭabarī, III, 1300, 1302–3 [pp. 174, 179, below]) and military governor over the Pilgrimage route during the years 239–43 (853–57; Ṭabarī, III, 1420, 1422, 1433, 1435, 1436). See Herzfeld, op. cit., 108.

152. Aytākh al-Khazarī, often called al-Ṭabbākh ("the cook") because he had originally been a domestic slave in the kitchens, achieved high favor as commander of the caliphal guard in Sāmarrā under al-Mu'taṣim, but was killed by al-Mu'taṣim sent to al-Afshīn certain reinforcements and money, all of which reached the latter when he was at Barzand. Aytākh handed over to al-Afshīn the money and the troops who had accompanied him and set off homeward, but Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ remained with al-Afshīn for some time.[153] Then al-Afshīn moved on when the time of year made movement possible and came to a place called Kalān Rūdh, where he dug a defensive trench and rampart (khandaq). He wrote to Abū Sa'īd, who journeyed from Barzand to a spot opposite him on the fringes of the rural district of Kalān Rūdh—which means (in Persian) "Great River"[154]—so that a distance of three miles separated the two of them. Abū Sa'īd established a camp within a defensive trench and remained at Kalān Rūdh for five days. Then someone came to him and informed him that a certain one of Bābak's commanders called Ādhīn had encamped opposite al-Afshīn and had sent his family up into a mountain that overlooked Rūdh al-Rūdh,[155] saying, "I won't entrench myself in a defensive position from the Jews"—he meant the Muslims[156]—"and I won't place my family within a fortified position!" This was because Bābak had said to him, "Place your family within a fortified position!" But Ādhīn had replied, "I protect myself from the Jews? By God, I'll never place my family within any fortified position!" Hence he moved them to this mountain. [1196]

Al-Afshīn sent Ẓafar b. al-'Alā' al-Sa'dī and al-Ḥusayn b. Khālid

---

al-Mutawakkil in 235 (849–50). See Ṭabarī, III, 1384–87; *EI*² Suppl. s.v. Aytākh al-Turkī (Ed.). The etymology of the name is presumably Turkish "moon-like."

153. In the fairly compressed account of Dīnawarī, op. cit., 403 (cf. 404), it is mentioned that around this time al-Afshīn sent forward Ja'far b. Dīnār and his own deputy Yūbārah (?) to dig this new defensive trench; the latter name—whatever its true form may be—appears only later in Ṭabarī, III, 1225–26 (p. 79, below), in the account of Bābak's extradition from Armenia, as Būzbārah; the reading of the name in parallel and later sources, e.g. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII = par. 2809, is equally uncertain.

154. Glossed here in the text as Arabic nahr kabīr.

155. Described by Ibn Khurradādhbih, op. cit., 121, as the site of al-Afshīn's third camp, only one farsakh from al-Badhdh.

156. Hereby setting off his own group of the Khurramiyyah, a body within the ancient Iranian religious tradition, from the Muslims, with their Semitic religious background, shared by the Jews. Ādhīn's contemptuous reference to his opponents as Jews was to be echoed by Bābak when the Armenian prince Sahl b. Sunbāṭ betrayed him to al-Afshīn; see Ṭabarī, III, 1226 (pp. 80–81, below); Sadighi, op. cit., 265; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 51, 53–54.

al-Madāʾinī, two of Abū Saʿīd's commanders, with a force of cavalrymen and mountain guards. They traveled all through the night from Kalān Rūdh until they descended into a defile so narrow that even a single rider could pass through it only with great effort. Most of the troops led their mounts; and they squeezed through, one man behind the other, for al-Afshīn had ordered them to travel to Rūdh al-Rūdh before the break of dawn. [He also ordered] the mountain guards to cross on foot, because it was impossible for cavalrymen to maneuver there, and to climb up the mountain. They reached Rūdh al-Rūdh before daybreak. At this point, he (Ẓafar b. al-ʿAlāʾ) ordered the cavalrymen who had approached to dismount and go on foot and to remove their clothing. So all the cavalrymen dismounted and crossed [the river] on foot, accompanied by the mountain guards, en masse, and they went up the mountainside. There they seized Ādhīn's family and some of his children and brought them back across the river.

The news about the seizure of his family reached Ādhīn. It happened that al-Afshīn had been fearful lest, when this force of troops on foot pressed onward and entered the defile, the defile be closed against them. Hence he ordered the mountain guards to take banners with them and to station themselves on the peaks of the loftiest mountains in places from which they could look down on Ẓafar b. al-ʿAlāʾ and his forces; and, if they should see anyone about whose behavior they were suspicious, they were to wave the banners (i.e., as a signal). The mountain guards accordingly passed the night on the mountaintops.

When Ibn al-ʿAlāʾ and al-Ḥusayn b. Khālid returned with those members of Ādhīn's family whom they had captured and when they had gone some way along the road, before they were to reach the defile, Ādhīn's foot soldiers swept down on them and engaged them in fighting before they could enter the defile. Men on both [1197] sides were slain, but they rescued some of the women [from being massacred]. The mountain guards, whom al-Afshīn had deployed, saw them. Ādhīn had sent two bodies of troops, one to engage the Muslims in battle and one to seize the defile and hold it against them.[157] Thus, when the mountain guards waved their flags [as a signal], al-Afshīn sent Muẓaffar b. Kaydar with a squadron (kurdūs)[158] of his troops, and these last galloped off. He also sent Abū Sa'īd behind al-Muẓaffar and then, to follow them both, the Bukhārā-khudāh,[159] and these all met up together. When Ādhīn's foot soldiers who were above the defile looked down on them, they descended and joined forces with their comrades. Ẓafar b. al-'Alā' and al-Ḥusayn b. Khālid, together with the troops who were with them, escaped; none of them was killed except those

157. Following the text [and that of the Cairo edition, IX, 30], which seems better than the suggestion in Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIII.

158. Defined as a small detachment of troops, especially of cavalry but possibly also of infantry, numbering some forty to fifty men, hence smaller than a katībah (see WbKAS, I, 122–23). Ṭabarī, II, 1941, 1944, mentions the adoption by Marwān b. Muḥammad (sc. the last Umayyad Caliph Marwān II) of the military formation of karādīs, compact bodies of troops as opposed to the traditional Arab formation of lines of soldiers (ṣufūf). S. Fraenkel, Die aramäische Fremdwörter, 239, suggested a derivation of the word kurdūs from the Greek plural choortis, ultimately from Latin cohortes. Hence some authorities have held that Marwān took over this military formation from the Byzantines in the course of his warfare with them along the eastern Anatolian frontier (cf. Wellhausen, Das arabische Reich, 232–33, trans., 371–73; Herzfeld, op. cit., 141 n. 1; *EI*², s.v. Ḥarb. ii. The Caliphate [Cl. Cahen]), but it is probable that it was used before then. Poets of a somewhat earlier period, such as A'shā Qays and Jarīr, used the word in their poetry, and Levy, op. cit., 430, noted that it is used by Ṭabarī, I, 2091 ff., in connection with the Battle of Yarmūk against the Byzantines.

159. This is the first mention by Ṭabarī of this Iranian prince, the hereditary local ruler of Bukhārā, as one of al-Afshīn's leading commanders, and it is an indication of the strength and importance of Iranian elements from Transoxania within the 'Abbāsid army side by side with the Turkish ghilmān. With the final subjugation and Islamization of Transoxania and adjacent regions, the local Soghdian, Khwārazmian, and other free Iranian peoples were recruited in large numbers by the caliphs, thus providing a fresh wave of easterners, mashāriqah, after the Khurāsānians of the first 'Abbāsid decades. They seem often to have been led by their own local princes, of whom al-Afshīn and the Bukhārā-khudāh are of course good examples. Thus we find mentioned in the historical sources "the men of Farghāna," al-Farāghinah, "the men of Ushrūsanah," al-Ushrūsaniyyah, and "the men of Ishtīkhān," al-Ishtīkhaniyyah (not al-Ishtīkhāniyyah; cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1362) as distinct units. Ishtīkhān was the district north of Samarqand, to which the local rulers of Soghdia, the Ikhshīds, had moved their capital in the second (eighth) century, after the Arabs' occupation of Samarqand; see Le Strange, Lands, 466; Barthold, Turkestan, 95–96. At Sāmarrā these Iranian units were allocated land grants, qaṭā'i', adjacent to those of the Turks, as Mas'ūdī expressly states (Murūj, VII, 122 = par. 2805). Indeed, Ya'qūbī, in his detailed survey of Sāmarrā and also of its component parts, mentions quarters inhabited by people from Balkh, Marw, Khuttal, Bukhārā, Isfījāb, Kābul, Khwārazm, Soghdia, Fāryāb, Ishtakhanj, etc. (Buldān, 248–49, 259, 262–63, trans., 30–31, 52, 54–55). Shaban is right in emphasizing that al-Mu'taṣim's new armies included a considerable proportion of these Iranian troops from the northeastern fringes of the Islamic world (op. cit., 62–64). It is equally true that these soldiers were freemen, who entered the 'Abbāsid service of their own accord, for reasons of personal advancement, and not as slaves. But to deny, as Shaban does (63–66), that there killed in the first engagement. They all eventually reached al-Afshīn's encampment, accompanied by some of the womenfolk whom they had captured.[160]

In this year, Bābak's capital, al-Badhdh, was captured. The Muslims entered it and treated it as lawful plunder (i.e., sacked it). This was on Friday, the twentieth of Ramaḍān of this year (26 August 837).[161]

The Capture of al-Badhdh, How It Was Achieved, and the Reasons for This

It has been mentioned that, when al-Afshīn resolved to advance toward al-Badhdh and depart from Kalān Rūdh, he began to creep were any appreciable numbers of Turks in the new ʿAbbāsid armies and that there were any slave elements at all is perverse and ludicrous. The undoubted presence of Turks is shown, if by nothing else, by the frequency of Turkish names among the leading commanders of the third (ninth) and fourth (tenth) centuries: Bughā, Aytākh, Unūjūr, Minkajūr, Adgutigīn, Bektimūr, Yināl, etc.. There is no obvious cultural process by which Iranians would have adopted Turkish names; rather, the reverse (cf. perhaps Ash[i]nās, the commander of al-Maʾmūn and al-Muʿtaṣim, whose name is explained by Ṭabarī, III, 1017, as derived from Persian shinākhtan "to recognize, know"). Furthermore, the slave origins of these commanders is shown by the use of such terms as waṣīf and khādim (for which see pp. 99 n. 293, 134 n. 375, below; Ayalon, "On the Eunuchs in Islam." 74–89) and by the presence of commanders known to have been eunuchs (Yāzmān, Muʾnis al-Muẓaffarī, etc.); it is most unlikely that free Iranians would willingly have consented to be castrated. Nor would Jāḥiẓ have thought it worthwhile to compose a lengthy epistle on the virtues of the Turks as the fighting race par excellence if these troops had not loomed large in the public eye. On the Turkish element of the ʿAbbāsid army, see also Ayalon, "Military Reforms," 29–33; Ismail, "Muʿtaṣim and the Turks," 14–15, 17.

---

The personal name of the Bukhārā-khudāh is not given by Ṭabarī, but he was probably the grandson of the Bunyāt b. Tughshādah, killed in 166 (782–83), whose line continued to rule the city-state of Bukhārā until the time of the Sāmānid Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad in the later third (ninth) century (Narshakhī, Taʾrīkh-i Bukhārā, 10–11, trans., 11). Dīnawarī, op. cit., 403, and Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 580, actually name him as Muḥammad b. Khālid; if this is correct, it shows that these rulers had by now adopted fully Islamic, rather than indigenous Iranian, names.

Finally, one may note that the Bukhārā-khudāh (with the name written corruptly but recognizably) appears as a patron of the poet al-Masdūd in the time of the Caliph al-Muntaṣir, sc. 247–48 (861–62); see Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Kitāb al-aghānī, XXI, ed. Brünnow, 258 line 14. This may well be the same Bukhārā-khudāh as the one involved here against Bābak, or it may be his son.

160. Ṭabarī, trans. Balʿamī, IV, 527–33; Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 385; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 461–62.

161. Actually a Sunday.

forward a little at a time, in a manner different from his steady advance on earlier occasions, to the places where he had previously encamped. He would advance for four miles and then encamp in a spot on the road leading to the defile that goes down to Rūdh al-Rūdh, not digging a defensive trench but pitching his camp inside a protective belt of caltrops (al-ḥasak).[162] Al-Mu'taṣim wrote to him, ordering him to station his troops in squadrons that would take turns on guard duty [during the day], [1198] mounted on their horses, just as the army would normally patrol [the encampment] by night; some of the troops were to remain in camp, and others were to remain mounted on their steeds about a mile away, just as the army would normally patrol [the encampment], but night and day for fear of any nocturnal attack. In this fashion, if any sudden disaster should assail them, the troops [of the cavalry] would be deployed in battle formation, and the infantry would be in the encampment.

However, the troops raised an outcry because of their exhaustion and said, "How long are we going to be stuck here in the defile when we could be out on the open plain? Between us and the enemy are four farsakhs, yet we are behaving just as if the enemy were directly facing us! We have become an object of shame in the eyes of the people and the spies who pass between us and the enemy within this four farsakhs' intermediate zone, and we behave as if we were nearly dead of fright. Let us advance, whether the outcome be for us or against us!"

Al-Afshīn replied, "By God, I know full well that what you say is right. But the Commander of the Faithful has ordered me to do this, and I have no choice but to implement it." Not long after that, a letter came to him from al-Mu'taṣim, commanding him to remain on his course of action by night, just as he was already doing. So he continued thus for several days and then went down with his close retainers till he halted at Rūdh al-Rūdh. He proceeded onward until he found himself overlooking the spot where there was the rocky area[163] at which Bābak had attacked 162. For this term, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 286.

163. Al-rakwah, following Glossarium, CCLXX (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1188 (p. 39 n. 142, above). Glossarium, however, also mentions a possible translation "pool," following the Glossaire to Ibn Khurradādhbih, op. cit., 4.

him the previous year. He examined the place and found there a squadron of the Khurramiyyah, but they did not attack him, nor did he attack them. One of (or: some of) the indigenous non-Arab population (baʿḍ al-ʿulūj) said to him, "What's the matter with you? You move forward and then come to a halt! Aren't you ashamed of yourselves?" Nevertheless, al-Afshīn ordered that they should not attack them (the Khurramiyyah)[164] and that no one should march out and give them battle. He remained there confronting the enemy until nearly noon and then returned to his encampment. He stayed in it for two days, and then he went [1199] down the slope again with a larger force than he had gone down with on the first occasion. He ordered Abū Saʿīd to go forward and confront the enemy in the same manner in which he had confronted them on the first occasion but not to provoke them and not to launch an assault on them.

Al-Afshīn remained at Rūdh al-Rūdh. He ordered the mountain guards to climb up to those mountaintops that they deemed to be naturally defensible, so that they might then report back in person to him about them and might choose for him places on the mountaintops in which the infantrymen could fortify themselves. Hence they chose for him three mountains where there had in the past been fortifications that were now in ruins; and al-Afshīn learned of them. He next sent for Abū Saʿīd, who came back to him on that very same day. When two days had elapsed al-Afshīn went down from his camp to Rūdh al-Rūdh, taking with him the kilghariyyah,[165] that is, the pioneer and labor corps, who brought with them skins filled with water and also dry biscuit (kaʿk).[166] When they reached Rūdh al-Rūdh he sent Abū Saʿīd

164. The text here and in the Cairo edition, IX, 31, gives yajīʾūhum, which seems preferable to the possible emendation yujībūhum of Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXIII, with the translation "that they should not make any response to them."

165. This word is stated in Glossarium, CDLVII, and WbKAS, I, 320, to be from Persian gilghar, but the Persian lexica (Vullers; Steingass) do not list this word with any appropriate meaning. It would in fact appear to derive from Persian gil-kār "one who works with clay; e.g., clay bricks in building."

166. A kind of dry bread or biscuit, particularly associated with Egypt (where the Greek geographer Strabo mentions kakeis; Coptic caace, kake) and used as iron rations by pilgrims and other travelers across deserts and difficult terrain. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 474; BGA, IV, 341; WbKAS, I, 234–35. On the Persian form forward, ordering him to stand up against the enemy once more in the same manner as he had ordered him on the first day. He ordered the laborers to transport rocks and fortify the roads that led to those three mountains until they resembled fortresses. He gave further commands, and along every road behind those rocks he had a trench dug, right up to the top of the mountain, leaving [free] only a single way up the each mountaintop. Then he instructed Abū Sa'īd to return; the latter returned, and al-Afshīn also went back to his encampment.

He related: When it was the eighth day of the month and the stronghold had been rendered well fortified al-Afshīn issued biscuit and sawīq[167] [as provisions] for the foot soldiers and provisions and barley for the cavalry. He appointed men to guard his encampment, and the rest of the troops went down. He ordered the foot soldiers to ascend to the tops of those mountains and take up with them water and all that they would need there; [1200] and they in fact did this. He encamped in the vicinity and sent Abū Sa'īd to confront the enemy as previously, at the same time ordering his troops to descend with their weapons at the ready but that the cavalry were not to take the saddles of their mounts. Then he delimited the trench and ordered the laborers to get to work on it, setting over them overseers who would urge them on, and he and the cavalry dismounted. They halted in the shade beneath the trees, letting their mounts pasture. When he had led the afternoon worship, he ordered the laborers, together with the foot soldiers, to ascend to the mountaintops that he had fortified, and he ordered the foot soldiers to stay on their guard and not to go to sleep on the mountaintops but to let the laborers on the mountaintops sleep. He ordered the cavalry to mount their steeds at the gleam of dawn and formed them up into squadrons that he stationed one in front of the other, with the distance of a bowshot between each squadron. He gave the command to all the kāk, see A. Siddiqi, Studien über die persischen Fremdwörter, 71. The trade of the ka'ki, or baker of ka'k, was recognized in medieval Cairo; see S. D. Goitein, A Mediterranean Society, I, 114.

---

167. A dish made from flour and then a soup thickened with flour and other ingredients. See Tha'ālibī, op. cit., 10, trans., 41 and n. 20; *EI*², s.v. Sawīk (J. Ruska).

squadrons, "Make sure that each one of you pays no attention to the other, so that each person guards what is near him. Even if you hear any loud noise, let none of you pay any attention to anyone else; each squadron is to be responsible only for what is near it, without being heedful to any loud noise."[168]

The squadrons of cavalry remained mounted [at the ready] until dawn, while the foot soldiers were keeping guard on the mountaintops. Al-Afshīn ordered the foot soldiers that, if they became aware of anyone in the course of the night, they were not to concern themselves with it. Rather, each group of them was to remain in the assigned position and guard its particular mountain and trench; and no one was to pay any attention to anyone else.

They continued in this way until daybreak. Then he ordered someone to get the cavalrymen and the foot soldiers to come to a [1201] mutual agreement concerning the night (i.e., for dividing it into periods of guard duty and sleep); then [later] he would consider their situation. They spent the next ten days excavating the trench, and on the tenth day he took up his position in it. Then he divided it among the troops and ordered the commanders to send for their baggage and that of their men, so that they would fight to better advantage (literally, "by way of bringing them comfort and support," ʿalā rifq).

[At that point] an envoy from Bābak came to him, bearing cucumbers (qiththā'), melons and [other kinds of] cucumber (khiyār), explaining to al-Afshīn that it was known that he was suffering hardship in those days and that he and his troops were having to exist on biscuit and sawīq alone; hence Bābak wished to show kindness to him by means of these gifts. Al-Afshīn replied to the envoy, however, "I am certainly aware of what my brother intends with this! He only wishes to get a look at the army, but I am indeed most worthy of receiving his benevolence and satisfying his desire, for he has truly observed that I am having a hard time." He also told the envoy, "As for you, you must definitely go up in order to view our encampment; you have already seen what there is here [in front of us], and now you will see what is behind us too." He thereupon gave orders that the envoy was to be provided with a mount and taken up [the mountain] until he should see the trench and likewise the trenches of Kalān Rūdh and Barzand; that he should have a good look at all three of them and study them carefully and should have nothing of the military arrangements concealed from him, so that he might fully inform his master. All this was done for the envoy until he reached Barzand, and then al-Afshīn had him sent back to his own presence. Al-Afshīn now set him free, saying, "Go and give Bābak my greetings!"

168. As Marin observed, Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 32, n. 175, the text is disturbed here, and any translation is conjectural.

Some of the Khurramiyyah used to interfere with those who were bringing supplies to the army (to that of al-Afshīn). This was done once or twice, but after that the Khurramiyyah came in three squadrons until they drew near to the ramparts of al-Afshīn's trench, all the time shouting. Al-Afshīn ordered that none of his troops should speak [to them], and this they did for two or three nights running. They [the Muslim troops] began to gallop their steeds behind the ramparts on several occasions until, [1202] when the Khurramiyyah were familiar [with that noise], al-Afshīn got ready against them four squadrons of cavalrymen and foot soldiers—the latter being archers—and established them in ambushes against the Khurramiyyah within the valleys, placing lookouts above them. When the Khurramiyyah came down at the time they had usually swept down on each previous occasion, shouting and yelling as was their wont, al-Afshīn unleashed against them the cavalry and foot soldiers who had been [previously] deployed, and these blocked the Khurramiyyah's way of retreat. Al-Afshīn further launched against them two squadrons of foot soldiers in the middle of the night. The Khurramiyyah realized that the mountain pass had been blocked against them, so they scattered along a number of tracks until they began to ascend the mountains. They passed along and never returned to what they had been doing before. Al-Afshīn's troops came back to the trench at Rūdh al-Rūdh from the pursuit at the time of the morning worship, without however having overtaken a single one of the Khurramiyyah.

Once every week al-Afshīn used to have the drums beaten at midnight and would go out with candles and naphtha torches

(al-naffāṭāt)[169] to the gate of the trench. Meanwhile, each one of his troops knew his own squadron, whether he was on the right wing or the left wing, and they would go forth and then wait in their positions and places. Al-Afshīn also used to carry large black banners, twelve of them, which he transported on mules, rather than on horseback, lest the banners should wave, placing them [instead] on twelve mules. His large drums numbered 21 and his smaller banners around 500. His troops would wait, each section arranged in its place, from the first quarter of the night until, when dawn first gleamed, al-Afshīn rode forth from his tent. The [1203] muezzin would give the call to worship in his presence, and al-Afshīn would perform the worship. Then the troops would perform the worship at daybreak. Al-Afshīn would thereupon order the drums to be beaten, and he would move slowly forward. His signals for moving and halting were the beating and silencing of the drums because of the great number of troops who were traveling in the mountains and on the narrow paths in their military formations. Whenever they came to a mountain they would ascend it, and when they descended into a valley they would proceed onward through it, unless it was an inaccessible mountain, impossible either to ascend or descend, in which case they would rejoin the army units and return, when they came to a mountain, to their military formations and positions. The signal for moving forward was the beating of drums, but if al-Afshīn wanted the army to halt he silenced the drums, and the troops would stop, the whole lot of them, in every part of the mountain or valley or wherever they might be. Al-Afshīn advanced by slow stages, and, whenever one of the mountain guards came to him with a piece of information, he halted for a brief while. He traversed those six miles between Rūdh al-Rūdh and al-Badhdh between the gleaming of dawn and high noon. When he wished to ascend to the area of rocky ground where the battle had taken place the previous year, he left the Bukhārā-khudāh at the top of the mountain slope with 1,000 cavalrymen and 600 foot soldiers to guard the road for him and block the road against any of the Khurramiyyah who might sally forth.

169. Clearly with this meaning, here, whereas in Ṭabarī, III, 1215 [p. 68, below], naffāṭah has the sense of "naphtha-hurling weapon."

When Bābak became aware that the [Muslim] army was closing in upon him, he sent one of his detachments of troops, consisting of foot soldiers, to a valley below the mountain slope on top of which was the Bukhārā-khudāh, and they lay in ambush for anyone who might intend to block the road against him (i.e., against Bābak). Al-Afshīn had stationed the Bukhārā-khudāh to [1204] hold this mountain track to which Bābak had sent his military force in order to seize it against al-Afshīn. The Bukhārā-khudāh was to stand fast there for as long as al-Afshīn was entering al-Badhdh across the stretch of rocky ground. Al-Afshīn had ordered the Bukhārā-khudāh to station himself in a valley resembling a defensive trench, which lay between him and al-Badhdh. He also ordered Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf to cross that valley with a squadron of his troops. He ordered Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ, moreover, to station himself with a squadron of his troops; and he ordered Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl to take up his position with another squadron. Thus in that part of the valley there would be three squadrons on the outskirts of the houses of Bābak's people (i.e., of the urban area of al-Badhdh).

Bābak had sent out a military force under Ādhīn, who stationed himself on a hill opposite these three squadrons [of al-Afshīn's troops] outside al-Badhdh, lest any of al-Afshīn's forces approach the gate of the town. Al-Afshīn was intending to make for the gate of al-Badhdh and was ordering his troops to cross but then just halt and not engage Bābak's forces in battle. When Bābak realized that al-Afshīn's troops had moved out of the trench and were aiming toward him, he split his men up into ambush groups, retaining with him only a small number of men. Al-Afshīn got knowledge of this but did not know the places where the ambushes had been laid. Then the information came to him that the Khurramiyyah had come out en masse and that only a handful of his men remained with Bābak.

When al-Afshīn had gone up to that position, a leather mat (naṭʿ)[170] was spread out for him and a seat (kursī)[171] set up for [1205]

170. This term is also used for a leather mat with drawstrings round the edges, which could be used at beheadings as a receptacle for the severed heads.

171. For the kursī, originating from the Iranian cultural sphere, see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 130–31; J. Sadan, Mobilier, 92–94, 123 ff.; *EI*², s.v.

him. He sat on a hillock that overlooked the gate of Bābak's fortress, with the troops drawn up in their [cavalry] squadrons; he ordered those who were with him on this side of the valley to dismount from their steeds and likewise those on the other side with Abū Sa'īd, Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ, and his men. Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl, however, did not dismount because of his close proximity to the enemy, and his troops remained in place and on the backs of their mounts. Al-Afshīn now divided up the mountain-guard foot soldiers in order to search the valleys, because he was eager to find the places where the enemy was lurking in ambushes and thus be aware of them.

This was al-Afshīn's procedure [each day] in carrying out this work of searching until afternoon; the Khurramiyyah would be with Bābak, drinking wine (nabīdh),[172] playing on reed pipes (surnāyāt),[173] and beating drums until, when al-Afshīn had performed the noon worship, he would go forward and then go down to his trench at Rūdh al-Rūdh. Abū Sa'īd would be the first to descend, followed by Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl and then Ja'far b. Dīnār. Then al-Afshīn would come back again. This coming and going of al-Afshīn used to infuriate Bābak, so that, when he was on the point of returning, the Khurramiyyah would strike their cymbals (ṣunūj)[174] and blow their trumpets (būqāt)[175] in a mocking fashion. The Bukhāra-khudāh, meanwhile, would re-

---

Kursī [Cl. Huart and J. Sadan]. It was often regarded as a symbol of power, like a throne; cf. the Chair of 'Alī, covered in silk and brocade, which was the focus of circumambulation and was carried into battle like the Hebrews' Ark of the Covenant during the revolt of al-Mukhtār in 66–67 [685–87]; Ṭabarī, II, 702–6.

172. Originally date wine and as such allowed for medicinal use by certain of the Islamic law schools, but the term often becomes a generalized designation for wine. See EI[1], s.v. Nabidh [A. J. Wensinck]; EI[2], s.v. Khamr. 1. Juridical Aspects [A. J. Wensinck].

173. On this small reed pipe, the name of which is also found in the form suryānay, see EI[2], s.v. Mizmār [H. G. Farmer]; it came to be used especially in military bands; see Farmer, History of Arabian Music, 154, 208.

174. Sing. ṣanj(ah), another name for the jank, pl. junūk [< Persian chang], a term used both for the harp or lyre and for the cymbals; in both senses it was derived by the Arabs from Sāsānid Persian music. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 845; Farmer, op. cit., 16, 18, 74, 155; for the philological aspects of the varying Persian and Arabic forms, see Siddiqi, op. cit., 72, 73.

175. Sing. būq, essentially a military band instrument; see EI[2], s.v. Būḳ [H. G. Farmer].

main on the mountain slope where he was stationed until all the troops had passed him and only then would return in their tracks. One day the Khurramiyyah became tired of the position of stalemate (mu'ādalah) and the process of searching being carried out against them. So, [when] al-Afshīn returned, according to his custom, and the squadron returned one after the other and Abū Sa'īd crossed the valley as also Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl and some of Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ's troops, the Khurramiyyah opened the gate of their defensive trench and rampart, and ten of their cavalrymen rode forth and attacked those of Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ's men who had [1206] remained in that place. A clamor broke out among the [Muslim] army, and Ja'far, on his own initiative, came back with a squadron of his troops and charged those [Khurramī] cavalrymen until he drove them back to the gate of al-Badhdh. Further clamor nevertheless continued within the army, and at this point al-Afshīn returned, while Ja'far and his troops were fighting on that side, a number of Ja'far's men having previously gone forth (i.e., to join him). Bābak rode forth with a number of his cavalrymen, neither side—al-Afshīn's or Bābak's—having any infantrymen with them. Each side in turn would lead assaults on the other side; and men on both sides suffered wounds. Al-Afshīn went back, and the leather mat was laid down for him and the seat set up. He then sat down in the place which had been his wont, all the time blazing with anger against Ja'far, who, he kept saying, "has spoiled my deployment of the troops and my intended plans."

The clamor rose higher. Abū Dulaf[176] had with him, in a squadron, a group of volunteers from al-Baṣrah and others also. When these volunteers saw that Ja'far was engaged in battle, they went down, without any order from al-Afshīn, and crossed to that side of the valley[177] until they reached the flank of al-Badhdh.

176. I.e., Abū al-Qāsim b. 'Īsā al-'Ijlī, lord of Karaj in al-Jibāl, famed not only as a warrior, the beau ideal of an Arab knight, but as a Maecenas and littérateur himself; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 139–40; EI[2], s.v al-Ḳāsim b. 'Īsā (J. Bencheikh). Abū Dulaf's contingent of volunteers from lower Iraq would be mainly Arabs, and there seems in fact to have been hostility between him, as a representative of Arab influence at the caliphal court, and the Iranian al-Afshīn; see further Ṭabarī, III, 1308 (p. 186 and n. 529, below).

177. Strict grammar requires jānib al-wādī dhālika, rather than dhālika jānib al-wādī, as given in the text; the variant in n. 1, from two of the manuscripts,

They kept close to it (i.e., to the side of the valley), marked out tracks up it, and almost climbed to its top and entered the town. Ja'far sent a message to al-Afshīn, "Send me reinforcements of 500 foot soldiers, archers, for I hope to enter al-Badhdh, if God wills, and I do not see facing me more than this single squadron of troops that you yourself can see," meaning Ādhīn's squadron. But al-Afshīn sent back the reply, "You have already ruined my [1207] intended plan, so extricate yourself little by little and save your troops, and come back." Clamor broke out among the volunteers when they came up against al-Badhdh. The Khurramī troops whom Bābak had sent out to man the ambushes thought that the battle had become firmly interlocked so they rushed forward and rose from under the Bukhārā-khudāh's force, while another group of ambushers rose up from beyond the rocky tract where al-Afshīn had been sitting. The Khurramiyyah rushed around, while the troops stationed above them made no move, for al-Afshīn commented, "Praise be to God Who has revealed to us the enemy's places!"

Then Ja'far and his troops and the volunteers returned, and he went to al-Afshīn and told him, "My master the Commander of the Faithful sent me solely to the military compaign that you see and did not send me to sit down here. You hindered me in the very hour of my need—a mere 500 foot soldiers would have been sufficient for me to enter al-Badhdh or to penetrate into Bābak's residence [there], for I had perceived what forces lay before me." Al-Afshīn answered him, "Don't look at what lies before you; just look at what is behind you and at how they launched an assault on the Bukhārā-khudāh and his men." Al-Faḍl b. Kāwūs said to Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ, "If the decision had been yours, you wouldn't have been able to get up to this place where you are now standing so that you might say, 'I would have done this' or 'I would have done that'!" Ja'far replied to him, "[You call] this war, when here we are standing waiting for whoever may come!" Al-Faḍl told him, "If this were not the Amīr's council, I would teach you on the spot how to behave!" but al-Afshīn called out to them both, and they desisted.

---

leads one to suspect that the correct reading is probably dhālika al-jānib li-al-wādī, though it would make no difference to the essential meaning.

Al-Afshīn ordered Abū Dulaf to recall the volunteers from the wall (i.e., of al-Badhdh); hence Abū Dulaf said to them, "Come back!" But one of the volunteers came back bearing a stone and [1208] said, "Are you going to send us back now? I have taken this stone from the town wall!" But Abū Dulaf told him, "Return instantly, and when you get back you will realize who is straddling your road (i.e., your way of retreat)," meaning by this the force [of the Khurramiyyah] that had leaped upon the Bukhārā-khudāh from behind the [Muslim] troops.

Then al-Afshīn said to Abū Sa'īd in Ja'far's presence, "May God grant you a goodly recompense, both on your own account and on behalf of the Commander of the Faithful! I never knew that you were so knowledgeable about matters concerning those troops and their management! And does not every person old enough to shave his head say that halting in a place that he needs is better than giving battle in a place that he does not need? If those of the enemy who were beneath you had risen up"—and he pointed to those in the ambush below the mountain—"what do you think would have been the state of these volunteers, who have what beats under their shirts (i.e., who are far from stout-hearted)? What would have been their condition, and who would have got them together again? Praise be to God, Who has delivered them safely! Now wait here and do not move until no one is left here."

Al-Afshīn went back, and it was his custom when preparing to return that the flag of the squadrons, his cavalrymen, and his foot soldiers should be lowered, while the last squadron would wait, so that between him and it was the distance of an arrow shot. He would not go near the mountain slope or the defile until he could see that all the men in the squadron in front of him had passed through and the road was then clear for him. After that he would approach and would go down with his cavalrymen and his foot soldiers, together with the last squadron, and would continue thus. He had previously instructed each squadron behind whom it was to return and [had instructed them] that not a single man was to go on ahead of his companions or dawdle behind. This was to be the procedure until all the squadrons had passed through and no one remained behind except the Bukhārā-khudāh; then [1209] the Bukhārā-khudāh himself was to go down, abandoning the mountain slope. On that day the Bukhārā-khudāh went back in this same manner; Abū Saʿīd was the last to return, and, whenever the troops passed by the place where the Bukhārā-khudāh was stationed and saw the spot where the ambushers were concealed, they realized what was in store for them. Then those of the indigenous population (al-aʿlāj) who wanted to capture the place that the Bukhārā-khudāh was holding dispersed and returned to their positions.

Al-Afshīn remained in his trench at Rūdh al-Rūdh for several days. At that point the volunteers complained to him about their straitened circumstances in regard to fodder, provisions, and living expenses (nafaqāt).[178] He answered them, "Whoever of you endures patiently, let him endure patiently, and whoever cannot endure, well, the road is wide open, so let him go back in peace. I have with me the Commander of the Faithful's army (jund), and those who are in receipt of regular pay allowances (arzāq)[179] from him will stay with me in heat and cold; I am not going to leave this place until the snow falls."

The volunteers went back but were murmuring among themselves, "If only al-Afshīn had left Jaʿfar and us alone, we would have captured al-Badhdh; this man wants only to procrastinate." This talk, and all the other lengthy words of the volunteers, reached al-Afshīn. They bandied these words around with their tongues and asserted that al-Afshīn did not want to march out 178. Volunteers, as noted, p. 37 n. 136, above, were not paid regular salaries by the dīwān al-jaysh (cf. n. 179, below) but attached themselves to the regular forces, either from motives of religious enthusiasm (hence as ghuzāt or mujāhidūn) or from sheer love of plunder (see Levy, op. cit., 414–15. Both motives were doubtless present in the volunteer element of al-Afshīn's forces, and both may have contributed to the disenchantment and impatience with al-Afshīn's cautious generalship expressed here. The problems of supplying themselves with food and other necessities were beginning to outweigh the prospects of martyrdom fighting the infidel Bābak or, more probably, the hopes of finding rich plunder within al-Badhdh. Hence, as appears below, faced with the onset of winter and no immediate prospect of victory, some of the volunteers were starting to melt away homeward. In general, keeping an army together in the field for a long period was as much a problem for medieval Islamic commanders as for their medieval Christian counterparts.

179. The regular soldiers, those in receipt of salaries (rizq/razqah, ʿaṭāʾ), were accordingly known as murtaziqah. On such terms as jund and razqah, see W. Hoernerbach, "Zur Heeresverwaltung der ʿAbbāsiden," 278 ff.; Levy, op. cit., 414–15; Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī," 144–45; *EI*², s.v. Djaysh. i. Classical (Cl. Cahen).

against the enemy but only wanted to prolong matters as far as possible, until one of them stated that he had seen in a dream the Messenger of God, who said to him, "Tell al-Afshīn, 'If you make war on this fellow [Bābak] and exert yourself in hunting him down, [then well and good!]. But if not, I will order the mountains to rain down stones on you!'" As a result, the troops talked about that openly in the encampment, as if the man who had seen the dream had been divinely inspired (mastūr).[180]

[When he learned of this,] al-Afshīn sent a message to the leaders of the volunteers and had them brought before him. He told them, "I would like you to show me this man, for people see in dreams remedies and solutions to problems (abwāb)."[181] So they brought the man to him, together with a group of other people. Al-Afshīn greeted him, put him at his ease, and brought him near, saying to him, "Tell me your dream; don't be [1210] embarrassed or ashamed, but just relate it." The man said, "I saw in my dream so-and-so and so-and-so." Al-Afshīn replied, "God knows everything before anyone else and [knows] what is wanted of these people. If God, He is blessed and exalted, wanted to command the mountains to pelt anyone [with stones], then He would pelt the unbeliever [Bābak] and relieve us of the trouble of dealing with him. How could He stone me and thereby allow me to relieve Him of the trouble of dealing with the unbeliever? [On the contrary, if He wanted to stone anyone,] He would be stoning Bābak and would not need me to make war on him! I know that nothing is concealed from God, He is mighty and exalted, and that He is the One who knows the secrets of my heart and what I intend to do with you, O wretches!"

One of the volunteers, who had a reputation for piety, said, "O Amīr, do not deprive us of [a chance of] martyrdom, if an opportunity for it has now come to hand! We only intended and sought God's reward and His favor. So leave us alone until we can advance, after receiving your permission, and it may be that God will grant us the victory." Al-Afshīn replied, "Indeed, I perceive that the object of your intention is now close at hand, and I believe that God does in fact desire this course of action and that it will be successful, if He so wills. You and the rest of the troops have now an intense desire for engaging battle. God knows best that this was not my original view, but it has now at this point become that after hearing your words. I hope that He desires this course of action and that it will be successful. Go forth, with God's blessing, on whichever day you think best, so that we may rise up and assail them. There is no strength and no power except through God!"

180. Literally, "veiled," but here in the sense of "humble, self-deprecating, hidden from public view" > "pious, ascetic, having outstanding spiritual gifts." See Glossarium, CCLXXXVI; Dozy, Supplément, I, 633.

181. For this sense of bāb, see Glossarium, CXLIV.

The soldiers went away rejoicing and passed on the good news to their comrades. Those who had wanted to go back remained, and those who were still in the vicinity, having actually gone back some days' distance [only] but who then heard about the decision, now returned. Al-Afshīn named an appointed day to the troops and ordered the regular troops (al-jund), the cavalry, the infantry, and all the other warriors to get ready; and he made it [1211] clear that he was intending to fight, without any doubt. He set out bearing money and provisions; not a mule remained in the encampment that did not carry a litter for transporting the wounded. He brought with him physicians and supplies of biscuit, sawīq, etc., and everything that he might possibly need. The troops moved forward slowly until they went up to al-Badhdh,[182] leaving the Bukhārā-khudāh in the position on the mountain slope where he had previously stationed him. Then the leather mat was spread out and the seat set up for him, and he seated himself on it, as was his wont.

He said to Abū Dulaf, "Tell the volunteers to concentrate their efforts and confine themselves to whatever sector is easiest for them," and he said to Ja'far, "You have the whole army at your disposal, including the archers and the naphtha throwers (al-naffāṭūn);[183] and if you need extra men, I will transfer them to you. So take all necessary items and whatever you need, and go 182. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 578, this slow advance (verb zaḥafa) took place on Thursday, the ninth of Ramaḍān (August 15, 837).

183. On these troops, also called zarrāqūn "those who hurl, throw (missiles)," see Levy, op. cit., 439; *EI*², s.vv. Bārūd. i. General (G. S. Colin), Ḥiṣār. iii. Persia (C. E. Bosworth).

forth, with God's blessing! Proceed to any place (i.e., in the battle front) you choose." Ja'far replied, "I intend to make for the place where I was before." Al-Afshīn said, "Make your way there, then." He summoned Abū Sa'īd and said to him, "Stay here with me, you and all your troops, and don't let any one of you leave!" He summoned Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl and said to him, "You and your troops stay here, and let Ja'far and all the men with him cross. If he requires any more [foot] soldiers or cavalry, we will assist him with these reinforcements and send them to him." He now sent forward Abū Dulaf and his troops, comprising the volunteers, and they dropped down into the valley and then went up to the walls of al-Badhdh from the place where they had gone up to them on that previous occasion and took up a position against the wall, just as they had done on that day.

Ja'far launched an attack until he reached right up against the gate of al-Badhdh, exactly as he had done on that first occasion. [1212] He halted there, and the unbelievers held him up for a substantial while. So al-Afshīn sent a man with a purse (badrah)[184] of dīnārs, saying to him, "Go to Ja'far's men and ask who was in the van of the battle, and then pour out a handful of coins for him." He handed over a second purse to another one of his men, telling him, "Go to the volunteers, taking with you this money, neck chains, and bracelets (aṭwāq wa-aswirah),[185] and tell Abū Dulaf to reward each of the volunteers and the others whom he sees fighting well." Then he summoned the chief cellarer (ṣāḥib al-sharāb)[186] and said to him, "Go and take up a position with the troops in the midst of the fray so that I can see you with my own eyes, and take with you sawīq and water in case the troops become thirsty and have to return." He did likewise regarding water and sawīq for Ja'far's troops. Then he summoned the commander of the pioneer and labor corps (ṣāḥib al-kilghariyyah), instructing him, "Whichever person of the volunteers whom you see in the thick of the fighting, with a battle-ax in his hand, will get fifty dirhams from me," and he handed over to him a purse of dirhams. He did likewise for Ja'far's troops and sent to them the pioneer and labor corps, with their battle-axes in their hands. He also sent to Ja'far a chest containing neck chains and bracelets and told him, "Hand over these to whomever you wish of your troops, this being in addition to what they are due to receive from me (i.e., their regular pay) and the increased amount of pay allowances that they have been guaranteed from me, plus the letters (i.e., of commendation for bravery) containing their names that are to be sent to the Commander of the Faithful."

184. Conventionally a badrah contained 10,000 dirhams.

185. Gold neck chains and arm bracelets were often conferred, together with robes of honor (khila'), on successful commanders. See Hilāl al-Ṣābi', op. cit., 93–94, trans., 75–76; Mez, op. cit., 131 n. 2, trans., 133 n. 1; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 143.

186. Cellarers, in charge of the provision of wine and drinking vessels, were employed by private individuals (see Mez, op. cit., 376–77, trans., 398). The post of cellarer to the Caliph at this time was held by a high-ranking Turkish slave commander; slightly later it was held by Bughā al-Ṣaghīr, also called al-Sharābī (see *EI*², s.v. Bughā al-Ṣaghīr [D. Sourdel]).

For a long while the battle at the gate was closely interlocked. Then the Khurramiyyah opened the gate to sally forth to attack [1213] Ja'far's men and pushed them back from the gate. They also assailed the volunteers from another quarter; they captured two of their standards, hurled the volunteers back from the walls, and inflicted wounds on them with rocks to the point that they made appreciable marks on the Muslims, so that the latter were unable to sustain the fighting and had to stop. Ja'far cried out to his men, and about a hundred of them rushed forward and knelt behind the shields with which they were equipped, halting up against the enemy, with both sides refraining from fighting, neither side advancing upon the other. They continued like that until the [Muslim] troops performed the noon worship.

Al-Afshīn had brought up ballistas ('arrādāt)[187] and he set one of these up near Ja'far at the gate and another on the side of the valley in the vicinity of the volunteers. Ja'far fought to defend the ballista that was near him, the ballista being in the area between the two opposing sides for a lengthy period; but then Ja'far's troops got it free after strenuous efforts, dragged it away, and brought it back into their own camp. The troops on both sides

187. In antiquity the ballista (Greek onagros) was a kind of torsion artillery and probably tension artillery also. In Islam the 'arrādah was generally a smaller instrument than the manjanīq (though the terms seem at times to have been interchangeable), and until the Crusading period they were of the beam-operated traction type, the trebuchet. See *EI*², s.vv. 'Arrāda (Cl. Cahen), Mandjanīk (D. R. Hill).

continued in positions against each other, refraining from [hand-to-hand] fighting, but with arrows and stones flying to and fro between them, Bābak's troops being on the walls and at the gate and Ja'far's hundred warriors sheltering beneath their shields. Then later the two sides fought with each other.

When al-Afshīn observed that, he feared lest the enemy become emboldened against his troops. So he sent on ahead the foot soldiers whom he had marshaled, and they took up their stand in the same place as the volunteers. He sent to Ja'far a squadron containing infantrymen, but Ja'far said, "I have not been adversely affected by shortage of men; I have ample troops[188] with me, but I don't discern any place where they can advance and fight. Here there is space only for one or two men to maneuver. They have been reduced to a standstill in this spot, [1214] and fighting has ceased." [On hearing that,] al-Afshīn sent a message to him, "Return, with God's blessing"; hence Ja'far returned.

Al-Afshīn sent the mules that he had brought with him, with litters on their backs, and the wounded and those incapacitated by the stones and unable to walk were placed on them. He ordered the troops to turn back, so they returned to their trench at Rūdh al-Rūdh. The troops despaired of victory in that year, and the greater part of the volunteers departed.

Two weeks later al-Afshīn got his forces ready. When it was the middle of the night he aroused the infantrymen archers, amounting to about 1,000 men, and to each one of them he gave a waterskin and some biscuit, while to some of them he gave black banners and such things. He dispatched them at sundown, sending guides with them. They traveled all the night through unknown, difficult mountains, avoiding the roads, until they made their way round and came up behind the hill on which Ādhīn was stationed, this being [in fact] a lofty mountain. Al-Afshīn ordered them not to let their presence be known to anyone until they saw al-Afshīn's banners, had performed the morning worship, and had seen battle raging; then they were to mount those banners on their spears, beat the drums, go down from above the mountain, and hurl arrows and rocks at the

188. Rijāl firah; the Cairo edition, IX, 41, has rijāl furh "skilled troops."

Khurramiyyah. If, however, they did not see al-Afshīn's banners, they were not to move until information from him reached them.

They did that and reached the crest of the mountain at daybreak; they had filled those waterskins with water from the wadi and had traveled to the top of the mountain. When a certain night came round, al-Afshīn sent a message to his commanders that they were to get ready with their weapons, for he himself intended to ride out at dawn. At some point in the night he sent [1215] Bashīr al-Turkī and several commanders from the Farghānan troops[189] who were with him and ordered them to move onward until they reached the point below the hill in the lowest part of the wadi from which they had carried away their water, this spot being below the mountain where Ādhīn was. Al-Afshīn had previously become aware that the unbelievers hid in ambush below that mountain whenever troops approached it. Bashīr and the Farghānan troops made for that place, where he knew that the Khurramiyyah had a force lying in ambush. Bashīr and his troops traveled through part of the night, with the greater part of the troops in the camp being unaware of their movement. Then Bashīr sent word to his commanders that they were to get ready for riding forth with their weapons because the Amīr was going to thrust forward at daybreak.

Accordingly, when daybreak came, al-Afshīn sallied forth, taking with him the troops, naphtha throwers (al-naffāṭīn),[190] naphtha-hurling weapons (al-naffāṭāt), and torches (al-shamʿ, literally "wax candles"), just as he had previously done. He performed the dawn worship, and he beat the drum and rode out until he reached the place where he used to halt each time, and the leather mat was spread out for him and his seat set out for him, as was his usual practice.

The Bukhārā-khudāh was meanwhile waiting on the mountain slopes where he used to have his position each day. But on that particular day al-Afshīn sent the Bukhārā-khudāh forward in the vanguard with Abū Sa'īd, Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ, and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl. The troops were unfamiliar with this battle formation at that time, and al-Afshīn ordered them to approach the hill where Ādhīn was, in order to encircle it, although previous to that particular day he had been forbidding them to do so. The troops went onward, led by these four commanders named above until they surrounded the hill. Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ was near the gateway of al-Badhdh, Abū Sa'īd was next to him, the Bukhārā-khudāh was next to Abū Sa'īd, and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl b. Hishām was next to the Bukhārā-khudāh. They came together in an encircling formation round the hill, and the confusion and uproar from the lower part of the valley was great. The troops hidden in [1216] ambush below the hill where Ādhīn was stationed had suddenly leaped out upon Bashīr al-Turkī and the Farghānan troops. They fought with them for some time, and the conflict became confused. The troops in the [Muslims] camp heard the uproar and became stirred up for action, so al-Afshīn ordered his heralds to proclaim, "O troops, this is Bashīr al-Turkī and the men of Farghānah whom I sent on ahead, and they have as a result stirred up an enemy ambush [into showing their position], so do not get overexcited!"

189. I.e., from the region of Farghānah, the valley of the upper Syr Darya or Jaxartes, the later khanate of Khokand. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 253; Le Strange, Lands, 447–80; Barthold, Turkestan, 155–65; for the Farghānan troops in the caliphal service, see p. 49 n. 159, above.

190. Here naffāṭ is used as military term; in a civilian context it denotes a person concerned with the processing or refining of petroleum. See Goitein, op. cit., 85.

When the infantrymen archers who had advanced to the crest of the mountain heard this, they raised the banners just as al-Afshīn had commanded them. The troops then saw banners coming from a lofty mountain, black banners, there being about a farsakh between the army and the mountain. They themselves were descending Ādhīn's mountain from above Ādhīn's forces, since the banners had been raised, and began to go down with the aim of attacking Ādhīn. When the soldiers in Ādhīn's army spied them, Ādhīn sent some of the Khurramī infantrymen who were with him against the enemy. When the Muslim troops saw them, they filled them with fear, but al-Afshīn sent a message to the Muslim troops, saying, "Those [descending the mountain] are our own troops, who will reinforce us in the struggle against Ādhīn." With that, Ja'far al-Khayyāṭ and his men attacked Ādhīn and his followers until they advanced right up to them. But then Ādhīn's forces mounted a strong counterattack against the Muslims and hurled Ja'far and his men back down to the valley. A man who was one of those fighting in the vicinity of Abū Saʿīd, one of his own warriors called Muʿādh b. Muḥammad or Muḥammad b. Muʿādh, then led a further assault on the Khurramiyyah with a band of troops, but behold, beneath their horses' hooves pits had been dug out (i.e., by the Khurramiyyah), into which the horses' forelegs stumbled, so that Abū Saʿīd's cavalrymen fell into them [1217] one after the other. At that point al-Afshīn sent the pioneers and labor corps to prise out [the stones from] the walls of their dwelling places[191] and to fill up those pits with them, which they did, and then the Muslim troops made a concerted attack on the Khurramiyyah. Ādhīn had got ready on the mountaintops carts (or trolleys, ʿajal) loaded with rocks, and when the Muslim troops attacked him he pushed the carts toward them and released them onto the troops so that they rolled down. Then the troops attacked from every side.

When Bābak saw that his followers had been surrounded, he left al-Badhdh by means of the gate nearest to al-Afshīn—there being a mile's distance between this gate and the hill on which al-Afshīn was—and approached, accompanied by a band of his partisans, inquiring for al-Afshīn.[192] Abū Dulaf's followers demanded, "Who is this?" They replied, "This is Bābak seeking al-Afshīn." Abū Dulaf sent word to al-Afshīn, informing him of that, who thereupon dispatched a man who knew Bābak. This man looked at Bābak, returned to al-Afshīn, and told him, "Yes, he is indeed Bābak!" Hence al-Afshīn rode off to where he could have speech with Bābak and his companions; meanwhile, the battle had become confused and interlocked in Ādhīn's sector of the front. Bābak said to al-Afshīn, "I seek a safe-conduct from the Commander of the Faithful." Al-Afshīn replied, "I have already offered you this, and it is available whenever you want it."[193] Bābak said, "I want it now, on condition that you allow me a

191. Presumably of the rough shelters that the Muslim troops had constructed within their lines.

192. According to Dīnawarī, op. cit., 404, Bābak first sent a representative, one Mūsā al-Aqṭaʿ, to inquire about the possibility of a meeting.

193. As Marin notes, Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 43 n. 208, these words and what follows seem to point to some previous communication between al-Afshīn and Bābak, as also hinted at in correspondence adduced in al-Afshīn's subsequent trial ("I exerted myself to avert death from him," Ṭabarī, III, 1311; p. 191, below); cf. Sadighi, op. cit., 260, 293. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 579, regards Bābak's approaches and period of time in which I can get together mounts for my household and equip myself for traveling." Al-Afshīn told him, "By God, I have already given you advice more than once, but you didn't take my advice; I am now giving you up-to-the-moment advice—it is better for you to come forth today with your safe-conduct than tomorrow!" He answered, "O Amīr, I accept this and will follow this course [forthwith]!" Al-Afshīn then said to him, "Now send the hostages about whom I asked you [1218] previously." He replied, "Yes, but so-and-so and so-and-so are on that hill (i.e., where Ādhīn was fighting), so order your troops to hold back."

He related: Al-Afshīn's envoy went to bring the troops back and was told that the banners of the Farghānan troops had already entered al-Badhdh and that the troops had scaled the strongholds there. He therefore rode on, shouting to the troops [to follow him]. Then he entered, and they entered, too, and the troops went up with their banners over Bābak's strongholds. However, Bābak had set ambushes in his strongholds—there being four of these—the men in ambush totaling 600, and the Muslim troops encountered them. They climbed to the tops of the fortresses with the banners, and the streets and public square of al-Badhdh were thronged with people. Those partisans of Bābak lying in ambush threw open the gates of the fortresses, and foot soldiers poured forth, combating the Muslim troops. Meanwhile, Bābak traveled onward until he came to the valley near Hashtādsar.

Al-Afshīn and all his commanders were fully occupied with the fighting at the gates of the fortresses, and the Khurramiyyah fought on strenuously. He brought up the naphtha throwers, and they began to pour naphtha and fire over the Khurramiyyah, while the troops were pulling down the fortresses until the Khurramī soldiers were killed to the last man. Al-Afshīn took captive Bābak's children and those members of their families who were with them in al-Badhdh.[194] Finally, evening came on, so seeking of amān here as simply procrastinating measures so that he could fortify al-Badhdh more securely against the Muslims.

---

194. According to Yāqūt, Irshād, I, 369, al-Mu'taṣim subsequently had in his harem a daughter of Bābak's, together with daughters of Māzyār and the patricius of 'Ammūriyyah, or Amorion, Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 579, states that al-Afshīn's forces released 7,600 Muslim captives from al-Badhdh.

al-Afshīn gave orders for the return, so the troops returned [to their camp], all the [survivors of the] Khurramiyyah being [still] in their houses. Al-Afshīn himself returned to the defensive trench at Rūdh al-Rūdh.[195]

It has been mentioned that, when Bābak and those followers of his who had gone with him into the valley learned that al-Afshīn had returned to his defensive trench, they returned to al-Badhdh. They carried off all the travel provisions they could transport and bore away their personal possesions; then they went into the valley near Hashtādsar. The next morning al-Afshīn set out until he reentered al-Badhdh. He halted in the town; he ordered the [1219] fortresses to be demolished and sent foot soldiers to patrol the outer fringes of the town, but they did not find there a single member of the indigenous population (al-'ulūj). He sent up the pioneer and labor corps, and they pulled down and set fire to the fortresses, spending three days on that until he had destroyed by fire Bābak's treasuries and fortresses. He did not leave a single house or fortress in al-Badhdh without burning down or demolishing it.[196] After that al-Afshīn went back and learned that Bābak had slipped away with a group of his followers. Hence he wrote to the rulers of Armenia and its local princes (baṭāriqihā),[197] informing them, "Bābak, together with a number of his partisans, has fled and has gone to a certain valley, and from there has set out in the direction of Armenia and will pass by you." He ordered each one of them to guard his own district

195. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 578–79; Dīnawarī, op. cit., 403–4; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 123–24 = par. 2806; Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 533–39; Azdī, op. cit., 425; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 385–87; Niẓām al-Mulk, op. cit., 293–95, trans., 234–35; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 462–71; Sadighi, op. cit., 256–61; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 51–52; B. Spuler, Iran in früh-islamischer Zeit, 61–63; Nafīsī, Bābak-i Khurramdīn, 109–17; Kennedy, op. cit., 166.

196. The poetic eulogies on al-Afshīn's victory (by Abū Tammām, al-Buḥturī, and al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, the verses of the last being given by Ṭabarī at III, 1256 [pp. 120–21, below]), imply that the Khurramī population of al-Badhdh, or that part of it that had not yet fled, was massacred en bloc. Haq notes (op. cit., 23) that this particular author refers in his verses not only to the final capitulation of al-Badhdh but also to various other skirmishes and engagements of the previous two years not apparently mentioned by Ṭabarī.

197. Baṭrīq/biṭrīq is the normal Arabic rendering of the Byzantine title patricius; see Bosworth, "Al-Khwārazmī," 30–32. Here it is used for the Christian princes of Armenia, who could be considered equivalent in status and rank to the Byzantine nobles and generals bearing the title patricius.

carefully and not to let anyone travel through it without first seizing him and ascertaining his identity.

Spies came to al-Afshīn and informed him of Bābak's hiding place in valley. It was a valley filled with thick vegetation and trees, with Armenia on one side and Ādharbayjān on the other. Cavalry could not penetrate into it, nor could anyone hiding there be seen on account of the density of its trees and watercourses. It was indeed one big jungle-like thicket, and this valley was in fact called a "thicket" (ghayḍah).[198] Al-Afshīn sent to every place to ascertain whether there was any road going down from that place into that thicket or whether [if there were such a road] Bābak could get out by that road. On every road in every locality in those parts he posted a detachment of troops, comprising between 400 and 500 warriors, and he sent with them the mountain guards to provide them with information about the road; and he ordered them to guard the road by night, lest anyone leave by it. At the same time he sent to each one of these detachments of troops provisions from his own army camp. These detachments amounted to fifteen in all.

They remained thus until there arrived a letter from the [1220]
Commander of the Faithful al-Mu'taṣim, sealed in gold and containing a safe-conduct (amān) for Bābak. Thereupon al-Afshīn summoned those [former] partisans of Bābak who had sought protection (ista'mana) from him, among whom was one of Bābak's grown-up sons, the eldest of his sons in fact. Al-Afshīn said to him and the other captives, "This is something which I had not expected from the Commander of the Faithful and had not been hopeful of him regarding it, that he should write a safe-conduct for Bābak when the latter is in this present situation.[199] Now which of you will take it and convey it to Bābak?" But none of them dared to undertake it, and one of them protested, "O Amīr, none of us would venture to confront him with this!" "Woe to you," al-Afshīn answered him, "surely he will rejoice at this?" The man replied, "May God guide the Amīr 198. Presumably this was part of the low-lying Kur valley.

199. Following here the suggested translation of H. Ritter, "Autographs," 158, which makes unnecessary Marin's surmise, Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 45 n. 213a, that al-Afshīn was alarmed at the arrival of the Caliph's safe-conduct, in the light of his own previous connivance at Bābak's escape.

in an upright way! We know better than you about this matter." Al-Afshīn said, "Even so, you must ineluctably submit yourselves to me completely and must deliver this letter to him."

At that, two men from among them got up and said to him, "Give us a guarantee that you will provide for our families"[200] (i.e., if anything unpleasant should happen to us), so al-Afshīn gave them the required guarantee. The two men took the letter, set out, and kept on going round in the thicket until they came upon Bābak. Bābak's son sent a letter [also] with the two envoys, informing him of the new situation and asking him to come back and take up the safe-conduct, for this would be the safest and best course for him.

The two men delivered to Bābak his son's letter, which he read. Then he said, "What have you been doing?" They replied, "Our families and children were taken captive on that night, and we did not know where you were in order that we might join you. We were in a place where we feared that they would capture us, so we sought a guarantee of protection." Bābak said to the man who had brought the letter, "I know nothing of this. But you, O son of a whore, how have you dared to do this, to come to me from that son of a whore," and he seized the man, cut off his head, and fastened the (caliph's) letter to his breast, still sealed, never having broken the seal. Then he said to the other man, "Go and [1221] ask that son of a whore"—he meant his own son—"how it is that he writes to me thus?" And he wrote back to him in these terms, "If you were to join up with me and follow in the way of the movement to which you belong (da'wataka, i.e., the movement of the Khurramiyyah) until one day you succeeded to power, you would indeed be my son, but at this point I am certain about the corruption of your mother, the whore. O son of a whore, it may be that I shall live [a long time] after this, but it will have been as one bearing the name of this ruling position, and, wherever I am or wherever I am spoken of, it will be as a king. You [on the other hand] come from a stock that is devoid of good characteristics, and I bear witness that you are no son of mine, for it is better to live for just a single day as a ruler than to live for forty years as an abject slave." With that, he left his place of concealment and sent three men with al-Afshīn's envoy to escort him up to a certain spot. Then they rejoined Bābak.

200. Following Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIII, tujrī 'alā 'iyālātinā.

Bābak remained in that thicket until his provisions were exhausted, and then he went out at a place adjoining a road on which some troops were stationed on guard. The place where this road ran was a mountain devoid of water; hence the detachment of troops was unable to stay on the road because of its distance from water and had to turn away from the road to a spot near which water was available. They had, however, stationed two mountain guards and two cavalrymen at the side of the road to guard it, there being about a mile and a half between the road and the main body of troops. Each day two cavalrymen and two mountain guards took turns in patrolling the road. One day, around midday, they were engaged on this duty when Bābak and his companions came forth; they saw no one and did not observe the two cavalrymen and the two mountain guards and imagined that there were no troops there. Accordingly, Bābak and his two brothers 'Abdallāh and Mu'āwiyah,[201] together with his mother and one of his wives called Ibnat al-Kalandāniyyah, set out. The whole group went forth, leaving the road and heading for [1222] Armenia.

The two cavalrymen and the two mountain guards saw them and sent a message to the main body of troops, which was under the command of Abū al-Sāj,[202] "We saw a group of horsemen passing by, but we do not know who they are." The troops thereupon mounted and rode off and observed them (Bābak's party) from afar, Bābak's group having halted at a spring of water to eat their midday meal. When they spotted the Muslim troops the unbelievers rose up in great haste. Bābak and those with him rode off and managed to escape, but Mu'āwiyah, Bābak's mother, and the wife who was with him were captured. One of Bābak's slave retainers (ghulām) escaped with him also. Abū al-Sāj sent Muʿāwiyah and the two women back to his army camp. Bābak pressed onward in the direction that he intended until he came to the mountains of Armenia,[203] traveling through them clandestinely. He was in urgent need of food, but all the Armenian nobles had set watchmen and guards over their neighborhoods and outlying districts and had instructed their guard posts (masāliḥ) not to let anyone pass without seizing him so that they might establish his identity. Hence all the guard-post commanders were on the alert.

201. Somewhat surprisingly, the Islamic names of Bābak's brothers are used here. We learn Bābak's own one, al-Ḥasan, only from Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, = par. 2812 (given in several manuscripts as al-Ḥusayn).

202. I.e., Abū al-Sāj Dīwdād b. Yūsuf Dīwdast, an Iranian commander from the Transoxanian region (in fact, like al-Afshīn himself, from Ushrūsanah), who subsequently served the caliphs in various governorships until his death in 266 (879–80); his sons Muḥammad and Yūsuf became governors of Ādharbayjān and Armenia and founded a virtually autonomous short-lived ruling line there. See Madelung, "Minor Dynasties," 228–32; EI[1], s.v. Sādjids (Cl. Huart).

Bābak was stricken with hunger. He looked down from an eminence and noticed a ploughman ploughing one of his acres (faddān)[204] in a certain valley, so he said to his slave retainer, "Go down to this ploughman and take with you dīnārs and dirhams, and if he has bread with him take it and give him the money (i.e., in exchange)." The ploughman had a companion who had gone aside to fulfill a need of nature. The slave went down to the ploughman, and the latter's companion observed him from a distance; he stood there apart, waiting, fearful of the slave's going up to his companion and watching what his companion would do. The slave handed something over to the ploughman; the ploughman came forward and, taking some bread, handed it over to the slave. His companion was meanwhile standing there watching him and imagined that the slave had seized the bread from the ploughman by force, not realizing that he had given the ploughman something in return. He ran off to the guard post and told them that a man bearing a sword and weapons had come to them and that he had taken the bread of his companion who was in the valley.

The commander of the guard post rode out, and, as this was in [1223] the mountains of Ibn Sunbāṭ, he sent information about this to Sahl b. Sunbāṭ,[205] who thereupon rode off in haste, with a group

203. As Bābak later entered the territory of Sahl b. Sunbāṭ, he must have been heading northwest toward the upper reaches of the Kur River in the Western part of the modern Azerbaijan Soviet Socialist Republic; see n. 205, below.

204. In medieval times this measurement of area was around 6,000–6,400 square meters. See Hinz, op. cit., 65; EI[1], s.v. Faddān (Cl. Huart); EI[2], s.v. Misāḥa. 1. In the Central Islamic Lands (C. E. Bosworth).

205. Sahl b. Sunbāṭ (Armenian Smbat), from a local Armenian family of eastern Transcaucasia, lord of Shakkī (Shak'ē) to the north of the upper reaches of the Kur of his retainers, until he came to him. When he reached the ploughman, the slave was still with him, and he said to the man, "What's happening here?" The ploughman replied, "This is a person who was passing by me and asked me for bread, so I gave him some." Ibn Sunbāṭ thereupon said to the slave, "Where is your master?" and he replied, "Over there," inclining his head in the direction of Bābak. Ibn Sunbāṭ followed him and came up with Bābak, who was descending [the mountain]. When he saw his face, he recognized him. Ibn Sunbāṭ dismounted from his horse in deference to Bābak and drew near to him on foot, kissing his band. Then he said to him, "Alas, my lord, where are you heading?" Bābak replied, "I am heading for the Byzantine lands," or some other place that he named. Ibn Sunbāṭ said, "You will not find any place or any person who is more conscious of your rights or more deserving that you should stay with him than myself. You know my position; there is no contact between me and the central power (al-sulṭān, i.e., the central power of Islam, meaning the caliphate), and you will not be coming into the presence of one of that power's adherents. You are well acquainted with my personal affairs, my country, and all the local princes here; indeed, they are people of your own house, for sons have come to you by them!" By that he meant that, whenever Bābak learned of a beautiful daughter or sister of one of the nobles, he would send a message to that noble, seeking her [in marriage]. If the noble in question sent her to Bābak, [all well and good]; but, if not, Bābak

---

River and an important figure in the affairs of Arrān (Armenian Alvan-k', classical Caucasian Albania), is mentioned in both Armenian and Arabic sources; it may be that Ibn Sunbāṭ (Armenian Smbatean) was a family name, rather than a direct patronymic. He came into prominence after 205 (820–21) and was involved in resistance against the Arabs' attempts to extend their influence in Arrān (see p. 78, n. 208, below). Then, after the fall of al-Badhdh, Bābak, hoping for asylum with Sahl, fled north into Arrān by a route that cannot be determined exactly from the vague itinerary in Ṭabarī's account. The two leaders, Sahl and Bābak, shared a common hostility to the Arabs, but in the event Sahl decided to conciliate them and to surrender Bābak, as detailed below. He must have enjoyed the Caliph's favor for about fifteen years, until ca. 238 (852–53), when Bughā al-Kabīr, the new governor of Ādharbayjān and Arrān, is reported in Armenian sources to have deported him, along with many local Armenian princes; in Ṭabarī's list of these deportees (III, 1416), however, it was Sahl's son Mu'āwiyah, "baṭrīq of Arrān," who was deported in this group. Ṭabarī (III, 1232 [pp. 89–90, below]) also mentions Mu'āwiyah as having escorted Bābak to al-Afshīn. See Marquart, Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge, 412–14, 422–23; Minorsky, "Caucasica," 505–10; *EI*², s.v. Arrān (R. N. Frye); EIr, s.v. Arrān (C. E. Bosworth).

would swoop down on him in a night raid and seize her, together with all the noble's possessions, etc., and take everything back to his own land by force.

Ibn Sunbāṭ then said to Bābak, "Come and stay with me in my fortress, for indeed it is your own house and I am your slave. Spend this winter here and then consider your future course of action." Bābak was suffering from hardship and fatigue, so he relied on Sahl b. Sunbāṭ's words and told him, "It is not good that both myself and my brother should be in the same place, for if anyone should stumble upon one of us, then [if we have separated] the other would be preserved alive; but I will stay here with you and my brother 'Abdallāh will go to Ibn Iṣṭifānūs,[206] for [1224] we do not know what might happen, and we have no successor who could then continue to uphold our cause."[207] Ibn Sunbāṭ said to him, "Your sons are many!" But Bābak answered, "There is not one of them who is any good," and he resolved upon sending his brother to Ibn Iṣṭifānūs's fortress, for he trusted him. So at that point he went with Ibn Sunbāṭ to his fortress, and when it was morning 'Abdallāh proceeded to Ibn Iṣṭifānūs's fortress, while Bābak remained with Ibn Sunbāṭ.

Ibn Sunbāṭ wrote to al-Afshīn, informing him that Bābak was with him in his fortress. Al-Afshīn wrote back to Ibn Sunbāṭ, "If this news is true, then you will have something coming to you from me and from the Commander of the Faithful, may God strengthen him, which you will like very much!" And he wrote promising Ibn Sunbāṭ a handsome recompense. Al-Afshīn gave a description of Bābak to one of his intimates whom he trusted and sent him to Ibn Sunbāṭ, and he wrote to the latter that he had sent to him one of his intimate circle, with the aim that he should see Bābak in order to report back to al-Afshīn [i.e., with the identification].[208]

---

206. The full name of Ibn Iṣṭifānus appears in the list of Armenian princes deported by Bughā al-Kabīr in 238 (852–53; Ṭabarī, III, 1416) as 'Īsā b. Yūsuf b. Ukht Iṣṭifānus, which Minorsky interpreted as a nephew of Iṣṭifānus (Armenian Step'annos), born to Yūsuf of a sister of Iṣṭifānus. His principality must have lain to the south of the Kur River valley in Arrān; according to Ṭabarī, III, 1232 (p. 90, below), it was in the region of Baylaqān. See Minorsky, "Caucasica," 512–14.

207. Bābak was obviously not wholly certain of Sahl's good faith in offering him shelter.

208. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 579 (cf. also Balādhurī, op. cit., 211), records that, when al-Afshīn first arrived an Ādharbayjān to take charge of the war against Ibn Sunbāṭ did not wish to arouse Bābak's suspicions, so he said to the man, "You won't be able to see him except at the times when he is occupied with eating his food. He has his midday meal [with me], so, when you see us calling for the meal, put on the clothes of the cooks in our household, the garb of the indigenous people hereabouts, and come forward as if you were bringing in food or presenting something. He will be preoccupied with the food, and you can look closely at him as much as you want; then go back and report it to your master." The man accordingly did that at the mealtime. At that point Bābak raised his head and looked at him but failed to recognize him, saying, "Who is this man?" Ibn Sunbāṭ answered him, "He is a man from the people of Khurāsān, who came to join us some time ago, a Christian," and [1225] he made the Ushrūsanī understand what he was saying. Then Bābak said to the man, "How long have you been here?" He replied, "Since the year so-and-so." Bābak said, "How did you come to remain here?" He replied, "I got married here." Bābak exclaimed, "You have spoken truly! When a man is asked, "Where do you come from?' he replies, 'From where my wife comes!"

The man then went back to al-Afshīn with the information and described to him everything that he had seen there of Bābak. Al-Afshīn sent Abū Sa'īd and Būzbārah[209] to Ibn Sunbāṭ with a letter to him and ordered that, when they came to a certain road, they should forward his letter to Ibn Sunbāṭ with one of the indigenous people. He further ordered them not to disobey Ibn Sunbāṭ in whatever instructions he might give them. They did that. Ibn Sunbāṭ wrote to them both, telling them to stay in a certain place, which he named and described to them, until his envoy should come to them. They therefore remained fixed in the location that he had described to them, and Ibn Sunbāṭ sent supplies and provisions to them until Bābak was moved to go forth hunting. Ibn Sunbāṭ said to him, "Here is a valley with sweet and fragrant air, and you are enveloped in care within the Bābak, Sahl had been in revolt in Arrān; al-Afshīn had sent against him the governor whom he had appointed over Armenia, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Azdī al-Samarqandī, but the latter was defeated by Sahl. Sahl's extradition of Bābak may accordingly be viewed as an attempt—successful as it turned out—to regain favor with the caliphal authorities.

---

209. See p. 47 n. 153, above.

bowels of this fortress! Why don't we go out, taking with us a falcon and sparrow hawk and other necessary equipment, and we'll dispel our cares and divert ourselves till the midday mealtime by hunting." Bābak answered, "Just as you wish."

Ibn Sunbāṭ put this intention into execution, so that they rode out together the next morning. He wrote to Abū Sa'īd and Būzbārah informing them of what he had resolved upon and instructing them to meet him with their military forces, one on one side of the mountain and the other on the other side. [He [1226] further instructed them] to journey clandestinely at the time of the dawn prayer. Then, when his messenger should come to them, they were to take up a vantage point overlooking the valley, and when they saw them they were to come down into the valley and capture them. When Ibn Sunbāṭ and Bābak rode out the next morning, the former sent a messenger to Abū Sa'īd and another one to Būzbārah, and to each messenger he said, "Take this [group of men] to such-and-such a place, and take this [group of men] to such-and-such a place; then assume a position overlooking us, and, when you see us both, shout 'There they are! Seize them!'" He wished [by means of this stratagem] to throw Bābak into confusion, so that he might say, "This group of cavalrymen has come toward us and will capture us!"—not wanting to hand Bābak over to them [directly] from his own residence.

The two messengers came to Ibn Sa'īd and Būzbārah and proceeded with them until they reached a vantage point over the valley. Lo and behold, there they found themselves in the presence of Bābak and Ibn Sunbāṭ! They looked down at Bābak, and then they and their men descended to him, one from one side and the other from the other side, and seized both of them, together with their sparrow hawks. Bābak was wearing a white durrā'ah, a white turban, and short boots and is said to have had a sparrow hawk on his hand. When he saw that the troops had surrounded him, he stopped and looked at the two leaders, who told him, "Dismount!" He replied, "Who are you both?" One of them replied, "I am Abū Sa'īd," and the other replied, "I am Būzbārah." Bābak said, "All right then," bent his leg, and dismounted. Ibn Sunbāṭ was meanwhile watching him. Bābak raised his head toward him and reviled him, saying, "Indeed, you have sold me to the Jews[210] merely for a trifling amount. If you wanted money and had asked me for it, I would have given you much more than these are giving you!" Abū Sa'īd said, "Mount again and ride on!" Bābak replied, "So be it!"

They conveyed him thus and brought him to al-Afshīn. When Bābak drew near to the camp, al-Afshīn went up to Barzand, and a [1227] tent was pitched for him there. He ordered the troops to form two lines, and he himself sat down within a tent or booth (fāzah).[211] They brought in Bābak, and al-Afshīn commanded that they should not let anyone of the Arabs[212] enter between the two lines, out of fear lest someone whose comrades Bābak had killed or upon whom he had wrought great misfortune might kill or wound Bābak. A large number of women and children had already come to al-Afshīn, relating that Bābak had taken them captive and that they were of freeborn status, either from the Arabs or from the (Persian) *dihqān*s. So an extensive enclosure was set aside in which he installed them and issued to them allowances of bread. He instructed them to write to their next of kin, wherever they might be, and he handed them over to anyone who might come along and recognize a woman, a boy, or a girl and then bring forward two witnesses testifying that he really did know them or that they were women of his household or kindred. People came along and took away a large number of them, but a considerable number of them were left behind, still waiting for their relatives.[213]

---

210. I.e., the Muslims; see p. 47 n. 156.

211. This term recurs at III, 1261 (p. 126, below), where it has the sense of a tent or booth within a larger tent or pavilion, as noted in Glossarium, CDVIII. This meaning is confirmed by the detailed description in Jahshiyārī, Kitāb al-wuzarā', 221, of Hārūn al-Rashīd's encampment at Ṭūs in Khurāsān just before his death there. He held public audience in a large, black-silk tent or pavilion (miḍrāb), apparently rectangular, for in the corners there were four canopies or cupolas (qibāb), also covered in black silk; the whole tent was 400 *dhirā'*s around. Within this, the Caliph sat in a black silk fāzah in the center of the miḍrāb, the supporting columns of which were also black. The rendering "large two-poled tent" in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 51 and n. 233, based on Lane, does not therefore seem appropriate. Cf. Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 128.

212. Thus in the text and in that of the Cairo edition, IX, 50. But one could read with ms. C gharīb^{an} "any stranger" for 'arabiyy^{an}; gharīb^{an} is preferred in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 51 nn. 233–34.

213. The restoration of the former captives to their families is referred to by Abū Tammām in his poetry; see Haq, op. cit., 23.

On that day when al-Afshīn ordered the troops to form up in lines, there being a distance of half a mile between him and Bābak, the latter was made to dismount and walk between the two lines in his durrāʿah, turban, and boots until he reached al-Afshīn and stood before him. Al-Afshīn scrutinized him and said, "Take him down to the army camp"; so they rode down with him. But, when the women and boys in the enclosure saw him, they beat their faces, cried out, and wept until their voices rent the air. Al-Afshīn said to them, "Last night you were crying out, 'He made us captive!' yet today you are weeping for him, may God curse you!" They answered, however, "He used to treat us [1228] well!" Al-Afshīn then gave orders, and Bābak was placed in a house, with al-Afshīn then appointing some of his men as guards over him.

Bābak's brother ʿAbdallāh, at the time when Bābak was staying with Ibn Sunbāṭ, went to [the stronghold of] ʿĪsā b. Yūsuf b. Istifānūs.[214] When al-Afshīn had seized Bābak and had brought him to his army camp and set guards over him, he was informed of ʿAbdallāh's whereabouts: that he was in fact staying with Ibn Iṣṭifānūs. Hence al-Afshīn wrote to this last asking him to send ʿAbdallāh to him, so Ibn Iṣṭifānūs duly dispatched ʿAbdallāh to him. When he came into al-Afshīn's hands, al-Afshīn imprisoned him in the same house with his brother (with Bābak), setting a group of men to stand guard over them both. He wrote to al-Muʿtaṣim about his capture of Bābak and his brother, and al-Muʿtaṣim wrote back, ordering him to bring them both to him. When al-Afshīn was on the point of traveling back to Iraq, he sent a message to Bābak, saying, "I am about to set off, taking you along, so have a last look at whatever you wish in the land of Ādharbayjān." Bābak answered, "I long to see my own town again." So al-Afshīn sent an escort of men with him on a moonlit night to al-Badhdh, and Bābak roamed around in it and looked at the slain and the houses until dawn; then the escort brought him back to al-Afshīn. The latter had consigned Bābak to the custodianship of one of his retainers, but Bābak sought from al-Afshīn to be relieved of that man. Al-Afshīn said to him, "Why do you seek to be relieved of him?" Bābak replied, "He comes [to me] with his hands full of the foul reek of meat and then sleeps at my head, and the smell from his hands discommodes me." So al-Afshīn removed the man. Bābak came to al-Afshīn in Barzand on the tenth of Shawwāl [15 September 837], [escorted] between Būzbārah and [Abū al-Sāj] Dīwdād.[215]

214. For the more probably correct filiation of this name, see p. 78 n. 206, above.

In this year Muḥammad b. Dāwūd led the Pilgrimage.[216]

---

215. Dīnawarī, op. cit., 404–5; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 579; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 124–27 = pars. 2807–9; Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 539–44; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 387–88; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 471–75; Sadighi, op. cit., 265; Spuler, op. cit., 63–64; Nafīsī, Bābak-i Khurram-dīn, 40.

216. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 786; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., 476. One might have expected to have found here, among the miscellaneous events that Ṭabarī often inserts at the end of the entry for each year, mention of a plague of rats (or mice, fa'r) that infested the districts of Sarakhs and Marw al-Rūdh in northern Khurasan during this year and even affected the crops adversely; it is mentioned on the authority of Ṭabarī by Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, op. cit., 144, under this year.

The Events of the Year 223

(December 3, 837–November 22, 838)

[1229]

Al-Afshīn's Bringing of Bābak and His Brother to al-Mu'taṣim at Sāmarrā and Their Execution

It has been mentioned that al-Afshīn reached al-Mu'taṣim at Sāmarrā with them on the night of Thursday (i.e., the night of Wednesday–Thursday), the third of Ṣafar (4 January 838) and that al-Mu'taṣim used [at this time] to send to al-Afshīn, on every day from the moment when he set off from Barzand until he reached Sāmarrā, a horse and a robe of honor.[217] [It is further mentioned] that, because of his concern over the matter of Bābak and over getting news about him and because of the bad state of the road on account of snow and other things, al-Mu'taṣim stationed sleek, swift horses (khayl muḍammarah) along the road from Sāmarrā to the pass leading to Ḥulwān.[218] At the start of each

217. The standard awards for victorious generals (robes of honor, jeweled sword, standards, horses, gold collars and armbands, etc.) are mentioned by Hilāl al-Ṣābi' as having been given to al-Afshīn by the Caliph; op. cit., 93–94, trans. 75 (read al-Mu'taṣim for al-Mu'taḍid); in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 127–28 = par. 2810, there is a detailed description of the gifts heaped on al-Afshīn when he reached Sāmarrā.

218. Ḥulwān was on the borders of Iraq and al-Jibāl, where the highway to farsakh was specially stationed a horse with a rapid rider (mujrī), who would gallop with the news, so that he might relay it personally to another man [similarly stationed], placing it in the latter's hand directly from his own. In the stretch from beyond Ḥulwān to Ādharbayjān they had stationed mounts from al-Marj;[219] these were ridden for a day or for two days and then would be exchanged for new mounts that were then dispatched onward, and slaves from the personnel at al-Marj would travel on their backs, each mount being stationed at the beginning of each [new] farsakh. He (al-Muʿtaṣim) posted for them watchmen (dayādibah)[220] on the mountaintops by night and day and ordered them to cry out when news came to them (i.e., of the approach of one of the relays). When the person who was near the shouting heard the noise, he got himself ready, but his opposite number who had shouted was not to go to him until the other was waiting for him on the road; then he would take the dispatch bag (kharīṭah).[221] In this way, the mail bag used to reach Sāmarrā from al-Afshīn's army camp in four days or less.

When al-Afshīn reached Qanāṭir Ḥudhayfah,[222] there met him Hārūn b. al-Muʿtaṣim (al-Wāthiq) and members of al-Muʿtaṣim's household. When al-Afshīn brought Bābak to Sāmarrā, he lodged the latter in his own palace at al-Maṭīrah.[223] During the middle of [1230] Khurāsān left the plain and entered the mountains; the Paytak Pass over the Zagros Mountains leading to Hamadhān lay to the east of the town. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 290–93; Le Strange, Lands, 191–92; Schwarz, op. cit., 673–83; Barthold, Historical Geography, 198–99; *EI*², s.v. Ḥulwān (L. Lockhart).

219. Sc. Marj al-Qalʿah "Meadow of the Fortress," a fertile grazing ground at the head of the Ḥulwān Pass, ten farsakhs from Ḥulwān itself, where, according to Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 270, trans., 68, the caliphal studs were kept. Obviously these studs were drawn upon, as stated here, for the use of the postal and intelligence couriers. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 101; Marquart, Untersuchungen, II, 159–60; Le Strange, Lands, 191–92; Schwarz, op. cit. 491–92.

220. Arabic broken plural of Persian dīda-bān. The task of these men must have been similar to that of the kūhbāniyyah mentioned earlier, in the account of the campaign against Bābak, e.g., at Ṭabarī, III, 1188 (see p. 38, above); cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., 142 n. 1.

221. According to Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ, the official kharāʾiṭ were of black silk brocade secured by a drawstring with a sealed tassel made of either ambergris and musk or of black clay mixed with ambergris; op. cit., 127, trans., 103.

222. These bridges, named after the Companion Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamānī al-ʿAbsī, who had encamped there during the conquest of Iraq from the Sāsānids, lay in the Sawād of Baghdad, according to Yāqūt, Buldān, IV, 400.

223. This lay some two miles to the south of the modern city of Sāmarrā and was, according to Yāqūt, Buldān, V, 151–52, a pleasure ground (mutanazzah) for the night Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād came in disguise and saw and spoke with Bābak; then he went back to al-Muʿtaṣim and described Bābak to him. Very soon thereafter al-Muʿtaṣim rode forth to Bābak between the two walls of al-Ḥayr,[224] went into Bābak's presence disguised, and scrutinized him at length, without Bābak's recognizing him.

The next morning al-Muʿtaṣim sat in state to receive Bābak, this being either Monday or Thursday.[225] The troops were drawn up in lines [along the road] from the Bāb al-ʿĀmmah[226] to al-Maṭīrah, and al-Muʿtaṣim wished to display Bābak publicly and show him to the populace at large. He therefore asked, "On what sort of mount should this fellow be placed, and how can he best be shown off?" Ḥizām[227] told him, "O Commander of the Faithful, there is nothing better for displaying [someone] than an elephant!" Al-Muʿtaṣim commented, "You have spoken truly," and ordered the elephant to be gotten ready.[228] He gave further orders concerning Bābak, and he was dressed in a short coat

---

Baghadad and Sāmarrā, first laid out in al-Maʾmūn's reign. Subsequently, al-Muʿtaṣim allotted it to al-Afshīn, and around it were the land grants to his Ushrūsanī troops (Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 259, trans., 51). After his fall it passed to the general Waṣīf and then to a son of al-Mutawakkil's. The actual site of al-Maṭīrah and even that of al-Afshīn's palace have now been identified with reasonable certainty as lying in the modern area of Jubayriyyah. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 101; Northedge, "Planning Sāmarrāʾ," 118–21; idem and Faulkner, op. cit., 145.

224. Literally, "the enclosure"; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 100–1, and *EI*², s.v. Ḥāʾir (J. Sourdel-Thomine). Yāqūt, Buldān, II, 328, states that this was a palace at Sāmarrā on which al-Mutawakkil spent a vast amount of money, but it clearly antedates that Caliph. It is mentioned at length by Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 258 ff., trans., 50 ff., as an area with many estates allotted to the Turkish generals, where al-Mutawakkil subsequently built a large congregational mosque.

225. According to Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 261, trans., 53 (cf. Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 126), Mondays and Thursdays were the days when the caliphs at Sāmarrā held public audience in the Dār al-ʿĀmmah. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 129 = par. 2811, fixes the precise date of the reception of Bābak as Thursday, the second of Ṣafar, 223 (January 3, 838).

226. On the "Public Gate," see n. 232, below.

227. Ḥizām b. Ghālib, Khurāsānian commander who, with his brother Yaʿqūb, was in charge of the caliphal stables at Sāmarrā and to whom a land grant was allotted in the area of al-Maṭīrah. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 260, trans., 52; Herzfeld, op. cit., 107.

228. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 127 = par. 2810, describes the sumptuous coverings of this gray elephant, which had been a present from an Indian prince.

(qabā')[229] of satin brocade and a round cap (qalansūwah)[230] of sable fur; he was completely alone. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt[231] recited,

The elephant has been painted and adorned with dyestuff, as is the custom with such a beast, for it is bearing the devil from Khurāsān.
The elephant does not have its limbs painted and adorned except for a very momentous person (or: for a very momentous occasion, dhī sha'n^{in} min al-shān).

The people watched Bābak intently from al-Maṭīrah to the Bāb al-'Āmmah, and then he was brought into the Public Audience Chamber (Dār al-'Āmmah) before the Commander of the Faithful.[232] The latter summoned a butcher to cut off his hands and feet. But then he ordered (instead) Bābak's own executioner

229. This coat or jacket, regarded as a Persian garment, in contrast to the Arab durrā'ah, was increasingly worn by the caliphs from the mid-third (mid-ninth) century onward; see Dozy, Vêtements, 352–62.

230. This headgear (often qualified as ṭawīlah "tall" or ruṣāfiyyah, from the type of fabric used for it) was worn by the caliphs and by the learned classes, often in conjunction with a turban ('imāmah). See Dozy, Vêtements, 365–71; idem, Supplément, II, 401; Herzfeld, op. cit., 142–43 n. 5; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 133–34; EI^{1}, s.v. Kalansuwa (W. Björkman). Herzfeld saw in its use by the caliphs a reminiscence of the Achaemenid emperors' kyrabasia mentioned by Aristophanes. The word qalansūwah is clearly non-Arabic, but its origin is unclear; as Herzfeld implies, it does not seem to be derived from New Persian kalāh "hat."

231. I.e., the vizier; see pp. 31–33 and nn. 117, 126, above. In his time, Ibn al-Zayyāt had in fact a considerable reputation as a poet and adīb, leaving behind a dīwān of poetry that has survived, though so far unpublished; Sezgin, GAS, II, 576–77.

232. It is clear from this passage that there was a distinction between the Public Gate, presumably a monumental edifice, and the Public Audience Chamber, which would be part of the palace complex—in this case, the Jawsaq al-Khāqānī, the modern Qaṣr al-Khalīfah (see Herzfeld, op. cit., 95–99, 104–6)—but would lie before the inner, private parts of the palace. In the Public Audience Chamber, as noted, p. 86 n. 225, above, the Caliph held open sessions on Mondays and Thursdays, and the texts make clear that visitors and suppliants had to traverse a series of courtyards and rooms before reaching it. Sourdel has affirmed, in "Questions de cérémonial," 126–28, that the triple-arched īwān of the Jawsaq al-Khāqānī, which still stands, was an ideal place for the Caliph to hold audience, but there is no reason to equate it, as did Herzfeld, with the Public Gate, the site of which remains unclear.

to be brought in, so the chamberlain went out by the Bāb [1231] al-'Āmmah, at the same time calling out "Nūdnūd!"—this being the name of Bābak's executioner—and the cry of "Nūdnūd!" rose up until he actually appeared. He came into the Public Audience Chamber, and the Commander of the Faithful ordered him to cut off Bābak's hands and feet. He did this, and Bābak fell to the ground. Then the Commander of the Faithful ordered him to be slaughtered (or: to be ripped open, bi-dhabḥihi), and one of the two of them (i.e., either the butcher originally summoned or Nūdnūd) slit open his belly. Then he sent Bābak's head to Khurāsān[233] and gibbeted his trunk[234] in Sāmarrā at al-'Aqabah (literally, "the rise, slope"), a place well known for its pieces of timber.[235]

Al-Mu'taṣim further ordered that Bābak's brother 'Abdallāh should be sent with Ibn Sharwīn al-Ṭabarī[236] to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm (al-Muṣ'abī), his deputy in the City of Peace; and he commanded

---

233. Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 545, adds the detail (from a local tradition?) that 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir had it paraded around the towns of Khurāsān and then finally exhibited on a pole at Nīshāpūr.

234. Wa-ṣalaba badanahu. Although ṣalb and taṣlīb can literally mean "crucifixion" (see Glossarium, CCCXXVI), they often refer to the impalement or gibbeting of a corpse (or a victim still alive?) on a post or beam; see Herzeld, op. cit., 143n. 1.

235. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 129–31 = par. 2812, gives a different version of Bābak's mutilation and execution. See also Dīnawarī, op. cit., 405; Tanūkhī, Nishwār al-muḥāḍarah, I, 147–48 (anecdote on Bābak's fortitude); Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 544–45; Azdī, op. cit., 426; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 388; Niẓām al-Mulk, op. cit., 295, trans., 235–36; Ibn al-Athir, op. cit., VI, 477–78; Browne, op. cit., I, 329; Sadighi, op. cit., 265–67; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 54–55; Nafīsī, Bābak-i Khurram-dīn, 141–44; Frye, Golden Age, 115. Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 260, trans., 52, locates Bābak's gibbet on the main avenue leading from al-Maṭīrah to the Nahr Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, along which lay the land grants of the Khurāsānian commanders, just before the great market and the Old Mosque, later to be replaced by al-Mutawakkil's jāmi' (see p. 86 n. 224, above); cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., 103, 143. The post in Sāmarrā on which Bābak's corpse was gibbeted was still known for this more than thirty years later, as appears from Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXI, ed. Brünnow, 258, shajarat Bābak; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 131 = par. 2813, says that the spot was still known as khashabat Bābak in his own time, a century later, when Sāmarrā was much reduced in population.

236. This name was frequent among the Bāwandids of the mountainous region of Ṭabaristān, so that their homeland became known as Jabal Sharwīn, but at this time the head of the family was Qārin b. Shahriyār b. Sharwīn. He is nevertheless probably the person referred to here, "Ibn Sharwīn" being a dynastic, rather than a personal, name. See Ibn Isfandiyār, Ta'rīkh-i Ṭabaristān, 147 ff; H. L. Rabino di Borgomale, "Les dynasties du Māzandarān," 412–13.

the latter to decapitate 'Abdallāh and to do to him what had been done to his brother and then to gibbet him. When al-Ṭabarī brought 'Abdallāh to al-Baradān, he halted with him in the palace there. 'Abdallāh, Bābak's brother, said to Ibn Sharwīn, "Who are you?" Ibn Sharwīn replied, "The ruler of Ṭabaristān." 'Abdallāh exclaimed, "Praise be to God, Who has fittingly brought for me a man from the dihqān class to take charge of my execution!" But Ibn Sharwīn replied, "It is in fact this fellow who is going to be in charge of killing you," for he had with him Nūdnūd, who had killed Bābak. 'Abdallāh commented, "You are my social equal and compatriot (ṣāḥibī), but this fellow is a mere barbarian ('ilj)! Now tell me, were you ordered to allow me any food or not?" He replied, "[Ask for] whatever you like!" 'Abdallāh said, "Rustle up for me some fālūdhajah!"[237] He related: Ibn Sharwīn gave orders, and some fālūdhajah was put together for him in the middle of the night, and he ate till he was fully sated. Then he said, "O Abū so-and-so, tomorrow morning you will know that I am a true dihqān, if God wills!" Then he asked, "Could you give me some nabīdh to drink?" He replied, "Yes, but not a lot." 'Abdallāh said, "I shan't, indeed, drink a lot." He related: Ibn Sharwīn called for four raṭls[238] of wine, and 'Abdallāh sat down and drank them at a leisurely pace until it was almost dawn. Then he (Ibn Sharwīn) set off at dawn and brought 'Abdallāh to the City of Peace and to the head of the bridge. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm ordered his hands and feet to be cut off, but 'Abdallāh did not utter a sound or speak during this. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm ordered his corpse to be gibbeted, so it was gibbeted at the City of Peace on the eastern side [of the city] [1232] between the two bridges.[239]

It has been mentioned from Ṭawq b. Aḥmad that when Bābak fled he went to Sahl b. Sunbāṭ. Al-Afshīn then sent Abū Sa'īd and Būzbārah, who assumed custody of Bābak from Sahl. Sahl sent 237. A sweetmeat confected of starch, honey, and nuts. See Jāḥiẓ, Kitāb al-bukhalā', 203, trans., 292 (cf. 314, noting that it was a dish originally favored by the Persians and their emperors; Rodinson, op. cit., 148).

---

238. A raṭl was a measure of weight; the Iraqi raṭl was considered canonical and at ca. 130 dirhams was the equivalent of 406.25 gr. See Hinz, op. cit., 31.

239. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 131 = par. 2813; Azdī, op. cit., 426; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 388; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 478; Browne, op. cit., I, 329–30; Sadighi, op. cit., 267–68; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 55.

his own son Muʿāwiyah with Bābak to al-Afshīn; the latter thereupon ordered 100,000 dirhams for Muʿāwiyah and a million dirhams for Sahl, eliciting this for him from the Commander of the Faithful, plus a richly jeweled belt and a crown denoting princely rank (tāj al-baṭraqah), and this was how Sahl acquired the status of prince.[240] [It is also mentioned from Ṭawq that] the person with whom ʿAbdallāh, Bābak's brother, took refuge was ʿĪsā b. Yūsuf, known as Ibn Ukht Iṣṭifānūs, ruler of al-Baylaqān.[241]

It has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. ʿImrān,[242] ʿAlī b. Murr's secretary, that he said that ʿAlī b. Murr told him, on the authority of one of the vagabond desperadoes (al-ṣaʿālīk) called Maṭar, who said: "O Abū al-Ḥasan, by God, Bābak was my son!" I said, "How was that?" He replied, "We were with Ibn al-Rawwād,[243] and Bābak's mother was B.r.w.m.y.d[244] the one-eyed, one of Ibn al-Rawwād's indigenous population. I used to lodge with her. She was strong and healthy;[245] hence she used to act as my servant and launder my clothes. One day my eye fell on her, and I leaped upon her with the lust such as one feels when traveling and a long away from home, and I left the seed of Bābak firmly implanted in her womb.[246] Then," he went on to relate, "we went away after that for some time. But then we came back, 240. Azdī, op. cit., 425; Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 388; E. M. Wright, op cit., 55.

241. "Ibn Ukht Iṣṭifānūs" pertains to the paternal name Yūsuf; cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1224 (p. 78 and n. 206, above). Baylaqān (Armenian P'aytakaran) lay in the steppe between the Araxes and Kur Rivers. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 533; Le Strange, Lands, 178; Schwarz, op. cit., 1144, 1296–98; Barthold, Historical Geography, 228; *EI*², s.v. Baylaḳān (D. M. Dunlop); Elr, s.v. Baylaqān (C. E. Bosworth).

242. This name seems fairly common. This person cannot be, on obvious chronological grounds, the official of al-Manṣūr mentioned in Ṭabarī, III, 172–73, 191; nor, as apparently a humble secretary, is he likely to be the Muḥammad, son of ʿImrān b. Mūsā b. Yaḥyā al-Barmakī, who was arrested and mulcted by al-Wāthiq in 227 (841–42) after his father had been killed (Ibn al-Zubayr, Kitāb al-dhakhāʾir, 185 no. 239).

243. See Ṭabarī, III, 1172 (p. 16 and n. 64, above).

244. The putative b and y here are written without dots. According to Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIII–DCCLXXIV, following the parallel passage in the autograph ms. of Dhahabī's Kitāb duwal al-Islām, a probable reading would be "was (known as) Rūmiyyah"; the Cairo edition, IX, 54, however, vocalizes it as T.r.tūmīdh.

245. Miṣakkah; the normal meaning of the word seems to fit the context perfectly well, pace de Goeje, in Glossarium, CCCXXVI, "knock-kneed" = aṣakk.

246. An alternative reading for fa-aqrartuhu in the text might be fa-aqarrat-hu "she was left pregnant with him (quickening in her womb)."

and behold, she had given birth to the child. I lodged in another house, and she came to me one day and said, 'When you made me pregnant, you used to stay here with me, but now you cast me aside,' and she revealed that her son was mine. I told her, 'By God, if you mention my name, I'll assuredly kill you!' She therefore let me alone, but by God, he [really] is my son!"[247]

During the period of his confrontation with Bābak, al-Afshīn was paid, in addition to the pay allowances for the troops, costs of provisions, lodging, and such for extraordinary expenses (al-arzāq wa-al-anzāl wa-al-maʿāwin), 10,000 dirhams for every day he [1233] rode forth [against the enemy] and 5,000 for each day when he did not ride forth.[248]

The total number of people whom Bābak killed in a period of twenty years was 255,000 and he defeated Yaḥyā b. Muʿādh,[249] ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid,[250] Aḥmad b. al-Junayd (whom he took prisoner[251]), Zurayq b. ʿAlī b. Ṣadaqah,[252] Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī,[253] and Ibrāhīm b. al-Layth.[254] Together with

247. This is a folkloric, even legendary, story intended to affirm the plebeian and bastard origins of Bābak; a parallel story is given, on the authority of one Wāqid b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī, author of Akhbār Bābak, by Ibn al-Nadīm, Kitāb al-fihrist, 406–7, trans., II, 818–22. Dīnawarī, op. cit., 402, identifies Bābak's father as Muṭahhar b. Fāṭimah bt. Abī Muslim and says that a subsect of the Khurramiyyah called the Fāṭimiyyah were attached to him. As Dīnawarī wrote in the last decades of the third (ninth) century weight should perhaps be given to this filiation, which would accord with Bābak's brother ʿAbdallāh's satisfaction that his death was to be at the hands of a Persian nobleman, dihqān, the prince of Ṭabaristān Ibn Sharwīn, and not at the hands of a low-class barbarian; see Ṭabarī, III, 1231 (p. 89, above). On the question of Bābak's antecedents and early life, see Browne, op. cit., I, 323–28; Sadighi, op. cit., 239 ff.; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 45–48.

248. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 438.

249. Khurāsānian commander who, according to Ṭabarī, III, 1039, engaged in an indecisive battle with Bābak in 204 (819–20); see Crone, op. cit., 184.

250. He had been apointed governor of Armenia and Ādharbayjān, with special responsibility for carrying on the war against Bābak, in 205 (820–21); see Ṭabarī, III, 1044.

251. This is recorded in Ṭabarī, III, 1072, under the year 209 (824–25).

252. Properly, it seems, Ṣadaqah b. ʿAlī, known as Zurayq, given thus in Ṭabarī, III, 1072, where he is said to have been appointed governor of Armenia and Ādharbayjān by al-Maʾmūn in 209 (824–25); see Ṭabarī, trans. Bosworth, Reunification, 144 and n. 423.

253. See p. 37 n. 134, above.

254. Appointed governor of Ādharbayjān in 209 (824–25) after the capture of Aḥmad b. al-Junayd; see Ṭabarī, III, 1072, trans. Bosworth, Reunification, 144 and n. 424.

Bābak there were captured 3,309 persons (of Bābak's partisans); and out of the Muslim women and children who had fallen into his hands, 7,600 were rescued. The number of the sons of Bābak who fell into al-Afshīn's hands amounted to seventeen, together with twenty-three daughters and daughters-in-law.[255]

Al-Mu'taṣim presented al-Afshīn with a crown (tawwaja),[256] girded him with two jeweled belts (wishāḥayn), and presented him with 20 million dirhams, 10 million of which he kept as a personal gift and the other 10 million of which he was to distribute among his troops. Al-Mu'taṣim appointed him governor of Sind, and he had poets brought in to praise him and ordered presents for them.[257] This was on Thursday, the thirteenth of Rabī' II (March 14, 838). Among the poetry eulogizing him were the words of Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'ī:[258]

The stout warriors subdued (badhdha) al-Badhdh and it was buried;
no dweller is left there but the wild beasts.
This sword (of ours) has been vouchsafed this endurance in battle only so that this faith (Islam) could be exalted.
Al-Badhdh was formerly a virginal (unbreached) seat of power, but there deflowered it [1234] with a sword the stallion of the East, al-Afshīn.
And he rendered it once more a place in whose midst the foxes howl, 255. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 45–48; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 55–56.

256. Somewhat surprisingly, the wearing of a crown was not common caliphal practice at this time (although it became so later, in the fourth (tenth) century). Crowns tended to be regarded as Iranian, rather than Arab, emblems of authority and were bestowed, as here, on successful generals. The grant to al-Afshīn seems to be the first attested occasion for this, but in the next two or three decades Ashnās, Bughā al-Ṣaghīr, and others received them from their masters. See Mez, op. cit., 131 and n. 2, trans., 133 and n. 1; Herzfeld, op. cit., 143, 145–46; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 134, 143–44. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 132–33 = par. 2815, is more detailed here than Ṭabarī: al-Afshīn received a tāj of gold set with jewels and an iklīl with rubies and emeralds within gold-filigree work.

257. Dīnawarī, op. cit., 405; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 132–33 = par. 2815; Azdī, op. cit., 426; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 388; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., 45–48; Sadighi, op. cit., 268; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 55.

258. The great poet and compiler of the anthology entitled Ḥamāsah, who died in 231 (845). See GAS, II, 551–58, IX, 299–300; EI^{2}, s.v. Abū Tammām (H. Ritter).

as it had been in past times, when it was a thicket for wild beasts.
There rained down on it from the skulls of its people continuous downpours (i.e., of blood), shed by necks and skulls.
It was a miserable desert waste before the lifeblood flowed, and then it became transformed through it (i.e., the sword) into a place of running springs.[259]

The Byzantine Emperor's Attacks on the Muslims at Zibaṭrah and Malaṭyah

In this year Theophilus son of Michael,[260] the ruler of the Byzantines, fell upon the inhabitants of Zibaṭrah,[261] taking them captive and devastating their town. He proceeded immediately to Malaṭyah[262] and launched attacks on its people and successively on the people of various of the fortresses held by the Muslims. He enslaved Muslim women—over a thousand of them, it is said—and made an example of those Muslim men who fell into their hands, putting out their eyes with hot irons and cutting off their ears and noses.[263]

---

259. Abū Tammām, Dīwān, III, 316–22 no. 166, these being the opening six verses of a qaṣīdah of thirty-six verses. Cf. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 170, trans., 231, citing other verses from this poem. Among what must have been a plethora of panegyrics composed on this occasion of Bābak's being brought to Sāmarrā, Dīnawarī, op. cit., 405, cites three from a qaṣīdah addressed to al-Mu'taṣim; they were composed by Isḥāq b. Khalaf (d. ca. 230 [844–45]), a Shī'ī poet of al-Mu'taṣim's circle, often known as Ibn al-Ṭabīb al-Ṭunburī (see GAS, II, 575).

260. Second ruler of the Amorian dynasty, successor of Michael II the Stammerer (829–42). See A. A. Vasiliev, Byzance, 89–190; M. V. Anastos, "Iconoclasm and Imperial Rule," 103–4.

261. A fortress in the thughūr of al-Jazīrah, the Greek Sōzopetra. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 130–31; Le Strange, Palestine, 553–54; idem, Lands, 128; Vasiliev, Byzance, 138 nn. 4, 5; E. Honigmann, Die Ostgrenze des byzantinischen Reiches, index s.v.

262. A fortress of southeastern Anatolia, now a provincial capital of modern Turkey, the classical Melitene. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 192–93; Le Strange, Palestine, 499–500; idem, Lands, 120; Honigmann, op. cit., index, s.v. Melitene; Canard, Histoire, 262–64; EI[2], s.v. Malaṭya. i. Pre-Ottoman History (E. Honigmann).

263. Balādhurī, op. cit., 191–92; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 580–81; Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 531–32; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 389; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 479; J. B. Bury,

The Reason for the Byzantine Ruler's Behaving Thus with the Muslims

It has been mentioned that the reason for that was the position into which Bābak had fallen, because of his being driven into a tight corner by al-Afshīn, his reduction to the verge of destruction, and al-Afshīn's continuous pressure on him. When he was close to final perdition and became convinced that his own resources were now too weak to combat al-Afshīn, he wrote to the king (malik)[264] of the Byzantines, Theophilus, son of Michael, son of George, informing him that the king of the Arabs had sent his armies and warriors against him, even to the point of sending his tailor (he meant Ja'far b. Dīnār) and his cook (he meant Aytākh),[265] and that no one remained behind at his headquarters. [He accordingly told him], "If you want to march [1235] out against him, know that there is no one in your way who will prevent you." Bābak sent that communication of his to the king of the Byzantines in the hope that, if he could induce the king to mount an attack, some of the difficulties that he himself was at that point enduring would be dispelled by al-Mu'taṣim's having to transfer some of the armies then facing Bābak to combat the king of the Byzantines and by his attention's being thus deflected from Bābak.[266]

History, 259–62; Vasiliev, Byzance, 274–75, 293–94; Sadighi, op. cit., 257; Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 55–56; Rosser, op. cit., 268.

264. Thus used slightingly in reference to the Emperor.

265. Contemptuously referring to the nisbahs, or gentilics, of these two commanders, al-Khayyāṭ ("the tailor") and al-Ṭabbākh ("the cook"); see Ṭabarī, III, 1194–95 (p. 46 and nn. 151, 152, above).

266. According to Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 531, Bābak, in his plea to Theophilus for help, pretended that he was a Christian and would, if victorious, endeavor to convert his followers to Christianity; cf. Bury, History, 259–62. However, Sadighi, op. cit., 257, correctly noted that chronological difficulties are involved here. If Bābak really did send an appeal to Theophilus, it must have been a reasonable time before his final defeat at al-Badhdh in Ramaḍān 222 (August 836), and it seems improbable that Theophilus, after an appeal for immediate action, should have waited for several months, until 223 (which began in December 837), before launching his diversionary attack. Rosser, op. cit., 267–68, accepts Ṭabarī's information at face value and speaks of Theophilus' being "obligated to help Bābak when the latter requested it in 837." But Rekaya discounts completely the laconic information of Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, not repeated in any of the later Arabic sources, and denies that there could have been any alliance between Bābak and Theophilus, much less that Bābak would have

It has been mentioned that Theophilus set out with a force of 100,000 men—or, it has been said, more than that—including 70,000 odd regular army (al-jund) and the rest auxiliary troops (atbāʿ), until he reached Zibaṭrah.[267] He had with him a group of the Muḥammirah[268] who had been involved in the revolt in Jibāl and had subsequently joined up with the Byzantines at the time when Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab had fought with them; their leader was Barsīs (?).[269] The Byzantine king had assigned stipends to them, had provided them with wives, and had enrolled them as [regularly paid] warriors, utilizing their services in those affairs of the greatest importance to him. When the king of the Byzantines entered Zibaṭrah, killing the menfolk, enslaving the children and womenfolk, and burning it down, it was reported that the fleeing refugees came as far as Sāmarrā. The people of the frontier zones of Syria and al-Jazīrah, and the people of al-Jazīrah itself, sallied forth (i.e., for a counterstroke), with the exception of those lacking either a mount or weapons. al-Muʿtaṣim regarded this event as a great calamity, and it has been reported that when news of it finally reached him, he raised a call to arms in his palace. Then he mounted his horse and attached behind his promised to become a Christian. Moreover, the chronological difficulties, already noted by Sadighi, make it very unlikely that Theophilus's Zibaṭrah campaign could have resulted from the direct prompting of Bābak, even though it is possible that the latter, increasingly desperate as al-Afshīn gradually and methodically tightened the noose around al-Badhdh, did send a general appeal to the Emperor. See Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 55–59.

267. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 133–34 = par. 2816; cf. Vasiliev, Byzance, 330, who states that Theophilus had in his army contingents under the kings of the Burjān (?), Bulghars (B.r.gh.r), Slavs, and others.

268. Literally, "wearers of red," in Persian surkh-jāmagān (also Persian surkh-ʿalamān "those with red banners"), a term that Islamic authors applied also to the Mazdakite sect of pre-Islamic Persia. The color red thus seems generally to be associated with change, a break with tradition, and the forging of new ideas or ways of life. See Sadighi, op. cit., 108, 188, 219–21; Scarcia Amoretti, op. cit., 514.

269. The commander of this group of the Khurramiyyah of al-Jibāl who entered Byzantine service is named in other sources as Naṣīr/Nuṣayr or Theophobus, as noted (p. 3 n. 10, above). Vasiliev, Byzance, 138 n. 3, following Adontz, suggested that the man's original name may have been Narsī, Narseh (from ancient Iranian Nariyathaha; see Justi, op. cit., 221–25), rendered in Arabic script as Narsīs. This seem quite possible. The assertion of Rekaya, "Mise au pont sur Théophobe," 45 n. 4, tht we should follow the varant of ms. C in n. e for the preceding word, raʾīsuhum, and read instead yusammīhim Barsīs, "they were called Persians," seems less likely.

saddle shackles, an iron plowshare, and a provision bag, but he did not deem it advisable actually to set out until all arrangements had been completed.[270]

According to what has been mentioned, he held a meeting in the Public Audience Chamber, having summoned thither a group of persons from the City of Peace, including the judge of the city, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq,[271] and Shu'ayb b. Sahl,[272] accompanied by 328 men whose testimony was regarded as legally admissible;[273] and he made them bear formal witness to the arrangements for the disposal of his estates. He set aside one-third [1236] for his children, one-third for God, and one-third for his mawlās, and then he camped on the western bank of the Tigris. That was on Monday, the second of Jumādā I (April 1, 838). He sent 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah, 'Amr al-Farghānī,[274] Muḥammad Kūtah,[275] and a group of other commanders to Zibaṭrah as succor for its people, but [on arrival] they found that the king of the Byzantines had gone back to his land after perpetrating what we have previously recorded. They waited for a short while until the people gradually returned by degrees to their villages and became calm.[276]

---

270. Some later sources, including Kitāb al-'uyūn, 390; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 480; and Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, al-Kitāb al-fakhrī, 209–10, trans., 229, include a folkloric story that a captive Hāshimite woman in 'Ammūriyyah cried out to al-Mu'taṣim for help when he was in his palace at Sāmarrā; he heard her appeal and answered it by preparing for battle. It is, of course, quite likely that appeals for help from Muslim survivors or refugees from Zibaṭrah reached the Caliph, as is implied by v. 46 of Abū Tammām's celebrated ode on the capture of 'Ammūriyyah (see. p. 121 n. 339, below), which speaks of a "cry from Zibaṭrah," ṣawt^{an} Zibaṭriyy^{an}, to which al-Mu'taṣim responded. More soberly, Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 580–81, cf. Vasiliev, Byzance, 275, relates that al-Mu'taṣim was deeply disturbed, sat down on the ground, distributed pay to the troops, and encamped with them immediately at the base of al-'Uyūn, to the west of the Tigris, departing on campaign of the sixth of Jumādā I 223 (April 5, 838). According to Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 135 = par. 2817, he arrived at this camp four days previously.

271. Ḥanafī scholar, involved in the enforcement of the Miḥnah in al-Ma'mūn's reign. See Ṭabarī, III, 1120, 1121; al-Khaṭīb, op. cit., X, 260–61 no. 5376; Watt, The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, 285.

272. Judge of al-Ruṣāfah in East Baghdad; see al-Khaṭīb, op. cit., IX, 243–44 no. 4816.

273. Ahl al-'adālah, i.e., 'udūl, those qualified by their probity to act in various legal capacities of attesting and verifying; see EI^{2}, s.v. 'Adl (E. Tyan).

274. On the Farghānan element in the 'Abbāsid armies, see p. 49 n. 158, above.

275. Literally, "the short" (Persian kūtah).

276. In Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 532, al-Mu'taṣim personally marches to Zibaṭrah. It seems that Theophilus marched from there farther eastward into

When al-Mu'taṣim had [finally] got the upper hand over Bābak, he said, "Which place in the Byzantine lands is the most impregnable and securely fortified?" He was told, "'Ammūriyyah.[277] No Muslim has ever made an attempt upon it since the coming of Islam; it is the very heart [literally, "eye"] and core of Christendom. In the view of the Christians, it is even more exalted in estimation than Constantinople."[278]

Al-Mu'taṣim's Campaign against 'Ammūriyyah

In this year al-Mu'taṣim set out with a military expedition into the Byzantine lands. It has been said that he departed thither from Sāmarrā in 224 (838/839)—or, alternatively, in 222 (836/837)[279]—after he had killed Bābak.[280]

It has been mentioned that he equipped himself in a manner

Little Armenia and subdued various local Armenian princes; see Bury, History, 260–61.

277. I.e., the central Anatolian city, in the Anatolikon theme, the classical Phrygia, with a strong fortress and the seat of an archbishopric. It was of particular concern to Theophilus as the seat of his dynasty, the Amorian emperors, and had been attacked four times by the Arabs—despite what is said here by the Caliph's responders—in the previous two centuries, beginning with the raid of the governor of Syria Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān in 25 (646). See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 158; Le Strange, Lands, 137–38; 153; Bury, History, 262–63; Vasiliev, Byzance, 160–61; *EI*², s.v. 'Ammūriyya (M. Canard).

278. Kitāb al-'uyūn, 390; Ibn al-Athir, op. cit., VI, 480; Vasiliev, Byzance, 145, 293–95.

279. The date given by Ya'qūbī and Mas'ūdī, Jumādā I 223 (see p. 96 n. 270, above), seems more accurate.

280. The main additional primary sources for the 'Ammūriyyah campaign are Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 580–81 (brief); Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 787–88 (brief); Balādhurī, op. cit., 192 (brief); Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 169–70, 354, 355–56, trans. 230–32, 454, 456, idem, Murūj, VII, 134–37 = pars. 2817–18; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 389–95; Azdī, op. cit., 426–27; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 480–88; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, op. cit., 209–11, trans., 229–30. Many of the relevant excerpts from these sources and from others are translated into French by Canard in Vasiliev, Byzance, 271–394; he notes that Ṭabarī's account is by far the most detailed and important. Supplementary information from Christian Syriac and Armenian chronicles is noted in Vasiliev, Byzance, 145 n. 2.

Secondary sources include accounts based on the above sources and in varying detail; Edward Gibbon, Decline and Fall, VI, 44–46; Bury, History, 262–72; Vasiliev, Byzance, 144–75; idem, History, I, 276–77; Canard, "Byzantium," 710–11. Bury, in "Mutasim's March," endeavors to solve some of the problems connected with the itineraries of the Caliph and his commanders Ashnās and al-Afshīn.

that no previous caliph had ever done in regard to weapons, military supplies, implements, leather water troughs for the animals, mules, beasts of burden for carrying water (or: leather waterskins, rawāyā), goatskins for water, iron tools, and naphtha. He placed Ashnās[281] in charge of his vanguard, with Muḥammed b. Ibrāhīm[282] following him, Aytākh on his right wing, Jaʿfar b. Dīnār b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khayyāṭ on his left wing, and ʿUjayf b.
[1237] ʿAnbasah in charge of the center.[283] When he entered the Byzantine lands he encamped on the Lamas River,[284] by Salūqiyah,[285] near the sea, a day's journey from Ṭarsūs.[286] It is here that the ransoming takes place when there is an exchange of prisoners between the Muslims and the Byzantines.[287]

Al-Muʿtaṣim sent al-Afshīn Khaydhar b. Kāwūs to Sarūj[288] and instructed him to start out from there and enter [the Byzantine territory] via the pass (darb) of al-Ḥadath,[289] specifying for him a 281. Abū Jaʿfar Ashnās was a Turkish general and governor of al-Jazīrah, Syria, and Egypt in 25–30 (840–45). The name looks more Persian than Turkish, and Ṭabarī, III, 1017, gives a fanciful story explaining how it originated. It is found elsewhere in Iranian onomastic, and Justi, op. cit., 44, conjectured an origin from -shinās "knowing, knower," with an omitted previous element; but the name remains basically unexplained.

282. Member of the Musʿabī line, parallel to that of the Ṭāhirids, brother of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Musʿabī (see Ṭabarī, III, 1165 [p. 3 and n. 8, above]), governor of Fārs. He was regarded by al-Muʿtaṣim as one of the great men of state from his brother al-Maʾmūn's time; see Ṭabarī, III, 1328 (p. 214, below). He did, however, become involved in disputes with his nephew Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm during al-Mutawakkil's caliphate, and these brought about his execution. See Nafīsī, Taʾrīkh-i khāndān-i Ṭāhirī, 30; Kaabi, op. cit., I, 327.

283. For the various estimates of the numbers of the Muslim troops and their beasts, see Vasiliev, Byzance, 146 n. 1.

284. Classical Lamos, the modern Turkish Lamas Su, which runs from the Taurus Mountains down through the plain of Cilicia. See Le Strange, Lands, 133; *EI*², s.v. Lamas-Ṣū (X. de Planhol).

285. The classical Seleucia, modern Turkish Selefke. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 242; Le Strange, Lands, 133; idem, Palestine, 530.

286. The most important and the most disputed of the frontier fortresses; it lay on the Cilician plain and commanded the southern approaches to the Cilician Gates. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 28–29; Le Strange, Lands, 133; *EI*¹, s.v. Ṭarsūs (F. Buhl).

287. On these exchanges, see *EI*², s.v. Lamas-Ṣū (X. de Planhol).

288. A town of al-Jazīrah, in Diyār Muḍar, to be associated with the classical names Anthemusia and Batnae. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 216–17; Le Strange, Lands, 108; Canard, Histoire, 92–93; *EI*¹, s.v. Sarūdj (M. Plessner).

289. Al-Ḥadath, Greek Adata, was a town of the frontier ʿawāṣim between Marʿash and Malaṭyah, used by the ʿAbbāsids as a base for incursions into Byzantine territory; the famed pass lay northwest of the town, traversing the day when he was to enter it.[290] He also assigned a day [of departure] for his own army and that of Ashnās, allowing between this day and the one of al-Afshīn's entry into Byzantine territory an amount of time corresponding to the difference of the two distances involved, the amount of time that he deemed adequate for the armies to come together in one place, i.e., Anqirah.[291] He organized the attack on Anqirah carefully, so that when God conquered it for him he could proceed against ʿAmmūriyyah, as there was nothing greater in the Byzantine lands upon which he had fixed his intentions than these two towns or any worthier goal for which he was aiming.

Al-Muʿtaṣim ordered Ashnās to enter via the pass of Ṭarsūs and to wait for him at al-Ṣafṣāf.[292] Ashnās set out on a Wednesday, the twenty-second of Rajab (June 19, 838), and al-Muʿtaṣim sent Waṣīf[293] forward after him and in command of al-Muʿtaṣim's own advance guard. He himself set off on Friday the twenty-fourth of Rajab (June 21, 838). When Ashnās reached Marj al-Usquf[294] a letter from al-Muʿtaṣim dispatched from al-Maṭāmīr[295] reached eastern part of the Taurus range. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 227–29; Le Strange, Lands, 121–22; idem, Palestine, 443–44; Honigmann, op. cit., see index s.v. Adata; Canard, Histoire, 272–73; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadath (S. Ory).

---

290. The Greek sources state that it was at this point that al-Afshīn's Turks were joined by an Armenian army commanded by the prince of Vaspurakan and the amīr of Malaṭyah; see Vasiliev, Byzance, 148.

291. Classical Ankyra of Galatia, in the Bucellarian theme, also known in Arabic sources as Qalʿat al-Salāsil "Fortress of the Chains." See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 271–72; Le Strange, Lands, 149–50; Vasiliev, Byzance, 151 n. 2; *EI*², s.v. Ankara (F. Taeschner).

292. This fortress, often in the plural al-Ṣafāṣif "the Willows," lay beyond the southern end of the Cilician Gate. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 413; Le Strange, Lands, 134–35, 139; Vasiliev, Byzance, 149; Honigmann, op. cit., 42; Canard, Histoire, 284.

293. Turkish slave commander (waṣīf being a common term for "slave" in medieval Islam; Dozy, Supplément, II, 810), purchased by al-Muʿtaṣim in Baghdad and the owner of extensive land grants, or qaṭāʾiʿ, at Sāmarrā, eventually including those confiscated from al-Afshīn. He was finally killed in an insurrection of Turkish troops in 253 (867). See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 256, 258, 262, 264–65, trans., 45, 50, 54–55, 58; Ṭabarī, II, 1687–88; Herzfeld, op. cit., III, 243.

294. "The Bishop's Meadow" lay to the west of the Podandos River; its possible location is discussed by Bury, "Mutasim's March," 121–22, 124, and by Canard, in Vasiliev, Byzance, 412. See also Le Strange, Lands, 138; Vasiliev, Byzance, 149; Honigmann, op. cit., 45–46 n. 9.

295. Literally, "subterranean chambers, storehouses, strongholds"; these lay in the region of Malacopia, Arabic Malaqūbiyah. See Bury, "Mutasim's March," 121–22; Le Strange, Lands, 138; Honigmann, op. cit., 46; *EI*², s.v. Maṭmūra (Ch. Pellat).

him, informing him that the [Byzantine] king was in front of him hoping that the [Muslim] forces would cross the Lamas (the Halys[296]) and that he (al-Muʿtaṣim) would take up a position by the fording place and thereby take them by surprise; Ashnās [1238] therefore was to remain at Marj al-Usquf. Jaʿfar b. Dīnār was in charge of al-Muʿtaṣim's rear guard, and al-Muʿtaṣim informed Ashnās in his letter that he was awaiting the arrival of the rear guard because in it were the baggage, mangonels, provisions, etc.—the rear guard was in fact still in the narrow defile of the pass and had not yet emerged—so he was ordering Ashnās to stay put until the commander of the rear guard and the troops accompanying him were safely through and could go forth into the open country and reach Byzantine territory.[297]

Ashnās waited at Marj al-Usquf for three days until [another] letter from al-Muʿtaṣim arrived, ordering him to send one of his commanders on a nocturnal foray to seek out a man from the Byzantines whom they could question about the doings of the [Byzantine] ruler and those accompanying him. Hence Ashnās sent ʿAmr al-Farghānī with 200 cavalrymen, and they traveled all through the night until they came to the fortress of Qurrah.[298] They sallied forth in search of a man from the area outside the fortress but were unable to find anyone. The commander of

296. The classical Halys is the modern Turkish Kızıl Irmak, the longest river of Asia Minor; see *EI*², s.v. Ḳızıl Irmāḳ (Cl. Huart). The apparent confusion of the Cilician Lamas Su with the Kızıl Irmak has attracted discussion, beginning with Bury, "Mutasim's March," 122–23. Vasiliev, Byzance, 146 and n. 4, suggested that it arose from corrupt readings of orthographically similar Arabic renderings of the names. In the same work Canard argues that it would have been pointless for the caliphal army to be within the great bend of the Halys if it was heading for Anqirah and suggests that the river intended is the Hylas; the orthographical confusion would thus be Hylas-Halys-Lamas.

297. It thus emerges, as Bury notes in "Mutasim's March," 120–21, that the Muslim attack on Anqirah was to be three-pronged. Al-Afshīn, commanding what might be called the Eastern Army, was to cross the Taurus range via al-Ḥadath, while the two divisions of the Western Army, under the Caliph himself and Ashnās, were to start from Cilicia and cross the mountains through the Cilician Gate, the aim being to converge simultaneously on their goal in Phrygia. To this end, the starting times of the armies and the distances to be covered had been carefully calculated beforehand, as Ṭabarī's narrative here shows.

298. Greek Koron, a fortress in Cappadocia and residence of the kleisurarch of that province. See Bury, "Mutasim's March" 123; Vasiliev, Byzance, 101–2, 150; Honigmann, op. cit., 45.

Qurrah was aware of their presence, so went out with all the cavalry who were with him in al-Qurrah and concealed himself in ambush in the mountain that lay between Qurrah and Durrah,[299] a large mountain that flanks a rural district called "the rustāq of Qurrah."

ʿAmr al-Farghānī realized that the commander of Qurrah had become aware of their presence, so he proceeded onward toward Durrah and concealed himself there during that night. When the first gleams of dawn were visible he sent out his forces in three squadrons and ordered them to ride swiftly, so that they might bring back to him a captive who had intelligence regarding the [Byzantine] king. He arranged with them in advance to meet him, bringing the captive, at a certain place that the guides knew, and he sent two guides with each squadron. They rode forth at dawn and then split up in three directions. They took prisoner a number of Byzantines, including some from the king's army and some from the frontier regions (al-ḍawāḥī).[300] ʿAmr singled out one of the Byzantine captives, a man from the cavalry force of [1239] Qurrah, and questioned him about what was happening. The man told him that the king and his army were near to him, to the other side of the Lamas (of the Halys), four farsakhs away, and that the commander of Qurrah had become aware of their presence during that night and had ridden away and hidden himself in an ambush in that mountain above them. ʿAmr continued to remain in the place where he had arranged to meet his troops and ordered the guides who were with him to spread out among the mountain tops and thereby assume vantage points above the squadrons that he had sent out, fearing that the commander of Qurrah would fall upon one of the squadrons in their absence. The guides saw them and signaled to them [concerning the new orders], so they went forward; and they and ʿAmr met up in a place different from the one where they had originally been told to meet. They halted for a short while and then traveled onward, seeking to regain the main army and having taken a number of prisoners from the [Byzantine] king's army.

299. Bury, "Mutasim's March," 123–24, and Canard, in Vasiliev, Byzance, 412, conjecture that it is to be identified with the modern Nora-halvadere (pace Vasiliev, Byzance, 150, who suggested Doara, which lay farther north, near the modern Hacı Bektaş).

300. Sing. ḍāḥiyah, literally, "outer, border region," in effect a no-man's-land between the Arabs and the Greeks. See Honigmann, op. cit., 39–40; Bosworth, "Byzantine Defence System," 123–24.

They came to Ashnās on the Lamas (the Halys), and he asked them what had been happening, They informed him that for over thirty days the king had been fixed in one spot, awaiting the crossing of the Lamas (the Halys) by al-Muʿtaṣim and his vanguard, so that he might fall upon them from the other side of the river. [They also mentioned] that information had come to him (the king) recently that a powerful army had traveled from the direction of al-Arminiyāq[301] and had penetrated well into the country—meaning al-Afshīn's troops—and that these last had come up behind him. The king of the Byzantines had accordingly ordered one of his own kinsmen, the son of his maternal uncle, to act as deputy over his army and had himself gone forth with a detachment of his army seeking the whereabouts of al-Afshīn.

[On hearing all this] Ashnās sent the man who had given him this information to al-Muʿtaṣim, and he repeated the information to him. Al-Muʿtaṣim thereupon sent out a group of guides from his army, and he guaranteed to each one 10,000 dirhams if they should safely deliver his letter to al-Afshīn. In this letter he informed al-Afshīn that the Commander of the Faithful was remaining [where he was] and that he should likewise remain [1240] [where he was], for fear of the possibility of the king of the Byzantines' attacking him. He also wrote a letter to Ashnās, ordering him to send, from his own resources, a messenger from among the guides who knew the mountains and tracks and could pass as Byzantines; and he guaranteed to each of them 10,000 dirhams if they could deliver the letter. He further wrote to him [in this same letter] that the king of the Byzantines had advanced toward him, so he could remain where he was until a letter should reach him from the Commander of the Faithful [with further instructions]. The messengers proceeded in the direction of al-Afshīn, but none of them was able to catch up with him because he had penetrated into the Byzantine lands (i.e., more deeply than had been assumed).

301. Arabization of the name of the Armeniakoi theme, which lay in the northeastern part of Asia Minor and bordered on independent Armenia; Qudāmah b. Jaʿfar, Kitāb al-kharāj, 258, renders it as ʿamal al-Arminiyāq. See Vasiliev, History, I, 228; Bosworth, "Byzantine Defence System," 122.

Al-Mu'taṣim's matériel and baggage finally reached the army camp with the commander of the rear guard. Al-Mu'taṣim now wrote to Ashnās ordering him to advance, which he did, with al-Mu'taṣim one stage[302] behind him, one group halting to camp while the other journeyed forward [and vice versa], but without any news from al-Afshīn reaching them until they were [only] three stages from Anqirah.

Al-Mu'taṣim's army was reduced to extreme distress because of lack of water and fodder. In the course of his march[303] Ashnās had captured a number of prisoners, whose execution he had ordered until only one of them, an aged man, remained. The aged man said, "What good will killing me do you, when you are in this parlous condition and your troops also are suffering from lack of water and provisions? Now in this vicinity are a group of people who have fled from Anqirah for fear lest the king of the Arabs descend upon them. They are close to us here, and they have with them a considerable quantity of grain, food, and barley. Send a party of men with me so that I can hand over this group to them, and then set me free!"

So Ashnās's herald proclaimed, "Whoever feels lively and ready for action, let him ride forth!" And there rode with him around 500 cavalrymen. Ashnās went out until he had gone a mile from [1241] the army, and those soldiers who were eager for action went forth with him. He rode forward, whipped his mount, and galloped furiously for about two miles. Then he stopped to look at his troops behind him, and those who could not keep up with the main body because of the inadequacy of their mounts he sent back to the army camp. He handed over the captured man to Mālik b. Kaydar [al-Ṣafadī][304] and told him, "When this fellow 302. I.e., a day's march, marḥalah, on which see *EI*², s.v. Marḥala (Ed.).

303. According to Michael the Syrian, Ashnās, on his march between al-Ṣafṣāf and Anqirah, captured and razed the citadel of Nīshī'ā, i.e., the episcopal seat of Nyssa, south of the Halys; see Vasiliev, Byzance, 152.

304. Subsequently governor over the ṣalāt in Egypt, as deputy of Ashnās, during the years 224–26 (839–41). He died at Alexandria in 233 (848); see Kindī, Kitāb al-wulāt, 195.

shows you captives and extensive plunder, release him according to our undertaking!"

The aged man traveled with them until the time for the evening prayer, and he led them to a river valley with abundant herbage. The troops were able to pasture their mounts on the herbage until the mounts were satisfied; and they, the troops, were able to eat their evening meal and drink until they were refreshed. Then he took them along until he brought them out of the valley with its lush vegetation. Ashnās pressed on from where he was camped in the direction of Anqirah, and he ordered Mālik b. Kaydar and the guides accompanying him to meet him there. The aged man from the local inhabitants (al-shaykh al-ʿilj) led them onward for the remainder of the night, leading them around on a mountain but not conducting them from out of it, so that the guides complained to Mālik b. Kaydar, "This man is leading us around in circles." Mālik questioned him regarding the guards' accusations, and he replied, "They have spoken truly. The group of people whom you seek are outside the confines of the mountain, but I am afraid to leave the mountain at night, lest they hear the noise of the horses' hooves on the rocks and take flight. If we leave the mountain [now] and see no one there, you will kill me; however, I shall lead you round on this mountain until dawn, and then, when it is morning, we will go forth upon them, and I will show them to you, so that I shall be preserved from your killing me."

Mālik said to him, "Woe upon you! Bring us to a halt upon this [1242] mountain, so that we may take a rest." The aged man replied, "Just as you think fit." So Mālik and the troops stopped on the rocks, holding fast in their hands the bridles of their mounts, until the dawn broke. When the dawn began to gleam the aged man said, "Send two men to climb up this mountain and see what is on it and to seize anyone they come upon there." So four of the troops climbed up and took prisoner a man and a women and brought them down. The local inhabitant questioned them as to where the group of people from Anqirah had spent the night, and they named for them the spot where the people from Anqirah had stayed. Then the aged man said to Mālik, "Release these two, for we promised them a safe-conduct so that they would guide us." So Mālik set them free. Then the local inhabitant went with Mālik's troops to the place that he (i.e., acting on the information of the two captives) named to them. He brought them out above the camp, that is, the camp of the people of Anqirah, who were on the edges of some salt workings (mallāḥah). When the people of Anqirah saw the [Muslim] troops they shouted to the women and children, and these last went inside the works while they (the menfolk) waited for the Muslim troops on the edges of the works, fighting with spears, as there was no room to fight with stones or to use cavalry. The Muslim troops seized a number of captives from them. Among those who fell into their hands was a number of those who had long-standing wounds acquired some time previously. They questioned these captives about their wounds, and the captives said, "We were in the king's battle with al-Afshīn."[305] They instructed them, "Tell us about the affair!"

They accordingly told them that the king had been encamped four farsakhs away from the Lamas (the Halys) when a messenger had come to him with the news that a formidable army had entered from the vicinity of al-Arminiyāq. He had therefore appointed as deputy leader over his forces a member of his own family and had ordered him to stand fast in his position: If the vanguard of the king of the Arabs should come upon him, he (the deputy) was to attack him so that he himself (the Byzantine emperor) could go forth and attack the army that had entered al-Arminiyāq, that is, al-Afshīn's army.

Their leader (that of the Byzantine troops captured with the refugees from Anqirah) said, "Yes, [this is true]. I was one of those who went with the king; we attacked them at the time of the [1243] morning worship, and we put them to flight and killed all their infantrymen. Then our own troops split up into groups to pursue them (the fleeing Muslim troops), but at noon their cavalry returned and engaged us in battle fiercely until they pierced our ranks and mingled with us and we with them. We did not know in which squadron was the king. We continued in this fashion until the time of the afternoon worship. After that we returned to the place where [previously] the king's army, of which we were a part, had been, but we did not come upon him. Hence we went back to the place of the camp that he had left behind on the Lamas (the Halys). There we found that the army had mutinied and the troops had abandoned the king's relative, the one whom he had appointed as his deputy leader over the army.[306] We remained there for the next night, and the following morning the king met us with a small contingent of troops. He found that his army had been broken up and thrown into confusion, so he arrested the man whom he had made his deputy and executed him. He also wrote to the towns and strongholds that, if they intercepted any deserter from the royal army, they were to flog him with whips, and then the fugitive was to return to a place that the king named, to which he himself repaired, so that all the troops might gather together and encamp in order to resist the king of the Arabs. He sent one of his servants, a eunuch, to Anqirah, with the instructions to remain there and guard the local populace in case the king of the Arabs should descend upon it."

305. This battle had taken place on the plain of Dazimon, at Anzen near Tokat, Greek Dokeia, in northern Cappadocia, showing that al-Afshīn had penetrated deep into Byzantine territory from al-Ḥadath. According to the Greek sources, Theophilus's army included a contingent of Persians with the Persian commander Theophobus, and the Emperor also had with him the domesticus Manuel; these Persians were, of course, the Khurramī refugees from al-Jibāl who had fled west in 218 (833) under their leader Naṣīr/Nuṣayr, now the convert (Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 136 = par. 2818, rajul min al-mutanaṣṣirah) Theophobus; see p. 3 n. 10, above. See further, Bury, History, 264–66; Vasiliev, Byzance, 154–59; Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 61–63; Rosser, op. cit., 68–69.

The captive continued, "The eunuch proceeded to Anqirah, and we with him, but lo and behold, the people of Anqirah had left the city empty and had fled from it. The eunuch wrote to the king of the Byzantines telling him this news, and the king wrote back ordering him to travel onward to ʿAmmūriyyah."[307] He stated, "I

306. According to the Greek sources, either Manuel or Theophobus engaged in treacherous discussions with the Arabs during the battle, but Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 136 = par. 2812, reports that Theophilus lost the greater part of his patricians in the battle and himself escaped only through the aid of Naṣīr/Nuṣayr and his companions. He was able to reassemble the remnants of his forces on the plain of Khiliokōmon near Amasya. Theophilus's gratitude toward Theophobus later manifested itself in the Emperor's refusal to extradite him to the Caliph in order to stop the latter's march on Constantinople. See Ṭabarī, III, 1254 (p. 117 n. 327, below); Vasiliev, Byzance, 156–58; Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 62–63.

307. Theophilus now retreated westward to Dorylaeum in the Opsikion theme, or, according to the Greek sources, even as far as Nicaea, where he awaited news of what had happened at Amorion. It may have been from this refuge in asked about the place for which its people"—meaning the people of Anqirah—"had made, and they told me that they were at the salt workings, so we joined up with them there."

[On hearing this], Mālik b. Kaydar said, "Leave behind all the people. Take just what you have, and leave the rest." The troops accordingly abandoned the captives (the women and children) and the [captured] soldiers and turned back, making for Ashnās's camp, and on their way they drove before them a great number of [1244] sheep and goats and also cattle. Mālik set free that aged man who had been captured and went on to Ashnās's camp with the prisoners until he reached Anqirah. Ashnās remained encamped for one day, and then the following morning al-Muʿtaṣim joined him. He told al-Muʿtaṣim what the captive had told him, and al-Muʿtaṣim rejoiced at that. On the third day good news came from the direction of al-Afshīn, reporting that he was safe and sound and that he was on his way to the Commander of the Faithful at Anqirah.[308]

He related: Just one day after that al-Afshīn reached al-Muʿtaṣim at Anqirah. They remained there for some days. Then al-Muʿtaṣim proceeded to divide the troops into three armies: The first army was on the left wing, under the command of Ashnās; al-Muʿtaṣim was in the center; and al-Afshīn was on the right wing. Between each army was a distance of two farsakhs. He further ordered that each component army should have a right wing and a left wing and that they should burn down and destroy the villages and capture anyone they found in them. When it was time to encamp all the soldiers in the army were to come together with their particular commander and their chief. They were to do this all the way between Anqirah and ʿAmmūriyyah, a distance northwestern Anatolia that the Emperor had to go to Constantinople in order to quell a plot to replace him on the throne, a rumor having spread that he had been killed in battle. This story is reported by Michael the Syrian, who may in fact have confused it with the information in Greek sources (the credibility of which may be suspect) that Persian troops in the imperial army rebelled at Sinope with the intention of proclaiming Theophobus emperor. See Vasiliev, Byzance, 158–59; Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 63; Rosser, op. cit., 268–71.

308. It was after the Anzen defeat that the Emperor sent his first embassy to the Caliph, with the aim of securing peace and a Muslim withdrawal. It reached al-Muʿtaṣim when the siege of ʿAmmūriyyah was about to begin, and he kept the envoys in his camp until the city had fallen and a second Byzantine embassy arrived. See Ṭabarī, III, 1254 (p. 117, below) and the sources listed in n. 280, above.

of seven stages, until all the troops should have reached 'Ammūriyyah.

He related: When the troops all converged on 'Ammūriyyah, the first to arrive there was Ashnās, who reached 'Ammūriyyah on Thursday in the early morning and then circled around the place. He encamped two miles away in a place that had water and herbage. When the sun rose next morning, al-Mu'taṣim rode up; and he, too, circled around the city. Then on the third day al-Afshīn arrived. At this point the Commander of the Faithful divided the city between his commanders as they were circling around it. He allotted to each one of them a certain number of the city's defensive towers, according to the relative strength of that commander's forces, whether greater or lesser, so that each [1245] commander had between two and twenty towers. Meanwhile, the inhabitants of 'Ammūriyyah had entrenched themselves behind their fortifications and had prepared for a siege.

The people of 'Ammūriyyah had [previously] captured a man of the Muslims, who had then become a Christian and married among them.[309] He had hidden himself away when the Byzantines had entered the fortress, but when he saw the Commander of the Faithful he came into the open and went over to the Muslims. He came to al-Mu'taṣim and told him that there was a place in the city where the stream had borne down on it, owing to heavy rainstorms, so that the water had been carried down against it, with the result that the wall had collapsed at that place. The king of the Byzantines had written to the governor of 'Ammūriyyah, ordering him to rebuild that place, but the governor had been dilatory over rebuilding it until the time when the king had set out from Constantinople, heading for some destination or other. The governor feared lest the king, passing through that district, should pass by the wall and see that it had not been rebuilt. At that point he had sent for skilled artisans, and

309. This is the first of two acts of treachery that, according to Ṭabarī, brought about the fall of 'Ammūriyyah. The Christian sources are somewhat confused as to whether there was a single or a double betrayal; see p. 114 n. 318, below. The first traitor, originally a Muslim but converted to Christianity, may be the Manikophagos of one Byantine Greek source; as Vasiliev remarks, this name, "he who gnaws his manacles," would fit a former captive very well; see Byzance, 162–63, 169 n.

the facade of the wall had been repaired with stones laid one upon the other; but the rear surface of the wall, facing the city, he merely filled up with rubble (ḥashw). Then he had constructed on top of it battlements just as it had been there before. That man (the renegade) gave information to al-Mu'taṣim about that particular place that he had described, and al-Mu'taṣim gave orders for his own tent to be pitched in that place. He also set up mangonels[310] against the reconstructed part of the wall, and the wall was breached in that spot. When the people of 'Ammūriyyah saw the breach in the wall, they hung down over it great balks of timber, each lapped over another, but when the rocks hurled by the mangonels fell on those timbers they shattered. So they hung down further pieces of timber with packsaddles over them to furnish a shield over the wall, but when the (fire of the) mangonels bore down hard on that place, the wall was split open. [1246]

Yāṭis (Aetius)[311] and the eunuch wrote a letter to the king of the Byzantines, informing him about the state of the wall, and they sent the letter with a man who spoke Arabic fluently and a Greek youth. They let them out through the outer protecting wall (al-fāṣil), and they crossed the defensive trench and emerged in the neighborhood of the force of royal princes and nobles (abnā' al-mulūk) attached to 'Amr al-Farghānī. When the two men came up out of the trench, they (the attackers) did not recognize them; hence asked them where they came from. They replied, "We're from your comrades." They asked further, "Whose command are you under?" But the two men did not know any of the commanders of the army to name them to their questioners. As the latter could not identify the two men, they brought them to 'Amr al-Farghānī Ibn 'r. b. khā (?), who sent them to Ashnās, who in turn sent them to al-Mu'taṣim.

Al-Mu'taṣim questioned and searched them, and he found on them a letter from Yāṭis to the king of the Byzantines, in which Yāṭis told him that a very large army (that of the Muslims) had surrounded the city, that the place had become barely tolerable 310. Majānīq; see *EI*², s.v. Mandjanīḳ (D. R. Hill).

311. Described as Theophilus's maternal uncle in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 581. Aetius was the strategos of the Anatolikon theme; see Bury, "Mutasim's March," 267, and Vasiliev, Byzance, 147 and n. 1, on the commanders of the opposing Byzantine forces.

for them, and that his entry into that place had been a mistake. [Yāṭis continued] that he had therefore determined upon riding forth, bringing with him the elite of his companions on whatever mounts were within the fortress. He would open the gates by night without any warning (ghaflat^{an}) and would go forth and attack the [Muslim] forces, whatever the outcome might be; some would manage to escape, and the rest would fall in battle, but he would then get free of the fortress and come and join the king. When al-Muʿtaṣim had read the letter, he ordered a purse of money (badrah)[312] for the man who could speak Arabic and the [1247] Greek youth accompanying him, who both thereupon became Muslims. He presented them with robes of honor and gave orders so that, when the sun rose, the two men were paraded around [the walls of] ʿAmmūriyyah. The two men stated that Yāṭis would be in such-and-such a tower, so al-Muʿtaṣim ordered them to halt for a long while opposite the tower where Yāṭis was. In front of them two men bore the dirhams that they had been given, and they themselves wore the robes of honor and had with them the letter, until Yāṭis and all the Byzantines comprehended what they had done and hurled insults at them from the walls. Then al-Muʿtaṣim ordered that the two men be removed.

Al-Muʿtaṣim commanded that the soldiers take turns on guard duty all through each night [and that] the cavalry be on hand, spending the nights mounted and with their weapons at the ready, stationed there, lest the gate be opened at night and any man [of the people of ʿAmmūriyyah] slip out of the city. The troops continued to spend their nights that way, taking turns, on the backs of their mounts with their weapons ready, the mounts being saddled, until the stretch of wall between two towers in the place that had been described to al-Muʿtaṣim as poorly reconstructed collapsed. The troops of the army heard the crash, and they looked up, thinking that the enemy had broken out in an attack on one of the squadrons, until al-Muʿtaṣim sent someone to go round the troops in the encampment, informing them that that noise was the sound of the wall that had fallen down; as a result, the troops were jubilant.

When al-Muʿtaṣim had [originally] halted before ʿAmmūriyyah, 312. On this term see p. 65 n. 184, above.

he had observed the width of its defensive trench and the length of its walls, and he had driven along the road with him a great quantity of sheep. His plan in doing that was that he would utilize powerful mangonels proportionate to the height of the [1248] wall, each mangonel manned by four persons and constructed as firmly and skillfully as possible. He mounted them on platforms on wheeled carts, and in regard to this he further planned to hand over the sheep to the troops, a single sheep for each man. The man was to eat its flesh, stuff its skin with earth, and then to bring these skins, stuffed with earth, for throwing into the defensive trench; this last was done. He further constructed large movable siege towers (dabbābāt),[313] each one capacious enough to hold ten men, and he had them carefully built so that he could roll them forward over the earth-filled skins when the trench became filled; this, too, was done. The skins were hurled down [into the trench] but did not fall in a regular, even-surfaced pattern, because the men were afraid of the rocks being thrown down by the Byzantines. They fell in an uneven layer, and it was not possible to level them. So al-Mu'taṣim ordered earth to be thrown on them until the surface of the trench became level, and then a siege tower was pushed forward. He had it rolled, but halfway across the trench it became stuck on those skins; the crew were still inside and able to get free of it only with great effort. The wheeled cart remained fixed and immobilized there, and no stratagem could free it until 'Ammūriyyah had been conquered. Thus the siege towers, mangonels, scaling ladders, and such remained ineffective and in the end were [broken up and] burned.

The next morning [after the collapse of the section of the wall] he attacked them at the breach. Ashnās and his men led the first assault, but the place was narrow, and they were unable to fight [properly] there. Al-Mu'taṣim thereupon gave orders, and the big mangonels that were scattered around the perimeter of the wall were brought together in one spot and deployed around the 313. For this siege instrument, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 421; Levy, op. cit., 440. Already in 149 (766) al-Manṣūr's generals had used mangonels and such movable towers as these for the conquest of Kamakh [Greek Kamakha] to the south of modern Turkish Erzincan; see Balādhurī, op. cit., 184–85.

breach. Then he ordered that place to be bombarded. On the second day it was the turn of al-Afshīn and his troops to give battle; they fought well and were able to advance. Al-Muʿtaṣim [1249] was waiting, on horseback, opposite the breach, accompanied by Ashnās, [al-]Afshīn, and the leading commanders, while the subordinate commanders were waiting on foot.

Al-Muʿtaṣim commented, "How well the battle is going today!" And ʿAmr al-Farghānī added, "The battle is going better today than yesterday!" Ashnās heard these words but controlled himself. However, when al-Muʿtaṣim went back to his tent for the midday meal and the commanders also went back to their tents for their meals and Ashnās drew near to the entrance of his own tent, the commanders dismounted from their horses in his honor, as was their custom, with ʿAmr al-Farghānī and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl b. Hishām among them. They stepped before him, as usual, at his tent, but Ashnās said to them, "O you misbegotten sons [awlād al-zinā]! How can you walk before me? It would have been better if you had fought yesterday, rather than waiting there with the Commander of the Faithful. You now say that the conduct of the fighting today is better than yesterday, as if others than you were fighting then! Get back to your tents!"[314]

When ʿAmr al-Farghānī and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl b. Hishām went back, one of them said to the other, "Don't you see what this slave, the son of a whore"—he meant Ashnās—"has done with us today? Wouldn't it be easier to go over to Byzantine territory than to endure what we have heard today?" ʿAmr al-Farghani, who had special information, said to Aḥmad b. Khalīl, "O Abū al-ʿAbbās, God will relieve you in the near future of his attitude, so rejoice!" And he led Aḥmad to suspect that he had [private] information. Aḥmad kept on pressing him with questions, and ʿAmr revealed to him what they were up to, saying, "The preparations regarding al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn have been completed, and very soon we shall openly declare our allegiance to him and kill al-Muʿtaṣim, [1250] Ashnās, and others." Then he told Aḥmad, "I would advise you to go to al-ʿAbbās, to step forward and become numbered among those sympathetic to his cause."

314. This altercation seems to reflect the jealousies and hostilities of the Abnāʾ and Iranian elements (Khurāsānian and Transoxanian) toward the Turkish slaves, feelings that soon afterward assumed concrete form in the conspiracy to murder al-Muʿtaṣim and replace him with his nephew al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn; see Ṭabarī, III, 1256–68 [pp. 121–23, below].

Aḥmad replied, "I don't believe this project will come to fruition." but ʿAmr told him, "It's already accomplished and finished!" And he directed him to al-Ḥārith al-Samarqandī, the kinsman of Salamah b.ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ,[315] who was in charge of recruiting men to al-ʿAbbās's side and administering to them the oath of allegiance. ʿAmr said to Aḥmad, "I will bring you and al-Ḥārith together, so that you become one of the circle of our supporters." Aḥmad told him, "I am with you if this matter can be completed within ten days, but if it drags on beyond that then I can have nothing to do with you." Al-Ḥārith went along to al-ʿAbbās and informed him that ʿAmr had mentioned him (al-ʿAbbās) to Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl, but al-ʿAbbās said to him, "I don't like al-Khalīlī becoming cognizant of any part of our business. Keep away from him, and don't include him in any aspect of your affairs. Leave it between just the two of them." So they kept away from him.[316]

On the third day the battle was fought by the Commander of the Faithful's own troops in particular, together with the Maghāribah[317] and Turks, the overall commander being Aytākh. They fought and did well, and under their attacks the breach in 315. Possibly a kinsman, a first cousin, of the Khurāsānian general Hārūn b. Nuʿaym b. Waḍḍāḥ, employed in the campaign against the Zuṭṭ in lower Iraq in 219 (834–35); see Ṭabarī, III, 1167 (p. 8, above). The common grandparent Waḍḍāḥ may have been the Khurāsānian commander Abū Budayl Waḍḍāḥ b. Ḥabīb, who was active in the last years of the Umayyads and under al-Mahdī; see Ṭabarī, II, 1888, III, 496; Crone, op. cit., 167.

316. Cf. Vasiliev, Byzance, 165–66.

317. The sources give little exact information about the ethnic or local origins of these "Westerners," in contradistinction to the detailed and specific information on the Khurāsānians and Transoxanians and their land grants at Sāmarrā (see pp. 28 n. 105, 49 n. 159, above). But they seem to have included, first of all, Bedouins who had long been located in the two ḥawfs, or "districts," of the Egyptian desert, to the east and west respectively of the Nile delta (those of Qays and Yaman, according to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 118 = par. 2801, recruited by al-Muʿtaṣim), then Berbers from North Africa and possibly blacks brought as slaves from East Africa. They had their own qaṭāʾiʿ in Sāmarrā (Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 263, trans., 55) and achieved particular power in caliphal affairs in the troubled middle decades of the third (ninth) century. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 99, 112; *EI*², s.v. Maghāriba (M. Talbi). As to their numbers, it is mentioned, on the authority of the rāwī Ḥamdūn b. Ismāʿīl (for whom see Ṭabarī, III, 1314 (p. 196 n. 570, below), that 4,000 Maghāribah were involved in a ceremonial parade on the

the wall was enlarged. The fighting continued thus until many of the Byzantines were wounded. At the time when al-Mu'taṣim's army had sat down before them, the king of Byzantium's commanders had divided among themselves the defensive towers, each commander and his troops being allotted a number of towers. The commander responsible for the place where the [1251] wall had been breached was a man of the Byzantine commanders called W.n.dū, whose interpretation in Arabic is "bull."[318] This man and his troops fought strenuously night and day, but the whole weight of the fighting was on the shoulders of him and his troops alone, and neither Yāṭis nor anyone else would reinforce him with a single Byzantine soldier. When night came, the commander who was in charge of the breach went to the [other] Byzantines and said, "The whole weight of the fighting is on me and my troops, and I have no one left who has not been wounded. So send some of your own troops to man the breach and fire back for a while, for if you don't you will be disgraced and the city lost." They nevertheless refused to help him with a single man and told him, "The wall is intact in our section, and we aren't asking you for any assistance; so manage as best you can in your section, for you can expect no reinforcements from us."

As a result, W.n.dū and his comrades resolved to go out to the Commander of the Faithful al-Mu'taṣim, asking him for a guarantee of safe-conduct for their families and [having been assured of this] to yield up to him the fortress, with all its contents of fittings, goods, weapons, etc. So when morning came he appointed his troops to hold the two sides of the breach while he went forth, saying, "I intend to go to the Commander of the Faithful," and instructing his soldiers not to fight until he should occasion of the 'Īd; see Ibrāhīm al-Bayhaqī, op. cit., ed. Schwally, 165 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 250.

---

318. This name is corruptly written in the sources, but, if, as Ṭabarī says, it is to be equated with thawr "bull," then the correct reading is probably B.y.dū, corresponding to the Boiditzes of the Greek chronicles, described as having derived his surname from the ox (boidon) and stigmatized as the traitor who delivered the city to the Arabs. Bury, History, 269–71, and Vasiliev, Byzance, 167–70, 188–90, discuss at length the rather confused accounts in the Christian sources of the treacherous delivery of the impregnable fortress of Amorion to the Muslims; some of them mention only a single act of treachery.

return. He went forth till he came to al-Muʿtaṣim and stood in his presence.

Meanwhile, the [Muslim] troops were advancing to the breach, the Byzantines having held back from fighting, until they reached the wall. The Byzantines were making signs with their hands and saying, "Don't be afraid!" while the troops were at that moment advancing. W.n.dū was sitting with al-Muʿtaṣim, and the latter called for a horse and set W.n.dū on it; and he set his face forward [1252] until the troops proceeded with them to the edge of the breach. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. ʿAlī was in front of al-Muʿtaṣim, and he gestured to the troops with his hand that they were to enter, and they duly entered the city. At that point, W.n.dū turned [toward the Caliph] and seized his own beard with his hand. Al-Muʿtaṣim asked him, "What's the matter with you?" He replied, "I came because I wanted to hear your words and to let you hear mine, but you have acted treacherously with me!" Al-Muʿtaṣim, however, said, "Anything you want to ask, I guarantee to fulfill for you; say what you wish, for I shall not gainsay you." W.n.dū protested, "How can you say that you won't gainsay me, when the troops have already entered the city?" Al-Muʿtaṣim said, "Place your hand on whatever you want, and it is yours, and say whatever you want, and I will truly grant it to you. So W.n.dū remained in al-Muʿtaṣim's tent.

Yāṭis was in his tower with a group of Byzantines gathered around him. A detachment of them went along to a big church situated in one corner of ʿAmmūriyyah and fought there fiercely, but the Muslim troops burned the church over them; they were burned to death to the last man. Yāṭis remained in his tower with his soldiers and the remainder of the Byzantines, but the swords [of the enemy] wrought havoc among them, and all were either slain or wounded. At that, al-Muʿtaṣim rode on until he arrived and halted opposite Yāṭis, this place being near Ashnās's troops, and these last cried out, "O Yāṭis, this is the Commander of the Faithful!" The Byzantines shouted down from the top of the tower, "Yāṭis isn't here!" They replied, "Yes he is; tell him that the Commander of the Faithful is waiting." But they responded, [1253] "Yāṭis isn't here!" So the Commander of the Faithful went onward in an angry state. But when he had passed beyond [them] the Byzantines cried out [mockingly], "Yāṭis is here, Yāṭis is here!" Al-Muʿtaṣim accordingly came back and halted just opposite the tower. Then he gave orders regarding the ladders that had already been got ready, and one of them was carried forward and placed against the tower where Yāṭis was. Al-Ḥasan al-Rūmī, a slave of Abū Saʿīd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf's, climbed up it, and Yāṭis spoke to him.[319] Al-Ḥasan said, "This is the Commander of the Faithful, so descend the submit to his judgment." Then he went back down and told al-Muʿtaṣim that he had seen Yāṭis and spoken with him. Al-Muʿtaṣim instructed him, "Tell him that he must come down!" Al-Ḥasan went up a second time, and Yāṭis, girded with a sword, came out of the tower and stood on it, with al-Muʿtaṣim watching him meanwhile. Yāṭis then took off his sword from around his neck[320] and handed it over to al-Ḥasan and finally came down and presented himself before al-Muʿtaṣim, who lashed him in the face with a whip. Al-Muʿtaṣim returned to his tent and said, "Bring him here." Yāṭis walked a little distance, and then a messenger from al-Muʿtaṣim came to him [and instructed the Caliph's attendants], "Set him on a mount," so they conveyed him to the Commander of the Faithful's tent.[321]

The troops drew near from every direction with male prisoners and women and children captives until the encampment was full. Al-Muʿtaṣim commanded Basīl al-Tarjumān[322] to sort out the male prisoners and to set the noble and high-born Byzantines[323] on one side and the rest on another; and Basīl did this. Then al-Muʿtaṣim gave orders that his commanders should be in charge of the lots to be sold. Thus he gave Ashnās charge of what had come from his sector and told him to proclaim its sale. He gave al-Afshīn charge of what had come from his sector and told him [1254] to proclaim and sell it. Aytākh was to deal with what came from his sector likewise and Jaʿfar al-Khayyāṭ similarly with what was

319. Presumably in Greek, since al-Ḥasan was of Greek (rūmī) origin.

320. A sign of submission.

321. Aetius's surrender effectively marked the fall of the city, which very probably took place on Tuesday, the seventeenth of Ramaḍān (August 12, 838); Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 581. The Christian sources are imprecise, but there seem to be some grounds for stating that the duration of the siege was quite short, only twelve or fifteen days. See Vasiliev, Byzance, 170–71, 275.

322. I.e., "the interpreter, translator."

323. These amounted a considerable number, according to the Greek chronicles, including, in addition to Aetius, the patricius and strategos Theophilus, the drungarius Constantine, etc.; see Vasiliev, Byzance, 171.

in his sector. At the side of each of these commanders he appointed a man from Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād's staff to keep an account of the gains that the commander made (yuḥṣī 'alayhi).[324] The various lots were sold in five days. What proved salable of them was sold, and he ordered that the remainder should be thrown on the fire. Al-Mu'taṣim then started back for the region of Ṭarsūs.

When it was Aytākh's day (i.e., to sell his share of the plunder)—this being before al-Mu'taṣim was to set out on his return journey—the troops pounced upon the spoils that Aytākh was in the process of selling. This was also the day on which 'Ujayf had arranged with the troops to fall upon al-Mu'taṣim. Al-Mu'taṣim galloped out alone (against the looters) with drawn sword, so that the troops fell back on each side before him and desisted from plundering the spoils. Al-Mu'taṣim then returned to his tent. However, the next morning he gave orders that bids for the women and children captives were to be invited only three times, to speed up the sale; if someone raised the price after the third call, (well and good); but if not the whole lot[325] was to be sold anyhow. He was involved doing that on the fifth day (of the sale). The slave captives were being proclaimed for sale in groups of five and ten and the extensive spoils of goods and equipment in one block.[326]

He related: The king of the Byzantines had sent an envoy (i.e., to negotiate peace) when al-Mu'taṣim first besieged 'Ammūriyyah, but al-Mu'taṣim ordered the envoy to be made to stay at a watering place three miles from 'Ammūriyyah, where the troops were providing themselves with good drinking water; he would not let the envoy come to him until he had conquered 'Ammūriyyah. Only then did he allow the envoy to go back to the king of the Byzantines, which he did.[327]

---

324. I.e., a representative of the chief judge was deputed to see that the division was handled fairly—an obvious precaution in the light of the quarrels mentioned below—and to take the ruler's fifth of all the spoils of war.

325. Following Glossarium, CCCLXXIII, for 'ilq in this context.

326. According to Michael the Syrian, the Caliph ordered that captured children should not be separated from their parents; see Vasiliev, Byzance, 172.

327. This is the embassy mentioned at p. 107 n. 308, above, to which was added a second embassy from Theophilus after the fall of the city. The two

Al-Muʿtaṣim went back in the direction of the frontier region (al-thughūr), as he had heard that the king of the Byzantines intended to set out following his (al-Muʿtaṣim's) tracks or else aimed at harrying the Muslim forces.[328] He accordingly pro-[1255] ceeded along the main highway for one stage but then returned to ʿAmmūriyyah and ordered the troops to turn back also. He now turned aside from the main highway onto the road leading to the Wādī al-Jawr.[329] He distributed the prisoners among the commanders; and to each one of these last he gave a group to guard. The commanders in turn divided them among their troops. They traveled along a road for about forty miles, a waterless stretch, and they executed every prisoner who, because of the intense thirst he was suffering, refused to keep up with them. The troops entered the desert on the road through the Wādī al-Jawr; they were struck by thirst, so that both men and beasts kept embassies seem to be conflated by Yaʿqubī, Taʾrīkh, II, 581, trans. in Vasiliev, Byzance, 275, and the details given here and by Michael the Syrian may relate to both embassies, though the plea for the return of the captives from ʿAmmūriyyah must obviously have been made by the second embassy. In his letter(s) Theophilus expressed contrition for the destruction of Zibaṭrah, promising to rebuild it and return the captives from there plus all other Arabs in Greek hands. Michael the Syrian alone adds further material: that the leader of the second delegation, the patricius Basil, asked for the release of Aetius and the other captives of ʿAmmūriyyah, offering a ransom of 200,000 centenaria. Al-Muʿtaṣim, however, demanded the extradition of Naṣr Khurdanāyā (i.e., Theophobus; see pp. 3 n. 10, 105 n. 305, above), his son, and the domesticus Manuel, who had once been a refugee in Muslim territory but had subsequently returned to Byzantine service. Basil refused these demands and presented a further letter from Theophilus, couched in menacing terms, after which al-Muʿtaṣim angrily dimissed the embassy and sent back the Emperor's presents. See Bury, "Mutasim's March," 266; Vasiliev, Byzance, 172, 174–75; Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 64–65.

---

328. The general assumption would be that al-Muʿtaṣim razed the walls of ʿAmmūriyyah completely, though Michael the Syrian states that he was able to pull down only a small part of the walls. Nevertheless, though Idrīsī and Ḥamdallāh Mustawfī Qazwīnī describe it as still flourishing, the city fell into ruins after the eighth (fourteenth) century. Its ruined site was identified only in the nineteenth century by Western travelers like William Hamilton as being that called by the local Turks Hergān-Qal'e. See W. M. Ramsay, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, 230; Vasiliev, Byzance, 173–74.

329. This, with varying orthographies of the second element, is located by the geographers twelve miles from ʿAmmūriyyah; though unattested, a form like Wādī al-Ghawr "watercourse of the hollow" might perhaps be correct. See Vasiliev, Byzance, 172 n. 3.

falling down [dead], and some of the prisoners killed some of the soldiers and escaped.[330]

Al-Mu'taṣim had traveled on ahead of the army and now came to meet the troops with water that he had brought from the place where he had encamped; nevertheless, many of the troops died of thirst in that valley. The troops told al-Mu'taṣim, "These prisoners have killed some of our soldiers." So he immediately ordered Basīl al-Rūmī to sort out those prisoners who were of high rank, and these were set on one side;[331] then he further ordered that the remainder were to be taken up the mountains and brought down into the valleys [beyond] and executed en masse. These amounted to 6,000 men, killed in two places, in the Wādī al-Jawr and in another place. Al-Mu'taṣim pressed on from there in the direction of the frontier zone until he reached Ṭarsūs. Water troughs made from leather had been set down for him around his encampment and all the way to the encampment at 'Ammūriyyah; these were now filled, and the troops drank from them, untiring in their demand for water.

The battle between al-Afshīn and the king of the Byzantines took place, it has been recorded, on Thursday, the twenty-fourth of Sha'bān (July 21, 838),[332] while al-Mu'taṣim sat down before 'Ammūriyyah on Friday, the sixth of Ramaḍān (August 1, 838)[333] and came back [from the expedition] after fifty-five days.[334] [1256]

330. This return march must have been through the deserts to the west and south of the Tuz Gölü.

331. The Christian sources state that forty-two distinguished Byzantine prisoners were carried off to Sāmarrā, imprisoned there for seven years, and finally killed by al-Wāthiq in 230 (845) after refusing to convert to Islam; subsequently they entered Greek hagiology as "the Forty-Two Martyrs of Amorion." See Bury, History, 271–72.

332. Actually a Sunday.

333. Actually a Thursday.

334. Both Arab and Byzantine military operations along the thughūr and Byzantine naval activities as far as the Syrian coast continued over the next four years. According to Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 136–37 = par. 2818, al-Mu'taṣim had, after his 'Ammūriyyah victory, planned an expedition by land and sea against Contantinople, but the conspiracy centered on al-'Abbās b. al-Ma'mūn forced his hurried return to Syria and al-Jazīrah. It seems, however, that naval operations were in fact undertaken in the last year or so of his life, probably in 227 (841–42), though the Arabic historical sources do not mention them. Canard has noted a lengthy eulogy by the poet Buḥturī of the Amīr Aḥmad b. Dīnār b. 'Abdallāh, probably the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd's mawlā Dīnār b. 'Abdallāh, who had been

Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Bāhilī[335] recited these verses eulogizing al-Afshīn and mentioning the battle between him and the king of the Byzantines:

The one protected (al-ma'ṣūm; by God, i.e., al-Mu'taṣim) made firm the power of Abū
Ḥasan (al-Afshīn) more securely than the pillar of Iḍam.[336]
All glory falls below that which he established for the house of Kāwūs,[337] the lords of the Persians.
Al-Afshīn is nothing but a sword drawn by God's power (or: His divine decree, qadar) in the hand of al-Mu'taṣim.
He left no inhabitant at al-Badhdh, except for images like those of Iram.[338]

---

briefly governor of al-Jibāl under al-Ma'mūn (Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 553) and had quelled a revolt in Yemen for that Caliph (Ṭabarī, III, 1062–63). He is described as having achieved a glorious naval victory against the Byzantines, and this may be the expedition aimed at Constantinople that the Greek historians mention as commanded by one Apodeinar (Ibn Dīnār?) and destroyed by a great storm; Vasiliev placed this event in 842. See Buḥturī, Dīwān, ed. Beirut, 398 ff. = ed. al-Ṣayrafī, II, 980–85 no. 387; Bury, "Mutasim's March," 273–74; Margoliouth, op. cit., 270; Vasiliev, Byzance, 176–77, 406–7.

Military operations, not recorded by Ṭabarī or other Arab historians but detailed by Michael the Syrian, also continued in the fronter region through the last years of al-Mu'taṣim's life. They were conducted by the Amīr Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf (Ṭabarī, III, 1171 [p. 15 and n. 58, above]; from such raids as these he derived his nisbah al-Thaghrī) and by the garrison commander of al-Maṣṣīṣah (Mopsuestia) in Cilicia, Bashīr. See Bury. "Mutasim's March," 275; Vasiliev, Byzance, 175–76. In the course of fighting near al-Maṣṣīṣah in 225 (839–40) Bashīr and Abū Sa'īd defeated and killed Naṣīr/Nuṣayr, or Theophobus, the leader of the Persian and Kurdish troops from the Khurramiyyah of al-Jibāl in the Byzantine army. The event was celebrated by the poets Abū Tammām and Buḥturī, the latter an eye witness to the events in question. See Margoliouth, op. cit., 269–70; Canard, "Les allusions," 398, 400–1, 403–4; H. Grégoire, "Manuel et Théophobe," 416; Rekaya, "Mise au point sur Théophobe," 65–67.

335. 'Abbāsid court poet, often dubbed al-Khalī' "the debauchee, the libertine" (i.e., one of several mājin, or "frivolous, scoffing" poets of this period; see *EI*², s.v. Mudjūn [Ch. Pellat]), who died ca. 250 (865); he was in particular favor with al-Mu'taṣim and his successors. GAS, II, 518–19; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk (Ch. Pellat).

336. Described by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 215, as a mountain in eastern Arabia between al-Yamāmah and Ḍariyyah.

337. I.e., that of al-Afshīn; on the ancient Iranian name Kāwūs, Avestan Kawa Usa, see Justi, op. cit., 334–36.

338. This verse is also cited by Yāqūt in his entry on Badhdh, Mu'jam, I, 361. Iram Dhāt al-'Imād "Iram of the Pillars," in Qur'ān LXXXIX:6, was generally

Then he brought forward as a present its ruler Bābak, as a captive, and as one taken in pledge, in double fetters, humbly expressing contrition.
And he pierced Theophilus with a well-aimed lance thrust, which shattered both his armies together and routed him.
The greater part of them were slain, and those who did escape of them were as meat on a chopping block (i.e., pounded and cut to pieces).[339]

In the year, al-Muʿtaṣim imprisoned al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn and ordered him to be publicly cursed.

The Reason for al-Muʿtaṣim's Imprisoning al-ʿAbbās b. al-Maʾmūn

It has been mentioned that the reason for this was that, when al-Muʿtaṣim sent ʿUjayf b. ʿAnbasah, together with ʿAmr b. ʾr.b.khā al-Farghānī and Muḥammad Kūtah, to the Byzantine lands at the time of the trouble with the king of the Byzantines at Zibaṭrah, he did not give ʿUjayf a free hand regarding expenditure on salaries and supplies as al-Afshīn had been given a free hand, al-Muʿtaṣim having found ʿUjayf's conduct and activities unsatisfactory. This became apparent to ʿUjayf, at which he reprehended al-ʿAbbās for his previous actions at the time of [1257] taken by the commentators to refer to a mighty city in the Arabian Desert, which had been destroyed by God as part of His punishment of the tribe of ʿĀd; see *EI*², s.v. Iram (W. M. Watt).

---

339. Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, Dīwān, 99–100. These verses and others by this poet are also cited in Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 169–70, trans., 231–32. Canard, "Les allusions," on Arabic poetry alluding to Byzantine-Arab warfare, has been mentioned in n. 334, above; he notes that these allusions are fairly meager and vague but do on occasion add further details to the accounts of the Muslim and Christian historians. See his listing of and comments on the poetry of Buḥturī and, above all, Abū Tammām, 397–403; for a detailed assessment of Abū Tammām's verse, see Haq, op. cit., 24–29. The most famous example is, of course, the qaṣīdah in praise of al-Muʿtaṣim's victory at ʿAmmūriyyah, which begins al-sayfu aṣdaqu anbāʾan min al-kutubi (Abū Tammām, Dīwān, I, 40–74 no. 3, analyzed by S. P. Stetkevych in "The ʿAbbāsid Poet Interprets History," 60–64, and discussed by M. M. Badawi, "The Function of Rhetoric in Medieval Arabic Poetry," 43–56. It is somewhat surprising that Ṭabarī, who has quoted from Abū Tammām's ode on the fall of al-Badhdh (III, 1233–34 [pp. 92–93, above]) does not cite this even more famous poem of his.

al-Maʾmūn's death, when he had given allegiance to Abū Isḥāq [al-Muʿtaṣim], and for his inadequate measures then,[340] and he encouraged al-ʿAbbās to repair the resultant damage. Al-ʿAbbās undertook to do that and he secretly plotted with a man called al-Ḥārith al-Samarqandī, a kinsman of ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Waḍḍāḥ[341] and a person with whom al-ʿAbbās was on intimate terms.

Al-Ḥārith was a well-educated, intelligent person, skilled in intrigue, so al-ʿAbbās sent him out as his emissary and liaison officer to the commanders [of al-Muʿtaṣim]. He used to circulate around the army camp until a number of commanders came to be on close terms with him and swore allegiance to him [as al-ʿAbbās's representative], including some from [the Caliph's] close entourage. For each one of al-Muʿtaṣim's great commanders he nominated one of his followers whom he trusted, chosen from those who had sworn allegiance to him, and gave him responsibility for that, saying, "When we give the appropriate order, each one of you is to fall upon the person whom we have assigned to you to kill." They each pledged that to him, whereupon he would say to the man who had sworn allegiance to him, "O so-and-so, you are to kill so-and-so," and the man would reply, "All right!" He appointed one of al-Muʿtaṣim's close intimates, who had sworn allegiance to him, to be responsible for [killing] al-Muʿtaṣim, one of al-Afshīn's entourage for al-Afshīn, and one of Ashnās's entourage for Ashnās, all these from the Turks who had sworn allegiance to him; and they gave him their agreement en bloc.

When they were about to enter the mountain pass en route for Anqirah and ʿAmmūriyyah, al-Afshīn having [already] entered [the Byzantine lands] from the region of Malaṭyah, ʿUjayf advised al-ʿAbbās to fall upon al-Muʿtaṣim in the pass while he had few troops with him and the main army had become separated from him and thereupon kill him and return to Baghdad, for the troops would rejoice at the prospect of returning home from the expedition. However, al-ʿAbbās refused to do this and said, "I won't spoil this campaign until they have entered the Byzantine lands and conquered 'Ammūriyyah." At this, 'Ujayf said to [1258] al-'Abbās, "O sleeping one, how long will you remain asleep? 'Ammūriyyah is as good as already captured,[342] and the man (i.e., al-Mu'taṣim) can now be dealt with. Secretly incite some of the troops to plunder these small amounts of captured spoils, and, when al-Mu'taṣim hears the news of this looting, he will immediately ride forth. You can then give orders for him to be killed here on the spot." Al-'Abbās nevertheless refused, saying, "I shall wait until he travels through the pass (i.e., on the way back), for he will be as isolated then as he was on the original way out, and he will be more vulnerable than he now is here."

340. See Ṭabarī, III, 1164 [p. 1, above].
341. Ibid., 1250 [p. 113 and n. 315, above].

But 'Ujayf had already actually ordered some troops to plunder the baggage and equipment, so some of the spoils in Aytākh's encampment were actually looted. [As foreseen], al-Mu'taṣim rode out at the gallop [to the looting], but the troops quieted down, for al-'Abbās did not give permission to act freely to any of those men with whom he had a covenant, so that they did nothing, reluctant to undertake any action without his orders.

News of what had been happening on that day reached 'Amr al-Farghānī. He had a relative, a beardless youth, among al-Mu'taṣim's close entourage, and the youth came to drink with 'Amr's sons that night. He informed them that the Commander of the Faithful had ridden in haste and that he himself had run before him, and he reported, "The Commander of the Faithful became angry today and ordered me to draw my sword, saying, 'Anyone who plants himself in front of you, strike him!'" 'Amr heard that report from the youth and was fearful that something unpleasant might happen to him, so he said to the youth, "O my son, you are foolish! Don't spend too much time with the Commander of the Faithful tonight! Keep to your tent, and if you hear any shoutings like these shoutings (of the discontented troops and looters), or any uproar, or anything at all, don't leave your tent, for you are indeed just an inexperienced lad, and you don't yet know how troops can behave." The youth then comprehended 'Amr's speech.

342. This makes better sense in the context than the translation in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 77: "'Ammūriyya is already conquered." On this usage of the perfective form of the verb, see W. Wright, A Grammar of the Arabic Language, II, 2 A, par. 1 (e); cf. H. Reckendorf, Arabische Syntax, 301, par. 155.2.b.

Al-Muʿtaṣim set out from ʿAmmūriyyah making for the frontier region. Al-Afshīn dispatched Ibn al-Aqṭaʿ[343] by a road [1259] different from that of al-Muʿtaṣim and ordered him to press on rapidly[344] to a place he named and to meet him at a certain point along the road, so Ibn al-Aqṭaʿ proceeded onward. Al-Muʿtaṣim also traveled onward toward the frontier region and journeyed until he reached a place where he halted for rest and refreshment and so that the troops might make their way through the defile that lay ahead of them. Ibn al-Aqṭaʿ, with the plunder he had gained, met al-Afshīn's troops, the camps of al-Muʿtaṣim and al-Afshīn being separate from each other, with two miles or more between them.

Ashnās fell ill, so al-Muʿtaṣim rode out at the time of the morning prayer to visit the sick man. He came to his tent and visited him, at a time when al-Afshīn had not yet caught up with him. Al-Muʿtaṣim set off back, when al-Afshīn met him on the road. Al-Muʿtaṣim said to him, "Are you heading for Abū Jaʿfar [Ashnās]?" At the time of al-Muʿtaṣim's departure from his visit to the sick Ashnās, ʿAmr al-Farghānī and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl both set out to the vicinity of al-Afshīn's encampment so that they might see what captives Ibn al-Aqṭaʿ had brought and purchase any of them that took their fancies. So they headed for the vicinity of al-Afshīn's camp, but al-Afshīn himself, on his way to visit Ashnās, met them. They dismounted and greeted him, while Ashnās's doorkeeper (ḥājib) observed the two of them from afar. Al-Afshīn went on to Ashnās and then returned. Meanwhile, ʿAmr and Aḥmad had proceeded to al-Afshīn's encampment, but the captives had not yet been brought out; hence they stood on one side waiting for the public bidding for captives to begin in order to purchase some of them.

Ashnās's doorkeeper went into his master's presence and said, "ʿAmr al-Farghānī and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl met al-Afshīn as they were going toward his encampment. They dismounted and greeted him and then continued onward to his encampment." At that, Ashnās summoned Muḥammad b. Sa'īd al-Sa'dī[345] and said to him, "Go to al-Afshīn's encampment and look if you can see [1260] 'Amr al-Farghānī and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl there; observe with whom they stop and what they are up to." Muḥammad b. Sa'īd did this and found the two stationary on the backs of their mounts. He asked them, "What has detained you here?" They replied, "We stopped to await Ibn al-Aqṭa''s captives' being brought out so that we might buy some of them." Muḥammad b. Sa'īd said to them, "Appoint an agent to purchase on your behalf." But they replied, "We don't want to buy anything we don't see personally."

---

343. I.e., the Amīr of Malaṭyah ʿAmr b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Aqṭaʿ, whose father had, during al-Amīn's reign, yielded up the fortress of Kamakh to the Byzantines in order to secure the freedom of his son. See Balādhurī, op cit., 185; Canard, "Les allusions," 446.

344. Vocalizing yughīra, form IV of gh-w-r, rather than yaghīra, form I of gh-y-r "provide provisions" ["and ordered him to bring provisions to a place"], as in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 78.

Muḥammad went back and informed Ashnās about that. The latter told his doorkeeper, "Say to those two, 'It would be better for you if you stuck to your own encampment' "—meaning [by "those two"] 'Amr and Ibn al-Khalīl—"'and don't keep wandering hither and thither.' " The doorkeeper accordingly gave them this message. They were perturbed by it and put their heads together and decided to go to the camp intelligence officer (ṣāḥib khabar al-'askar) and ask to be removed from responsibility to Ashnās as their military superior. They therefore went to him and said, "We are the Commander of the Faithful's slaves, and he can attach us to whomsoever he wishes. But this fellow (i.e., Ashnās) treats us with contempt; he has reviled and threatened us, and we are afraid that he is going to take measures against us. So let the Commander of the Faithful attach us to whomsoever [else] he wishes." The intelligence officer repeated that to al-Mu'taṣim the very same day.

The striking of camp coincided with the time of the morning worship. When the troops set out the armies traveled separately. Ashnās, al-Afshīn, and all the commanders in the Commander of the Faithful's army went on [together]; they appointed their deputies over the armies, and these were to travel with the armies. Al-Afshīn was in command of the left wing and Ashnās was over the right wing. When Ashnās went to al-Muʿtaṣim, the latter told him, "Punish ʿAmr al-Farghānī and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl in an exemplary fashion, for they have made fools of themselves."

345. Ms. C has the variant (n. l) of "al-Ṣughdī" for this nisbah, which would actually fit well with the Transoxanian Iranian origin of many of al-Mu'taṣim's senior military commanders. The Banū Sa'd b. Zayd Manāt were a clan of Tamīm (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1146; Ibn al-Kalbī, op. cit., I, Tafel 75, II, Register, 497; EI[1], s.v. Tamīm [G. Levi della Vida]), but Muḥammad b. Sa'īd may well have been of non-Arab mawlā origin, with a forebear who had become affiliated to the genuinely Arab Banū Sa'd.

With that, Ashnās galloped off to his encampment. He asked [1261] for ʿAmr and Ibn al-Khalīl. He found ʿAmr all right, but Ibn al-Khalīl had already gone forward with the left wing of the army, hastening toward the Byzantines. They brought ʿAmr al-Farghānī to Ashnās, who said, "Bring whips!" ʿAmr remained stripped for a long time, but the whips were not brought. ʿAmr's paternal uncle, who was a Persian (aʿjamī), spoke to Ashnās on ʿAmr's behalf, with the latter meanwhile waiting there. Ashnās thereupon said, "Carry him away and dress him in a qabāṭāq,"[346] so they bore him away on a mule in a canopied litter (qubbah) and took him to the camp. Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl galloped up, and Ashnās said, "Imprison this fellow with him." So he was made to dismount from his steed and put [in the litter] as the counterbalance[347] to ʿAmr, and the two of them were delivered to Muḥammad b. Saʿīd al-Saʿdī, who was to keep them under guard. He pitched for them a twin-poled tent[348] with a room and a table [for food], and he spread out for them mattresses and bedding,[349] and provided a tank of water. Their baggage and their slave boys remained in the encampment, and Muḥammad did not take away any of these. The two of them remained thus until they reached the mountain of al-Ṣafṣāf, Ashnās being in command of the rear guard (of the whole forces) and Bughā [al-Kabīr] being in command of the rear guard of al-Muʿtaṣim's [section of the] army.

When the army came to al-Ṣafṣāf and the Farghānī youth, who was a relative of ʿAmr's, heard of ʿAmr's imprisonment, he mentioned to al-Muʿtaṣim the conversation that had gone on between him and ʿAmr that night, including ʿAmr's words to

346. Not identified exactly, but possibly a gown, either sleeveless or with short sleeves, to be equated with the b.gh.l.tāq mentioned in Dozy, Vêtements, 81–84.

347. Here ʿadīl; in Ṭabarī, III, 1325 (p. 211, below), the term zamīl is used. Such a litter had two seats, one on each side of the mount.

348. Fāzah; see p. 81 n. 211, above.

349. Ṭayyah, translated as "platform" in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 80.

him, "If you perceive an uproar, stay inside your tent." Al-Mu'taṣim said to Bughā, "Do not set out tomorrow morning until you go first to Ashnās; then take over custody of 'Amr from him and bring him to me." This took place at al-Ṣafṣāf. Bughā halted with his banners, awaiting Ashnās. Muḥammad b. Sa'īd appeared with 'Amr and Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl, at which Bughā said to Ashnās, "The Commander of the Faithful has ordered me to bring 'Amr to him immediately." 'Amr was therefore made to descend [from the litter], and some other man was placed in the litter with Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl to counterbalance it, and Bughā brought 'Amr [1262] to al-Mu'taṣim. Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl sent one of his slave boys to 'Amr, so that he might learn what had been done with him. The slave boy came back and informed him that 'Amr had been taken to the Commander of the Faithful's presence, had stayed there for a while, and then had been handed over to Aytākh and that, when he came in, the Commander of the Faithful had questioned 'Amr about the words he had said to the youth who was his relative but that 'Amr had denied this and had stated, "This lad was drunk and did not understand; I didn't say anything of what he has mentioned." Al-Mu'taṣim gave orders, however, and 'Amr was handed over to Aytākh.

Al-Mu'taṣim traveled onward till he came to the entrance of the defiles leading to al-Budandūn,[350] and Ashnās remained there for three days waiting for the Commander of the Faithful's troops to emerge safely from it, because he was in charge of the rear guard.

Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl now wrote a letter to Ashnās telling him that he had valuable information for the Commander of the Faithful, Ashnās being at that moment stationed at the defile of al-Budandūn. Ashnās dispatched to him Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb[351] and Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf to ask him about the nature 350. I.e., the Podandos River in Cilicia, north of Ṭarsūs; see Honigmann, op. cit., 44–45, 82. It was here that the Caliph al-Ma'mūn suffered his fatal illness in 218 (833). See Ṭabarī, III, 1133; Vasiliev, Byzance, 122.

351. I.e., Aḥmad al-Ǧarǧarā'ī, at this time secretary to Ashnās, later to the prince al-Muntaṣir and, after the latter became Caliph, vizier; he died in 265 (879). He had a residence at Sāmarrā when it was first laid out. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 113, 212, 217–18, 230; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 262–65, 287–89; *EI*², s.v. al-Ǧarǧarā'ī (D. Sourdel).

of this information, but Aḥmad averred that he would communicate it to no one but the Commander of the Faithful personally. The two envoys returned and reported that to Ashnās, who said, "Go back, and swear to him that I myself have sworn by the life of the Commander of the Faithful that, unless he reveals this information to me, I will have him flogged to death."

They retraced their steps and repeated these words to Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl. He made all those present with him leave, and only Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and Abū Saʿīd were left. He then communicated to them what ʿAmr al-Farghānī had proposed to him concerning al-ʿAbbās; he explained to them everything that [1263] he knew and gave them information about the activities of al-Ḥārith al-Samarqandī. The two of them then went back to Ashnās and informed him about the whole affair. At this, Ashnās sent for blacksmiths, and they brought two blacksmiths from the army. He provided them with iron and told them, "Make for me shackles like those now on Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl, and get it done immediately," and they did that. Now at the time for the evening worship Ashnās's doorkeeper used to spend the night at Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl's in company with Muḥammad b. Saʿīd al-Saʿdī. But on this particular night, at the time for the evening worship, the doorkeeper went to al-Ḥārith al-Samarqandī's tent, made him come out, and took him along to Ashnās. The latter put him in shackles and ordered the doorkeeper to bear him to the Commander of the Faithful, and the doorkeeper did this. Ashnās's departure coincided with the time for the morning worship. When he reached the place of his encampment, al-Ḥārith met him, [now] wearing robes of honor and in the company of al-Muʿtaṣim's officials. Ashnās said to him, "What's all this?"[352] Al-Ḥārith replied, "The shackles that were on my leg have now been transferred to al-ʿAbbas's leg!"

When al-Ḥārith had come to him al-Muʿtaṣim had questioned him about his activities, and al-Ḥārith had confessed that he was al-ʿAbbās's secret agent (ṣāḥib al-khabar), revealing to the caliph everything he had done and providing information about all those commanders who had pledged allegiance to al-ʿAbbās. Al-Muʿtaṣim then freed al-Ḥārith and presented to him robes of honor but did not move against those commanders because of their numbers and the many who were specifically named among them.

352. Mah, literally, "steady on there!"; see W. Wright, op. cit., I, 295.

Al-Mu'taṣim was much disquieted over al-'Abbās's plot. When he marched out to the mountain pass he sent for al-'Abbās, set him free,[353] treated him kindly, and led him to believe that he (the caliph) had forgiven him. He ate his midday meal with al-'Abbās and then sent him back to his tent. At night he summoned al-'Abbās, made him his partner in conviviality over nabīdh,[354] and plied him [with it] until he had rendered him intoxicated and then made him swear an oath not to conceal from him any aspect of his undertaking. Consequently al-'Abbās disclosed to him his plan and gave him the names of all those who [1264] had clandestinely entered into his plot, and [he further disclosed to him] how each one of them had become involved in it. Al-Mu'taṣim recorded this and kept it safe. After that, he summoned al-Ḥārith al-Samarqandī and questioned him about the occasion and reasons [of those involved in the plot]. Al-Ḥārith repeated to him and confirmed al-'Abbās's story, whereupon al-Mu'taṣim ordered al-'Abbās to be shackled. He told al-Ḥārith, "I made it easy for you to have lied so that I might consequently have a just cause for shedding your blood, but you did not do so, hence have escaped." Al-Ḥārith replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, I am not a liar!" At that point al-Mu'taṣim handed over al-'Abbās to al-Afshīn.[355]

From then onward al-Mu'taṣim pursued those commanders relentlessly, and the whole lot of them was arrested. He ordered that Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl be transported on a mule with a packsaddle but no saddleblanket, left in the sun whenever he

353. The sequence of events in the unmasking of the plot against al-Mu'taṣim is not entirely clear. It may be that al-'Abbās was put in irons on two occasions (see below), or perhaps, as Marin suggests (Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 81 n. 383), al-'Abbās had been under some sort of surveillance as a suspect.

354. This was properly any intoxicating drink fermented from anything but grapes, e.g., dates; see EI[1], s.v. Khamr (A. J. Wensinck), and EI[2], s.v. Khamr. I. Juridical Aspects (A. J. Wensinck).

355. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 581, the great sum of 116,000 dīnārs was found with al-'Abbās when he was arrested. This was divided out among the regularly salaried troops (murtaziqah), two dīnārs each; al-Mu'taṣim made up from his own resources the difference between this and the larger sum required, so that all these troops could benefit.

halted, and fed with a single loaf of bread per day. ʿUjayf b. ʿAnbasah was arrested among those commanders who were seized, and he was handed over, together with the rest of the commanders, to Aytākh, [except that] Ibn al-Khalīl was handed over to Ashnās. ʿUjayf and his companions were transported along the road on mules with packsaddles but no blankets. Al-Shāh b. Sahl, the hereditary leader of the people of a region of Khurāsān called Sijistān,[356] was also arrested. Al-Muʿtaṣim sent for him when al-ʿAbbās was also there in his presence and said to him, "O son of a whore, I treated you with kindness, but you were ungrateful!" Al-Shāh b. Sahl replied to him, "If only this son of a whore who is with you now"—meaning al-ʿAbbās— "had left me alone, you yourself would not at this moment be able to sit in this session and call me a son of a whore!" With that, al-Muʿtaṣim ordered his decapitation. Al-Shāh was the first of the commanders, in company with his retainers (ṣaḥb), to be killed.

ʿUjayf was handed over to Aytākh, who loaded him with numerous iron fetters and had him transported on a mule in a [1265] litter without any saddle blanket.

As for al-ʿAbbās, he was in the custody of al-Afshīn. When al-Muʿtaṣim halted at Manbij,[357] al-ʿAbbās was hungry and asked for food. Ample food[358] was brought to him, and he ate, but when he asked for water this was refused, and he was wrapped in a felt blanket (mishḥ). As a result, he died at Manbij, and one of his brothers prayed over him.[359]

As for ʿAmr al-Farghānī, when al-Muʿtaṣim halted in a garden in Nisībīn,[360] he sent for the owner of the garden and told him to

356. Perhaps the scion of a local dynasty of Sīstān, which fell within the governorate of Khurāsān, held at this time by ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, who appointed deputies over Sīstān to fight the local Khārijites, as related in the relevant section of the anonymous local history of the region, the Taʾrīkh-i Sīstān, 181 ff., trans., 144 ff., though there is no mention there of al-Shāh b. Sahl.

357. A town on the Euphrates, in al-Jazīrah, where there was a bridge of boats over the river. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 205–7; Le Strange, Lands, 107; idem, Palestine, 501–2; Canard, Histoire, 87–88; *EI*², s.v. Manbidj (N. Elisséeff).

358. Very salty food, according to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 581.

359. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 489–92; Ibn al-ʿAdīm, op. cit., I, 69.

360. A town on the Hirmās River in al-Jazīrah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 288–89; Le Strange, Lands, 94–95; Canard, Histoire, 103; *EI*¹, s.v. Naṣībīn (E. Honigmann).

dig a pit, to the depth of a man's height, in a place that he indicated by making a sign with his head. The owner of the garden began to dig it out. Then he sent for 'Amr, al-Mu'taṣim being at that time seated in the garden, having drunk several cups of nabīdh. He did not utter a word to 'Amr, nor did 'Amr speak to him until, when 'Amr was there before him, al-Mu'taṣim ordered, "Strip him!" He was stripped and flogged with whips by the Turks. The pit was meanwhile in process of being excavated until, when the digging was completed, the owner of the garden reported, "I have dug it out." At that, al-Mu'taṣim issued orders, and 'Amr's face and body were beaten with wooden cudgels; he was beaten continuously until he fell to the ground. Then al-Mu'taṣim said, "Drag him to the pit and throw him into it." 'Amr meanwhile did not speak or utter a sound all through that day until he died. He was hurled into the pit, and it was filled up with earth on top of him.

As for 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah, when he reached Bā'aynāthā,[361] a little distance above Balad,[362] he died in the litter.[363] [His corpse] was thrown down and left with the commander of the garrison, who ordered that he be buried there. Hence he took the corpse to the side of a ruined wall; he threw the corpse down by it, and the corpse was buried there. It has been recorded from 'Alī b. Ḥasan al-Raydānī that he said: 'Ujayf was in the custody of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab. Al-Mu'taṣim inquired of Muḥammad about 'Ujayf and asked him, "O Muḥammad, is [1266] 'Ujayf not dead yet?" He replied, "O my lord, he will die today." Muḥammad then went back to his tent and said to 'Ujayf, "O Abū Ṣāliḥ, what do you have a craving for?" He answered, "Some isfīdbāj[364] and fālūdhaj sweetmeats."[365] Muḥammad ordered a 361. A town in al-Jazīrah on the al-Mawṣil-Naṣībīn road, to the northwest of Balad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 325; Le Strange, Lands, 99; Canard, Histoire, 106, 110.

362. A town on the Tigris to the north of al-Mawṣil, the modern Eski Mawṣil. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 481–82; Le Strange, Lands, 99; Canard, Histoire, 106, 117.

363. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 582, 'Ujayf was brought from Adana in Cilicia in heavy chains, with a felt gag sewn over his mouth and a large fetter round his neck.

364. A dish made with meat, onions, etc.; see Dozy, Supplément, I, 22.

365. See p. 89 n. 237, above.

meal of all these foodstuffs to be made for him, and ʿUjayf ate. He asked for water, but this was denied him, and he kept on asking and pleading for it until he died. He was then buried at Bāʿaynāthā.[366]

He continued to relate: As for the Turk who had undertaken to al-ʿAbbās to kill Ashnās whenever al-ʿAbbās should give the order—he being regarded with great favor by Ashnās, treated by him as a boon companion, and never denied access to him by day or night—al-Muʿtaṣim ordered him to be imprisoned. Ashnās imprisoned him next to himself in a house whose door he bricked up with clay, and he used to provide him with a loaf of bread and a pitcher of water each day. One day the Turk's son came to him, and he talked with him from behind the wall, saying, "O my dear son, if only you could get me a knife, I could free myself from this place." His son kept on using various subterfuges until he managed to get a knife to him; the Turk then killed himself with it.

As for al-Sindī b. Bukhtāshah,[367] al-Muʿtaṣim ordered that he should be given back to his father, Bukhtāshah, because Bukhtāshah had not been smeared in any way by al-ʿAbbās's conspiracy. Al-Muʿtaṣim said, "This venerable shaykh should not be afflicted through [the loss of] his son." And he ordered the son to be set free.

As for Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl, Ashnās handed him over to Muḥammad b. Saʿīd al-Saʿdī, who dug a pit for him in al-Jazīrah at Sāmarrā. One day, al-Muʿtaṣim asked about him and said to [1267] Ashnās, "What is Aḥmad b. al-Khalīl doing?" Ashnās told him, "He is with Muḥammad b. Saʿīd al-Saʿdī, who had a pit dug for him and then covered it over, leaving, however, a hole so that bread and water could be lowered down to him." Al-Muʿtaṣim replied, "This fellow must, I think, have grown fat under these conditions." Ashnās told Muḥammad b. Sa'īd about that, and the latter ordered that Aḥmad b. Khalīl should be given water and that it should be poured over him in the pit until he died and the pit was filled up. Accordingly, water was continuously poured over him, but the sand soaked it up, and he did not drown, nor did the pit fill. Ashnās therefore ordered him to be handed over to Ghiṭrīf al-Khujandī.[368] This was done; he lingered with him for a few days and then died and was buried.

366. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 582, states that ʿUjayf's son Ṣāliḥ asked the Caliph for permission to drop his father's name from his nasab and to be called Ṣāliḥ al-Muʿtaṣimī; he also cursed his father and cut off all connection with him.

367. The consonants and vocalization of this name are uncertain; conceivably his father was one of the local rulers of Transoxania or the east. Al-Sindī survived and regained favor, for he is heard of in 248 (862) commanding the right wing on the summer raid (ṣāʾifah) into Byzantine territory; see Ṭabarī, III, 1481.

As for Harthamah b. al-Naḍr al-Khuttalī,[369] he was governor of al-Marāghah and was one of those whom al-'Abbās named as among his fellow conspirators. Al-Mu'taṣim gave written orders that he should be transported in irons, but al-Afshīn spoke up for him and asked al-Mu'taṣim for Harthamah to be awarded to him as a gift. This al-Mu'taṣim did. Al-Afshīn thereupon wrote a letter to Harthamah b. al-Naḍr informing him that the Commander of the Faithful had given his person over to himself and that he (al-Afshīn) had now appointed him governor over the region where he would receive the letter. Harthamah was brought to al-Dīnawar[370] at nightfall in shackles and flung down in the caravanserai, still fastened in irons. Then the letter reached him in the course of the night; morning came, and he was governor of al-Dīnawar.

The remainder of the commanders, comprising Turks, men of Farghānah, and others, none of whose names have been preserved, were killed in their entirety.[371]

---

368. I.e., from Khujandah in Farghānah; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 347–48; Le Strange, Lands, 479; Barthold, Turkestan, 164–66; *EI*², s.v. Khudjand(a) (C. E. Bosworth).

369. I.e., from Khuttal or Khuttalān, a principality to the north of the upper Oxus; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 346–47; Le Strange, Lands, 438–39; Barthold, Turkestan, 69; *EI*², s.v. Khuttalān (C. E. Bosworth).

370. An important town in al-Jibāl, known in earliest Islamic times as Māh al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 545–46; Le Strange, Lands, 189, 227; Schwarz, op. cit., 473 ff.; Barthold, Historical Geography, 207–8; *EI*², s.v. Dīnawar (L. Lockhart).

371. According to Kitāb al-'uyūn, 398, al-Mu'taṣim killed some seventy commanders in all, the greater part of those participating in the 'Ammūriyyah campaign, by various methods: beheading, strangling, gibbeting on a wooden beam, etc. The result of this mass slaughter must have been a considerable diminution in the Khurāsānian and Transoxanian element among the leading commanders of the army and a corresponding rise in the influence of the Turkish

Al-Muʿtaṣim reached Sāmarrā safely and in the best of circumstances. On that day al-ʿAbbās was publicly called "The Accursed One." and al-Maʾmūn's [other] sons by Sundus[372] were handed over to Aytākh. They were imprisoned in an underground cellar in his house, where they later died.[373] slave element, a trend accentuated a year or so later by the arrest and condemnation of the Iranian al-Afshīn (Ṭabarī, III, 1303–13, 1314–18 [pp. 179–93, 195–200, below]). See also Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 492–93; Herzfeld, op. cit., 144.

[1268] In this year, in Shawwāl (August–September 838), Isḥaq b. Ibrāhīm [al-Muṣʿabī][374] was wounded by one of his servants (or: eunuchs, khādim).[375]

In this year Muḥammad b. Dāwūd led the Pilgrimage.[376]

---

372. This name literally means "fine silk brocade," the sort of name one would expect a slave concubine to have. The sons are named by Azdī, op. cit.: Hārūn, Aḥmad, ʿĪsā, and Ismāʿīl.

373. According to Ṭabarī, III, 1383, Aytākh took charge of executions for al-Muʿtaṣim and al-Wāthiq, and many important prisoners were committed to his charge. For the other primary sources on the conspiracy around al-ʿAbbās and its aftermath, see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 581–82 (with several details not in Ṭabarī); Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 136–37 = par. 2818; Azdī, op. cit., 427–28; Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 395–98; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 489–93. See also Vasiliev, Byzance, 166–67.

374. I.e., the governor of Baghdad; see p. 3 n. 8, above.

375. The general term khādim "servant" was extensively used in this period as a euphemism for such blunter terms as khaṣī and majbūb, as has been emphasized and documented in great detail by Ayalon, Military Reforms, 3–4, 42–43; idem, "On the Eunuchs in Islam," 74–89; and *EI*², s.v. Khaṣī. I. In the Central Islamic Lands (Ch. Pellat).

376. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 787; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 494; but, according to Azdī, it was ʿAlī b. Dāwūd al-Hāshimī who led this rite.

The Events of the Year

224

(NOVEMBER 23, 838–NOVEMBER 11, 839)

These included the open rebellion of Māzyār b. Qārin b. Wandāhurmuz[377] in Ṭabaristān against al-Muʿtaṣim and his warfare against the people of the plain and the chief towns there.[378]

---

377. On the etymology of the name Māzyār, see Justi, op. cit., 201–2; and Marquart, Untersuchungen, II, 56 and n. 4: "helper, friend of Māhīzad"; cf. the form Māyazdyār in Balādhurī, op. cit., 134, 339–40.

378. The roots of this episode lay in the complex family rivalries in the petty Caspian principalities but became entangled with tensions within the caliphate from the time of al-Maʾmūn and his minister al-Faḍl b. Sahl, on one side, and the Ṭāhirids, on the other. Essentially, it involved the Qārinid family, local rulers in the mountainous inland parts of Ṭabaristān, and their rivals in the Elburz Mountains region, the Bāduspānids and Bāwandids of Jabal Sharwīn. The Qārinids first appear in history, as opposed to legend, with the revolt of Māzyār's grandfather Wandād-Hurmuzd against the Muslim tax collectors of al-Mahdī in 165 (781–82). Qārin succeeded his father at some point during al-Maʾmūn's reign and was then succeeded, after only a short reign, apparently toward the end of al-Maʾmūn's caliphate, by his own son Māzyār. The Qārinid domains were at this time shrinking under pressure from the neighboring Bāwandid prince Shahriyār. At one point Māzyār had to flee Ṭabaristān altogether and take refuge at al-Maʾmūn's court, where he became a Muslim, in effect a client of al-Faḍl b. Sahl, and the first of his line to embrace the Islamic faith. He assumed the name of Abū al-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. Qārin and the title "Mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful." Māzyār's fortunes now began to revive. He defeated the Bāwandids and

The Reason for Māzyār's Open Rebellion against al-Muʿtaṣim and His Severe Measures with the People of the Plain

It has been mentioned[379] that the reason for that was that Māzyār b. Qārin had an antipathy toward the house of Ṭāhir and would refuse to hand over the land tax (kharāj) to the Ṭāhirids (i.e., through their intermediacy). Al-Muʿtaṣim would write to him, ordering him to convey the taxation to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, and Māzyār would say, "I won't convey it to him, but I will convey it [directly] to the Commander of the Faithful." So, when al-Māzyār brought the taxation to him, al-Muʿtaṣim would direct one of his sought to extend his authority, by oppressive and brutal methods, into the coastal plain of Ṭabaristān, with its centers at Āmul and Sāriyah. First al-Maʾmūn and then al-Muʿtaṣim confirmed him in his position as Ispahbadh, or prince, of Ṭabaristān, and Māzyār was thus able to adopt grandiloquent titles (see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 582; Ṭabarī, III, 1298 [p. 172, below]). He became more and more tyrannical and independent, maltreating both the Muslim population of the coastal towns and the Zoroastrian dihqān class of landowners. He refused, as Ṭabarī here details, to send the land tax of Ṭabaristān to the Caliph via his family's ancient rivals the Ṭāhirids, who, as governors of Khurāsān, were at least nominally his suzerains; he insisted on sending it directly to Iraq. Finally, he revolted against the central government.

---

The primary sources for Māzyār's earlier career and his revolt are Balādhurī, op. cit., 339–40; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrikh, II, 582–83; Ṭabarī's account here; Ibn al-Faqīh, Mukhtaṣar Kitāb al-buldān, 305–7, trans., 362–63; and Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 137–39 = pars. 2819–22 (followed by Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 399–403, and Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 495–505 (but totally omitted in Ṭabarī, trans. Balʿamī). From a somewhat later date the local chronicles of the Caspian region include Ibn Isfandiyār, op. cit., 145–57, and Ẓahīr al-Dīn Marʿashī, Taʾrikh-i Ṭabaristān, 114–18, 231.

Secondary sources include Rabino di Borgomale, "Les dynasties du Māzandarān," 408–9; Sadighi, op. cit., 290–303 (mainly on Māzyār's part in al-Afshīn's trial but pointing out, 301–2 n. 4, that Ṭabarī's account of Māzyār's revolt includes material from four sources of varying reliability plus two short fragments, unimportant but with some extra details); E. M. Wright, op. cit., 125; Rekaya, "Māzyār"; idem, "La place des provinces" (stressing that Māzyār's uprising was not an anti-Islamic movement of Iranian socioreligious protest against the incoming Arabs but rather a familiar early Islamic type of rebellion by a provincial governor against the central government in distant Iraq, there being no doubt about Māzyār's continued adherence to the Islamic faith); Mottahedeh, op. cit., 75–76; Bosworth, "Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffārids," 100; Madelung, "Minor Dynasties," 204–5; Scarcia Amoretti, op. cit., 506; Frye, Golden Age, 116–117; Kabbi, op. cit., 253–57; EI[1], s.v. Māzyār (V. Minorsky); EI[2], s.v. Ḳārinids (M. Rekaya).

379. This short section, from an unnamed authority, at III, 1267–68, is the first of the sources drawn upon by Ṭabarī for his account of the revolt.

own officials, as soon as the money should reach Hamadhān, to collect the whole of it together and hand it over to 'Abdallāh b. Tāhir's representative, so that the latter might take it back to Khurāsān.[380] This was his procedure for a complete run of several years, with Māzyār showing his detestation of the house of Ṭāhir until the affair between them grew serious.

From time to time al-Afshīn used to hear talk from al-Mu'taṣim, indicating that he would like to remove the Ṭāhirids from Khurāsān.[381] When al-Afshīn had overcome Bābak and had secured in al-Mu'taṣim's counsels a position such that no one had [1269] precedence before him, he came to covet the governorship of Khurāsān. He got news of Māzyār's antipathy toward the Ṭāhirids and hoped that it would become a reason for removing 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. He therefore began intriguing by means of letters to al-Māzyār,[382] endeavoring to win him over by an appeal to fellow feelings as a Persian of noble birth and status (yastamīluhu

380. This compromise perhaps indicates that the Caliph was somewhat unwilling to throw his weight entirely behind the authority of the Ṭāhirids in Khurāsān, as would follow from the anti-Ṭāhirid talk attributed below to al-Mu'taṣim; see, further, n. 381, below.

381. That a deep distrust and hostility existed between al-Mu'taṣim and 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir became something of an idée fixe in subsequent adab works (see, e.g., the anecdote about an exchange of letters between the two in Ibrāhīm al-Bayhaqī, op. cit., ed. Schwally, 477–78 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 196–97, and the episode in Shābushtī, Kitāb al-diyārāt, 139–40, related on the authority of al-Faḍl b. Marwān (cf. G. Rothstein, "Zu aš-Šābuštī's Bericht," 164) and in the work of later historians (e.g., the Ghaznavid historian Gardīzī's statement, op. cit., ed. Ḥabībī, 136 = ed. Nāẓim, 7, that al-Mu'taṣim plotted to poison 'Abdallāh, who had slighted him during al-Ma'mūn's reign). Barthold, Turkestan, 208–9, accepted such stories as true and attributed to the Caliph a deep hatred for 'Abdallāh. The whole question is considered at length by Kaabi, op. cit., 247–53, who suggests that it was in the nature of things for the Caliph to be suspicious of the Ṭāhirids' immense power in both Iraq and Khurāsān and that, in the light of these suspicions, the stories in the sources must contain some truth. Certainly 'Abdallāh never left his governorate to come to the caliphal court (a reluctance prominently mentioned in the stories about their mutual coolness). But Kaabi points out that in practice both sides acted with prudence and restraint. Al-Mu'taṣim recognized the fundamental importance of a well-governed, prosperous Khurāsān for the stability of his caliphate, while 'Abdallāh never displayed any sign of insubordination or desire for independence, fully acknowledging his dependence on the Caliph, for example, by forwarding the tribute, including Turkish military slaves, regularly to the capital in Iraq.

382. As is already apparent, the name Māzyār sometimes appears with and sometimes without the Arabic definite article.

bi-al-dahqanah), telling him of his (al-Afshīn's) affection for him and that he had been promised the governorship of Khurāsān. This induced al-Māzyār to stop delivering the taxation due from him to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.[383]

ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, for his part, kept continually dispatching letters about al-Māzyār to al-Muʿtaṣim until he made the latter fearful and angry about him.[384] This impelled al-Māzyār to rise up in rebellion and withhold taxation.[385] He took up a firm position in the mountains of Ṭabaristān and its outlying fringes, which was making al-Afshīn rejoice and leading him to covet the province. Al-Muʿtaṣim thereupon wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, ordering him to make war upon Māzyār, while al-Afshīn wrote to al-Māzyār ordering him to make war on ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and telling him that he would favorably represent his best interests at al-Muʿtaṣim's court.[386] Al-Māzyār would stand up against ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and resist him, to the point that al-Muʿtaṣim

---

383. See Rekaya, "Māzyār," 159–61. Despite the doubts thrown by Rekaya on the translation of the phrase yastamīluhu bi-al-dahqanah, given here and earlier by Minorsky, it still seems preferable to his "pour attirer (par la promesse de lui consentir la qualité de) dihqān." Such a promise would hold nothing fresh for Māzyār, already virtually an independent ruler in Ṭabaristān.

384. For ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's role in the affair of Māzyār, see Kaabi, op. cit., 253–55, who emphasizes that the dispute between Māzyār and ʿAbdallāh was purely political and secular in origin; Māzyār was attempting to establish for himself a position in the Caspian provinces analogous to that of ʿAbdallāh in Khurāsān. A further factor was the earlier hostility between the Ṭāhirids and Sahlids, Māzyār having a connection with the latter (see n. 378, above).

385. Kafara wa-ghadara, in the words of Balādhurī, op. cit., 339, who places the event six years and a few months after al-Muʿtaṣim's accession, i.e., in 224; but the rebellion may well have begun earlier, and Māzyār seems to have made his preparation in 223 (837–38). The use of kafara does not imply Māzyār's apostasy from Islam, and no other early sources state this. The verb is used here in its earliest signification, "to show ingratitude" > "to rebel." Only the fifth (eleventh)-century historian Gardīzī, op. cit., ed. Nāẓim, 8 = ed. Ḥabībī, 136–37, explicitly attributes to Māzyār the doctrines of Bābak and the adoption of red garments like those of the Khurramiyyah, and the seventh (thirteenth)-century source of Ibn Isfandiyār, op. cit., 153, speaks of Māzyār's demolition of mosques in the coastal region of Ṭabaristān and his grant of public offices to Zoroastrians.

386. That al-Afshīn urged Māzyār on in his rebellion is repeated by Ṭabarī at III, 1305 (p. 182, below). As Rekaya points out, in the words exchanged at al-Afshīn's trial between him and Māzyār, reported by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 583, Māzyār categorically avers that al-Afshīn had never corresponded with him, though acknowledging that his steward or agent (wakīl) had on occasion been kindly received by al-Afshīn.

would of necessity have to send him and others to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir (i.e., to take the situation in hand and restore order).

It has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ al-Thaqafī al-Ṭabarī[387] that, when al-Māzyār resolved on rebellion, he summoned his people to pledge allegiance. This they pledged to him, but unwillingly, so he took hostages from them and imprisoned them in the Iṣbahbadh's fortress (burj). He also ordered the peasant cultivators on the estates to rise up against the owners of those estates and to plunder their wealth.[388] Al-Māzyār had [previously] been corresponding with Bābak, egging him on and offering him assistance. Hence, when al-Muʿtaṣim had completed his campaign against Bābak and was free, he let it become widespread among the people that the Commander of the Faithful planned to travel to Qarmāsīn[389] and was sending al-Afshīn to al-Rayy[390] to combat Māzyār.[391] [1270]

387. This account, at III, 1269–82, 1282–93, is the second and longest of the four given by Ṭabarī: highly detailed, circumstantial, and apparently worthy of credence; cf. Sadighi, op. cit., 301 n. 4. Minorsky, in EI[1], s.v. Māzyār in the bibliography, questioned whether the rāwī Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ might not be a kinsman of the Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ who became governor of Ṭabaristān, Rūyān, and Dunbāwand under al-Maʾmūn in 207 (822–23) but died in 211 (826–27); he was succeeded there by his son Muḥammad (Ṭabarī, III, 1066, 1098).

388. This item of information has been used by certain modern writers to support the assertion that Māzyār's revolt was rooted in the ancient Iranian customs and ways of thought, aiming at a restoration of past glories and involving a kind of primitive communism and a hatred of the landowning classes similar to that of the Mazdakites in Sāsānid times. Rekaya ("Māzyār," 157–68; "La place des provinces," 145–46) has refuted this thesis, pointing out that what we have here is simply a policy on the part of Māzyār to eliminate his political opponents, those opposed to the extension of his arbitrary power, in which he used whatever means came to hand. Minorsky noted that Māzyār's violence and tyranny against all opposition in Ṭabaristān remained proverbial in the time of Ẓahīr al-Dīn Marʿashī (ninth [fifteenth] century); EI[1], s.v. Māzyār, and cf. Ibn Isfandiyār, op. cit., 152, and Marʿashī, op. cit., 118.

389. The town of al-Jibāl more recently known as Kirmānshāh. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 330–31; Le Strange, Lands, 186–88; Schwarz, op. cit., 480–82; Barthold, Historical Geography, 195–198; EI[2], s.v. Kirmānshāh (A. K. S. Lambton).

390. A town in northern Persia on the highroad to Khurāsān, commanding the approaches to Ṭabaristān and Gurgān; it lay just south of modern Tehran. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 116–21; Le Strange, Lands, 214–17; Schwarz, op. cit., 740–81; Barthold, Historical Geography, 122–26; EI[1], s.v. Raiy (V. Minorsky).

391. The question whether there had really been any collusion between Bābak in Ādharbayjān and Arrān, on one hand, and Māzyār in Ṭabaristān, on the other, has aroused the interest of modern historians. Some recent Persian scholars have

When al-Māzyār heard about the people being thrown into a state of alarm through hearing news of that, he ordered that a cadastral survey[392] be made of the land, except for [the lands of] those who came to an agreement for paying taxation on their estates at a rate three times a [normal] tithe; action would be taken against anyone who refused to come to such an agreement and an increased assessment, and never a diminished one, levied against him.[393] Then he composed a letter to the official of his responsible for collecting the land tax, this official being a man called Shādhān b. al-Faḍl, the text of which was as follows:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.[394] Information has been continually reaching us, and we have given it full credence, on the subject of what foolish people in Khurāsān and Ṭabaristān are disquietingly spreading concerning us, the [false] reports that they are engendering against us, and the assumed the existence of a vast, anti-Arab conspiracy, involving not only Bābak but also the Byzantine Emperor Theophilus (see Ṭabarī, III, 1234–35 [p. 94 and n. 266, above]) and al-Afshīn, echoing the words, put into Māzyār's mouth at the time of his capture by 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir by the later historian Ibn Isfandiyār, op. cit., 155, that for many years he and Bābak and Afshīn Ḥaydar b. Kāwūs (read thus for "Afshīn and Ḥaydar b. Kāwūs" in Ibn Isfandiyār's text) had been plotting the downfall of the Arabs and the restoration of the ancient Persian empire. This seems even more unlikely than the possibility of limited contact between Bābak and Māzyār, for which there is no solid evidence. Sadighi's conclusion, op. cit., 297 ff., was that all such accusations are highly dubious (even if the idea of a revival of former Persian glories does seem to have been in circulation at the popular level in some regions), affirmed by Rekaya, "Māzyār."

---

What does seem true is what Ṭabarī states here: that al-Afshīn coveted the government of Khurāsān and, having acquired an access of prestige through the capture of Bābak and through his part in the campaign against 'Ammūriyyah and the Greeks, thought that, if 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir became embroiled in the revolt of Māzyār over a long period of time and proved unable to suppress it, al-Afshīn himself would then be able to put himself forward to the Caliph as the one person in the empire who could save the situation in the east (cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1305 [p. 182, below]).

392. I.e., a misāḥah, for which term see F. Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation, 108 ff., and *EI*², s.v. Misāḥa. 3. As a Technical Financial Term (Ed.).

393. Māzyār was clearly boosting his financial resources in preparation for a long war against the Ṭāhirids.

394. One would not expect Māzyār to begin his letter with the basmalah if he had in fact apostatized from Islam.

violent feeling against our dynasty and the critical attacks on our system of government that they are inciting their local leaders to nurture, the correspondence with our enemies, the expectation of civil strife, and the awaiting of changes of fortune among us, thereby denying favors [received from us] and making little of the security, tranquility, ease of life and riches that God has bestowed on them in preference [to others].

No commander or intelligence officer[395] comes to al-Rayy, nor does any envoy, young or old, reach us without saying thus-and-thus, and these foolish people stretch out their necks (i.e., hasten) toward him and engage at length in their tales to which God has already given the lie and their fanciful desires (i.e., for a forthcoming upheaval), which He has already frustrated time after time. The first [disappointment] does not deter them from indulging in the second, nor does fear of God or ordinary apprehension scare them away from that. All this we have patiently overlooked and have swallowed its bitterness to spare the whole of them and in furtherance of their welfare and security. But our desire to spare them has only increased them in obstinacy, and our refraining from punishing them has only incited them more. If we delay the process of the perception of the land tax (iftitāḥ al-kharāj)[396] out of consideration and tenderness for them, they say, "[He—i.e., the tax collector—has been] dismissed," and, if we hasten to begin the process, they say "[He needs it urgently] for some emergency that has arisen." They are not restrained by violence if we act [1271] roughly or by kindness if we act generously. But God is sufficient for us, and He is our patron; upon Him we repose our trust and to Him we return repeatedly.

We have already ordered a letter to be written to the

---

395. For wa-lā mushrif, ms. O and the Cairo edition, X, 80, offer wa-lā musharriq wa-mugharrib "no traveler making his way eastward or making his way westward."

396. I.e., the opening of the financial year, a term of the financial dīwāns, see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī," 134–35.

tax collector (bundār)[397] of Āmul[398] and to that of al-Rūyān[399] concerning the completion of the process of collecting the land tax (istighlāq al-kharāj)[400] in their respective districts, and we have granted them a delay in this until the end of the month of Tīr-Māh.[401] Take cognizance of that, exact the amount of taxation due to you, and raise what has been imposed on the people of your district in its entirety; do not let the month of Tīr-Māh reach its close with a single dirham outstanding to you, for if you turn away from that to doing something else your recompense from us will inevitably be gibbeting. So watch out for yourself, protect your own life's blood, and exert yourself diligently in your work. Forward your letter to al-ʿAbbās,[402] and beware of making excuses.[403] Report on the celerity and diligence with which you are proceeding, for we have been hoping that this procedure will constitute something that will distract them from spreading false news and act as a deterrent from putting off [payment of the required tax].

In recent days they have bruited abroad the rumor that the Commander of the Faithful—may God grant him

---

397. This Persian term (literally, "one who possesses a firm basis") had come by Seljuq times to apply generally to the tax collector = Arabic ʿāmil but seems originally to have designated commercial agents or speculators who purchased items of the land tax collected in kind. See Glossarium, CXLI-CXLII; BGA IV, 194; Løkkegaard, op. cit., 244 n. 110.

398. The main town of the coastal plain of Ṭabaristān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 57–58; Le Strange, Lands, 370; Barthold, Historical Geography, 238–42; *EI*², s.v. Āmul (L. Lockhart).

399. The westernmost district of Ṭabaristān. See Le Strange, Lands, 373–74; Barthold, Historical Geography, 233–34.

400. Again a technical financial term, often in the form ighlāq (literally, "closing, completing") al-kharāj; see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī," 135.

401. I.e., the fourth month of the Persian solar calendar, corresponding to late June–early and middle July. The equivalent month in the Avestan calendar is named after Tishtrya; and cf. Armenian Trē (Marquart, Untersuchungen, 1, 64 and n. 55).

402. Note i by the editor suggests that this person may be the Abū Ṣāliḥ Sarkhāstān named later as Māzyār's deputy in Sāriyah.

403. For al-taʿdhīr, the editor's reading of an ambiguous ductus in the mss., the Cairo edition, IX, 82, has al-taghrīr "(beware of) rashly exposing yourself to destruction."

nobility!—is going to Qarmāsīn and is sending al-Afshīn to al-Rayy. By my life, if indeed he—may God grant him strength!—does that, it is one thing by means of which God will grant us joy, will provide us with pleasure through his company with us, will enlarge the hope for what we have in the past been accustomed to enjoy of his benefits and favor, and will humble both his enemies and our own enemies. For he—may God grant him nobility!—will certainly not neglect his affairs or abandon his frontier districts and his personal attention to the management of the outlying provinces of his empire simply on account of alarmist reports spread about his tax collectors and slanderous talk about his close associates. Nor will he—may God grant him nobility!—send out his army when he sends it out, nor will he dispatch his commanders, when he dispatches them, except against a rebel. [1272]

Accordingly, read out this letter of ours to the land-tax collectors who are with you, in order that those of them who are present may convey it to those who are absent. Speak to them in harsh terms about exacting fully the taxation, and as for he who intends to break off short the work of levying it (kasrihi),[404] let him openly reveal his shortcomings in order that God may bring down on his head what He has brought down [in the past] on his likes. They have an example in the various imposts liable from the people of Jurjān,[405] al-Rayy, and the adjoining districts. The caliphs lightened the land tax due from them, and the obligation to pay the taxes normally raised (al-rafā'i')[406] was removed from them only because of the need that they (the people of Jurjān, etc.) had to combat

404. Again a technical financial term, with the cognate form in māl munkasir, relating to tax arrears that, for one reason or another, could not be collected and had to be written off; see Bosworth, "Abū 'Abdallāh al-Khwārazmī," 136.

405. Persian Gurgān, classical Hyrcania, the region and also its main town, at the southeastern corner of the Caspian Sea. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 119–22; Le Strange, Lands, 376–81; Barthold, Historical Geography, 115; *EI*², s.v. Gurgān (R. Hartmann-[J. A. Boyle]).

406. For this term, see Glossarium, CCLVII; in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 88, rufi'at 'anhum is misinterpreted as "raised revenue from them."

the mountain peoples and because of the incursions of the errant Daylamīs;[407] but now God has relieved the Commander of the Faithful—may God exalt him in might!—of all that and has constituted the mountain peoples and the Daylamīs into a force of troops and auxiliaries.[408] God is worthy of praise!

He related: When al-Māzyār's letter reached Shādhān b. al-Faḍl, his collector of the land tax, the latter demanded the tax from the people and collected the whole of it within a space of two months, whereas it used previously to be collected in twelve months, a third every four months.

Then a man called ʿAlī b. Yazdād al-ʿAṭṭār, who was one of the group of persons from whom a hostage had been taken, fled and abandoned al-Māzyār's territory. Abū Ṣāliḥ Sarkhāstān,[409] al-Māzyār's deputy over Sāriyah,[410] was informed of that. He assembled the leading citizens of the town of Sāriyah and began to upbraid them, saying, "How can the king repose any confidence in you, and how can he trust you when this ʿAlī b. Yazdād was one of those who had given his oath, pledged his allegiance, and handed over a hostage but has now broken his oath, departed, and left his hostage behind, while you yourselves are not being true to your pledges and not really condemning this breach of faith and violation of an oath? How can the king trust you, and how can he [1273] treat you again as you will like?" One of them replied, "We'll kill

407. For the first three centuries or so of Islam, the Caspian coast and the lands to the south of the Elburz range suffered from the incursions of the Daylamīs, predatory mountain people of the western Elburz region who were still pagans; they were converted to Shīʿī Islam by Ḥasanid ʿAlid duʿāt, or missionaries, toward the end of the third (ninth) century. See *EI*², s.v. Daylam (V. Minorsky).

408. Ibn al-Faqīh, op cit., 306, trans., 362–63, speaks of Māzyār's earlier desire to implant Islam in Daylam and of a successful expedition thither by his commander al-Surrī (see Ṭabarī, III, 1274 [p. 147 and n. 417, below]). This success can only have been temporary, as the real Islamization of Daylam came later; see n. 407, above.

409. Somewhat dubiously interpreted by Justi, op. cit., 277, 289, and Marquart, Untersuchungen, II, 56 n. 5, as meaning "he whose desire is set upon the ruler"; but the element khʷāst seems to mean here "seek (out)."

410. Beside Āmul the other main town of the Ṭabaristān coastal plain, at times alternating with Āmul as the administrative center of the province. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 170–71; Le Strange, Lands, 370, 375; Barthold, Historical Geography, 238–39; *EI*¹, s.v. Sārī (Cl. Huart).

the hostage so that no one else will flee again." Sarkhāstān asked them, "Will you really do that?" They replied, "Yes!" whereupon he wrote to the custodian of the hostages and ordered him to send al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Yazdād, who was hostage for his father[ʾs good behavior]. But, when they brought him to Sāriyah, the people repented of what they had said to Abū Ṣāliḥ and began to turn violently against the person who had advised killing him. Sarkhāstān then gathered them all together, having previously had the hostage brought in, and addressed them, "Verily, you guaranteed to perform a certain thing; here is the hostage [in question], so put him to death now!" However, ʿAbd al-Karīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Kātib said, "May God guide you in an upright way! [In the past] you granted a delay of two months to those who abandoned this land. Regarding this hostage who is now before you, we ask you to grant him a respite of two months [before killing him]. Then if his father comes back [well and good]; if not you can put into effect your will regarding him."

He related: Sarkhāstān became angry with the people. He summoned the commander of his personal guard, a man called Rustam b. Bārūyah, and ordered him to gibbet the youth. This last asked him to grant him leave to perform two rakʿahs.[411] He gave him permission, but the youth took a long time over his act of worship, for he was trembling with fear, and a palm trunk had already been erected for his execution. They therefore dragged the youth from his worship and stretched him on the gibbet, tying his throat round it until he was strangled and expired on it.

[After this] Sarkhāstān ordered the people of the town of Sāriyah to go forth to Āmul, and he ordered the commanders of the garrisons to summon the people of the trenches (ahl al-khanādiq) (?),[412] both Abnāʾ and Arabs, to be present. They were duly brought in, and he proceeded with the people of Sāriyah to Āmul, saying to them, "I wish to call you to bear witness for the people of Āmul, and the people of Āmul as witnesses for you,

411. I.e., the middle part of the ṣalāt, or worship, from the recitation of the Fātiḥah to the second sujūd or prostration, a certain number of rakʿahs making up the whole ṣalāt; see EI[1], s.v. Ṣalāt (A. J. Wensinck).

412. The reference here is obscure, unless it refers to the defensive works that the inhabitants of the lowland settlements had been constructing to protect themselves.

and I will restore your estates and wealth; if then you stick to obedience and to providing good counsel, we shall from our own resources increase to you twofold what we [previously] took from [1274] you." When they reached Āmul he gathered them together at the palace of al-Khalīl b. Wandāsfajān,[413] and made the people of Sāriyah go to one side apart from the rest, and he placed al-Lawzajān (?)[414] in charge of them. He wrote down the names of all the people of Āmul until not a single one of their names was hidden from him, and after that he passed them in review, according to their names, until they were all gathered together and not one of them had been left behind. Armed men surrounded them, and they were all paraded in ranks, he having appointed over each one two armed guards. He ordered the man in charge of them to cut off the head of anyone who held back in walking,[415] and the man drove them along with their hands pinioned behind their backs until he brought them to a mountain called Hurmuzdābādh,[416] eight farsakhs from Āmul and eight farsakhs from the town of Sāriyah. There he put them in irons and imprisoned them. They amounted to a total of 20,000. This happened in the year 225 (839/840), according to what has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ, but other relaters of historical traditions and a number of persons who were alive at that time state that it happened in 224 (838/839), and I believe that the latter is more likely to be correct, since the killing of Māzyār took place in 225 and the measures that he took against the people of Ṭabaristān were one year previous to that.

The narrative returns to the story of Māzyār and what he did to the people of Āmul, according to what has been mentioned from

---

413. Following Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIV, and Ibn al-Faqīh, op. cit., 305 and n. 1, trans., 362. The original Middle Persian form of this name is Windād-ispān, literally, "having attained peace, tranquility"; see Justi, op. cit., 370.

414. Reading of this name dubious.

415. Kāʿa ʿan al-mashy, literally, "walked on one side of the foot." The verb kāʿa means basically "to walk on its knuckles (of a dog)"; see WbKAS, I, 437–38.

416. This was the site of Māzyār's main stronghold; see Ṭabarī, III, 1291–92 [p. 165, below]. From Ṭabarī's account of subsequent operations in the area, III, 1289–92, Minorsky concluded that it must have lain in the valley of the Tālār river, or river of ʿAlīābād; see EI[2], s.v. Māzandarān (V. Minorsky-[C. E. Bosworth]).

Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ. He related: Māzyār wrote to al-Durrī[417] to do the same thing with the leading men of the Arabs and the Abnā' who were with him at Muzn,[418] and he placed them in irons, imprisoned them, and appointed guards over them in their prison.

When Māzyār became assured of his position and his power and his domination of the people became firmly established, he [1275] gathered together his followers and ordered Sarkhāstān to demolish the walls of the town of Āmul. Sarkhāstān accordingly did this, to the accompaniment of music from drums and flutes, and then proceeded to the town of Sāriyah and did the same there. Then Māzyār sent his brother Qūhyār to the town of Ṭamīs,[419] which is situated in the province of Ṭabaristān on the frontier of Jurjān, and he demolished its walls and its inner madīnah[420] and allowed its people to be taken as lawful spoil. Those who were able fled, but others suffered in the general calamity. After that Sarkhāstān set out for Ṭamīs, and Qūhyār came back from it and then joined his brother al-Māzyār. Sarkhāstān built a wall from Ṭamīs to the [Caspian] Sea and made it stretch out into the sea for a distance of three miles (or: its extension into the sea amounted to a distance of three miles). The Persian emperors had originally constructed this wall between themselves and the Turks because in their time the Turks used to raid the people of Ṭabaristān. Sarkhāstān encamped with his forces at Ṭamīs; he surrounded it with a secure trench and guard towers, provided it with a strong gate, and posted trustworthy men there as custodians.[421]

---

417. This name appears in Ibn al-Faqīh, op. cit., 306, trans., 363, as al-Surrī, previously sent by Māzyār against the Daylamīs; see p. 144 n. 408, above.

418. Amending the text's Marw in accordance with Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIV, and Ibn al-Faqīh, op cit., 305, 306; this is also the reading of the Cairo edition, IX, 100. According to Ibn al-Faqīh, op cit., 305–7, trans., 362–63, and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 122, it was a place from which raids were launched into pagan Daylam by the Muslim governors.

419. On this place, see n. 421, below.

420. I.e., the core area of a town, that part of it around the citadel (qal'ah, arg) containing the markets, Friday mosque, government offices, etc. (Persian shahrastān), as opposed to the surrounding suburbs (rabaḍ, bīrūn), on the frequent tripartite structure of eastern Islamic towns, see Barthold, Turkestan, 78.

421. Ṭamīs[ah], modern Tammīshah, lies on the eastern border of Ṭabaristān adjoining Jurjān; according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 41, the Emperor Khusraw Anūshirwān built a causeway there to carry the highway to Jurjān and Khurāsān

The people of Jurjān grew apprehensive and feared for their property and their town, and small group of them fled to Naysābūr.[422] The news reached ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and al-Muʿtaṣim, so the former dispatched against Māzyār his paternal uncle al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab,[423] together with a powerful army with which to secure Jurjān. He ordered him to make his camp at the trench; hence al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn encamped at those defenses that Sarkhāstān had constructed, just the width of the trench separating the two armies. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir further dispatched Ḥayyān b. Jabalah[424] with 4,000 men to Qūmis,[425] where he made his camp on the edge of the mountains over the marshes facing the Caspian; see also Le Strange, Lands, 375, and Barthold, Historical Geography, 232, 238 n. 49. There were certainly walls here in Sāsānid times, part of a system of man-made defenses intended to protect or to block points of entrance into Persia against invading armies, nomadic hordes, etc.; other such defenses were to be found along the Iraqi desert fringes, in the Caucasus, and in Jurjān. The Tammīshah walls, extending into the Caspian, were probably a second line of defense behind those in Jurjān farther east. Anūshirwān is popularly associated with the construction of various walls but may have simply repaired or reconstructed them. The ancient Tammīshah walls were demolished by Māzyār but then rebuilt by his commander Sarkhāstān. Recent excavations at the site have yielded finds of Kushan and Kushano-Sāsānid provenance, clearly indicating early settlement in the area. See Marquart, Untersuchungen, II, 56; A. D. H. Bivar and G. Fehérvári, "The Walls of Tammīsha," 35–50; Frye, "Sasanian System of Walls," 13–14.
[1276] of Sharwīn. For his part, al-Muʿtaṣim sent from his headquarters

---

422. Ibn Isfandiyār, op cit., trans. 153–54 (also Kaabi, op cit., I, 254, and II, 81–83), gives the text of an Arabic qaṣīdah by a certain Abū al-Qāsim Hārūn b. Muḥammad, which was addressed to the Caliph al-Muʿtaṣim on behalf of the people of Āmul, complaining of Māzyār's tyranny and seeking deliverance from the hands of ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.

423. I.e., the brother of the first Ṭāhirid governor of Khurāsān, Ṭāhir Dhū al-Yamīnayn and uncle of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Muṣʿabī, governor of Baghdad (on whom see p. 3 n. 8, above). In the past there had been ill feeling over the succession in Khurāsān after Ṭāhir's death, with a brief rebellion by al-Ḥasan in Kirmān in 208 (823–24), for which, however, he was pardoned; see Ṭabarī, III, 1066. After Māzyār was defeated, al-Ḥasan remained in that office till his death in 231 (846); see Ṭabarī, III, 1357. On al-Ḥasan, see Nafisī, Taʾrīkh-i khāndān-i Ṭāhirī, 29–30 (giving the date of his death as 231 [845–46]; the present writer has not been able to find this event exactly dated thus in the text of Marʿashī as edited by Shāyān); Kaabi, op. cit., I, 189, 254–55, 293, 296.

424. Described in Ṭabarī, III, 1282 (p. 156, below), as a mawlā of ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's.

425. The small province (classical Komisēnē) the center of which was Dāmghān, lying to the southeast of the Elburz range along the Khurāsān highway.

Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm's brother, with a large army, attaching to him the commander al-Ḥasan b. Qārin al-Ṭabarī[426] and the force of Ṭabarī troops who were at court. He also sent Manṣūr b. al-Ḥasan Hār, the lord of Dunbāwand,[427] to the city of al-Rayy that he might enter Ṭabaristān from the direction of al-Rayy, and he despatched Abū al-Sāj [Dīwdād] to al-Lāriz[428] and Dunbāwand.

When the cavalry surrounded al-Māzyār from every side he sent at that point Ibrāhīm b. Mihrān,[429] the commander of his police, and 'Alī b. Rabban al-Kātib al-Naṣrānī,[430] together with the deputy of the commander of the guard,[431] to the people of the towns [of Āmul and Sāriyah] who had been imprisoned by him, [saying], "The [Arab] cavalry have crept up round me on every side. I imprisoned you only so that this fellow"—he meant al-Mu'taṣim—"might make overtures to me on your behalf; but

---

See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 414–15; Le Strange, Lands, 364–68; Schwarz, op. cit., 809–28; Barthold, Historical Geography, 87, 121; *EI*², s.v. Ḳūmis (C. E. Bosworth).

426. Probably a member of the Bāwandid family, a son of Qārin, himself son of Sharwīn b. Surkhāb, who had died in al-Ma'mūn's reign. See Justi, op. cit., 431; Rabino di Borgomale, "Les dynasties du Māzandarān," 412.

427. The region of Ṭabaristān around the highest point of the Elburz chain, Mount Demavend. See Le Strange, Lands, 371; Schwarz, op. cit., 785–92; *EI*², s.v. Damāwand (M. Streck).

428. Variously described as a town of al-Rūyān (Ibn al-Faqīh, op.cit., 303, trans., 359) and as a village with a citadel near Āmul (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 7). See also *EI*², s.v. Lār and Lāridjān (J. Calmard).

429. Later described (in Ṭabarī, III, 1540, year 251 [865]) as the owner of a house in Sāmarrā and called al-Naṣrānī al-'Askarī—the latter presumably because, although Christians were commonly secretaries and financial officials, it was less common that they should be military men. After the collapse of Māzyār's cause Ibrāhīm must have entered the caliphal service.

430. 'Alī b. Sahl Rabban, a Nestorian Christian from Khurāsān, subsequently passed into the caliphal service and, under al-Mutawakkil, converted to Islam. It was after this, in ca. 240 (854–55), that he wrote his celebrated defense of his new faith, Kitāb al-dīn wa-al-dawlah; see GAL, S I, 415; GCAL, II, 120; GAS, III, 236–40.

431. The repetition of the whole phrase khalīfat ṣāḥib al-ḥaras shortly afterward (III, 1277 l. 3) inclines one to think that khalīfah here means "deputy," rather than a personal name, as Marin takes it, Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 91. This seems also to be the opinion of the editor of the text here, who, at III, 1277 n. a, suggests, on the basis of ms. C, that the personal name Muḥammad might perhaps be inserted here before the word khalīfah; it is also the opinion of the compiler(s) of the indexes, who do not include this person under the name Khalīfah.

he has not made a move. I have heard that al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf[432] once became angry at the ruler of al-Sind because of a woman of the Muslims who had been captured and taken to al-Sind, to the point that he sent an expedition against that land and expended whole treasuries until he had rescued the woman and returned her to her own city. But this fellow does not care about 20,000 people and is not sending to me anyone to inquire about you! I will certainly not move forward and engage him in warfare while you are in my rear, so hand over to me the land tax for two years, and I will then release you. Those among you who are strong young men I will send forth to battle, and to those who fulfill their promise to me I will return their wealth and possessions, but, for those who fail to keep their promise, I shall have already assessed their blood money. Further, those who are aged men or [1277] feeble I will appoint as guards or doorkeepers."

A man called Mūsā b. Hurmuz al-Zāhid[433]—of whom it was said that he had not drunk water for the previous twenty years—said, "I will hand over to you two years' land tax and assume responsibility for this matter. But the deputy of the commander of the guard said to Aḥmad b. al-Ṣuqayr, "Why don't you speak out, for you used to be the most highly favored of the people in the Ispahbadh's eyes? I used to see you eating with him and lolling back on his cushion, and this was something that the prince did with no one else. Thus you are more suitable for taking charge of this affair than Mūsā." Aḥmad replied, "Mūsā will certainly not be able to assume responsibility for collecting a single dirham. He answered you in this foolish manner only because of the stress that he and all the people are under.[434] If your master had known that we had a single dirham, he would not have imprisoned us; in fact, he imprisoned us only after cleaning us out of all the possessions and treasuries we had. If he seeks to acquire landed estates by means of this wealth, we will 432. The celebrated Umayyad governor of the East (75–95 [694–714]), known for his firm rule over the turbulent Arab tribes of Iraq but also, as here, for his meticulous oversight and care for the welfare of the Muslims. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj b. Yūsuf (A. Dietrich).

---

433. I.e., "the ascetic."

434. Following Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 92, rather than the reading of the editor in n. g, which seems to make less sense in the context.

give it to him." ʿAlī b. Rabban al-Kātib said to him, "The estates belong to the ruler [anyway] and not to you," and Ibrāhīm b. Mihrān added, "I implore you by God, O Abū Muḥammad, not to say this sort of thing!"[435] Aḥmad said to him, "I wasn't saying anything until this fellow spoke to me the words you just heard."

At that point the envoys, accepting the guarantee of Mūsā al-Zāhid, went back and informed al-Māzyār of his undertaking. A group of fiscal agents [suʿāt][436] attached themselves to Mūsā al-Zāhid and said, "So-and-so is capable of paying 10,000, and so-and-so 20,000, more or less"; and they began to appropriate the wealth of those subject to the land tax and of others as well. When this process had gone on for some days Māzyār sent envoys again, demanding the money and seeking fulfillment of what Mūsā al-Zāhid had guaranteed, but he was unable to collect the merest [1278] trace of that or any reliable information about it. The truth of Aḥmad's words was established, and the offense became firmly fixed to him (i.e., to Mūsā al-Zāhid). Al-Māzyār had [actually] realized that the people did not have the wherewithal to pay; he wanted only to make trouble between those liable to the land tax and the merchants and artisans who were not liable to it.[437]

He related: Sarkhāstān had with him a group of vigorous and brave youths whom he had chosen from the sons of commanders[438] and others of the people of Āmul. He gathered together in his own house 260 of those youths whose presence in his vicinity he feared, ostensibly for interrogation purposes. Then 435. Lammā sakatta ʿan hādhā al-kalām; for this sense of lammā after an oath, see W. Wright, op. cit., II, 340A, par. 186 Rem c, and Reckendorf, op. cit., 512, par 262. 12.

436. Sing. sāʿī, literally, "someone who busies himself with an affair," whence in later usage "courier, agent of the barīd or postal service"; see Dozy, Supplément, I, 656. Here it must refer to the agents of the Dīwān who went out into the field personally to collect taxes in money or kind.

437. Again, the implication is that Māzyār was following a policy of encouraging divisiveness and disunity among the various social classes of Ṭabaristān, in order to strengthen his own authoritarian rule.

438. This is the literal translation of abnāʾ al-quwwād, yet it seems clear, from the mention of the Abnāʾ (in the technical sense) just below that what is intended is a reference to the Abnāʾ resident in the towns of Ṭabaristān and regarded, despite their Khurāsānian origin, as hostile to Māzyār, perceived as the representative of purely Iranian feeling; the rendering in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 93, "some officers of the Abnāʾ," thus seems more accurate.

he sent a message to selected cultivators (al-akarah al-mukhtārīn) of the dihqāns (i.e., to the local Persian agrarian population) and told them, "The sympathies of the Abnāʾ are [inevitably] with the Arabs and with the partisans of the ʿAbbāsid régime (al-musawwidah; literally, "the wearers of black"),[439] and I do not feel safe from their treachery and scheming. I have assembled together the suspect persons from among those whose presence I fear, so kill them, in order that you, too, may feel secure and that there may not be in your military forces anyone whose sympathies are in conflict with your own aspirations." At that, he ordered their hands to be pinioned behind them and their handing over to the dihqān cultivators by night, and this was done. They took them to a qanāt[440] thereabouts, then killed them and threw their corpses into the inspection shafts of that qanāt and returned home. But, when they recovered their senses, they regretted what they had done and were filled with fright at it.

When al-Māzyār realized that the people had nothing with which they could pay him, he sent a message to the select group of cultivators—the ones who had killed the 260 youths—and said to them, "I herewith grant to you as lawful spoil the dwellings of the owners of the estates and their womenfolk also, except for any of their daughters who are beautiful maidens,[441] for they are to become the ruler's (i.e., his own) property." He went on to tell [1279] them, "Go to the prison and kill all the owners of the estates first; then after that take possession of the houses and womenfolk that I have bestowed upon you." But the men were too faint hearted to do that. They were stricken with fear and behaved cautiously and did not do what he had ordered them to do.

He related: The men appointed by Sarkhāstān to guard the walls of Āmul used to talk by night with al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab's guard, there being just the width of the trench between 439. See p. 31 n. 120, above.

---

440. I.e., a subterranean irrigation tunnel, which would have vertical shafts at intervals for inspection and cleaning; see EI[2], s.v. Ḳanāt. I. In Iran (A. K. S. Lambton).

441. Jāriyah seems here to have the general sense of "girl, maiden," rather than the more specific sense of "slave girl"; the Arabic lexicographers take it as the female equivalent of ghulām and explain unconvincingly that it is derived from the woman's activity and running about (verb jarā "to run, flow").

them, to the point that they grew to be on familiar terms with each other. Al-Ḥasan's guard and Sarkhāstān's guardians of the wall conspired together for the latter to hand over the walls to the besiegers. They accordingly did that, and al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn's guard entered via that spot to Sarkhāstān's camp, unknown to either al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn or to Sarkhāstān. Al-Ḥasan's troops observed a band of persons entering from the wall, so they joined them in entering [the town]. The inhabitants looked at each other (i.e., in astonishment) and were thrown into perturbation. Al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣ'ab arrived and began shouting to the populace to keep them back, saying, "O people, I fear for your safety lest you become like the people of Dāwandān!"[442] But the troops of Qays b. Zanjūyah, who was one of al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn's men, continued going on until they set their banner on top of the wall in Sarkhāstān's camp. The news finally reached Sarkhāstān that the Arabs had broken through the wall and entered the town unexpectedly. Accordingly, his only thought was of flight, he being at that moment in the bathhouse (ḥammām). He heard the shouting, so came forth and fled, clad only in a thin shift (ghilālah).[443]

When al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn found himself impotent to get his followers to come back, he said, "O God, they have indeed disobeyed me but have obeyed you, O God, so watch over them and succor them." Al-Ḥasan's forces continued to follow the [first [1280] wave of] troops until they reached the gate in the wall; they broke it down and poured in, without anyone hindering them, until they had gained control over all who were in the camp, with one group [of the troops] continuing the search (i.e., for fugitives).

It has been mentioned from Zurārah b. Yūsuf al-Sijzī[444] that he 442. Said by Yāqūt, , Mu'jam, II, 434–35, to have been a place near the site of the later Islamic town of Wāsiṭ in lower Iraq; the inhibitants in ancient times fled in order to avoid the plague, were nevertheless killed by divine action, but were brought to life again by the prophet Ezekiel (Arabic Hizqīl; see T. P. Hughes, Dictionary of Islam, 114). In traditional exegesis, Qur'ān II: 244/243, was taken to refer to the inhabitants of Dāwandān. In early Islamic times a Christian monastery, the Dayr Hizqīl, was located there. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 321, trans., 164; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 540–41.

443. A garment worn by both sexes, more recently the equivalent of an undershirt. See Dozy, Vêtements, 319–23; *EI*², s.v. Libās, i, ii (Y. K. Stillman).

444. I.e., the man from Sijistān, or Sīstān, on the border between modern Persia and Afghanistan.

said: I passed onward in the search, and while I was thus engaged I came to a spot on the left side of the road. I was afraid to penetrate farther into it, but then I rushed headlong into it with my spear without, however, seeing anyone. I shouted out, "Who are you? Woe upon you!" when behold, a well-built, elderly man cried out "Zīnhār!" meaning "Quarter!"[445] He related: I rushed upon him and seized him and pinioned him securely with cords, and, lo, it was Shahriyār, the brother of Abū Ṣāliḥ Sarkhāstān, the chief of the army. He related: I handed him over to my commander, Yaʿqūb b. Manṣūr. Night descended, preventing us from continuing the search, whereupon the troops returned to their camp. Shahriyār was brought to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, who had his head cut off.

As for Abū Ṣāliḥ, he went onward until he was some five farsakhs from his camp, being ill at this time. He was also tormented by thirst and fear. He halted in a thicket on the right-hand side of the road at the foot of a mountain, tethered his mount, and threw himself down on his back. One of his own slave boys and also one of his retainers called Jaʿfar b. Wandāmīd[446] recognized him and saw him reposing there. Sarkhāstān cried out, "O Jaʿfar, a drink of water, for I have become afflicted by thirst!" He (Jaʿfar) related: I replied, "I have no vessel with me with which I can get water from this place." Sarkhāstān said, "Take the top of my quiver and get me water in that." Jaʿfar related: At that, I went along to a number of my comrades and [1281] told them, "This devil has brought about our destruction, so why should we not ingratiate ourselves by means of him with the ruling power (i.e., the ʿAbbāsid central government) and secure for ourselves a guarantee of safe-conduct?" They asked him, "How shall we achieve this through him?" He related: He made them stand round him and told them, "Help me for brief moment, and I will spring upon him." So Jaʿfar took a large beam of wood, Sarkhāstān being meanwhile laid out on his back, and hurled himself on Sarkhāstān; they overpowered him and made him fast by pinioning him to the beam. Abū Ṣāliḥ cried out to them, "Take from me 100,000 dirhams and leave me alone, for the Arabs will not give you anything." They said to him, "Produce it forthwith!" But he replied, "Bring some scales!" They protested, "Where are there any scales here?" But he replied, "And where is there anything for me to give you? But go with me to my house, and I will furnish you with bonds and guarantees of payment; truly, I will fulfill my promises to you and lavish wealth upon you."

445. Persian zinhār "protection, refuge, security."

446. The latter element probably a compressed form of the name Windād-umīd, literally, "bringing about the attainment of hope," see Justi, op. cit., 370.

Nevertheless, they took him along to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, one of whose cavalry detachments came out to meet them, and these cavalrymen cut off their heads. They seized Sarkhāstān from them, intending themselves to profit by him, and then al-Ḥasan's men conveyed Sarkhāstān to al-Ḥasan himself. When they brought him before al-Ḥasan, the latter summoned the military leaders of Ṭabaristān, such as Muḥammad b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah al-Azdī, 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad al-Quṭquṭī al-Ḍabbī, al-Fatḥ b. Q.rāṭ, and others,[447] and asked them, "Is this Sarkhāstān?" They replied "Yes!" Then he said to Muḥammad b. al-Mughīrah, "Arise and kill him in revenge for your son and brother!" Muḥammad went up to him and struck him with sword; the blows found their mark, and he was killed.

The Story of the Poet Abū Shās [1282]

The poet Abū Shās, whose full name was al-Ghiṭrīf b. Ḥusayn b. Ḥanash, was a youth of Iraqi origin but raised in Khurāsān, well educated and knowledgeable.[448] Sarkhāstān had attached Abū Shās to himself to learn from him the characteristics and ways of thought of the Arabs. When Sarkhāstān suffered his fate Abū Shās was in his military camp, together with riding beasts and baggage. A group of the Bukhāriyyah[449] from al-Ḥasan's troops suddenly fell upon him, seizing as plunder everything that he had with him, and several wounds were inflicted on him. Hence he rapidly snatched up a water jar he had by him, placed it on his shoulder, 447. From their names and the context, apparently members of the Arab or Abnā' military class settled in the towns of Ṭabaristān.

448. Obviously a poet of purely local fame; he is not mentioned in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī.

449. I.e., troops drawn from the Iranian population of Bukhārā; cf. p. 49 n. 159, above.

took a drinking cup in his hand, and shouted, "Water freely available!" (al-mā' li-al-sabīl)[450] until he took advantage of a moment of inattentiveness on the part of the soldiers and fled from his tent, despite his wounds. When he passed by the tent of 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Quṭquṭī al-Ṭabarī, al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn's secretary, a slave boy spotted him, and they, that is, his slaves, recognized him also, he at that moment having the water jar on his shoulder, giving out water. They took him into their tent and told their master what Abū Shās was doing. He was accordingly brought into the presence of their master ('Abdallāh b. Muḥammad), who gave him a mount, provided him with [rich] clothing, and showed him the highest honor. He mentioned him to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn and told Abū Shās, "Compose an ode on the Amīr!" Abū Shās, however, replied, "By God, fear and dread have blotted out what there was of the Qur'ān in my breast, so how can I compose a satisfactory ode?"

Al-Ḥasan sent Abū Ṣāliḥ Sarkhāstān's head to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, but he did not leave his camp.

The Continuation of the Operations against Māzyār and His Capture and Execution

It has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ that Ḥayyān b. Jabalah, the mawlā of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, had drawn near, in the [1283] company of al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, to the vicinity of Ṭamīs. He entered into correspondence with Qārin b. Shahriyār and encouraged him to give obedience, promising him that he would guarantee him possession of the mountain territories that his father and grandfather had held. Qārin was actually one of Māzyār's commanders and the son of his brother.[451] Māzyār had

450. Sabīl, in full fī sabīl Allāh, denotes anything made available by pious charity but is used especially in connection with the provision of drinking water. From this arises the later usage, certainly from Mamlūk times onward, of sabīl alone = "drinking fountain, source of fresh water provided by charity" and of the verbal noun tasbīl = "the charitable distribution of drinking water." See Dozy, Supplément, I, 630; Lane, Manners and Customs, Chapter 14, 332–33; EI[1], s.v. Sabīl (T. W. Haig).

451. This nephew of Māzyār was his governor in the Jabal Sharwīn and the eastern part of the Elburz range adjoining Jurjān. For his services in abandoning Māzyār's cause, he was rewarded after his uncle's fall by the grant of Jabal sent him out with his [further] brother 'Abdallāh b. Qārin, attaching to them a number of his trusty commanders and faithful relatives of his. When Ḥayyān endeavored to win over Qārin, the latter guaranteed to Ḥayyān that he would hand over to him the mountains and the town of Sāriyah as far as the frontier with Jurjān, on condition that Ḥayyān would make him ruler over the mountain territories held by his father and grandfather once he [Qārin] had fulfilled his pledge to Ḥayyān. Ḥayyān wrote to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir about this, and 'Abdallāh set down formally, in writing and duly sealed, everything he asked, but he wrote back also to Ḥayyān that he should halt for a while and not enter the mountains or penetrate deeply into them until something should come from Qārin that would indicate his good faith, lest there be some trickery on his part.

Ḥayyān wrote to Qārin in these terms, and Qārin forthwith summoned 'Abdallāh b. Qārin, Māzyār's brother, together with all his commanders, to a feast. When they had all eaten, laid down their weapons, and felt completely at ease, his own troops, who were armed to the teeth, surrounded them, pinioned them in bonds, and sent them to Ḥayyān b. Jabalah. When they reached Ḥāyyān he made sure of them and then rode forth with his forces until they entered the mountains of Qārin (jibāl Qārin).

News of this event reached Māzyār and disturbed him deeply. His brother al-Qūhyār said to him, "You have 20,000 Muslims in your custody, ranging from shoemakers to tailors, and you have given your attention to them; but now you are faced with the question of your own security and that of your family and kindred, so what are you going to do now with these prisoners in your custody?" He related: At that, Māzyār ordered the release of all who were in his custody. Then he summoned Ibrāhīm b. Mihrān, the commander of his police guard; 'Alī b. Rabban al-Naṣrānī, his secretary; Shādhān b. al-Faḍl, the chief fiscal officer (ṣāḥib kharājihi); and Yaḥyā b. al-Rūzbahār, his assayer and banker (jahbadhahu[452]), who were all members of the [1284] element of plains dwellers in his entourage, and said to them, "Your womenfolk, your residences, and your estates are all in the [coastal] plain, which the Arabs have now entered. I do not wish to bring down on you ill fortune, so go back to your dwellings and obtain guarantees of safety for yourselves." He then gave them gifts and accorded them permission to return, and they went away to their dwellings and obtained guarantees of safety for themselves.

Sharwīn, and in 227 (842) he became a Muslim; see Madelung, "Minor Dynasties," 205–6.

452. On this term, which may be of Persian origin and derive from Sāsānid administrative practice, see *EI*², s.v. Djahbadh (W. J. Fischel).

When the people of the town of Sāriyah heard the news of Sarkhāstān's capture, the plundering of his camp, and Ḥayyān b. Jabalah's invasion of Sharwīn's mountain territories, they rose up and attacked Māzyār's governor ('āmil) in Sāriyah, who was called Mahrīstānī b. Shahrīz, but he fled from them and saved his skin. The populace threw open the gate of the prison and released those jailed there. After that Ḥayyān arrived at the town of Sāriyah; news of his arrival in Sāriyah reached Qūhyār, Māzyār's brother, whereupon he set free from his imprisonment Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ, the governor of Ṭabaristān, set him on a mule with a saddle, and dispatched him to Ḥayyān in order that Ḥayyān might accord him a guarantee of safety and so that Ḥayyān might grant him the mountain territories that his father and grandfather had held, [this] on condition that he would hand over Māzyār to Ḥayyān. To make that firm, he would offer him the guarantees of Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ and Aḥmad b. al-Ṣuqayr. When Muḥammad b. Mūsā came to Ḥayyān and told him about Qūhyār's message to him, Ḥayyān said to him, "Who is this?" meaning Aḥmad. Muḥammad b. Mūsā replied, "The leading figure of the region; the representatives (al-khulafā') [of the central government] know him,[453] as does the Amīr 'Abdallāh b.
[1285] Ṭāhir." Ḥayyān then sent for Aḥmad, and he came to him. He ordered Aḥmad to set out for the garrison at Khurramābādh[454] in

453. The Cairo edition, IX, 91, has wa-baqiyyat al-khulafā' "and the best of the representatives (of the central government)."

454. A village in the province of al-Rayy, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 361. It is to be distinguished from the better-known Khurramābādh in Lur-i Kūchik; see Le Strange, Lands, 200–1. One should, however, note the existence, in modern times, of at least one other Khurramābād in Māzandarān itself, the chief place of the district of Tunakābun; also Rabino di Borgomale, Mázandarán and Astarábád, 23. A location on the coastal plain of Ṭabaristān seems better to fit the the company of Muḥammad b. Mūsā. Now Aḥmad had a son called Isḥāq who had previously fled from Māzyār, spending the daylight hiding in the dense undergrowth and traveling by night to an estate called Sāwāsh.r.yān on the main highway from Qidḥ[455] al-Iṣbahbadh, where lay Māzyār's fortress.

It has been mentioned from Isḥāq that he said: I was at this estate when a number of Māzyār's troops passed me by, having with them riding beasts that were being led and other [? animals or things]. He related: I leaped onto one of the horses, a stout animal of mixed breed (ḥajīn); I rode it bareback and brought it to the town of Sāriyah, and there I handed it over to my father. When Aḥmad decided to set off for Khurramābādh he was riding that horse. Ḥayyān observed him [on it] and was filled with admiration for the horse. He turned to al-Lawzajān, who was one of Qārin's retainers, and said, "I see this shaykh on a noble horse, whose like I have rarely seen!" Al-Lawzajān told him, "This horse was Māzyār's." Ḥayyān thereupon dispatched a message to Aḥmad, asking him to send the horse to him so that he might look it over, and Aḥmad sent it on to him. When Ḥayyān had examined it at length and had inspected it closely he found that it had scarred forelegs, so he lost interest in it and gave it back to al-Lawzajān. He further told Aḥmad's envoy, "This belonged to Māzyār, and Māzyār's property belongs to the Commander of the Faithful."

The envoy returned and informed Aḥmad [about that]. Aḥmad grew angry against al-Lawzajān because of it, and Aḥmad sent him an insulting message. Al-Lawzajān protested, "I've committed no fault over this," returning the horse to Aḥmad, together with a horse of inferior breed (birdhawn) and a sprightly one of mixed breed (shihrī fārih);[456] and he ordered his envoy to deliver [1286] events described in Ṭabarī, III, 1291 (p. 165, below), when the captive Māzyār was sent to Sāriyah from Khurramābādh.

455. Qidḥ is presumably used here in the sense of "share, portion," hence "The Ispahbadh's allotment of land"; cf. Qidḥ al-S.l.tān in Ṭabarī, III, 1288 (p. 162, below). It appears to be an alternative designation for Burj al-Iṣpahbadh, mentioned at III, 1269 (see p. 139, above).

456. The word fārih is supplied from one of the mss. utilized in the Cairo edition, IX, 91.

them both to him.[457] Aḥmad became angry at how Ḥayyān had treated him and said, "Can this weaver[458] send to a shaykh like myself and treat him as he has done?" At that he wrote to Qūhyār, "Woe upon you! Why do you act so mistakenly in your undertaking? You spurn a man like al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, the paternal uncle of ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, and accept a guarantee of security from this servile wretch of a weaver! You are handing over your brother and diminishing your own prestige (or: power, qadr/qadar). Al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn will bear a secret hatred for you for leaving him and cleaving to one of his vilest slaves!"

Qūhyār wrote back to him, "I have indeed acted mistakenly in the first part of this affair, but I have promised the man that I would come to him the day after tomorrow, and I would not feel safe, if I were to break my word to him, that he would not rise up against me, launch an attack on me, and treat as lawful plunder my properties and possessions. Moreover, if I were to fight with him and as a result were to kill some of his retainers and blood were to flow between us, deeply felt hatred would result. Consequently, this matter that I am working toward would be brought to nothing." Aḥmad wrote to him, "When the day appointed for the meeting comes round, send to him a man from your own household, and write a letter to him that you have been afflicted with an illness that prevents you from moving and that you require medical treatment for three days. Then if you are restored to health [well and good]; if not you will come to him in a litter. We ourselves will prevail upon him to accept that story from you and [the promise of your] coming to him in due course."

Aḥmad b. al-Ṣuqayr and Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ wrote to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, who was at that moment in his army camp at Ṭamīs awaiting orders from ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and a [1287] reply to his letter announcing the killing of Sarkhāstān and the conquest of Ṭamīs. They wrote to him, "Ride to us so that we can hand over to you Māzyār and the mountain territory; otherwise, he will escape from you, and you will lose the chance of

457. There is some ambiguity here as to whether al-Lawzajān sent the latter two horses or all three of them; cf. Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 98 n. 463. For these terms denoting various breeds of horse, see *EI*², s.v. Faras (F. Viré).

458. The trade of weaver (ḥā'ik) was generally regarded with contempt as mean and debased; see R. Brunschvig, "Métiers vils en Islam," 50–54.

vengeance."[459] They sent the letter with Shādhān b. al-Faḍl al-Kātib and ordered him to journey as speedily as possible. When al-Ḥasan got the letter, he rode off immediately and covered three days' [normal] distance in a single night until he reached Sāriyah; then when the day broke he pressed on to Khurramābādh on what was the day of the appointed meeting with Qūhyār. Ḥayyān heard the sound of the drums accompanying al-Ḥasan; hence he rode out and met him a farsakh's distance away.

Al-Ḥasan said to him, "What are you doing here? Why are you making your way to this place? You have conquered the mountain territories of Sharwīn, yet you have abandoned them and come here! What guarantee do you have that an opportunity may not present itself to the people there and that they will not act treacherously with you, so that all you have achieved will crumble to pieces around you? Get back to the mountains, send out garrisons to the outlying parts and districts, and keep such a close eye on the people there that they will have no opportunity to act treacherously, even if they intend it." Ḥayyān replied, "I am just about to go back, and I want only to transport my baggage and give orders for departure to my men." Al-Ḥasan, however, told him, "Your yourself get moving, and I'll send on your baggage and your troops after you. Spend tonight in the town of Sāriyah, so that they may catch up with you, and then set off in the morning." Ḥayyān accordingly left immediately, just as al-Ḥasan had ordered him, for Sāriyah.

There then reached Ḥayyān a letter from 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, instructing him to camp at Labūrah[460] in the mountains of Wandāhurmuz,[461] this being the most strongly fortified place in

459. Vocalizing the text here as fa-lā naqm^{a}; the Cairo edition, IX, 92, has less plausibly fa-lā taqum "so don't arise!"

460. This is the Lafūr frequently mentioned by Ibn Isfandiyār (op. cit., index), on the eastern source of the Bābul river, which runs down to Bārfurūsh. Subsequently it was ruled by local Ispahbadhs; see Rabino di Borgomale, Mázandarán and Astarábád, 118, 147); Ibn Isfandiyār op. cit., 95, states that in his time (early seventh [thirteenth] century) the noble families of Lafūr traced their descent back to the Qārinids, early rulers of the district. See also p. 180 n. 511, below.

461. At III, 1295 (pp. 168–69, below), Ṭabarī describes the mountain of Māzyār's grandfather Wandād-Hurmuz as in the center of the mountains of Ṭabaristān between that of his brother Wandās.b./f.jān and the Jabal Sharwīn of the Bāwandid prince; see Rabino di Borgomale, Mázandarán and Astarábád, 2.

his mountains and the spot where the greater part of Māzyār's wealth was stored. 'Abdallāh gave further orders to Ḥayyān that [1288] he should not prevent Qārin from doing what he wished in regard to those mountains and treasures. Qārin accordingly carried off that wealth of Māzyār's deposited there and Māzyār's treasuries at Asbāndarah,[462] together with what Sarkhāstān had at Qidḥ al-S.l.tān,[463] and took possession of the whole of it. Thus because of that horse everything that had presented itself to Ḥayyān as a favorable opportunity crumbled about him. Ḥayyān b. Jabalah died after that, and 'Abdallāh sent in his place and over his troops Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣ'ab, with orders that he should not prevent Qārin from doing anything he wished.

Al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn arrived at Khurramābādh. Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ and Aḥmad b. al-Ṣuqayr came to him; they engaged in private discussions with him, and he said to them, "May God reward you handsomely [for that]!" He himself wrote to Qūhyār, who came to Khurramābādh and went to al-Ḥasan, who rewarded him and showed him honor and agreed to everything he asked. The two of them fixed on a certain day [for the betrayal of Māzyār]. Then al-Ḥasan dismissed Qūhyār, who now went to Māzyār and informed him that he had secured for him a guarantee of safe-conduct and made it firm for him. Al-Ḥasan b. Qārin had written to Qūhyār from where Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Mus'ab was, pledging to him desirable rewards from the part of the Commander of the Faithful, and in response Qūhyār had pledged to him what he had pledged to others, all this being aimed at deterring them from making war, and had gone over to al-Ḥasan's side. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm rode off from the town of Āmul, and the information [about all this] reached al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn.

It has been mentioned from Ibrāhim b. Mihrān that he was engaged in conversation at Abū al-Sa'dī's, and when the meridian approached he went back in the direction of his residence. His [1289] way went past the door of al-Ḥasan's tent. He related: When I drew opposite his tent, lo, al-Ḥasan appeared, riding alone with merely three Turkish slave retainers of his following him. He

462. The reading of this name in the manuscripts is very doubtful.
463. The vocalization of the second element of this name is uncertain.

related: I threw myself off my mount and greeted him, at which he said, "Mount!" When I had remounted he said, "Where is the road to Ārum?"[464] I replied, "It goes through this valley." He said to me, "Proceed in front of me." He related: So I proceeded until I reached a pass two miles from Ārum. He related: I became very afraid and expostulated, "May God guide the Amīr uprightly! This is a fearful place; not less than a thousand cavalrymen ought to venture along this path! I would advise you to turn back and not enter it!" He related: But he roared at me, "Go on!" So I went on, almost bereft of my reason, although we did not see anyone along the road until we reached Ārum. Then he said to me, "Where is the road to Hurmuzdābādh?" I replied, "Over the mountain, by this track." He related: He told me, "Travel along it!" I protested, "May God make the Amīr mighty! [I seek the help of] God in preserving you and ourselves and all this body of troops with you!"[465] He related: But he shouted back at me, "Get going, O son of a stinking, uncircumcised whore!" He related: I said to him, "May God make the Amīr mighty! Cut my head off yourself, for this would be preferable to me than Māzyār's killing me and than the Amīr ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's fastening the blame on me!" He related: He thereupon upbraided me so roughly that I thought he was going to lay violent hands on me, and I went along, having completely lost heart. I said to myself, "At any moment now we shall all be seized, and I shall be brought before Māzyār; he will upbraid and threaten me and will say, 'You have acted as a guide against me!'" This was our situation when we reached Hurmuzdābādh as the sun began to gleam. Al-Ḥasan said to me, "Whereabouts around here was the prison where the Muslims were kept?" I replied, "On this very spot." He related: He dismounted and sat down, while we were at this time silent and holding back, with the cavalry catching us up in separate groups, because he had ridden forth without the troops' knowing; [1290] they knew about it only after he had gone.

464. Thus vocalized by the editor of the text; perhaps it is to be identified with the village Arim, in the mountainous district of Sawādkūh to the south of Sārī, listed by Rabino di Borgomale, Māzandarān and Astarābād, 115.

465. Allāhᵃ Allāhᵃ fī nafsika, with a verb like astaʿīnu or astaghīthu understood; the expression is badly mistranslated in Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 101.

Al-Ḥasan summoned Yaʿqūb b. Manṣūr and said to him, "O Abū Ṭalḥah, I want you to go to al-Ṭālaqāniyyah[466] and then, employing your subtle stratagems, take care of Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab's army there for two or three hours or more, whatever you can manage." There was a distance of two or three farsakhs between him and al-Ṭālaqāniyyah. Ibrāhīn continued to relate: While we were standing waiting in al-Ḥasan's presence, behold, he summoned Qays b. Zanjūyah and told him, "Proceed to the defile (darb) of Labūrah. It is less then a farsakh away, so go forth with your troops to the defile." He related: When we had performed the sunset worship and the night had come on, behold, a group of horsemen appeared before me, bearing lighted wax candles and coming from the Labūrah road. Al-Ḥasan said to me, "O Ibrāhīm, what is there on the Labūrah road?" I replied, "I can see lights and horsemen who have approached from that road." He related: I was filled with bewilderment and did not know what our situation was until the lights drew near to us. I was looking, and behold there was al-Māzyār, together with al-Qūhyār. I was not fully aware [of the position] until they both dismounted. Al-Māzyār advanced and greeted al-Ḥasan as Amīr, but the latter did not return to him the salutation and instead told Ṭāhir b. Ibrāhīm and Aws al-Balkhī, "Take him into your custody!"

It has been mentioned from the brother of Ummīdwār b. Khwāst Jīlān[467] that on that same night he went with a group of men to Qūhyār and told him, "Fear God! You have now taken the 1291] place of our leading men, so permit me to round up all these Arabs, for the troops are in a confused state and starving, and there is no road open to them for fleeing. You will thereby do away with their power and authority forever. Do not repose any trust in anything that the Arabs may give you, for they never keep

---

Grammatically the construction is analogous to those of taḥdhīr and ighrā'; see W. Wright, op. cit., II, 74–75.

466. Not identified but unconnected with the Ṭālaqāns of Khurāsān and Daylam. Rabino di Borgomale, Mázandarán and Astarábád, 22, notes however the existence of a Ṭalaqānī clan today, in the district of Tunakābun in western Māzandarān.

467. For the first element of this name the text has W.m.y.d.wār; a more correct orthography (Persian umīdwār "hopeful") appears in the editor's n. l, as given by Ẓahīr al-Dīn Marʿashī.

their trust." Qūhyār, however, said, "Don't do that!" [Ummīdwār's brother continued to relate:] By that time Qūhyār had already ranged the Arabs against us and had handed over Māzyār and the members of his family to al-Ḥasan that he himself might enjoy the sole possession of royal power and that no one might contend with or oppose him.

When dawn had come al-Ḥasan sent Māzyār in the custody of Ṭāhir b. Ibrāhīm and Aws al-Balkhī to Khurramābādh and ordered them to take him to the town of Sāriyah. Al-Ḥasan rode on and took possession of the Wādī Bābak as far as al-Kāniyyah,[468] coming up with and encountering Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, who was traveling toward Hurmuzdābādh to seize al-Māzyār. Al-Ḥasan said to him, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, where are you heading?" He replied, "I am seeking al-Māzyār." Al-Ḥasan said, "He is at Sāriyah; he came to me, and I sent him on to there." Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm was left in a state of great perturbation, for al-Qūhyār had planned to act treacherously with al-Ḥasan and to hand over al-Māzyār to Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. But al-Ḥasan had forestalled him over that, and al-Qūhyār was afraid that al-Ḥasan would attack him when he observed him in the middle of crossing the mountains, for Aḥmad b. al-Ṣuqayr had previously written to al-Qūhyār, "I do not see you either cultivating friendly relations or showing hostility to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Information about your position and the assurances given by you has been written down and sent to him, so don't act in a two-faced manner (literally, "two-hearted," dhā qalbayn)." At that he paid heed to what had been said (ḥadhirahu),[469] and handed al-Māzyār over to al-Ḥasan.

Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm and al-Ḥasan al-Ḥusayn went to Hurmuzdābādh, burned down al-Māzyār's palace there, and plundered his possessions. They then proceeded to al-Ḥasan's [1292] army camp at Khurramābādh. They sent [men] to al-Māzyār's brothers, and these last were imprisoned in his residence with guards appointed over them. Then al-Ḥasan rode on to the town of Sāriyah and remained there, al-Māzyār being imprisoned near 468. The pointing of the consonants and the vocalization of these two place names are uncertain.

469. Or "he [sc. al-Ḥasan] gave him a warning," vocalizing ḥadharahu, as in the Cairo edition, IX, 95.

al-Ḥasan's tent. Al-Ḥasan also sent to Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ḥafṣ asking him about the shackles with which al-Māzyār had loaded him (i.e., had loaded Muḥammad b. Mūsā); Muḥammad sent them to al-Ḥasan, and al-Ḥasan fettered al-Māzyār in these same shackles.

Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm came to al-Ḥasan at the town of Sāriyah to ask about and discuss with him the wealth and possessions of al-Māzyār and his family. The two of them wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir concerning this matter and awaited his orders. A letter from ʿAbdallāh reached al-Ḥasan, commanding him to hand over al-Māzyār, his brothers, and the members of his family to Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, so that the latter might convey them to the Commander of the Faithful, al-Muʿtaṣim. ʿAbdallāh did not make any move regarding their wealth and possessions but ordered Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm to take the whole of al-Māzyār's wealth and possessions and to guard them. Al-Ḥasan then sent for al-Māzyār and had him brought in and questioned him about his wealth and possessions. Al-Māzyār stated that these last were deposited with a group of the leading citizens and persons noted for their probity, whom he named, of Sāriyah, ten individuals in all. At this al-Ḥasan also summoned al-Qūhyār and in a written document imposed on him an obligation, making him responsible for extracting the whole[470] of the wealth and possessions that al-Māzyār had said were in the custodianship of his treasurers and the keepers of his accumulated wealth. Al-Qūhyār assented to this duty laid upon him and formally bound himself to it before witnesses; then al-Ḥasan ordered the witnesses whom he had assembled to go to al-Māzyār and bear witness for him.

It has been mentioned by one of them that he said: When we went in to al-Māzyār's presence I was afraid lest Aḥmad b. al-Ṣuqayr might frighten him with [harsh] speech, so I told him, "I would like you to restrain yourself with him and not to mention what you have been advised about him." Aḥmad accordingly remained silent during the entire proceedings. Al-Māzyār now [1293] affirmed, "I bear witness that the whole of what I brought along and what accompanied me, of my personal wealth, amounts to

470. Tawfīr, in its sense of "exacting the whole of something due"; see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-ʿArab, VII, 150.

96,000 dīnārs, seventeen emeralds, sixteen rubies, eight loads of baskets bound with leather and containing various items of clothing, a crown and a sword decorated with gold and jewels, a golden dagger studded with jewels, and a large chest filled with jewels," he having placed it (the document) before us, which I had then handed over to Muḥammad b. al-Ṣabbāḥ, ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's treasurer and intelligence officer over the troops, and to al-Qūhyār. He related: We then went back to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, and he said, "Did you bear witness for that fellow?" He related: We replied, "Yes." He said, "This is something that I would have preferred to do myself, but I wanted his unimportance and contemptible status in my eyes to be made manifest."

It has been mentioned from ʿAlī b. Rabban al-Naṣrānī al-Kātib that that chest containing jewels belonging to al-Māzyār, his grandfather, Sharwīn, and Shahriyār, was sold for 18 million dirhams, and al-Māzyār brought the whole of this sum to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn on condition that he would proclaim publicly that al-Māzyār had come to him under a guarantee of safe-conduct; that he (al-Ḥasan) had given him a guarantee of safety for his person, his wealth and possessions, and his children; and that he had made over to him [the government of] the mountain held by his father. However, al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn refused to accept this and held back from taking it (i.e., the wealth of al-Māzyār and his family); he was the most incorruptible of men with regard to taking dirhams and dīnārs.

When it was morning he sent off al-Māzyār with Ṭāhir b. Ibrāhīm and ʿAlī b. Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī, but a letter arrived from ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir with instructions to send him with Yaʿqūb b. [1294] Manṣūr. They had meanwhile already traveled three stages with al-Māzyār; so al-Ḥasan despatched an envoy, brought al-Māzyār back, and then sent him with Yaʿqūb b. Manṣūr.

After this al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn ordered al-Qūhyār, al-Māzyār's brother, to convey the wealth that he had pledged and provided him with mules from the army, at the same time ordering a force of soldiers to accompany him. Al-Qūhyār, however, refused, saying, "I don't need them," and he and his personal slave retainers (ghilmān) set out with the mules. When he entered the mountain zone he opened the treasuries, removed the wealth, and got it ready for transporting himself. But al-Māzyār's Daylamī slave retainers (mamālīk), amounting to 1,200 in number, rose up against him and said to him, "You betrayed our master and handed him over to the Arabs, and now you have come to carry off his wealth." They thereupon seized him and made him fast in irons. Then, under cover of night, they killed him and carried off as plunder that wealth and the mules. News of this reached al-Ḥasan, and he sent an army against those who had killed al-Qūhyār, and Qārin also sent a force of his own troops to capture them. Qārin's commander captured a number of the plunderers, including one of al-Māzyār's paternal cousins called Shahriyār b. al-Maṣmughān,[471] who was the leader of the slave troops and the one who had egged them on. Qārin sent him on to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, but when he reached Qūmis he died. A group of those Daylamīs had set out along the way through the foothills and jungle, heading for al-Daylam. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab became aware of them, hence sent out, from the forces at his disposal, the troops of Ṭabaristān and others until these troops came up against and confronted the Daylamīs and blocked their road, and they were thus captured. He then sent them to the town of Sāriyah with ʿAlī b. Ibrāhīm. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm's route of access when he entered from Shalanbah[472] was (or: was from Shalanbah) on the road from al-Rūdhbār[473] to al-Rūyān.

It has been said[474] that the deterioration of Māzyār's position and his final ruin were at the hands of one of his paternal cousins [1295] called . . . ,[475] who ruled over all the mountain regions of Ṭabaristān, while al-Māzyār controlled the plain, this being the division between them as they had inherited it. It has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ al-Ṭabarī that the mountain regions of Ṭabaristān consisted of three mountains: that of

471. Maṣmughān was an ancient title of Ṭabaristān, held by a local dynasty of the Damāwand region, the Zarmihrid elder branch of the Qārinids, but by this time it seems to have become a proper name and to have been adopted in the younger branch of the Qārinids, that of Māzyār. See the discussion of this complex topic in *EI*², s.v. al-Maṣmughān (V. Minorsky).

472. Described by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 360, s.v. Shalambah, as a place in the region of Damāwand; see also Ibn Isfandiyār, op. cit., 28.

473. The Rūdhbār situated in Daylam, one of the many places with this name. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 77; Le Strange, Lands, 173.

475. There is a lacuna here in the texts of both manuscripts.

Wandāhurmuz in the middle of the Ṭabaristān mountains; second, the mountain of his brother Wandās.b/f. jān b. al-Andād b. Qārin; and, third, the mountain of Sharwīn b. Surkhāb b. Bāb.[476] When al-Māzyār's authority grew strong, he sent to that paternal cousin of his—or, as has been said, to his brother al-Qūhyār—and compelled him to stay with him at his court, meanwhile entrusting the governorship of the mountains to one of his own men, called Durrī. When al-Māzyār had a need for troops to combat ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir he summoned his cousin—or his brother al-Qūhyār—and told him, "You are more familiar with your mountain than anyone else." He revealed to him the matter of al-Afshīn and the latter's [secret] correspondence with him and told him, "Go to that region of the mountain and guard the mountain for me." Al-Māzyār also wrote to al-Durrī, ordering him to come to him, which al-Durrī did, and he gave him military forces and sent him against ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. He thought that he had made firm for himself the mountain through his cousin—or his brother al-Qūhyār—because he did not imagine that anyone could come upon him via the mountain, because there was no way for [the access of] armies or the possibility of fighting there on account of the numerous defiles and [dense] trees. He further made sure of the places where he feared [possible access] by [1296] means of al-Durrī and his forces, and he reinforced him with warriors and troops from his own army.

ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir sent his paternal uncle al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣʿab with a large army from Khurāsān against al-Māzyār, and al-Muʿtaṣim sent Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab, together with an intelligence officer called Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Būshanjī, the mawlā of al-Hādī, known as Qawṣarah,[477] who was to write intelligence reports about the army. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm met al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, and the

476. I.e., for Bāw/Bāv, sc. the Bāwandid Ispahbadhs. On this threefold division of the mountains, see *EI*², s.v. Māzandarān (V. Minorsky-[C. E. Bosworth]); the second would adjoin Daylam, as it was the starting point for expeditions against the Daylamīs (see p. 147 n. 418, above), and third would lie in the southeastern part of Ṭabaristān.

477. Literally, "a basket of dates woven from palm fibers," perhaps indicative of an originally servile status for this Khurāsānian. Būshanj was a town in what is now western Afghanistan. In connection with the attachments of this al-Būshanjī to Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab, it may not be without significance that the armies advanced together toward al-Māzyār until they were close to him. Al-Māzyār, meanwhile, was not in any doubt that he had made secure for himself the place where the mountains faced him (faced al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, his enemy?)[478] and was at this moment in his capital with only a small group of men. But the secret rancor that al-Māzyār's cousin nursed in his heart against al-Māzyār, the latter's treatment of him, and al-Māzyār's removal of him from his mountain impelled the cousin to write to al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn and tell him about everything that was happening in his camp, including the fact that al-Afshīn had been in correspondence with al-Māzyār. Al-Ḥasan forwarded al-Māzyār's cousin's letter to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, and ʿAbdallāh in turn sent it with an envoy to al-Muʿtaṣim. ʿAbdallāh and al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn then wrote back to al-Māzyār's cousin—or, it has been said, al-Qūhyār—and they both promised him whatever he might wish. Al-Māzyār's cousin had informed ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir that the mountain where he then was had belonged to him and his father and his forefathers before al-Māzyār[479] and that the latter, at the time when al-Faḍl b. Sahl had appointed him ruler over Ṭabaristān, had snatched the mountain from his possession and compelled him to remain at his court, treating him with 1297] contempt. Accordingly, ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir made the stipulation to him that, if the cousin should rise up against al-Māzyār and use stratagems so that the mountain should pass into his own possession, as it had always previously been, no impediment would be placed in his way regarding it, nor would he be pursued with military force. Al-Māzyār's cousin agreed to these terms, so ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir wrote out for him a document with that stipulation and in it gave him the requisite assurances.

Al-Māzyār's cousin promised al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn and their troops that he would lead them into the mountain. When the region around Bushanj was the original home of the Ṭāhirid family and the birthplace of Ṭāhir Dhū al-Yamīnayn himself. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 508–9; Le Strange, Lands, 431; Barthold, Historical Geography, 60; Kaabi, op. cit., I, 65.

---

478. One might also follow here the variant in n. g and read "the place in front of [tilqā'] the mountain."

479. Min qabli "before" seems to be the best vocalization here, in the light of the unequivocal phrase just below, "as it had always previously been"; the Cairo edition, IX, 99, vocalizes min qibali "under the suzerainty of."

time of the appointed meeting came round ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir ordered al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn to advance to engage al-Durrī in battle and in the middle of the night sent out a powerful force under one of his commanders. They met up with al-Māzyār's cousin in the mountain; he delivered the mountains over to them and conducted them into the mountains. Al-Durrī drew up his own army in ranks against the opposing force; al-Māzyār in his palace was meanwhile quite unaware of what was happening until the [Arabs'] infantrymen and cavalry planted themselves at the very gate of his palace. Al-Durrī was at this time engaged in battle with the other army. The caliphal troops surrounded and besieged al-Māzyār and brought him forth in accordance with (or: "for," ʿalā) the Commander of the Faithful al-Muʿtaṣim's judgment.

ʿAmr b. Saʿīd al-Ṭabarī[480] has mentioned that al-Māzyār was out hunting and the [Arab] cavalry came upon him during the hunt. He was taken prisoner, and his palace was entered forcibly and the whole of what was in it captured. Al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn brought along al-Māzyār, with al-Durrī still at this time fighting the enemy facing him and unaware of al-Māzyār's capture; he remained oblivious of the situation until ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's troops came up behind him. His own troops were cut up and scattered and he himself put to flight, fleeing and seeking to enter the land of al-Daylam. His companions were slain, and the caliphal troops pursued and overtook him when he had with him only a small group of his retainers. He turned round and fought with them but was slain and his head taken and then sent to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, into whose hands al-Māzyār had already [1298] passed.

ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir promised al-Māzyār that, if he would show him al-Afshīn's letters, he would ask the Commander of the Faithful to pardon him, and he warned al-Māzyār that he had learned that al-Māzyār had the letters in his possession. Al-Māzyār acknowledged the truth of that; the letters were sought for and found, and there turned out to be a considerable number of letters. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir took them and sent them, together with al-Māzyār, to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, commanding him not to allow the letters out of his hands, or al-Māzyār either, unless directly into the hands of the Commander of the Faithful, lest some stratagem be employed regarding the letters and al-Māzyār. Isḥāq followed his instructions and delivered them out of his own hands into those of al-Muʿtaṣim. Al-Muʿtaṣim then questioned al-Māzyār about the letters, but he refused to acknowledge them, whereupon al-Muʿtaṣim ordered al-Māzyār to be beaten until he died. His corpse was then gibbeted at the side of Bābak's.[481]

480. This is the fourth of Ṭabarī's authorities for Māzyār's revolt (III, 1297–98), noted by Sadighi, op. cit., 302 n. 4, as differing on some points from the principal account of Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ and containing some errors.

Al-Maʾmūn used to write to al-Māzyār, "From ʿAbdallāh al-Maʾmūn to the Jīl-i Jīlān,[482] Iṣbahbadh-i Iṣbahbadhān, Bishwār Khurshād,[483] Muḥammad b. Qārin, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful."[484]

It has been mentioned that al-Durrī's position began to deteriorate when, after al-Māzyār's reinforcing him with an army, the news reached him of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm's descent of Dunbāwand. He thereupon sent his brother Buzurj-Jushnas,[485] reinforcing him with Muḥammad and Jaʿfar, the two sons of Rustam al-Kalārī,[486] and with troops from the frontier region and [1299] from al-Rūyān, and he ordered them to proceed to the boundary of

---

481. I.e., in Sāmarrā, at the ʿaqabat Bābak; see Ṭabarī, III, 1231 (p. 88, above). For ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's relations with Māzyār and ʿAbdallāh's part in Māzyār's fate, see Kaabi, op. cit., I, 255–57.

482. I.e., Māzyār claimed authority over Gīlān, the province to the west, as well as over Ṭabaristān.

483. Minorsky amended this phrase, in EI[1], s.v. Māzyār, to Patishwārjarshāh, without, however, giving his interpretation; perhaps he was following Marquart's Patashwārgar-shāh, listed by Ibn Khurradādhbih, op. cit., 17, as an early Sāsānid provincial ruler's title. See Justi, op. cit., 99; Marquart, Untersuchungen, II, 71–72; Herzfeld, op. cit., 145.

484. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 582, gives these titles and says that, when Māzyār started getting pretensions, he no longer called himself by the humble title of "client of the Commander of the Faithful," but adopted muwālī ("partner, associate") Amīr al-Muʾminīn. See also Herzfeld, op. cit., 145; Rekaya, "Māzyār," 150–52.

485. Text, b.z.r.j.sh.n.s. The element j.sh.n.s is the usual Arabized rendering of the Persian name Gushnasp (literally, "stallion"), the whole name thus meaning "great stallion." see Justi, op. cit., 354–55; Ṭabarī, trans. Nöldeke, 110 n. 3.

486. Kalār is the district of western Ṭabaristān lying between Tunakābun and Kujūr, at this time adjoining the frontier of pagan Daylam and ruled by the Bāduspānids; see Rabino di Borgomale, Māzandarān and Astarābād, 27, 154–55.

al-Rūyān and al-Rayy to ward off the army. Al-Ḥasan b. Qārin had been corresponding with Rustam's sons Muḥammad and Ja'far, who were among the leaders of al-Durrī's troops, inciting the two of them [to betray their commander]. When the armies of al-Durrī and Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm met, Rustam's two sons plus the troops from the two frontier regions and from al-Rūyān turned against al-Durrī's brother Buzurj-Jushnas, took him captive, and joined up with Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm as his vanguard. Al-Durrī, together with his family and all his troops, was in his fortress at a place called Muzn.[487] When the news reached him of the treachery of Rustam's two sons, Muḥammad and Ja'far, and the rallying to their side of the troops from the two frontier regions and from al-Rūyān and of his brother Buzurj-Jushnas's capture, he became deeply grieved on account of that. He submitted [to the will of] his followers, whose only thought was for themselves, and the whole body of them split up, seeking guarantees of safe-conduct for themselves and contriving to save their skins as best they could. Al-Durrī then sent to the Daylamites (i.e., for reinforcements), and 4,000 of them rallied to his side. He held out inducements to them, gave them hope of largesse, and offered them gifts. Then he rode on, bearing his wealth and possessions with him, and proceeded as if his intention were to rescue his brother and attack Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, but in reality he intended to enter al-Daylam and seek the Daylamites' military assiatance against Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. At that point Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm and his army met him, and a bitter battle ensued.

After al-Durrī had gone the prison guards fled, and the prisoners broke their fetters and escaped, and every one of them reached his own land. It happened that the men from Sāriyah who had been in al-Māzyār's jail and those persons who had been in al-Durrī's one got free on the very same day, this being the thirteenth of Sha'bān in the year 225 (June 18, 840) according to Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ; others, however, say that this took place in the year 224 (i.e., on June 30, 839).

It has been mentioned from Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham that Muḥam- [1300] 487. With the same emendation of this name as in Ṭabarī, III, 1274 l. 16 (p. 147 n. 418, above).

mad b. Rustam said:[488] Al-Durrī and Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm met in combat on the coast of the [Caspian] Sea between the mountain chain, the jungle, and the sea, the jungle being contiguous with the border of al-Daylam. Al-Durrī was a courageous and valiant warrior. He hurled himself single-handed against Muḥammad's troops until he put them to flight. Then he went off to one side, not however fleeing precipitately and intending to go into the jungle. But one of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm's followers, called Find[489] b. Ḥājibah, attacked him and took him prisoner, and he was brought back.[490] The troops pursued al-Durrī's men, and everything that al-Durrī had with him—personal equipment, money, riding beasts, and weapons—was seized. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm ordered al-Durrī's brother Buzurj-Jushnas to be killed, and then al-Durrī himself was summoned. He stretched out his forearm, and it was cut off from the elbow; his leg was stretched out, and that was cut off from the knee. The same thing was done with the other forearm and leg. He squatted down on his backside, but did not utter a word or tremble at all. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm then ordered his head to be chopped off. He furthermore seized al-Durrī's men and had them transported in fetters.

In this year Ja'far b. Dīnār became governor of Yemen.[491]

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshin married Utrunjah, the daughter of Ashnās, and consummated the marriage at al-Umarī,[492] the palace of al-Mu'taṣim, in Jumādā II (April–May 839). He invited to the marriage celebrations the general populace

---

488. Dāwūd b. Quḥdham is otherwise unknown as an authority for this information, but his informant, Muḥammad b. Rustam, is presumably the Muḥammad son of Rustam al-Kalārī mentioned earlier.

489. This name seems to have perplexed the copyists, and also Marin, but is in fact not unknown in early Arabic onomastic (literally, "peak, mountain," hence a name for a powerfully built man); cf. the Jāhilī poet al-Find al-Zimmānī represented in Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsah, 9–12, trans. in C. J. Lyall, Translations, 5–7 no. III.

490. Reading wa-sturji'a, since istarja'a, which is transitive except in the denominative sense of "to exclaim 'Indeed we belong to God!'," requires an object in the active voice.

491. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 508.

492. The palace built by and thus named after the commander 'Umar b. Faraj al-Rukhkhajī (cf. p. 12 n. 42, above). See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 258, trans., 48–49; Herzfeld, op. cit., 95.

of Sāmarrā. I was informed that they sprinkled the populace there with costly perfume (ghāliyah)[493] in silver vases and that [1301] al-Mu'taṣim personally charged himself with the task of looking after those attending.[494]

In this year 'Abdallāh al-Warthānī assumed a rebellious attitude at Warthān.[495]

In this year Minkajūr al-Ushrūsanī, a kinsman of al-Afshīn, rebelled in Ādharbayjān.[496]

The Reasons behind Minkajūr's Rebellion in Ādharbayjān

It has been mentioned that, when al-Afshīn had concluded the affair of Bābak and had returned from al-Jibāl, he appointed as governor of Ādharbayjān—which was one of the regions in his own charge and for which he was responsible—this Minkajūr. In Bābak's capital, in one of Bābak's dwellings, Minkajūr came

493. This was a mixture of musk, ambergris, and olibanum, used only on the most festive occasions; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 144 n. 2. An anecdote given by Hilāl al-Ṣābi' emphasizes, however, al-Mu'taṣim's extreme detestation of the smell of ghāliyah; op. cit., 32–33, trans., 30–31.

494. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 133 = par. 2815; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 508; Herzfeld, op. cit., 144. For the use of tafaqqada in the sense of "to look after, care for," see Dozy, Supplément, II, 271.

495. A town on the south bank of the Araxes, hence on the border between Mūqān and Arrān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 370–71; Le Strange, Lands, 176–77, Schwarz, op. cit., 1047–53. The rebel Warthānī is described in Balādhurī, op. cit., 329, as one of the mawlās of al-Rashīd's wife Zubaydah. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 580, records the revolt of Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Warthānī, against whom al-Afshīn dispatched Minkajūr; but the rebel secured amān and came to al-Mu'taṣim's court. He must have been reinstated in Mūqān, for Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 583, goes on to record that Minkajūr, in the course of his own revolt (see below), killed Warthānī and other officials of the 'Abbāsids. The form of the name in Azdī, op. cit., 429, and Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 508, sc. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallah, is doubtless less correct. See also Schwarz, op. cit., 1051.

496. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 144. The rebel is described by Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 579, as Minkajūr al-Farghānī and as the maternal uncle of one of al-Afshīn's sons. Minorsky, in Studies in Caucasian History, 111 n. 1, suggested that the ford, now a dam, of Mingechaur over the Kur River in Arrān is named after him. The first element of what looks much more like a Turkish than an Iranian name may be ming/bing "1,000" or mengü "eternal, everlasting" (see Clauson, Etymological Dictionary, 345–47, 350–51), both of them common components in early Turkish onomastic. We may have here a Turkish slave soldier sold at or imported into Farghānah, rather than one of the indigenous population of that province.

across a large sum of money, which he then appropriated for himself without either al-Afshīn's or al-Muʿtaṣim's knowing about it (or: "being informed about it"). The head of the postal and intelligence service in Ādharbayjān was an adherent of the Shīʿah called ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. He wrote to al-Muʿtaṣim with the information about that hoard of wealth and Minkajūr in turn wrote branding the accusation a lie. Arguments and disputes broke out between Minkajūr and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān until Minkajūr finally determined to kill the latter. ʿAbdallāh sought the aid of the people of Ardabīl, and they shielded him from Minkajūr's intentions, so that as a result Minkajūr attacked them.

News of this reached al-Muʿtaṣim, who thereupon ordered al-Afshīn to send a man to remove Minkajūr from office; so al-Afshīn dispatched one of his commanders with a powerful army. When Minkajūr heard about this, he threw off allegiance, gathered around himself the vagabonds and desperadoes (al-ṣaʿālīk), and left Ardabīl. Al-Afshīn's commander spotted him and attacked him, and Minkajūr was put to flight. He went to one of the fortresses of Ādharbayjān that Bābak had destroyed, a [1302] well-defended site on an inaccessible mountain. There he rebuilt and repaired it and fortified himself within it. However, before less than one month had elapsed, Minkajūr's followers who were with him in the fortress rose up against him; they betrayed him and handed him over to that commander who had previously fought with him. The latter brought him to Sāmarrā, where al-Muʿtaṣim ordered him to be imprisoned; al-Afshīn also came under suspicion regarding Minkajūr's affair.[497] It has been said that the commander sent to wage war on this Minkajūr was Bughā al-Kabīr, and it has further been said that when Bughā encountered Minkajūr the latter went out to him with a guarantee of safe-conduct.[498]

---

497. I.e., for allegedly inciting Minkajūr to rebellion; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 579, explicity adduces this incitement, plus the fact that the army originally sent against Minkajūr under Abū al-Sāj Dīwdād was really intended as reinforcement for him, forcing the Caliph to send an army under Bughā al-Kabīr actually to quell the outbreak.

498. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 579–80, also has information on events in northwestern Persia and Armenia at this time that is not in Ṭabarī and records Minkajūr's

In this year Yāṭis al-Rūmī died, and [his corpse] was gibbeted at the side of Bābak.[499]

In this year, in the month of Ramaḍān (July–August 839), Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī died, and al-Mu'taṣim led the worship at his funeral.[500] appointment as governor there; the relevant passage is translated by Marquart, Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge, 460–61.

In this year Muḥammad b. Dāwūd led the Pilgrimage.[501]

---

499. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 138–39 = par. 2821, states that the corpses of Bābak, Māzyār, and then Yāṭis all bent toward each other on their respective gibbets and quotes some verses of Abū Tammām on this.

500. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 508.

501. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, II, 789; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 508.

The Events of the Year 225

(November 12, 839–October 30, 840)

These included al-Warthānī's coming to al-Muʿtaṣim in al-Muḥarram (November–December 839) with a guarantee of safe-conduct.[502]

In this year, Bughā al-Kabīr brought Minkajūr to Sāmarrā.[503]

In this year al-Muʿtaṣim went to al-Sinn, appointing Ashnās as his deputy. Also in this year, in Rabīʿ I (January–February 840), he installed Ashnās on a throne, awarding him a crown and a ceremonial girdle.[504]

In this year Ghannām the apostate (al-murtadd) was burned.[505]

---

502. This would refer to Warthānī's reinstatement after his submission; see p. 175 n. 495, above.

503. See Ṭabarī, III, 1301–2 (pp. 175–76, above).

504. Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 404; Herzfeld, op. cit, 145–46. Ashnās was now high in the Caliph's favor, and in this year also al-Muʿtaṣim appointed him overall governor of the vast region of al-Jazīrah, Syria, and Egypt (in practice, gubernatorial powers in these provinces were exercised by deputies while Ashnās himself remained in Iraq). See Kindī, op. cit., 194–95; Ibn al-ʿAdīm, op. cit., I, 69, according to whom al-Muʿtaṣim gave to Ashnās, in total, 40 million dirhams during the last years of his life; P. von Sivers, "Military, Merchants and Nomads," 222–23.

505. This character and episode remain enigmatic; all we have is a laconic mention by Jāḥiẓ in Kitāb al-ḥayawān, I, 9, implying that Jāḥiẓ had previously written against him.

In this year al-Mu'taṣim grew angry with Ja'far b. Dīnār on account of his attack on those of the Shākiriyyah[506] who were with him and imprisoned him in the custody of Ashnās for fifteen days. He dismissed him from the governorship of Yemen and gave it to Aytākh, but then he relented toward Ja'far. [1303]

In this year al-Afshīn was dismissed from the caliphal guard (al-ḥaras), and Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh took over the office.[507]

In this year 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir sent Māzyār (i.e., to the caliphal court).[508] Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm [b. Muṣ'ab] went out to al-Daskarah[509] and conducted Māzyār to Sāmarrā in Shawwāl (August 840), and he ordered Māzyār to be transported on an elephant. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt said,

The elephant has been painted and adorned with dyestuff, as is the custom with such a beast,
[for] it is bearing the Jīlān of Khurāsān.

---

506. This group (shākir, Persian chākir "servant," according to the lexicographers; Herzfeld suggested, op. cit., 99, that the word was derived from Middle Persian shkar, cf. New Persian shikār "hunt, hunting," but this does not have any very obvious connection with his adducing of instances in the Kitāb al-aghānī, where shākirī clearly means "personal attendant, bodyguard." These last instances accord however with the usage in Central Asia of chākir/chākar to denote the personal guard of rulers there, both Iranian and Turkish; see Minorsky, Sharaf al-Zamān Ṭāhir Marvazī, 94) formed a body of mercenaries in the caliphal serivce. In the Arabic historical sources the Dīwān al-Jund wa-al-Shākiriyyah is clearly distinguished from the Dīwān al-Mawālī wa-al-Ghilmān, that of the clients and military slaves (Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 267, trans., 61; idem, Ta'rīkh, II, 596, reign of al-Mutawakkil). By the middle years of the third (ninth) century, the old jund of free Arab warriors (cf. *EI*², s.v. Djund [D. Sourdel]) had virtually disappeared, and both the new jund and the shākiriyyah must have been paid, presumably non-Arab soldiers. See Hoernerbach, op. cit., 264–66; Bosworth, "Recruitment, Muster and Review," 69. Shaban, op. cit., 64–65, suggests that the shākirs of this period were the personal guards of Iranian and Turkish princes and local rulers of Central Asia, brought into the caliphal army, like al-Afshīn himself; this seems quite feasible.

507. Isḥāq was the grandson of a Khurāsānian commander, from Khuttal or al-Rayy, who served the first 'Abbāsids; he was the son of al-Ma'mūn's governor of Armenia and al-Jazīrah, who unsuccessfully fought Bābak (see Ṭabarī, III, 1233 [p. 91, above]). Isḥāq governed Damascus for both al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 584; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 516; Herzfeld, op. cit., 107, 145; Crone, op. cit., 183–84; p. xv, above.

508. Ibn Isfandiyār, op. cit., 154; cf. Mar'ashī, op. cit., 117, who says that Māzyār was confined in a box with only eyeholes and transported thus on a mule back to Iraq.

509. In full, Daskarat al-Malik, one stage from al-Nahrawān on the high road to Khurāsān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 455; Le Strange, Lands, 62; *EI*², s.v. Daskara (A. A. Duri).

The elephant does not have its limbs painted and adorned except for a very momentous person (or: for a very momentous occasion).[510]

Māzyār refused to ride on the elephant, so he was brought in mounted on a mule with a packsaddle. [On this day], the fifth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (September 6, 840), al-Muʿtaṣim sat in the Public Audience Chamber. He gave orders and brought Māzyār into confrontation with al-Afshīn, who had been imprisoned the previous day. Al-Māzyār acknowledged that al-Afshīn had been in correspondence with him and had persuaded him that it was right to show disobedience and rebelliousness. Al-Muʿtaṣim ordered al-Afshīn to be returned to his prison and Māzyār to be beaten with 450 lashes; he begged for water, was given some, and then expired immediately.[511]

In this year al-Muʿtaṣim became angry with al-Afshīn and imprisoned him.

The Reason for al-Muʿtaṣim's Anger against al-Afshīn and His Imprisoning Him

It has been mentioned that, during the time when al-Afshīn was engaged in his war with Bābak and was stationed in the land of the Khurramiyyah, all the presents that he received from the people of Armenia he invariably sent on to Ushrūsanah.[512] These [1304] presents used to pass through [the territory of] ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir,

---

510. These two verses are a repetition of those given in Ṭabarī, III, 1230 (p. 000, above), with the substitution of Jīlān, alluding to Māzyār's title Jīl-i Jīlān (Ṭabarī, III, 1298 [p. 172, above]), for Shaytān in the first verse.

511. Balādhurī, op. cit., 340; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 138–39 = pars. 2820–21; Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 403, placing this event in the previous year, 224; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 510; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 125; Herzfeld, op. cit., 145; Rekaya, "Māzyār," 188–89. The Persian local historical sources, e.g., Marʿashī, op. cit., 231, state that the line of Qārin, the Qārinwands, expired with Māzyār's execution. However, Madelung, "Minor Dynasties," 205, has pointed out that petty rulers in Lafūr (see Ṭabarī, III, 1287 [p. 161 n. 460, above]) are mentioned in the fourth (tenth) and fifth (eleventh) centuries and described as Qārinids; one branch at least of the family thus survived.

512. The province to the south of the great bend of the Jaxartes River, lying between it and the river of Soghdia; al-Afshīn's family were hereditary rulers of Ushrūsanah, continuing there after Khaydhar's death until 280 (893). See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 197; Le Strange, 474–76; Barthold, Turkestan, 165–69, 211; Bosworth and Clauson, op. cit., 7–8; EI[1], s.v. Osrūshana (J. H. Kramers).

who therefore wrote to al-Mu'taṣim about this affair. Hence al-Mu'taṣim wrote back to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, ordering him to set down a detailed description of all the presents that al-Afshīn was sending to Ushrūsanah, and 'Abdallāh did that. Whenever any of the money in question was ready and at hand with al-Afshīn, he would load it round the waists of his retainers in the form of dīnārs and waist purses (al-hamāyīn), as much as they could carry. A man used to carry 1,000 dīnārs and more round his waist. 'Abdallāh was informed about this, so that one day, when al-Afshīn's envoys had halted at Naysābūr, having the presents with them, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir sent after them and apprehended them. He searched them and found the purses around their waists, which he took away from them, saying to them, "Where did you get all this money?" The replied, "There are presents given to al-Afshīn, and they're his property." 'Abdallāh said, "You're lying; if my colleague al-Afshīn had wished to send such wealth as this, he would have written to me informing me about it so that I might order measures for guarding it and provide an escort for it, for that is an enormous sum! You are nothing but thieves!"

At that, 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir confiscated the money and distributed it to the troops under his command. He wrote back to al-Afshīn, recounting to him what the men had said and himself saying [in his letter], "I am unable to believe that you can have sent such a sum of money as this to Ushrūsanah without writing to me informing me of it, so that I might provide an escort for it. So, if this wealth is not in fact yours, well, I have distributed it to the troops in place of the money that the Commander of the Faithful forwards to me each year (i.e., for the payment of their salaries). If, however, the money really is yours, as the men assert, then, when the money arrives from the Commander of the Faithful, I will return it to you. Again, if the position should be [1305] otherwise, then the Commander of the Faithful has the best entitlement to this money. I simply gave it to the troops because I intend sending them out to the land of the Turks (i.e., on a campaign into the Central Asian steppelands)." Al-Afshīn thereupon wrote back to 'Abdallāh, telling him that his own money and the Commander of the Faithful's money were one and the same and requesting that 'Abdallāh set the men free, so that they might proceed to Ushrūsanah. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir accordingly released them, and they went on their way. However, this was the reason for the hostility that arose between ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and al-Afshīn; thereafter, ʿAbdallāh began to keep a close watch on him.[513]

From time to time, al-Afshīn used to hear words from al-Muʿtaṣim that indicated that he wanted to remove the Ṭāhirids from Khurāsān. Al-Afshīn coveted the governorship of Khurāsān for himself, so he began to send letters to Māzyār, inciting him to rebel and undertaking to assume the task of defending him with regard to the ruling power (al-sulṭān), thinking that, if Māzyār should rebel, al-Muʿtaṣim would, will-nilly, have to send him to combat Māzyār, would remove ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir from office, and would appoint him governor of Khurāsān instead. What subsequently transpired regarding Māzyār we have already recounted, and what happened regarding Minkajūr in Ādharbayjān we have already described.

What al-Muʿtaṣim had suspected regarding Minkajūr's affair and the fact that al-Afshīn's planning and express instructions to Minkajūr must have lain behind it became confirmed in the caliph's mind by al-Afshīn's correspondence with Māzyār in the terms that al-Afshīn had actually been carrying it on. Because of that, al-Muʿtaṣim's attitude toward al-Afshīn changed, and the latter sensed it and realized al-Muʿtaṣim's altered opinion of him but did not know what to do. He therefore resolved, according to what has been mentioned, to prepare rafts of inflated waterskins (aṭwāf)[514] in his palace and to employ the stratagem, on some day when al-Muʿtaṣim and his commanders were [1306] otherwise occupied, of taking the road to al-Mawṣil and crossing the Zāb[515] on those waterskin rafts until he should reach the land of Armenia and then the land of the Khazars.[516] This plan proved, however, difficult to execute, so he prepared [instead] a great

513. Herzfeld, op. cit., 145–46.

514. On these (sing. ṭawf), which were used for constructing rafts on the rivers of Iraq (known by the term kelek, for which see *EI*², s.v. Kelek [H. Kindermann]), see Bosworth, "Some Remarks on the Terminology," 84–85.

515. This river would be the Lesser Zāb, the left-bank affluent of the Tigris, which joints it at al-Sinn; see Le Strange, Lands, 90–91.

516. I.e., the land of the Turkish people of that name, north of the Caucasus and along the lower course of the Volga River. See D. M. Dunlop, The History of the Jewish Khazars; *EI*², s.v. Khazar (W. Barthold-[P. B. Golden]).

quantity of poison and decided on arranging a banquet, to which he would summon al-Mu'taṣim and his commanders and then give them to drink [the poison]. If al-Mu'taṣim were to refuse the invitation, he would seek the caliph's permission to invite his Turkish commanders, such as Ashnās, Aytākh, etc., on some day when the Commander of the Faithful was otherwise occupied. Then, when they came to him, he would ply them with food and drink and poison them, and then, when they had left his residence, he would go forth in the early part of the night, carrying on the backs of pack animals those waterskin rafts and other equipment for making a crossing, until he should come to the Zāb. He and his baggage would then cross on the rafts while the pack animals would swim across as best they could. He would then send on the rafts so that he might cross the Tigris and enter Armenia, the governorship of which he himself held. From there he would proceed to the land of the Khazars, seeking a guarantee of safe-conduct through them, thence go round from the land of the Khazars to that of the Turks, and return from the latter territory to the province of Ushrūsanah. Having achieved this, he planned to win over the Khazars into hostility against the Muslims. His preparations for this course of action got under way, but the whole affair took up an inordinate amount of time, and he was unable to achieve it.[517]

Al-Afshīn's commanders used to take turns [i.e., at guard duty] in the Commander of the Faithful's palace, as is the custom with commanders. A conversation had taken place between Wājan[518] al-Ushrūsanī and some person who had become aware of al-Afshīn's plans, and Wājan had told this person that, in his opinion, the scheme was not possible and could not be brought to a conclusion. The man who heard Wājan's words went away and [1307] related them to al-Afshīn. One of al-Afshīn's slaves [or: eunuchs, khadam[519]] and intimates, whose sympathies inclined toward Wājan, overheard what al-Afshīn said concerning Wājan; so, when Wājan came back from his turn of guard duty one night, this man went to him and told him that this matter [i.e., of

517. Herzfeld, op. cit., 146.

518. On this Iranian name [the Bīzhan son of Gīw of the Shāh-nāma], see Justi, op. cit., 367, and Herzfeld, op. cit., 146 n. 1. Marquart, Untersuchungen, I, 68, cites Parthian wēǰan, wēzhan, bēzhan "of good stock."

519. See p. 134 n. 375, above.

Wājan's doubts about the feasibility of al-Afshīn's plans) had been related to al-Afshīn.

Wājan was accordingly put on his guard and immediately rode off in the dead of the night till he came to the Commander of the Faithful's palace at a time when al-Muʿtaṣim himself was asleep. So Wājan went to Aytākh and told him, "I have some important counsel for the Commander of the Faithful." Aytākh replied, "You're here at the wrong time; the Commander of the Faithful has gone to sleep!" Wājan told him, however, "I can't wait until morning!" Aytākh therefore knocked on the door of someone who would inform al-Muʿtaṣim about what Wājan said. Al-Muʿtaṣim sent back word, "Tell him to return to his house tonight and come back to me first thing in the morning." But Wājan replied, "If I return tonight, I shall die." At that, al-Muʿtaṣim sent the message back to Aytākh, "Have him spend the night with you." Aytākh had Wājan spend the night with him, and then, when it was morning, he went with him at the time of the dawn worship and introduced him into al-Muʿtaṣim's presence. Wājan told al-Muʿtaṣim everything he knew, at which al-Muʿtaṣim sent for Muḥammad b. Ḥammād b. D.n.q.sh al-Kātib[520] and dispatched him to summon al-Afshīn. The latter arrived, dressed in black robes, but al-Muʿtaṣim ordered these to be taken away from him and consigned him to prison. He was incarcerated in al-Jawsaq,[521] but then the caliph had a lofty prison built for him within al-Jawsaq, which he named al-Luʾluʾah ("the Pearl")[522] and which is known until today[523] as [the prison of] al-Afshīn.[524]

---

520. Ḥājib or door keeper to al-Muʿtaṣim, according to Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 356, trans., 457. As Sourdel notes, Vizirat, I, 242, the office of ḥijābah was very much in the background during this period, and its holders are shadowy persons. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrikh, II, 584, included Muḥammad b. Ḥammād among a group of Turks who served as *ḥājib*s for al-Muʿtaṣim. From an anecdote in Tanūkhī, op. cit., VI, 162–63, it emerges that Ḥammād b. D.n.q.sh had been a mawlā of al-Manṣūr's; the son Muḥammad was subsequently to become al-Muhtadī's ṣāḥib al-shurṭah, according to this same source.

521. On this palace, see pp. 26 n. 97, 87 n. 232, above.

522. Not to be confused with the Luʾluʾah Palace constructed later by al-Mutawakkil, at vast expense, in the Jaʿfariyyah district of Sāmarrā; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 128, 132.

523. The words ilā al-ān are added in the Cairo edition, IX, 106.

524. Herzfeld, op. cit., 146–47. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 138 = par. 2820, uniquely has the detail that al-Afshīn was denounced by a secretary of his called Sābūr.

Al-Mu'taṣim wrote to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, telling him to employ a stratagem against al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn. Now al-Ḥasan had bombarded 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir with letters [complaining] about Nūḥ b. Asad, informing him about Nūḥ's unjust and oppressive treatment of him regarding his (al-Ḥasan's) estates and his region.[525] So 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir wrote to Nūḥ b. Asad informing [1308] him about what the Commander of the Faithful had written to him concerning al-Ḥasan, and he ordered him to gather together his forces and make preparations for al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn, so that, when the latter should come to him with a letter announcing his appointment to the governorship, Nūḥ was to secure his person and bring him to 'Abdallāh. [At the same time], 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir wrote to al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn, informing him that he had dismissed Nūḥ b. Asad from office and had appointed him (al-Ḥasan) governor of the region instead, and he sent to him the official letter of Nūḥ b. Asad's dismissal. At that, al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn set off with only a small force of his troops and few weapons until he reached Nūḥ. b. Asad, all this time under the delusion that he himself was the new governor of the region. But Nūḥ b. Asad seized him, placed him in secure bonds, and sent him to 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, who in turn sent him to al-Mu'taṣim.[526]

The prison that was built for al-Afshīn was in the form of a minaret, and inside it was left just sufficient space for al-Afshīn to sit down.[527] The guards used to walk round the minaret's perimeter below it during their spells of duty.

It has been mentioned from Hārūn b. 'Īsā b. al-Manṣūr[528] that he said: I was present in al-Mu'taṣim's palace, where there were

525. Nūḥ b. Asad was one of the four Sāmānid brothers given governorships in Transoxania and eastern Khurāsān by al-Ma'mūn as a reward for their support. As governor in Samarqand, Nūḥ would endeavor at this time to extend his authority over the neighboring principality of Ushrūsanah, thus clashing with al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn. See Barthold, Turkestan, 209–11; Frye, "Sāmānids," 136.

526. Herzfeld, op. cit., 147. Michael the Syrian, Chronicle, III, 103, says that 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, on the Caliph's orders, forced al-Ḥasan to divorce Utrunjah bt. Ashnās, whom he had married with such pomp the previous year; see Ṭabarī, III, 1300–1 (pp. 174–75, above).

527. Following Herzfeld's translation, op. cit., 147 and n. 2, pace Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 114.

528. A great-nephew of his, Isḥāq b. Muḥammad, is mentioned in the Kitāb al-aghānī; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 147 n. 3.

also assembled Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād,[529] Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt. Al-Afshīn was brought in, he not yet being in the strong prison. A group of prominent figures had been assembled to heap reproaches on al-Afshīn for what he had done, and not a single person of high social or official rank (aḥad min aṣḥāb al-marātib)[530] was left in the palace apart from the sons (i.e., the lineal descendants) of al-Manṣūr, the rest of the [generality of] people having been dismissed. The prosecutor (al-munāẓir)[531] chose for al-Afshīn was Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, and those who had been

529. The prominent part played by the chief judge in the interrogation and condemnation of al-Afshīn is noteworthy. Sadighi, op. cit., 291 ff., sees in the whole affair a reflection of Arab hatred of the Iranian element in the caliphate and its prominence (hence a continuation of the tension between the eastern part of the caliphate and the Arabs of the Iraqi and Syrian heartlands, discernible in the previous caliphates of al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn). Later sources—but not Ṭabarī here—give another explanation for this personal hostility between the chief judge and al-Afshīn. In the Arabic sources of the fourth (tenth) century (sc. Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Kitāb al-aghānī, and Tanūkhī, op. cit., VII, 246–47) we find a story that Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād had saved the life of the Arab general Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim al-'Iǰlī, who had commanded the volunteers during al-Afshīn's last campaign against Bābak (see Ṭabarī, III, 1206 ff. [pp. 59 ff. and n. 176, above]) and who is depicted in Arabic adab literature as an all-round Arab hero, after he had somehow fallen into al-Afshīn's power. Aḥmad had interceded for him, explaining to the Caliph about al-Afshīn's hatred for the Arabs and Arabic culture in all its aspects (see Sadighi, op. cit., 291–92; Herzfeld, op. cit., 140). The story is given at great length and with much circumstantial detail by the Persian historian of he Ghaznavid period Abū al-Faḍl Bayhaqī in his Ta'rīkh-i Mas'ūdī, trans. of this section in A. de Biberstein-Kazimirski, Menoutchehri, 149–54. Whether or not full credence should be attached to Bayhaqī's highly ornamented narrative is uncertain; his authority for the story is one Ismā'īl b. Shihāb, not recorded as a rāwī in Ṭabarī. But the authority for the briefer version in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Kitāb al-aghānī, Būlāq ed., VII, 154–55 = ed. Ibrāhīm, VIII, 250–51) is Aḥmad b. Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr (presumably from the lost later part of his history), and one must conclude that there is some substance to it.

530. In 'Abbāsid court and ceremonial procedure these persons of rank (martabah) included other members of the 'Abbāsid family, descendants of the Rightly Guided Caliphs, the Umayyad Caliphs, the 'Alids, etc. The term martabah also denotes the physical embodiment of this status, in the form of a cushion or seat of a height appropriate to its user's rank. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 140; Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 139 ff.; *EI*², s.v. Marāsim. 1. Under the Caliphate and Fāṭimids (P. Sanders).

531. A term also used for the official charged with extracting the ill-gotten gains of fallen officials, if necessary by violence, the process being called muṣādarah or munāẓarah; see *EI*², s.vv. Muṣādara. 2. In the Mediaeval Caliphate; Mustakhridj (C. E. Bosworth).

assembled there included al-Māzyār, the ruler of Ṭabaristān; the Mūbadh;[532] al-Marzubān b. T.r.k.sh, who was one of the princes of al-Sughd;[533] and two men from among the people of al-Sughd. [1309]

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik summoned first the two men, who were dressed in threadbare garments. Muḥammad ʿAbd al-Malik said to them, "What happened to you?" They uncovered their backs, which were stripped of flesh, and Muḥammad said to al-Afshīn, "Do you know these two men?" He replied, "Yes, this one is a muezzin and the other an imām. They built a mosque in Ushrūsanah, so I gave each of them 1,000 lashes because there exists between me and the princes of al-Sughd a covenant and stipulation that I should leave each people to their own religion and beliefs. These two men fell upon a house that contained their idols"—he meant [those] of the people of Ushrūsanah—"and then threw out the idols and turned it into a mosque. I accordingly gave them 1,000 lashes each because of their transgression and their keeping the people from their place of worship."[534]

Muḥammad now asked him, "What is a certain book that you have and that you have ornamented with gold, jewels, and satin brocade and that contains blasphemies against God?"[535] Al-Afshīn replied, "This is a book that I inherited from my father and that contains some of the wise counsels (ādāb) of the Persians. As for what you mention concerning blasphemies, I used to enjoy the wise counsels in it and ignore the rest. I found it already adorned, and there was nothing to impel me to remove

532. I.e., the chief priest of the Zoroastrian community, the Mōbadh-Mōbadhān; see *EI*², s.v. Mōbadh [M. Guidi-[M. G. Morony]].

533. Al-Marzubān (literally, "warden of the marches") b. T.r.k.sh (perhaps to be vocalized Türgesh, after the Western Turks, or Türgesh, who had been active in military intervention in Soghdia a century or so previously) was the dihqān, or local ruler, of a district near Samarqand, which was named Marzbān after him. See Barthold, Turkestan, 95; Le Strange, Lands, 466.

534. The two Muslim zealots were thus punished for their ill-considered and fanatical iconoclasm, which affronted the beliefs of the majority of the population of Ushrūsanah, not yet converted to Islam; al-Afshīn, though personally a Muslim, regarded it as conducive to social and religious harmony in his principality to curb the Muslims' excesses. Thus one does not have to assume, as does E. M. Wright, op. cit., 57, that al-Afshīn was himself still a secret devotee of the old religion of his subjects.

535. There has been speculation that this may be an allusion to the illuminated, finely written books of the Manichaeans; see p. 200, below.

the decoration from it. Thus I left it as it was, like the Book of Kalīlah and Dimnah[536] and the Book of Mazdak[537] in your own house. I did not think that this was in any way going outside Islam."

Hārūn b. 'Īsā b. al-Manṣūr continued: Then the Mūbadh came forward and said, "This man used to eat the flesh of strangled beasts, and he used to urge me to eat it also, alleging that it was more tender than meat that had been [ritually] slaughtered.[538] He used to kill a black ewe each Wednesday; he would sever it through the middle with a sword, walk between [1310] the two halves, and then eat its flesh. One day he said to me, "I have fallen in with these people (i.e., the Muslims) regarding everything that I in fact detest, to the point that, for them, I have gone as far as eating oil, riding camels, and wearing sandals; however, no hair has so far ever fallen from me," meaning that he had never smeared himself (i.e., had never used depilatories on his pubic hair) or been circumcised. Al-Afshīn replied, "Tell me about this man who utters these words—is he trustworthy in his own religion?" Now the Mūbadh was a Magian who subsequently converted to Islam at the hand of al-Mutawakkil and became one of the latter's boon companions. They replied, "No." Al-Afshīn said, "Then what is the meaning of your accepting testimony from a man whom you don't trust or account competent to act as a valid legal witness?"[539] Then he went up to

536. I.e., the Arabic version of the Fables of Bidpai, based on the Sanskrit Panchatantra and translated into Arabic from the Pahlavi version by Ibn al-Muqaffa' (d. ca. 139 [756]); see *EI*², s.v. Kalīla wa-Dimna (C. Brockelmann).

537. This work, also translated into Arabic by Ibn al-Muqaffa', apparently belonged, like Kalīlah wa-Dimnah, to the genre of adab, intended to divert, and was not a work of theology or polemic; see Ṭabarī, trans. Nöldeke, 461 n. 2. However, Sadighi, op. cit., 295 n. 2, cites the Persian scholar 'Abbās Iqbāl to the effect that it is not a Kitāb Mazdak but a Kitāb Marwak (cf. the reading in Ṭabarī's text, n. o: M.r.w.t.k). Marwak was a legendary person to whom aphorisms and wise sayings were attributed; the book would thus still be a work of adab.

538. I.e., in the manner conforming to Islamic law, with the animal's throat cut and the blood drained. See Hughes, op. cit., 697, s.v. Zabh; *EI*², s.v. Dhabīḥa (G.-H. Bousquet).

539. Because he was a Zoroastrian, the Mūbadh's legal testimony ('adālah) could not be accepted as the equal of a Muslim's or, indeed, be regarded as admissible at all in a legal suit with a Muslim. See A. Fattal, Le statut légal, 361 ff.; on the role of the 'adl in general, see J. Schacht, Introduction to Islamic Law, 193–94; *EI*², s.v. 'Adl (E. Tyan).

the Mūbadh and said, "Was there any door running between my house and yours or any garret window by means of which you could look down upon me and know what I was doing?" He replied, "No." Al-Afshīn continued, "Didn't I let you come in to me, and didn't I communicate to you my inner secrets and tell you about the concept of Persian national consciousness (al-a'jamiyyah) and my sympathies for it and for its exponents?" He replied, "Yes." Al-Afshīn went on, "Then in that case you were neither trustworthy in your own religion nor upright in keeping to your word, as you divulged openly, to my detriment, a secret that I had confided to you."[540]

Then the Mūbadh went aside, and al-Marzubān b. T.r.k.sh came forward. They said to al-Afshīn, "Do you know this man?" He replied, "No." Then al-Marzubān was asked, "Do you know this man?" He replied, "Yes, he is al-Afshīn." They told al-Afshīn, "This is al-Marzubān." The latter said to al-Afshīn, "O liar and trickster (mumakhriq), how long will you fend off [the truth] and confuse the issues?" But al-Afshīn replied, "O long-beard,[541] what are you talking about?" Al-Marzubān asked, "How do the people of your province address you in correspondence?" Al-Afshīn replied, "Just as they used to address my father and grandfather." Al-Marzubān said, "Explain that," but al-Afshīn retorted, "I won't." Al-Marzubān said, "Don't they write to you in such-and-such terms in the language of Ushrūsanah?"[542] Al-Afshīn admitted, "Yes, indeed." Al-Marzubān continued, "Doesn't that mean in Arabic, 'To the God of Gods, from his [1311] servant So-and-so, son of So-and-so'?" He said, "Yes, indeed." Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik now asked, "Do Muslims allow themselves to be addressed in this way? What have you left for Pharaoh when he said to his people, 'I am your supreme Lord'?"[543]

---

540. Herzfeld, op. cit., 148.

541. This being taken as a sign of stupidity; see Glossarium, CCCXLIV.

542. In Addenda et emendanda, DCCLXXIV. Von Kremer plausibly suggested reading the Persian title khudā-yi khudā instead of the Arabic of the text kadhā wa-kadhā, presumably with the same meaning in Persian "lord of lords" [though this would actually require khudā-yi khudāyān].

543. Qur'ān, LXXXIX:24, taken as revealing Pharaoh's pretentions to divinity, an idea borrowed from the Jewish Aggada. In the Midrashim we also find the idea that Pharaoh falsely claimed divinity in order to delude the stupid Egyptians; see A. Geiger, Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthume aufgenommen? 157–58; L.

Al-Afshīn answered, "This was the custom of the people when addressing my father and grandfather and when speaking to myself before I became a Muslim, and I was reluctant to lower my status to a level inferior to them and thus adversely affect their obedience to me." Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab reproached him, "Woe to you, O Khaydhar,[544] how can you swear by God to us in such a way that we can consider you veracious, hold your oath reliable, and treat you like other Muslims when you claim for yourself what Pharaoh claimed?" Al-Afshīn replied, "O Abū al-Ḥusayn, this is a sūrah that 'Ujayf cited against 'Alī b. Hishām,[545] and now you cite it against me! Consider carefully who may cite it against you tomorrow!"[546]

Hārūn b. 'Īsā b. al-Manṣūr continued: Then Māzyār, the ruler of Ṭabaristān, was brought forward, and they said to al-Afshīn, "Do you know this man?" He replied, "No." Then they said to al-Māzyār, "Do you know this man?" He replied, "Yes, he's al-Afshīn." They said to al-Afshīn, "This is al-Māzyār," and he replied, "Yes, I recognize him now." They asked, "Did you enter into correspondence with him?" He replied, "No." They asked al-Māzyār, "Did he write to you?" And he replied, "Yes. his brother Khāsh wrote to my brother Qūhyār in these terms, 'Indeed, there has been no one to uphold this pure religion (literally, "white religion," al-dīn al-abyaḍ)[547] but myself, you,

---

Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, II, 347–48, V, 201 n. 87, 427 n. 175, VI, 354 n. 16, 423 n. 100.

544. The use of the ism, or given name, for someone of al-Afshīn's status would be regarded as contemptuous; al-Afshīn himself uses Isḥāq's kunyah, or patronymic, implying respectful intimacy, when replying to him.

545. Al-Ma'mūn's governor of Ādharbayjān, Jibāl, and Armenia but executed, with his brother Ḥusayn, after 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah had been sent against him, in 217 (832–32); see Ṭabarī, III, 1107–9.

546. As Sadighi, op. cit., 297 n. 1, points out, the Arab accusers of al-Afshīn are unable to comprehend the purely protocolar nature of the titulature in a letter addressed to an Iranian prince.

547. Browne, op. cit., I, 334, translates "this Most Luminous Religion." Herzfeld, op. cit., 149 n. 2, takes abyaḍ here in the sense of "decisive, categorically true" and states that he is unable to discern any connection with the use of colors to denote various sectarian religious groups. White had, of course, been associated with the movement of al-Muqanna' in Transoxania, that of the "wearers of white," Mubayyiḍah, Ispīdh-Jāmagān. Certainly Islam is characterized in more than one source as the "black religion," in contrast to the "white religion" of the Persians; see Scarcia Amoretti, op. cit., 500, 513.

and Bābak. But as for Bābak, he brought about his own death through his foolishness. I exerted myself to avert death from him, but his folly inevitably led him into falling into what he eventually fell into (i.e., his death). But if you rebel, these people [1312] (the Arabs) will have no one except myself to launch against you. I have with me cavalry and valiant, fearless troops, and if I am sent against you there will be no one left to combat us apart from three groups—the Arabs, the Maghāribah, and the Turks. As for the Arab, he is like a dog; I will throw him a scrap of food and then beat his brains out with a mace. As for these flies"[548]—meaning the Maghāribah—"they are only a handful. As for those sons of devils"—meaning the Turks—"it is only a short period of time before they will have loosed off their arrows, and then the cavalry will swoop down on them in a concerted charge and destroy them to the last man.[549] [After that] the [true] religion will return to what it always was in the days of the Persians."

Al-Afshīn commented, "This fellow is marking an allegation against his own brother and my brother[550] that should not be imputed to me. Even if I had written such a letter as this to him in order that I might win him over to my side and that he might feel confident of my support and favor (literally, "my flank," nāḥiyatī),[551] it would not have been anything to be deprecated. For if I can aid the caliph with my hands, it is all the more fitting for me to aid him with cunning stratagems in order to seize him (Māzyār) unawares and bring him to the caliph, that I might thereby enjoy his favor as does ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir with the caliph." Then al-Māzyār was sent away on one side.[552]

---

548. Presumably a contemptuous reference to the swarthy and dark skins of the Maghāribah.

549. Herzfeld, op. cit., 149 n. 3, cites as a parallel to this judgment of the relative merits and demerits of these different groups of warriors similar words of al-Maʾmūn and al-Muʿtaṣim, used in a discussion, from Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr's Kitāb Baghdād.

550. The variant reading of ms. O, "against me and against my brother," makes equally good sense.

551. For these transferred meanings of nāḥiyah, see Glossarium, DV.

552. E. M. Wright, op. cit., 126, notes that al-Afshīn's evasiveness here—his defense that the letter was really his brother's and that, even if he himself had written it, it was for use as a stratagem to gain Māzyār's confidence and then capture him—leaves the impression that al-Afshīn had no strong desire to deny the genuineness of at least the letter's contents.

When al-Afshīn replied to al-Marzubān al-T.r.k.shī as recorded above and to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm in those above-mentioned terms, Ibn Abī Duwād chided him; but al-Afshīn said to him, "O Abū ʿAbdallāh, you lift your ṭaylasān with your hand and won't place it back on your shoulder until you have killed a great number by means of it."[553] Ibn Abī Duwād asked him, "Are you circumcised?" He replied, "No." Ibn Abī Duwād said, "So what kept you back from that, seeing that it signifies completion of one's Muslim faith and purification from uncleanliness?" Al-Afshīn replied, "Is there not a place in the Islamic faith for prudent dissimulation (al-taqiyyah)?"[554] He said, "Yes, certainly." Al-[1313] Afshīn continued, "I was afraid to cut that member of my body, lest I die." Ibn Abī Duwād observed, "You may be pierced with spears and struck with swords, but still that does not prevent you from engaging in battle; yet you are anxious about cutting a foreskin!" Al-Afshīn replied, "That first eventuality is a necessary affliction that may befall me, and I shall have to bear it when it occurs. But this last is something that I would draw upon myself voluntarily, and I am not sure that it might not involve my death. Moreover, I was not aware that the omission of being circumcised means the renunciation of Islam."[555]

At that Ibn Abī Duwād exclaimed, "His case has now become clear to all of you. O Bughā"—he was adressing Bughā al-Kabīr Abū Mūsā al-Turkī—"seize him!" He related: Bughā clapped his hand on al-Afshīn's girdle and pulled him toward himself, saying, "I had been expecting this [condemnation] from you (from the assembled inquisitors) before now!" He drew the fullness of al-

---

553. I.e., by condemning men to death through the exercise of his judicial authority, symbolized by his wearing of the ṭaylasān, a loose hood or gown worn by the faqīh, or religious lawyer. See Dozy, Vêtements, 278–80; Herzfeld, op. cit., 150 n. 2; p. 31 n. 120, above.

554. Taqiyyah or kitmān, the justifiable concealment of one's true religious views when under duress or threat of injury, recognized by Sunnīs but of special significance to the Shīʿah, who often suffered persecution or discrimination; see EI[1], s.v. Taḳiya (R. Strothmann).

555. Male circumcision is not, of course, prescribed in the Qurʾān, but in continuation of pre-Islamic practices and in accordance with much of ancient Near Eastern religion, above all that of the Hebrews, it came to be regarded very early in Islam as a touchstone of the faith; most of the law schools regard it as mandūb, recommended. See Rekaya, "Māzyār," 163; EI[2], s.v. Khitān (A. J. Wensinck).

Afshīn's qabā' over his head, and then he grasped the parts of the qabā' itself firmly at his neck and brought al-Afshīn out via the Bāb al-Wazīrī[556] to his prison.[557]

In this year 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir caused al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn and Utrunjah bt. Ashnās to be conveyed to Sāmarrā.

In this year Muḥammad b. Dāwūd led the Pilgrimage.[558]

---

556. See Herzfeld, op. cit., 96, 150, regarding the problems of locating this; it may have been a gate out of the Jawsaq Palace leading to Qaṣr al-Wazīrī or a doorway within the palace where the vizier usually worked. Whether the al-Wazīriyyah also mentioned in the sources for this period as being in Sāmarrā is to be identified with this Bāb al-Wazīrī or whether it was a separate locality is unclear; see also p. 200 n. 583, below.

557. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, II, 583; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 137–39 = pars. 2819–21; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 405–6; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 513–16; The trial of al-Afshīn has been translated almost entirely by Browne, op. cit., I, 331–36; Sadighi, op. cit., 294–304; and Herzfeld, op. cit., 147–50, with comments and paraphrases, and analyzed by E. Wright, op. cit., 56–59, 124–27; cf. also Kaabi, op. cit., I, 255–57; Rekaya, "Māzyār," 163 ff., 189–90.

558. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 790; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 516.

The Events of the Year 226

(October 31, 840–October 20, 841)

The Rebellion of ʿAlī b. Isḥāq in Damascus

These events included the rebellion of ʿAlī b. Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Muʿādh,[559] who was in charge of police duties (al-maʿūnah)[560] at Damascus on the authority of Ṣūl Er-Tigīn,[561] involving an attack on Rajāʾ b. ʿAlī al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who was in charge of the department of tax collecting. He killed Rajāʾ and then feigned madness 559. The son of al-Muʿtaṣim's recently appointed commander of the guard; see Ṭabarī, III, 1303 (p. 179, above).

560. Von Sivers, op. cit., 223, takes maʿūnah, however, as meaning here "auxiliary troops," and this would fit the context equally well; we are obviously dealing with locally raised or long-resident troops of the Syrian jund, who, as von Sivers points out, must have resented the appointment, a year previously, of a slave commander of the new caliphal guard from the east, Ashnās, as overall governor of Syria and al-Jazīrah, in place of the ʿAbbāsid ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Faḍl b. Ṣālih b. ʿAlī (see p. 178 n. 504, above). Finally, in regard to this ambiguous term maʿūnah, pl. maʿūnah, one should note that it is also used in the sense of extraordinary taxes and levies for the support of officials. See Løkkegaard, op. cit., 186–7; *EI*², s.v. Maʿūna (P. Crone).

561. For the origins of Ṣūl Er-Tigīn in the caliphal service, see Ṭabarī, III, 1194 (p. 44 and n. 148, above).

(aẓhara al-waswās).[562] [However,] Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād [1314] subsequently spoke up for him, and he was released from his prison.[563] Al-Ḥasan b. Rajā' used to encounter him on the street in Sāmarrā. Al-Buḥturi al-Ṭā'ī[564] said:

Through his impetuousness 'Alī b. Isḥāq erased the traces of the strange haughtiness that was once in al-Ḥasan.
A certain serious happening made him forget his loud, futile talk and left in him nothing but surrender to fate.
He was not like Ibn Ḥujr[565] when he was angry or like the brother of Kulayb[566] or Sayf b. Dhī Yazan.[567]
It was never said to you regarding an act of blood vengeance that you sought,
"[The blood of] those noble souls is not [like] two bowls of milk curds."[568]

In this year Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn died, and al-Mu'taṣim led the worship over him in Muḥammad's own house.[569]

In this year al-Afshīn died.

---

562. The verb waswasa is frequently used of the "whisperings" of Satan, but the interpretation followed here is that of von Sivers, op. cit., 223, that he feigned madness or diabolical possession in order to provide an excuse for his rebellious actions.

563. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 517.

564. Al-Walīd b. 'Ubayd[allāh], of the Buḥtur clan of the Banū Ṭayyi', (died 284 (897)), was a poet and author of an anthology called, like that of Abū Tammām, the Ḥamāsah. He was at this time a protégé of his fellow-Ṭā'ī the commander Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf (see p. 15 n. 58, above). See also GAS, II, 560–64, IX, 300–1; *EI*², s.v. al-Buḥturī (Ch. Pellat).

565. I.e., the famous pre-Islamic poet-king Imru' al-Qays b. Ḥujr al-Kindī.

566. I.e., Muhalhil b. Rabī'ah, avenger of Kulayb on the enemy tribe of Bakr in the pre-Islamic War of Basūs. See R. A. Nicholson, Literary History, 55–59; *EI*², s.v. Kulayb b. Rabī'a (G. Levi della Vida).

567. The Ḥimyarite prince famed for his role in the expulsion of the alien Abyssinians from South Arabia in the sixth century. See Nicholson, op. cit., 28–29; *EI*¹, s.v. Saif b. Dhī Yazan (R. Paret).

568. Al-Buḥturī, Dīwān, ed. al-Ṣayrafī, IV, 2246 no, 883.

569. This item of information cannot be correct, as Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭahir lived on until 253 (867), in al-Mu'tazz's caliphate, having played a leading role in affairs of the time. See Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic Culture," 68–69; Kaabi, op. cit., I, 299–312.

Al-Afshīn's Death, the Treatment of Him at That Time, and What Was Done with His Corpse after His Death

It has been mentioned from Ḥamdūn b. Ismāʿīl[570] that he related: When the new fruits came into season al-Muʿtaṣim gathered some of them on a platter and told his son Hārūn al-Wāthiq, "Go personally with these fruits to al-Afshīn and convey them to him." So they were brought along with Hārūn al-Wāthiq until he [1315] went up with them to al-Afshīn in the building that had been constructed for the latter's imprisonment and that was called Luʾluʾah. Al-Afshīn looked at the platter but missed certain fruits (or: "looked for certain fruits," iftaqada), either ordinary plums (ijjāṣ) or plums of the shāhlūj variety,[571] and exclaimed to al-Wāthiq, "There is no god but God! What an excellent platter, except that there are no ijjāṣ or shāhlūj plums there for me!" Al-Wāthiq replied, "That's true! I'll go back and send the missing fruit to you," al-Afshīn not having at that point touched any of the fruit. When al-Wāthiq got ready to go back, al-Afshīn said to him, "Give my lord greetings, and tell him, 'I beseech you to send me a trustworthy person from your entourage, who will convey what I shall say.'"[572]

Al-Muʿtaṣim at this point gave orders to Ḥamdūn b. Ismāʿīl—it was this Ḥamdūn who was, during al-Mutawakkil's reign, imprisoned by Sulaymān b. Wahb[573] in the very same prison where al-Afshīn was incarcerated, and he related this story when he was actually in it. Ḥamdūn said: Al-Muʿtaṣim sent me to

---

570. Ibrāhīm, called Ḥamdūn, b. Ismāʿīl b. Dāwūd b. Ḥamdūn, was a courtier and boon companion of al-Maʾmūn, al-Muʿtaṣim, and their successors. With his son Abū ʿAbdallāh he figures frequently in anecdotes in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, passim, and in Ibrāhīm al-Bayhaqī, op. cit., ed. Schwally, 164–68, 574–75 = ed. Ibrāhīm, I, 249–53, II, 328–30; see also Herzfeld, op. cit., 151 n. 1. The Ḥamdūn family of boon companions ran to four generations; see A. G. Chejne, "The Boon-Companion," 335; Masʿūdī, Murūj, ed. Pellat, VI, 285–86.

571. This type of plum is also found in Persian, spelled shāh-lūk; see Vullers, op. cit., II, 396. On ijjāṣ, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 10.

572. E. M. Wright, op. cit., 127, takes al-Muʿtaṣim's offer of the fruit as a sign that he intended momentarily to relent toward al-Afshīn.

573. I.e., the man who was subsequently the vizier of al-Muhtadī and al-Muʿtamid and who had previously been secretary to Mūsā b. Bughā al-Kabīr and Aytākh; he died in 271 (884–85) or 272 (885–86). See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 300–3, 310–13; EI[1], s.v. Sulaimān b. Wahb (K. V. Zetterstéen).

al-Afshīn and told me, "He will spin out his tale for you, so don't dally there." He related: I accordingly went in to al-Afshīn, who had the platter of fruit still in front of him, not having touched a single piece or more from it. He said to me, "Sit down," so I sat down, and he tried to win me over by stressing his position as a noble figure among the Persians (bi-al-dahqanah). I told him, however, "Don't spin things out, for the Commander of the Faithful ordered me not to dally here with you, so make it short!" He said, "Tell the Commander of the Faithful, 'You were good to me and showed me honor, and people followed me submissively (literally, "walked at my heels"). But then you accepted statements about me that were not confirmed for you as being true, nor did you reflect on them with your own intelligence, just how this situation could occur and how it could be thought possible of me that I should do these things you had heard about. You are informed that I was in secret communication with Minkajūr, urging him to rebel, and you give it credence. You are also informed that I told the commander whom I sent against Minkajūr, "Don't actually fight him, but hold back and feign battle, and if you come into contact with one of our men, flee from him!" You are a [courageous] man; you have been familiar [1316] with war, have fought against opponents, and have led armies. Is it possible that the head of an army would tell a body of troops that was about to encounter an enemy, "Behave in such-and-such a way!"? It would be inadmissible for anyone to behave in this fashion! And even if this were possible, it would not be fitting for you to accept its truth from an enemy whose ulterior motive you had already perceived. You are in a superior position over me (or: "you are always my first concern," anta awlā bī); I am merely one from among your slaves and a creature of yours.[574] But a fitting comparison between the two of us (i.e., in regard to the caliph's uncritical acceptance of calumnies against al-Afshīn), O Commander of the Faithful, is that of a man who tended and raised a calf of his until he had fattened it and it had grown big and was in a fine condition. He had friends who were longing to eat the calf's flesh, so they proposed to him that the calf should be slaughtered; but he refused their plea about that. At this, they all agreed to say to him one day, "Woe upon you! Why are you rearing this lion? This is a savage beast that has grown big, and, when a savage beast grows big, it reverts to its kind." The man answered them, "Woe upon you! This is a bovine's calf, not a savage beast!" But they replied, "This is a savage beast; ask whom you will about it! They had previously given instructions to all those who knew the man and had said to them, "If he asks you about the calf, tell him that it's a savage beast!" Hence whenever the man questioned another person about it and said to him, "Don't you see this calf, how fine it is!" the other person would reply, "It's a savage beast, a lion, woe upon you!" So [in the end] the man ordered the calf to be slaughtered. Now I am that calf, so how can I be a lion? [I ask the help of] God concerning my plight![575] You [al-Muʿtaṣim] have chosen me as one of your protégés and have raised me to a level of honor, and you are my lord and master. I implore God to incline your heart toward me!'"

574. Ṣanī'uka, in the sense of protégé, dependent; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 151 n. 2.

Ḥamdūn related: I rose and went away, and I left the platter just [1317] as it was, without al-Afshīn's having touched anything of it. Then it was only a short time afterward that it was reported that he was either dying or had already died. Al-Muʿtaṣim then said, "Show him to his son."[576] So they brought out al-Afshīn's corpse and flung it down in front of him, and he tore out his beard and his hair.[577] Then al-Muʿtaṣim gave orders, and al-Afshīn's corpse was borne away to Aytākh's house.[578]

Ḥamdūn related: Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād had summoned al-Afshīn from prison to the Public Audience Chamber and said to him, "O Khaydhar, it has reached the Commander of the Faithful that you are uncircumcised." He answered, "Yes." By asking that, Ibn Abī Duwād had only wanted him to bear witness against himself, for, if he exposed himself, weakness and lack of spirit would be imputed to him, and, if he did not expose himself, the accusation against him that he was uncircumcised would 575. Allāhᵃ Allāhᵃ fī amrī; see on this construction, p. 163 n. 465, above.

576. I.e., to al-Ḥasan, sent captive to Sāmarrā shortly before this by ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir; see Ṭabarī, III, 1308 (p. 185, above).

577. I.e., as a sign of distress and mourning.

578. Al-Ḥasan himself was not released from prison until 250 (864), in al-Mustaʿīn's caliphate; see Ṭabarī, III, 1533.

be substantiated. But al-Afshīn answered, "Yes, I am uncircumcised."

All the commanders and other troops and courtiers (al-nās) were present at the palace on that day when Ibn Abī Duwād had brought al-Afshīn forth into the Public Audience Chamber. This had taken place before al-Wāthiq's visit to him with the fruit and before Ḥamdūn b. Ismā'īl went to him.

Ḥamdūn related: I said to him (i.e., later, when al-Afshīn was back in his prison), "Are you (really) uncircumcised as you asserted (on that day)?" Al-Afshīn replied, "He (Ibn Abī Duwād) brought me forth to a place like that (i.e., to the Public Audience Chamber within the palace), with all the commanders and other people assembled, and then said to me what he said! He only wanted to dishonor me; if I had told him, 'Yes,' he would not have accepted my word but would have told me to expose myself so that he might dishonor me before all the people! Death would have been preferable for me, rather than exposing myself before all the people. But you, O Ḥamdūn, if you wish me to expose myself in your presence so that you can see me, I will do so." Ḥamdūn continued: I said to him, however, "In my opinion, you are a highly veracious person, and I don't want you to expose yourself."

When Ḥamdūn returned and conveyed al-Afshīn's message to al-Mu'taṣim, the latter ordered that all but a little food should be denied to al-Afshīn, so he used to be given only a loaf of bread each day until he died.

After his death his body was taken along to Aytākh's house,[579] and they brought it forth and gibbeted it on the Bāb al-'Āmmah, [1318] so that the populace might see it. Then it was flung down at the Bāb al-'Āmmah, together with the wooden beam on which it had been gibbeted, and burned and the ashes carried away and thrown into the Tigris.[580]

---

579. Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 262, trans., 54, places this in the second of the main streets of Sāmarrā, adjacent to the qaṭā'i' and houses of the two Bughās, Sīmā al-Dimashqī, Waṣīf, and other Turkish commanders; see Herzfeld, op. cit., 108.

580. The story of al-Afshīn's appeal to the Caliph, his adducing the story of the calf-lion, and his final fate, is given in a briefer form, also on the authority of Ḥamdūn, by Ibrāhīm al-Bayhaqī, op. cit., ed. Schwally, 574–75 = ed. Ibrāhīm, II, 328–30. Abū Tammām wrote an ode in praise of al-Mu'taṣim on the occasion of the gibbeting and burning of al-Afshīn's corpse (Dīwān, II, 198–209 no. 72), a

At the time when al-Muʿtaṣim ordered al-Afshīn to be imprisoned, on a certain night, he sent Sulaymān b. Wahb al-Kātib to make an inventory of everything in al-Afshīn's residence and to record it. Al-Afshīn's palace was at al-Maṭīrah.[581] In his residence was found a tabernacle (bayt) containing an image of a man, carved out of wood and covered with many ornaments and jewels and having in its ears two white stones with intricate gold filigree work over them. One of the men who were there with Sulaymān took one of these two stones, thinking that it was a jewel of great value—this being nighttime. But, when morning came and he pulled the gold filigree work off it, he found that it was a stone resembling the seashell called ḥabarūn, the kind of shell called "trumpet shell."[582] There were brought out of his residence grotesque figures (or: "paintings," ṣuwar) and such, idols and things of that ilk, together with the rafts made of inflatable skins and timber frameworks that he had got ready; and there were further items of his at al-Wazīriyyah.[583] Among them was found another idol, and among his books they found a book of the Magians called Z.rāwah[584] and many other books pertaining to his faith by means of which he used to worship his lord.[585] Al-Afshīn's death was in Shaʿbān 226 (May–June 841).[586] poem described by Stetkevych as strongly anti-Iranian and anti-Shuʿūbī in sentiment; see her analysis, op. cit., 55–60.

---

581. Al-Afshīn's qaṭīʿah, where his palace was built, was adjacent to the lands of others of his Ushrūsanī troops; the ruins of his palace are now called Jubayriyyah. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 259, 262, trans., 51, 55; Herzfeld, op. cit., 101. According to Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 264–65, trans., 58, al-Afshīn's palace was taken over after his death by Waṣif, who abandoned his old dwelling for this new one.

582. See Glossarium, CLXXIX.

583. Either a part of the Maṭīrah Palace, accessible by the Bāb al-Wazīrī (see p. 193 n. 556, above), or the district where lay the qaṣr al-wazīrī, the house of Abū al-Wazīr Aḥmad b. Khālid, who is said to have had a pioneer role in the original laying out of Sāmarrā; see Ṭabarī, III, 1179–80 (pp. 25–26, above); cf. Herzfeld, op. cit., 91, 95–96.

584. Herzfeld, op. cit., 152 n. 4, interprets this as being correctly zuwārah, uzwārah, rendered in Ibn al-Nadīm's Fihrist as ūzwārsh, meaning "interpretation, exegesis."

585. According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 139 = par. 2822, the idols were thrown on to the fire when al-Afshīn's corpse was burned and consumed.

586. Hence al-Afshīn remained in prison for nearly nine months. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 139 = par. 2822; Kitāb al-ʿuyūn, 407; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 517–18; Sadighi, op. cit., 303–5; E. M. Wright, op. cit., 127–30; Herzfeld, op. cit., 151–52.

In this year Muḥammad b. Dāwūd led the Pilgrimage by order of Ashnās, who himself made the Pilgrimage this year. He (Ashnās) was given charge over every place that he was to enter, and his name was mentioned with blessings in the worship from all the pulpits through which he passed, from Sāmarrā to Mecca and Medina. The one who mentioned him from the pulpit at al-Kūfah was Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā,[587] [1319] from the pulpit at Fayd[588] it was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Abī Khālid al-Marwarrūdhī,[589] from the pulpit at Medina it was Muḥammad b. Ayyūb b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān,[590] and from the pulpit at Mecca it was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.[591] In all these districts he was greeted as amīr, and he continued to hold this administrative charge over them until he returned to Sāmarrā.[592]

The last two authorities note, in connection with al-Afshīn's idols or pictures, what were originally believed to be painted stone columns (called by Herzfeld Bildsäulen "picture columns"), discovered by the German team of archaeologists who first excavated Sāmarrā under the floor of the throne room in the Jawsaq al-Khāqānī. In fact, D. S. Rice subsequently showed that these are fragments of tall wine vessels (technically called dann, pl. dinān), with scenes painted on them of a secular nature and appropriate to wine drinking and other convivial activities; see his "Deacon or Drink," 15–23. Thus these finds cannot be cited as having any connection with Manichaean idols or paintings. With regard to the nature of al-Afshīn's own religious beliefs, Sadighi rightly points out that his ancestral religion can hardly have been Zoroastrianism, in the light of the prominence of these idols, but could well have been Buddhism, which had certainly been one of the faiths of pre-Islamic Transoxania; this, too, is the conclusion arrived at by Rekaya, "Māzyār," 163.

587. Probably the great-grandson of the first ʿAbbāsid Caliph al-Saffāḥ's brother Mūsā, hence a first cousin of the Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, mentioned in n. 591, below.

588. A settlement in Najd, important as the halfway point on the Pilgrimage route from al-Kūfah to the Holy Places in the Ḥijāz; see *EI*² Suppl., s.v. Fayd (C. E. Bosworth).

589. A commander of Abnāʾ descent whom Ṭabarī mentions at various points at serving al-Maʾmūn; his father had been the leader of the Baghdad opposition to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl during the early years of al-Maʾmūn's caliphate.

590. This man is mentioned in Abū al-Faraj al-Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, Būlāq ed., XII, 129–30 = ed. Ibrāhīm, XIV, 17, 19, as governor of al-Baṣrah and as the grandson of the Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān who was an ʿAbbāsid of the line of ʿAlī al-Sajjād and governor of al-Baṣrah, Mecca, and Medina in the caliphates of al-Manṣūr and al-Mahdī.

591. The great-grandson of the brother of al-Saffāḥ and governor of Mecca 221–33 (836–48).

592. Khalīfah, op. cit., II, 791; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 521.

The Events of the Year

227

(October 21, 841–October 9, 842)

These included the rebellion in Palestine of Abū Ḥarb al-Mubarqa'[593] al-Yamānī[594] and his defiance of the central government.

593. Literally, "the Veiled One." As noted by H. Eisenstein, "Erhebung," 454, Abū Ḥarb was by no means the first rebel in Islam to call himself thus. Cf. the Yemeni rebel of the Prophet's time al-Aswad or Dhū al-Khimār; the Transoxanian rebel of early 'Abbāsid times al-Muqanna'; and the leader of the Zanj, or black slaves, in lower Iraq toward the end of the third (ninth) century 'Alī b. Muḥammad, al-Burqu'ī or al-Mubarqa'. (Eisenstein, op. cit., 454 n. 3, noted that it must be this last rebel who is to be identified with the "al-Burqu'ī" who Tha'ālibī claims, op. cit., 142 trans. 110, was among the monsters who killed more than a million people in Islam, rather than the Palestinian al-Mubarqa'.) This Palestinian outbreak is examined in detail by Eisenstein, op. cit., and EI[2], s.v. al-Mubarḳa'. He notes that Ṭabarī's account is the most detailed, the one upon which later writers, like Miskawayh, Tajārib al-umam, VI, 526–27; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 408; Ibn 'Asākir, op. cit., V, 311–12; and Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 522–23, largely depend. The only account clearly originating from a different source is the brief one given by Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 586, which is inserted among the events of al-Wāthiq's reign and involves the exploits of Rajā' b. Ayyūb al-Ḥiḍārī (see below), who suppressed a rebellion of the Berbers of Cyrenaica, supported by dissident Arab elements, in 228 (842–43), after he had dealt with Ibn Bayhas in Damascus and al-Mubarqa' in Palestine, to which should be added von Sivers, op. cit., 223–24.

594. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, II, 586, calls him "Tamīm al-Lakhmī, known as Abū Ḥarb and with the laqab al-Mubarqa'."

The Reason for Abū Ḥarb al-Mubarqa'ʿ's Rebellion and Its Eventual Outcome

One of my acquaintances, who stated that he was familiar with the story of al-Mubarqa'ʿ's outbreak, has mentioned to me that the reason behind his rebellion against the central government was that a certain one of the troops wanted to lodge in his house while he himself was away and [only] his wife or sister there. She refused to let him (the soldier seeking a billet) do that, so he struck her with a whip that he had with him, and she fended it off with her forearm, but the whip hit her forearm and left marks on it. When Abū Ḥarb returned to his house she wept and complained to him about what the soldier had done to her and showed him the marks on her forearm from his blow. At that Abū Ḥarb took up his sword and went along to the soldier, catching him unawares,[595] and struck him with the sword until he killed him. He then took to flight, covering his face with a veil (burqu'), so that he would not be recognized, and went into one of the mountains of the Jordan region. The government authorities sought him, but there was no report of him. [1320]

Abū Ḥarb used to appear openly during the daytime and sit out, veiled (mutabarqi'ᵃⁿ), on the mountain in which he had taken refuge, and people would see him and come to him. He would then exhort them and enjoin upon them good behavior and the prohibition of bad actions (al-amr bi-al-ma'rūf wa-al-nahy 'an al-munkar), and he would mention the central government (al-sulṭān) and how it oppressed the people and would speak scathingly of it. He persisted in doing this habitually until a group of the peasant cultivators from that region and also the villagers responded to his call. He used to assert that he was an Umayyad, with the result that those who responded to him said, "This man is the Sufyānī!"[596] When his adherents and followers from this class of people grew numerous, he summoned the members of leading families and notables of the region. Out of these a good number of the leaders of the Yemenis[597] responded to his call, including a man named Ibn Bayhas, who commanded the obedience of the Yemenis,[598] and also two other men from the people of Damascus.[599]

595. Ghārr, literally, "neglectful, unprepared."

596. I.e., an awaited deliverer from the Sufyānid line of the Umayyads, who would arise and release Syria from the tyranny of the 'Abbāsids. Outbreaks headed by such figures are mentioned up to the beginning of the fourth (tenth) century. The bibliography here is extensive. Earlier studies are reviewed in Madelung, "The Sufyānī," who is himself skeptical that the popular legend of the Sufyānī as a Syrian national hero was the mainspring of messianic beliefs about the Sufyānī and the Mahdī.

The news [of this rebellion] reached al-Mu'taṣim at the time when he was ill with the sickness from which he [eventually] died. He therefore sent Rajā' b. Ayyūb al-Ḥiḍārī[600] against Abū Ḥarb with about a thousand men from the local troops (al-jund). But when Rajā' reached Abū Ḥarb he found the latter with a vast host (literally, "a world, universe") of followers. The person who related this story to me about Abū Ḥarb's revolt mentioned that Abū Ḥarb had approximately 100,000 men. Rajā' was unwilling to engage forces with him, encamped opposite him, and procrastinated with him until it was the beginning of the season for the peasants' cultivating their lands and for their plowing.[601] The peasant cultivators in Abū Ḥarb's following went back to their plowing, and the landowners to their own estates, and Abū Ḥarb was left with a force of around 1,000 or 2,000 men. Rajā' now came out against him in battle, and the two armies met: that of Rajā' and that of al-Mubarqa'. When they came together Rajā' [1321] scrutinized al-Mubarqa''s army and said to his companions, "I don't discern within his forces any man who has the equestrian and martial skills (furūsiyyah)[602] except him. He will sally forth

597. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rikh, II, 586, mentions men of Lakhm (Abū Ḥarb's own tribe), Judhām, 'Āmilah, and Balqayn as responding specifically to him.

598. This same historian, however, gives him the nisbah "al-Kilābī" (hence from what was actually a North Arab tribe of the Rabī'ah group; see *EI*², s.v. Kilāb b. Rabī'a [W. M. Watt]; from the Kilāb Bedouins of Syria were to spring, in the next century, the Mirdāsids of Aleppo) and states that he rallied round him a great many of the clans of Qays.

599. This participation of the ahl Dimashq doubtless refers to members of the local jund, who had broken out in revolt against the central government in Iraq during the previous year, as recorded by Ṭabarī, III, 1313–14 (pp. 194–95, above); see von Sivers, op. cit., 223.

600. See, on him, p. 44 and n. 149, above.

601. Eisenstein, op. cit., 456, notes that at this juncture, according to Ibn Khaldūn and, by inference, Ibn al-Athīr, the already sick al-Mu'taṣim died.

602. See, on the ensemble of skills that made up this concept, *EI*², s.v. Furūsiyya (G. Douillet and D. Ayalon).

in person to display to his companions his manliness (rujlah), so don't hasten against him."

He related: The matter turned out just as Rajā' had predicted. Very soon al-Mubarqa' attacked Rajā''s forces. Rajā' instructed his men, "Leave a way open for him," and they did this until al-Mubarqa' passed right through their lines. Then he turned back again, and Rajā' again ordered his troops to leave a way open for him, and they did this until he passed right through them and returned to his own camp. Again Rajā' delayed any action and told his troops, "He will attack you once more, so leave a way open for him, but when he tries to return [this time] intercept him, and take him prisoner." Al-Mubarqa' behaved exactly thus. He attacked Rajā''s troops, and they left a way open for him until he passed right through them. Then he turned back again, but [this time] they surrounded him, captured him, and brought him down from his steed.

He related: Previously, when Rajā' had abandoned the idea of making a sudden onslaught on al-Mubarqa', an envoy had come to him, sent by al-Mu'taṣim, with the task of urging him on to action. Rajā' had seized the envoy and put him in fetters until the outcome of the struggle between him and Abū Ḥarb was as we have just mentioned; then he set him free. The same authority went on to relate: On the day when Rajā' brought Abū Ḥarb to al-Mu'taṣim the latter upbraided Rajā' for what he had done to his envoy. Rajā' told him, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God make me your ransom! You sent me with 1,000 men against a force of 100,000. I shrank from launching an immediate attack, lest I myself and the troops with me perish to no avail whatever. Hence I proceeded carefully until the forces that he had with him had grown sparse. I found an opportunity and discovered ways and means to combat him. Then I rose up and attacked him at the moment when his forces had grown sparse and he was in a weak position while we were in a strong one. And now I have brought you the man as a prisoner!"

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) says: Another source, as well as the one that I have mentioned as relating to me the story of Abū Ḥarb as I have just described it, has asserted that his rebellion was actually in the year 226 (840–841) and that he came out in arms in [1322]

Palestine or at al-Ramlah.[603] They (the people of that region) said that he was the Sufyānī. He then came with 50,000 Yemenis and others, and Ibn Bayhas and two other men with him from the people of Damascus raised the standard of rebellion (i'taqada).[604] Al-Mu'taṣim sent Rajā' al-Ḥiḍārī with a powerful force, and Rajā' attacked them at Damascus. He killed about 5,000 of the followers of Ibn Bayhas and his two associates, and he took Ibn Bayhas prisoner and killed his two companions. He attacked Abū Ḥarb at al-Ramlah, killed about 20,000 of his followers, and took Abū Ḥarb himself prisoner. He was transported to Sāmarrā, and he and Ibn Bayhas were incarcerated in the Maṭbaq prison.[605]

In this year Ja'far b. Mihrj.sh al-Kurdī rebelled. In al-Muḥarram (October–November 841) al-Mu'taṣim sent Aytākh to the mountains of al-Mawṣil to combat him, and one of his soldiers fell upon Ja'far and killed him.[606]

In this year, in the month of Rabī' I (December 841–January

603. The administrative capital of the jund of Filasṭīn, some twenty-five miles northeast of Jerusalem. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 69–70; Le Strange, Palestine, 28, 38, 303–8; EI[1], s.v. al-Ramla (E. Honigmann).

604. Understanding the omission of an implied object like liwā'an, as is pointed out by Eisenstein, op. cit., 457 n. 13, pace Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 126.

605. Einstein notes, op. cit., 457, that neither the role of Ibn Bayhas in al-Mubarqa'a's uprising nor the relationship between the Damascus and Palestine movements is clear, nor is the chronology certain. Given the fact, however, that Rajā' waited for some time while Abū Ḥarb's peasant followers returned to work their fields and that al-Mu'taṣim died in Rabī' I 227 (January 842), it may well be that the outbreak of al-Mubarqa' began in 226, rather than in 227, as Ṭabarī's second authority for the events related states. Nothing is recorded about the presumed eventual deaths of al-Mubarqa' and Ibn Bayhas. The Maṭbaq or Muṭbaq was a well-known jail within the Round City of al-Manṣūr at Baghdad. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 240, trans., 15–16; Le Strange, Baghdad, 27; Lassner, op. cit., 55, 243.

606. The reading of the second element of Ja'far's name is uncertain. Azdī, op. cit., 430–31, starts to tell the story of this revolt in detail (placing it under the events of the year 224), but his recital is broken off in the extant manuscripts midway through the story. It was doubtless Azdī's account that Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 506–7, used for his own narrative of the revolt, placing it under the year 226. The outbreak clearly turned into a large-scale uprising of the Kurds in the mountain regions north and east of al-Mawṣil; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 355, trans., 456, counts its suppression among the major victories of al-Mu'taṣim's reign. The caliphal governor of al-Mawsil, 'Abdallāh b. al-Sayyid b. Anas al-Azdī, was himself unable to quell it; it was not until Aytākh was sent into the mountains of Dāsin (see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 432: apparently the mountains of the modern Amadiyah ['Imādiyyah] region) to combat Ja'far that the latter was defeated and killed.

842), the death of Bishr b. al-Ḥārith al-Ḥāfī took place. He was originally from Marw.[607]

In this year, al-Mu'taṣim's death took place. According to what has been mentioned, it was on a Thursday, and some people say it was on the eighteenth of the month of Rabī' I (January 5, 842),[608] two hours after daybreak.

Al-Mu'taṣim's Fatal Illness, the Length of His Life, and His Physical Characteristics [1323]

It has been mentioned that the beginning of his illness was when he was cupped (or "asked to be cupped") on the first of al-Muḥarram (October 21, 841) and fell ill at that point.[609] It has been mentioned from Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Rashīd from Zunām al-Zamīr,[610] who said: Al-Mu'taṣim felt a momentary easing of his pain during his final illness and said, "Get a zulāl[611] ready for me, so that I may travel in it tomorrow." He related: He

---

607. Bishr was a renowned Khurāsānian mystic whose nickname al-Ḥāfī meant "the barefooted one." See al-Khaṭīb, op. cit., VII, 67–80 no. 3517; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-a'yān, I, 274–77 no. 114, trans., I, 257–60; *EI*², s.v. Bishr al-Ḥāfī (F. Meier).

608. This date was in fact a Thursday. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 354, trans., 454, gives Thursday, the nineteenth of Rabī' I (also the date in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 584, and Dīnawarī, op. cit., 406), but in his Murūj, VII, 144 = par. 2829, he gives Thursday, the eighteenth of Rabī' I. Kitāb al-'uyūn, 409, and Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 523–24, follow Ṭabarī in giving the day of the month as the eighteenth. The figures for al-Mu'taṣim's age at his death vary between forty-six and forty-nine years; see pp. 208–9, below.

609. According to Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, citing Ḥunayn b. Isḥāq, in his biography of Salmawayh b. Bunān ('Uyūn al-anbā', I, 164–65; cf. GAS, III, 227), al-Mu'taṣim used to be cupped regularly and then purged twice a year by his Christian physician Salmawayh, whom he trusted so implicitly that he called him "my father" and personally prayed over his grave when he died in 225 (840). After this the noted physician Yūḥannā or Yaḥyā b. Māsawayh (died in 243 [847]; cf. GAS, III, 231–36) treated al-Mu'taṣim but allegedly reversed the order of treatment, thereby overheating the Caliph's blood and bringing about his death. For an anecdote on Ibn Māsawayh's prescribing for the Caliph, see also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 104–6 = par. 2789.

610. Literally, "the reed pipe or flute player." i.e., the player on the zamr or mizmār, pace Ṭabarī, trans. Marin, 127 n. 606: "the lute player." Sunām was a celebrated performer on the reed pipe, who was patronized by caliphs from Hārūn al-Rashīd to al-Wāthiq; see Farmer, op. cit., 131; *EI*², s.v. Mizmār (H. G. Farmer).

611. This was a small, light, swift river craft used especially for pleasure. See Kindermann, op. cit., 35; al-Nukhaylī, op. cit., 59–62.

sailed off in it, with myself accompanying him, and on the Tigris he passed along opposite his palaces. He said, "O Zunām, play for me [the tune of the verses]:

O dwelling place whose traces have not yet become effaced,
God forbid that your traces should ever disappear completely!
I have not wept [merely] for your ruined traces, but I have wept for my life there within you as it has ebbed away.
His [past] life is the most fitting thing that a noble youth can weep over,
[but ultimately] the sad one must find consolation."

He related: I continued playing this melody until he called for a jar containing a raṭl [of wine] (raṭliyyah) and then drank a beakerful. I began to play my flute and repeated the melody. He meanwhile had taken up a napkin (mandīl)[612] before him and continued weeping, wiping his eyes with the napkin and sobbing until he went back to his palace, not having finished drinking the contents of the raṭliyyah.[613]

It has been mentioned from ʿAlī b. al-Jaʿd[614] that he said: When al-Muʿtaṣim was on the point of death, he began to murmur, "All possible stratagems have come to an end; there is no way out now left," until he was reduced to silence.[615] Others, however, have mentioned that he began to murmur, "I am being snatched away from the midst of all these people." He is also reported to have said, "If only I had known that my life-span would be thus short, I would not have done what I did."

When he died he was buried at Sāmarrā.[616] His caliphate lasted [1324] for eight years, eight months, and two days. It is said that he was born in Shaʿbān 180 (796–797), but others place it in the year 179 (795–796). If he was born in 180, his complete life-span was forty-six years, seven months, and eighteen days, but, if he was

612. Or handkerchief; see *EI*², s.v. Mandīl (F. Rosenthal).

613. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 523–24; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, op. cit., 212, trans., 231–32.

614. ʿAbī b. al-Jaʿd al-Jawharī al-Baghdādī was a muḥaddith from whom Bukhārī related traditions and who died in 230 (844–45). See al-Khaṭīb, op. cit., XI, 360–66 no. 6215; GAS, I, 105.

615. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 524; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, op. cit., 212, trans., 232.

616. In the Jawsaq Palace, as Yaʿqūbī specifies, Taʾrikh, II, 584.

born in 179, his life-span was forty-seven years, two months, and eighteen days. According to what has been mentioned, he was fair-complexioned, with a black beard the hair tips of which were red and the end of which was square and streaked with red, and with handsome eyes.[617] He was born in the Khuld Palace.[618] He related: Some authors say that he was born in the year 180 in the eighth month (Sha'bān), was the eighth caliph (of the 'Abbāsids), in the eighth generation from al-'Abbas,[619] his life-span was eight and forty years, that he died leaving eight sons[620] and eight daughters, and that he reigned for eight years and eight months.[621]

Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt said,

I commented, when they consigned you to oblivion and hands hovered over you, [throwing] earth and clay,
"Go forth, for what a fine guardian you were for the world, and what an excellent protector of religion!
May God not restore the fortunes of a community that has lost one like you, except through someone like Hārūn (al-Wāthiq)!"[622]

Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb, that is, Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah, said, Abū Isḥāq died when the sun was still extending its light, and we died too;

---

617. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 354, trans., 454; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 409; and Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, op. cit., 209, trans., 229, stress al-Mu'taṣim's physical strength, and the last source notes also his illiteracy (kāna ummiyy^{an} lā yaktubu).

618. The "Palace of Eternity," i.e., Paradise (cf. Qur'ān, XXV:17/16), was al-Manṣūr's palace, situated on the right bank of the Tigris opposite the Khurāsān gate and to the east of the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 101–5; Lassner, op. cit., 55, 76; al-'Alī, op. cit., 240, 343–47.

619. I.e., from the Prophet's uncle al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

620. Numbered by Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 584, however, at six: Hārūn al-Wāthiq, Ja'far al-Mutawakkil, Muḥammad, Aḥmad (al-Musta'īn), 'Alī, and 'Abdallāh.

621. In a typically Arab search for nawādir, strange happenings and coincidences, the sources stress al-Mu'taṣim's role as al-Muthamman "the man whose affairs were characterized by the number eight." See Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 354–55, trans. 454–55; Ṭabarī, trans. Bal'amī, IV, 545–56; Tha'ālibī, op. cit., 135–36, trans., 107; Kitāb al-'uyūn, 409; Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 524–25; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, op. cit., 209, trans., 229.

622. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 525.

but in the evening we were given Hārūn and were brought back to life!
Indeed, if Thursday has brought us what we have regarded with loathing, it has also brought us that which we have come to love passionately (i.e., the new caliph al-Wāthiq)![623]

Something about al-Muʿtaṣim's Character and Behavior

It has been mentioned from Ibn Abī Duwād that he [often] mentioned al-Muʿtaṣim bi'llāh; he mentioned him profusely, gave detailed descriptions of him, spoke at length about his [1325] merits, and expatiated on the openness of his character, the nobility of his lineage, the agreeableness of his manner, the easiness of his presence, and the pleasantness of his company. He said: One day, al-Muʿtaṣim said to me when we were at ʿAmmūriyyah, "What would you say to some fresh dates (busr),[624] O Abū ʿAbdallāh?" I replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, we are in the Byzantine lands, and fresh dates are in Iraq." He said, "You have spoken truly, but I have sent to the City of Peace, and they have brought two clusters of dates, which I know you love passionately." Then he said, "O Aytākh, bring in one of the date clusters," so he brought a cluster of fresh dates. Al-Muʿtaṣim thereupon stretched out his forearm and gripped the cluster with his hand, saying, "Eat, by my life, set to and eat them from my hand." I protested, "May God make me your ransom, O Commander of the Faithful! On the contrary, put them down, and I will eat as much as I want." He nevertheless replied, "No, by

623. Ṭabarī has here confused Abū al-Simṭ Marwān al-Aṣghar b. Abī al-Janūb (died ca. 248 [862]) with his grandfather Abū al-Simṭ Marwān al-Akbar b. Sulaymān, called Abū Ḥafṣah, the most talented of this famous poetic family (died in 182 [798]). Marwān al-Aṣghar must have been a eulogist of al-Muʿtaṣim, but only these two verses and two other fragments have survived from this period of his poetic career. See M. Y. al-Rasheed, The Abū Ḥafṣah Family, 67 ff., 131 n. 94, 179 nos. 202–3, 218, 250; *EI*², s.vv. Marwān al-Akbar b. Abī Ḥafṣa; Marwān al-Asghar b. Abi'l-Djanūb (J. E. Bencheikh).

624. I.e., fresh and still moist but not fully ripe, or ruṭb; see Ibn Manẓūr, op. cit., V, 123–24.

God, only from my own hand!" He related: And, by God, he kept on uncovering his forearm and stretching forth his hand while I was plucking dates from the cluster and eating until he threw it away, completely stripped and without a single date left.[625]

Ibn Abī Duwād further related: I used often to act as his counterweight (or: "used often to ride behind him on his mount," uzāmiluhu)[626] during that journey of his (i.e., during the 'Ammūriyyah campaign) until one day I said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, if only one of your mawlās or court intimates would ride with you as counterweight and if you had a refreshing change from me to them for a period and then from them back to me for another period, that would be more inspiriting to your heart and more pleasant to your mind, and you would find it more restful." He said, "Sīmā al-Dimashqī[627] is acting as my counterweight today, but who will accompany you thus?" I replied, "Al-Ḥasan b. Yūnus."[628] He said, "Just as you like." He related: So I sent for al-Ḥasan, and he acted as my counterweight, and preparations were made for al-Mu'taṣim to ride a mule, for he chose to ride alone. He related: He began to travel along at the side of my camel, and when he wished to talk to me he would raise his head toward me, and when I wanted to talk to him I would lower my head. He related: We came to a wadi the depth of which we did not know, having left the main body of [1326] the army behind us. Al-Mu'taṣim said to me, "Stay where you are while I go forward and thus ascertain the depth of water and look

625. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 525.

626. Cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1261–62 (p. 127, above), where, on the return from the 'Ammūriyyah campaign, two conspirators against al-Mu'taṣim are made to ride side by side in a litter on a mule. The verb zāmala and the noun zamīl (basically "traveling companion") can refer to journeying side by side or one behind the other (the rear person being called the radīf); see Ibn Manẓūr, op. cit., XIII, 329–30.

627. A Turkish commander (to be distinguished by the nisbah from another slave officer, Sīmā al-Sharābī) and doorkeeper (ḥājib) of al-Mu'taṣim, originally purchased by the Caliph from al-Faḍl b. Sahl. Sīmā held qaṭā'i' at Sāmarrā; see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 256, 262, trans., 45, 54. Subsequently, it was he who, with Waṣīf, placed al-Mutawakkil on the throne; see Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 584, 591; Herzfeld, op. cit., 243.

628. Unidentified, unless he is the Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan b. Yūnus b. Mihrān al-Zayyāt, a traditionist mentioned by al-Khaṭīb. op. cit., VII, 455 no. 4027, without, however, any date of birth, death, or floruit.

for shallow patches, and you follow in my tracks." He related: He thereupon went forward, plunged into the wadi, and began to search for shallow patches; at one time he would swerve to his right, another time to his left, and on some occasions he would go straight on, with me behind him, following in his track until we had crossed the wadi.

Ibn Abī Duwād also related: I sought to obtain from al-Muʿtaṣim 2 million dirhams for the people of al-Shāsh[629] for digging out one of their irrigation canals (nahr), which had silted up in early Islamic times and had thereby brought them hardship. He said to me, "O Abū ʿAbdallāh, what concern is it of mine or yours that you should take my money for the people of al-Shāsh and Farghānah?" But I replied, "They are your subjects, O Commander of the Faithful, and the farthest and the nearest one are alike in the benevolent oversight of the Imām!"[630]

Someone else has related that when al-Muʿtaṣim was roused to anger he did not care whom he killed or what he did.[631]

It has been mentioned from al-Faḍl b. Marwān that he said: Al-Muʿtaṣim took no pleasure in making buildings decorative and attractive to see; his sole aim was to make them solid. He also said: There was no item of expenditure on which he was more lavish in providing money than military campaigns.[632]

Muḥammad b. Rāshid has mentioned that Abū al-Ḥusayn Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm (b. Muṣʿab) once said to him: The Commander of the Faithful al-Muʿtaṣim summoned me one day. I went into his presence, and he was wearing a silk-embroidered waistcoat (ṣudrah),[633] a girdle of gold, and red boots. He said to me, "O

629. Shāsh (Persian form: Chāch) was a district adjacent to the district of Īlāq, on the right bank of the Jaxartes; the town of Shāsh was on the site of modern Tashkent. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 308–9; Le Strange, Lands, 480–83; Barthold, Turkestan, 169–75; EI[1], s.v. Tashkent (W. W. Barthold); EIr, s.v. Čāč (C. E. Bosworth).

630. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 525–26. Al-Muʿtaṣim's grudging attitude here hardly conforms to Masʿūdī's information, in Murūj, VII, 104 = par. 2788, that he was devoted to the improvement of his territories and their prosperity (ʿimārah, ʿumrān al-arḍ).

631. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 526.

632. Ibid.

633. This garment, though only vaguely explained in the sources, clearly denoted a waistcoat or short jacket covering the chest (ṣadr); see Dozy, Vêtements, 246.

Isḥāq, I would very much like to play polo (al-ṣawālajah)[634] with you, so by my life you must dress in the same fashion as I." I sought to be excused from that, but he refused. So I got dressed in the same dress as his. Then a horse caparisoned with gold [1327] trappings was brought forward for him, and we entered the polo field (al-maydān).[635] When he had played for a while he said to me, "I see you're lazy and half-hearted, but I realize that you dislike this outfit." I replied, "That's true, O Commander of the Faithful!" He then dismounted and took my hand and proceeded onward, walking in my company, until he came to the chamber of the bathhouse.[636] He said, "Take my clothes, O Isḥāq," so I took his clothes until he was left naked. Then he ordered me to remove my own clothes, which I did, and the two of us entered the bath. We were unaccompanied by any slave boy, so I stood over him and rubbed him, and the Commander of the Faithful al-Mu'taṣim undertook the task of doing the same for me.[637] Meanwhile, during the course of all this I was requesting him not to concern himself with me, but he refused. Then he left the bath, and I gave him his clothes and donned my own ones. Then he took my hand,

634. This term possibly designated the curved polo stick (Persian chawgān), rather than the game itself (chawgān-bāzī); see *EI*², s.v. Čawgān (H. Massé). The more usual Arabic form is ṣawlajān; see Dozy, Supplément, I, 854. For this episode, see Herzfeld, op. cit., 152–53, locating the polo ground to the east of the Jawsaq Palace. There may well have been one there, for as many as twelve putative polo grounds have been identified among the remains of Sāmarrā, though the bottle-shaped course located to the east of the Jawsaq al-Khāqānī or Dār al-Khilāfah (clearly visible at the time of Sarre and Herzfeld's first survey during World War I but now largely plowed up) is characterized by Northedge as one of the five walled tracks at Sāmarrā obviously intended for horse racing (his Course 2: see "Racecourses," 37–38). Northedge pertinently observes that recent writers on horse racing in medieval Islam have not always distinguished properly between courses for horse racing and polo grounds; "Racecourses," 52 n. 79.

635. For such fields, see *EI*², s.v. Maydān (F. Viré); Herzfeld, op. cit., 153 n. 2, pointed out that maydān in this context was a synonym for Middle Persian asprēs "polo, race ground."

636. Ḥujrat al-ḥammām. Here the general term ḥujrah must denote the first room of the bath, that for undressing and resting, the apodyterium of classical baths; in the central Islamic lands it was called the maslakh after the sixth (twelfth) century; Herzfeld, op. cit., 153, calls this room vestibulum. See H. Grotzfeld, Das Bad im Arabisch-Islamischen Mittelalter, 28 ff, *EI*², s.v. Ḥammām (J. Sourdel-Thomine).

637. Rubbing and massaging, tadlīk, would normally be done by a special attendant, the dallāk; see Grotzfeld, op. cit., 69–70.

and we walked on, the two of us together, until he reached his council chamber.

[When we were there] he said to me, "O Isḥāq, bring me a prayer rug (muṣallā)[638] and two pillows." I brought these to him, and he put down the pillows and lay down on his face as if to sleep. Then he said, "Bring [another] prayer rug and two [more] pillows," so I brought them, and he said, "Throw them down, and lie down on them opposite me." I swore that I would not do that, but I sat down on the rug. Aytākh al-Turkī and Ashnās entered, and he told them, "Just withdraw to a spot where, if I cry out, you will both be able to hear me." Then he said, "O Isḥāq, there is something on my mind (literally, "heart") that I have been pondering over for a long time, and I have only put you at your ease at this juncture so that I might divulge my inner thoughts to you." I answered, "Speak on, O my master, O Commander of the Faithful, for I am merely your slave and the son of your slave." He said, "I have been considering my brother al-Ma'mūn. He nurtured for his own service four men who turned out excellently, while I have nurtured for my own service likewise four men, none of whom has proved successful." I asked, "Who are these men whom your brother nurtured?" He replied, "Ṭāhir b.
[1328] al-Ḥusayn, whom you saw and heard of [his fame]; ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, a man of unparalleled quality; you yourself, for by God you are a person for whose like the ruling authority could never hope to find a substitute; and your brother Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm—where is there his like? Whereas I myself have nurtured al-Afshīn, and you have seen what finally became of him; Ashnās, and what a feeble heart and coward he is!;[639] Aytākh, who is totally insignificant; and Waṣīf, who is an unprofitable servant." I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God make me your

638. The Caliph normally had his own muṣallā for special ceremonial occasions, supervised by an official called ṣāḥib al-musallā. The family of one Ṣāliḥ seems customarily to have exercised this function from the time of al-Manṣūr onward, certainly until al-Mu'taṣim's reign, according to an anecdote in Tanūkhī, op. cit., VI, 187–89, and possibly until the time of al-Muntaṣir; see Sourdel, "Questions de cérémonial," 131–32, 146.

639. Fa-fashl^{un} ayyuhu. For ayyu in exclamations and to express surprise, see W. Wright, op. cit., II, 316, Rem. a; Reckendorf, op. cit., 33–34 par. 18.2, 40 par. 21.2. Neither, however, notes this particular use of ayyu + pronoun suffix after its qualifying noun, as opposed to the more usual ayyu fashl^{in}.

ransom! I can provide an answer, on condition of a guarantee of security from your wrath!" He replied, "Speak on!" I said, O Commander of the Faithful, may God make you mighty, your brother considered the roots and made use of them, and their branches flourished exceedingly; whereas the Commander of the Faithful has utilized only branches, which have not flourished because they have lacked roots." He replied, "O Isḥāq, the hardships that I have endured during the passage of this long period of time are indeed easier for me to bear than this answer!"[640]

It is mentioned from Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī[641] that he said: I went into the Commander of the Faithful al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh's presence one day when he had with him a slave singing girl (qaynah)[642] from whom he derived great pleasure, and she was singing to him. When I had greeted him and taken my seat he said to her, "Carry on with what you were singing," so she sang again. He said to me, "What do you think of her, O Isḥāq?" I answered, "O Commander of the Faithful, I see her subduing (her instrument) with skill and mastering it with delicacy; whatever she brings forth, she raises it to a level superior to what it was previously. In her melody are fragments of small pearls more beautiful than the settings of pearls that one sees on people's throats." He exclaimed, "O Isḥāq, your description of her is more beautiful than she herself or her singing," and he told his son Hārūn (al-Wāthiq), "Listen to these words!"

It has been further mentioned from Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī that he said: I spoke to al-Mu'taṣim regarding some matter, and he said to me, "O Isḥāq, when passion becomes dominant, one's [1329] judgment becomes impaired." I told him, "O Commander of the Faithful, I used to wish that my youth would stay with me always, so that I might remain at your service, as I would like to do." He said to me, "Haven't you achieved your aim in this respect, then?" I replied, "Yes, certainly." He observed, "Thus 640. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 526–27; Herzfeld, op. cit., 152–54.

641. The famous musician and singer (150–235 [767–850]) and son of the equally celebrated musician Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī. See Farmer, op. cit., 124–26; *EI*², s.v. Isḥāḳ b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī (J. W. Fück).

642. Such singing girls formed a highly trained, often well-educated class in 'Abbāsid times; see *EI*², s.v. Ḳayna (Ch. Pellat).

now at present you are achieving what you intended, so the two aims are equally realized!"

It has been mentioned from Abū Ḥassān[643] that he said: Abū Isḥāq al-Mu'taṣim's mother was a non-Arab slave (muwalladah) from al-Kūfah called Māridah.[644] It has been mentioned from al-Faḍl b. Marwān that he said: Al-Mu'taṣim's mother was Māridah, of Soghdian origin, whose father had, however, grown up in the Sawād.[645] He related: I think he was actually from al-Bandanījīn.[646] Al-Rashīd also had from Māridah, in addition to Abū Isḥāq, Abū Ismā'īl, Umm Ḥabīb, and two others whose names are unknown.

It has been mentioned from Aḥmad b. Abī Duwād that he said: Al-Mu'taṣim gave alms, and at my own hand and through my own agency he bestowed the amount of 100 million dirhams.[647]

---

643. I.e., al-Ḥasan b. 'Uthmān al-Ziyādī, judge and rāwī, who had been involved in al-Ma'mūn's miḥnah, or inquisition proceedings (Ṭabarī, III, 1121, 1122–23), and who was a source for Ibn Abī Ṭāhīr Ṭayfūr, whence for Ṭabarī, for events in the first half of the third (ninth) century.

644. Called by Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 103 = par. 2786, Māridah bt. Shabīb. See also Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb al-Baghdādī, Kitāb al-muḥabbar, 42; Ibn Qutaybah, Kitāb al-ma'ārif, 392; Tha'ālibī, op. cit., 126 trans., 102.

645. I.e., the "dark," because green and cultivated, region of central Iraq around Baghdad; see EI[1], s.v. Sawād (H. H. Schaeder).

646. A town lying to the east of Baghdad and the Tigris, the center of the rural district to Bādurāyā in the foothills of the Pusht-i Kūh range. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 499, Le Strange, Lands, 63.

647. Ibn al-Athīr, op. cit., VI, 527; Herzfeld, op. cit., 156. Despite such largesse, al-Mu'taṣim was nevertheless able to leave in the state treasury at his death, according to Ibn al-Zubayr, op. cit., 213–14 par. 300, 8 million dīnārs and 8 million dirhams, beside 33,000 riding beasts in the royal stables.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXIV

Incipient Decline

TRANSLATED AND ANNOTATED BY JOEL L. KRAEMER

Table 1. Genealogy of 'Abbāsid Caliphs (A.D. Ninth Century)

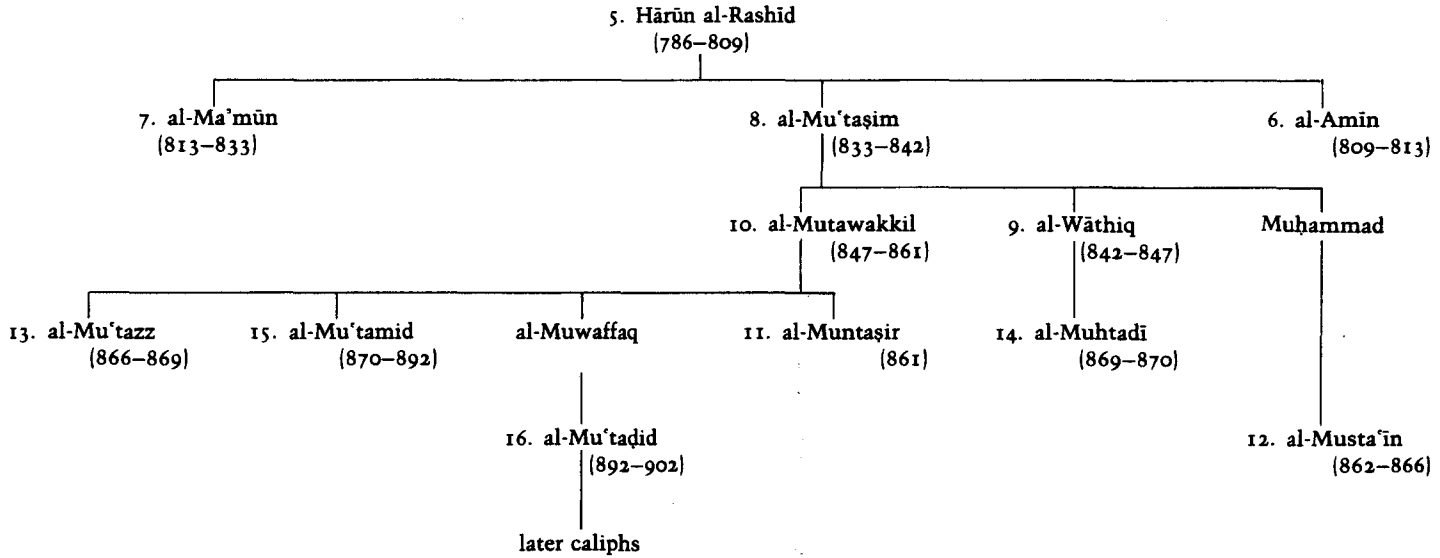

Table 2. Genealogy of the Khāqānids

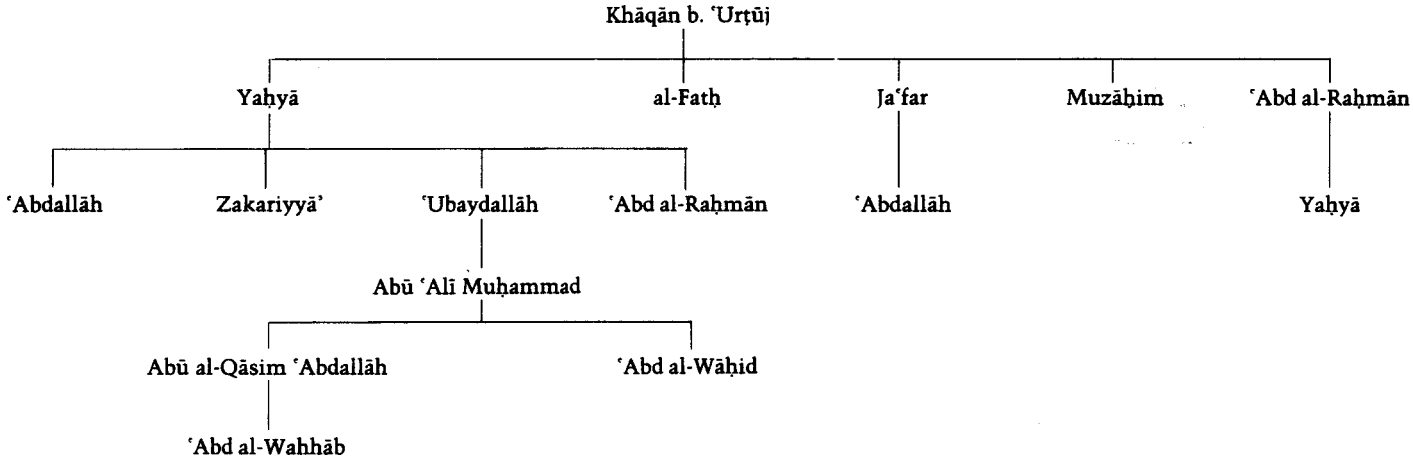

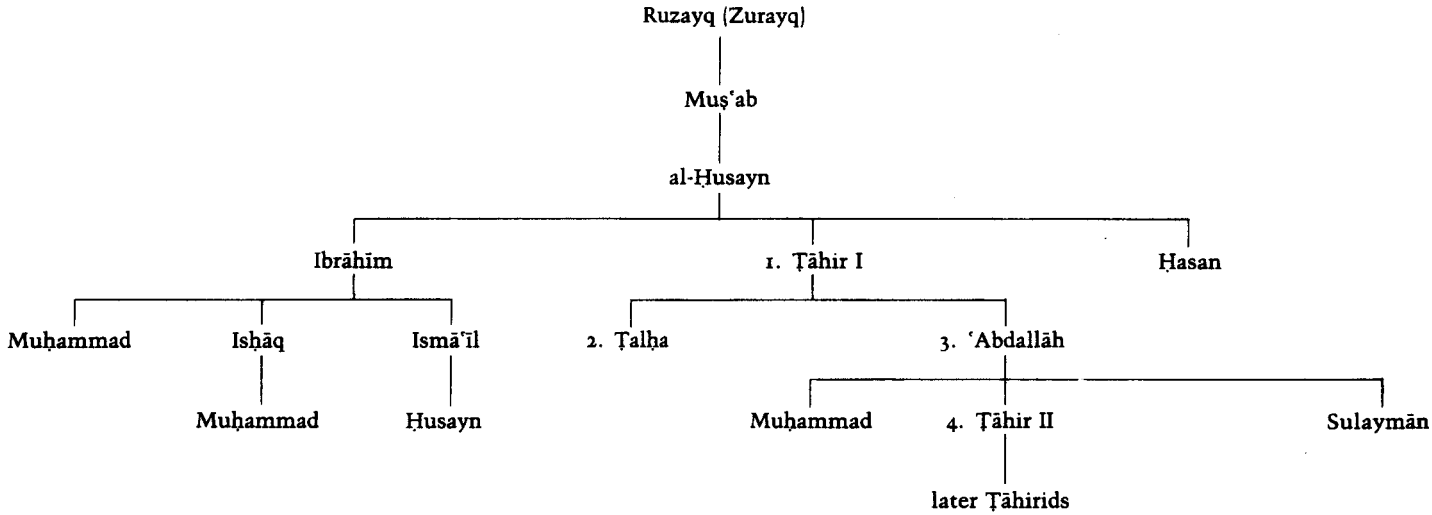

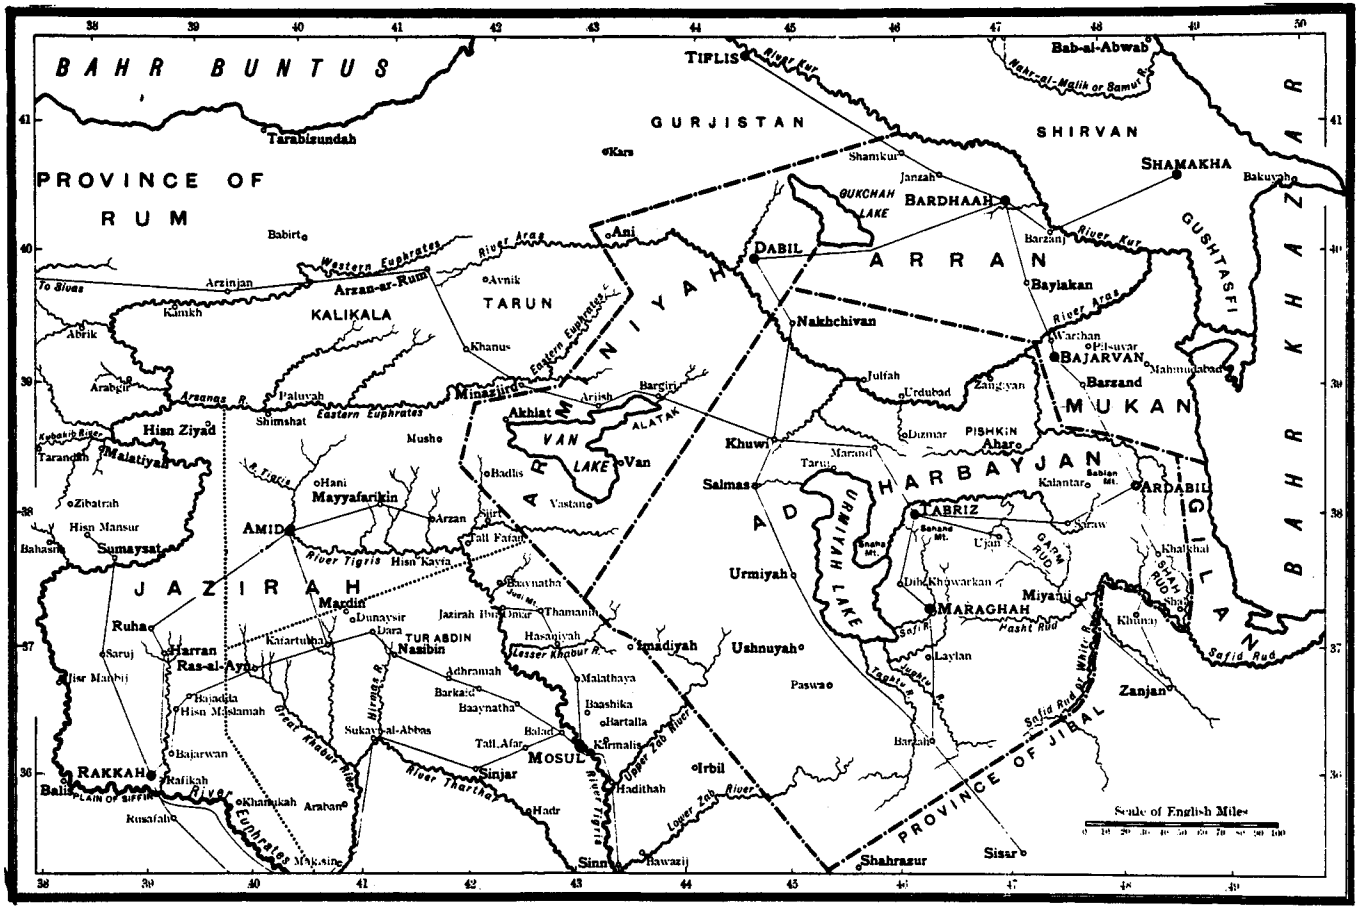

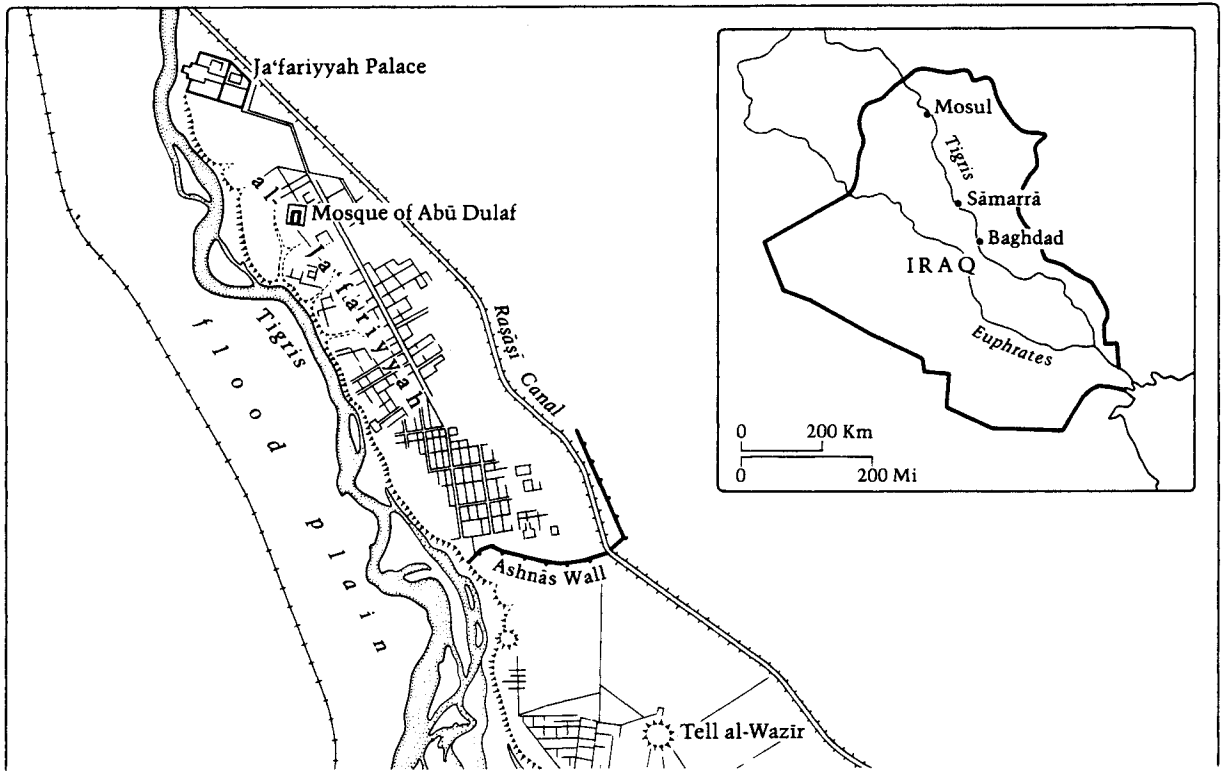

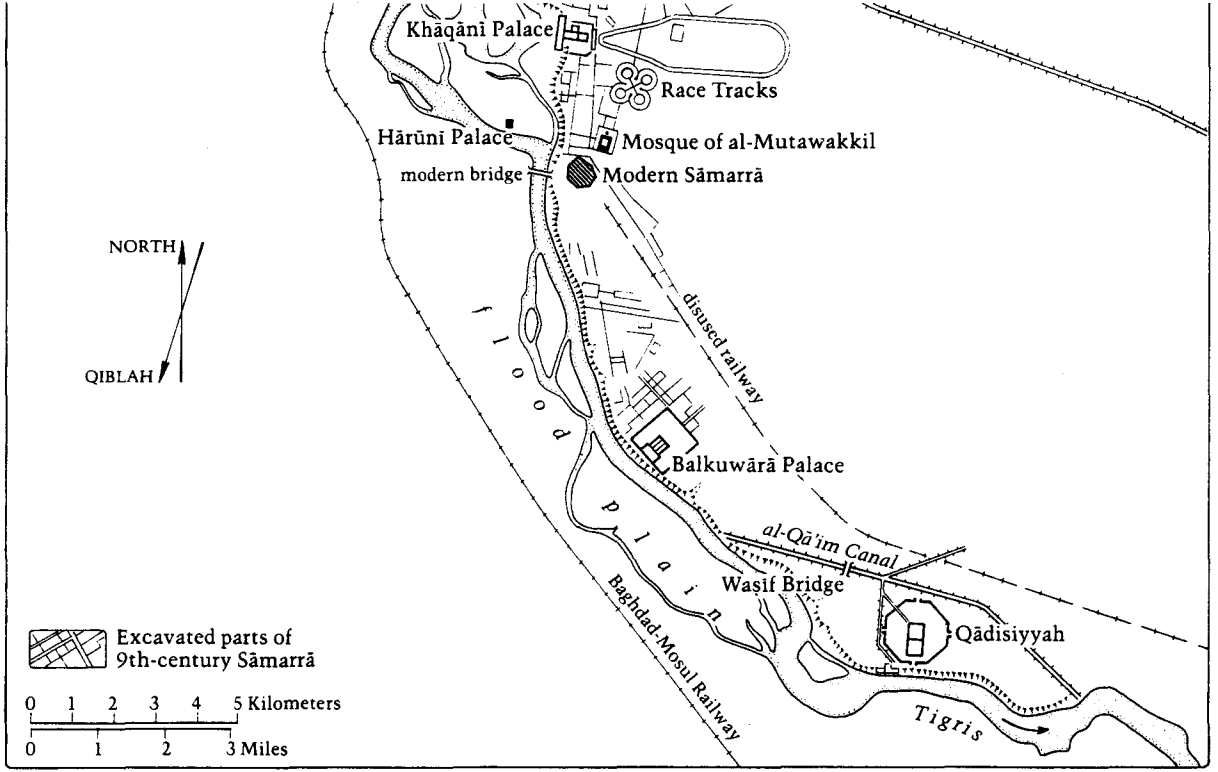

Table 3. Genealogy of the Ṭāhirids

Map 1. Armenia, Ādharbayjān, Arrān. After G. Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate

Ja'fariyyah Palace
al-Mosque of Abū Dulaf
Ja'fariyyah
Tigris flood plain Raṣāṣī Canal
Ashnās Wall
Tell al-Wazīr
Mosul
Tigris
Sāmarrā
Baghdad IRAQ
Euphrates
0
200 Km
0
200 Mi

Map 2. Sāmarrā. Map drawn by George Colbert after E. Herzfeld, Geschichte der Stadt Samarra.

The Events of the Year

227 (cont'd)

(October 21, 841–October 9, 842)

On the day that al-Muʿtaṣim died, his son Hārūn al-Wāthiq b. Muḥammad al-Muʿtaṣim received the oath of allegiance. This was on Wednesday, 8 Rabīʿ I, 227 (December 26, 841).[1] He was given the teknonym Abū Jaʿfar. His mother was a Byzantine slave named Qarāṭīs.[2] [1329]

In this year the Byzantine emperor Theophilus died following a reign of twelve years. His wife Theodora reigned after him, her son Michael son of Theophilus being but a youth.[3]

---

1. 8 Rabīʿ I, 227, actually fell on a Monday. The day of the week given by Ṭabarī does not always correspond to the date mentioned.

2. An umm (al-)walad was a female slave, or concubine, who bore children to her master and was thus entitled to certain rights; see EI[1], s.v. Quite a few ʿAbbāsid caliphs were the offspring of slave mothers; See Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 102. Qarāṭīs is the plural of qirṭās ("papyrus"), which is derived from Greek khartēs.

3. Theophilus, son of Michael II, reigned 829–42, and was succeeded by his son Michael III (842–67). They belonged to the Amorian, or Phrygian, dynasty. Michael ruled for fourteen years along with his mother, Theodora, and for ten years on his own. See Bury, History, Appendices, VI–VII, 465–71. According to C. Mango, "When Was Michael III Born?" his birth date was January 9/10, 840. Thus, he was two years old when his father died (January 20, 842), and he was crowned in the same year. See also below, n. 264.

[1330] Leading the pilgrimage this year was Ja'far b. al-Mu'taṣim.[4] Al-Wāthiq's mother accompanied him, intending to make the pilgrimage, but she died in al-Ḥīrah on 4 Dhū al-Qa'dah (August 16, 842) and was buried in al-Kūfah in the palace of Dāwūd b. 'Īsā.[5]

4. Ja'far b. al-Mu'taṣim, brother of al-Wāthiq, became the tenth caliph of the 'Abbāsid dynasty with the regnal title al-Mutawakkil; see below, pp. 61–191.

5. Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad, an 'Abbāsid prince, was son of the famous 'Īsā b. Mūsā, nephew of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr; see *EI*², s.v. He had been governor of Mecca and Medina at the time of al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn. See Ṭabarī, III, 709; Zambaur, Manuel, 20, 25, 193; and see Ṭabarī, III, 981–83 (Bosworth, Reunification, 19–21).

The Events of the Year

228

(October 10, 842–September 29, 843)

Al-Wāthiq bestowed a crown upon Ashnās and adorned him with two ornamental belts in Ramaḍān (June–July 843).[6]

---

6. Abū Ja'far Ashnās (d. 230/844–45) was a Turkish army commander who had been purchased by al-Mu'taṣim and served during the caliphates of al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq; see Ṭabarī, III, 1236–67 (Marin, Reign, Index, 134); Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 256=Wiet, Les pays, 45. He led the vanguard in the battle of Amorium; III, 1236 (Marin, 61). Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 585, makes the ceremony mentioned here an act of appointment, said to be al-Wāthiq's first, and states that Ashnās was put in charge of territories from Sāmarrā (min bābihi) to the Maghrib. Ashnās was governor of Egypt from 219 (834–35) to 230 (844–45); Kindī, Wulāh, 192, 194–96; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 231, 255; Zambaur, Manuel, 27; see also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 364. Abū Ja'far Ashnās al-Turkī is not to be confused with Abū Ja'far Ashnās, Turkish page of Abū Isḥāq b. al-Rashīd (Ṭabarī, III, 1017) or with Ashnās, a page of Ismā'īl b. Aḥmad; Ṭabarī, III, 2203 (see Rosenthal, Return, 95). Al-Mu'taṣim had presented his Turkish mawlās with brocade, belts, and gold ornaments, attiring them differently from other soldiers; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 118; Ṭabarī, III, 1169 (Marin, 7, n. 62). Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Rusūm, 93 (tr. Salem, 75), gives a list of honorary insignia bestowed upon army commanders. Crowns were occasionally presented to wazīrs; Sourdel, Vizirat, 295, 677. For wishāḥ ("ornamental belt"), see Dozy, Vêtements, 429. Compare the Byzantine insignia, which included diplomas, gold-handled swords, tunics, and colored mantles and belts; Bury, Imperial Administrative System, pp. 22f.

In this year Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī died in the residence of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī.[7]

In this year the poet Abū Tammām Ḥabīb b. Aws al-Ṭā'ī died.[8]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir.[9]

In this year the prices on the Mecca Road were so high that a raṭl of bread cost a dirham, and a water skin cost forty dirhams.[10] At the Place for Standing (Mawqif) people were first stricken by intense heat and then by heavy rain mixed with hail, so that severe heat and cold afflicted them within a single hour.[11] The downpour at Minā on the Day of Sacrifice (Yawm al-Naḥr) was

---

7. Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī, the famous historian and traditionist, was born in al-Baṣrah, then went to al-Madā'in, and thereafter to Baghdad, where he joined Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, who was his patron; *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'inī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 314. The date of his death is variously given as 215, 225, 231, 234, 235. Sezgin accepts 235 (849–50). He does not mention the date given here. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, noted musician and composer, son of Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, also a famous musician, died in Baghdad in 235 (849–50). He was a companion of the caliphs Hārūn al-Rashīd, al-Wāthiq, and al-Mutawakkil; see *EI*², s.v. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī; Sezgin, GAS, I, 371; Farmer, History, 124–26 et passim.

8. Abū Tammām Ḥabīb b. Aws al-Ṭā'ī, famous poet and anthology editor, died in 231 (845–46), according to his son, or in 232 (846–47), according to other sources, although Ṭabarī and others dependent upon him give 228 (842–430); *EI*², s.v. Abū Tammām Ḥabīb b. Aws.

9. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, d. 265 (878–79), belonged to the Ṭāhirid family/dynasty, which produced governors of Khurāsān and Baghdad in the third/ninth century, and participated actively in its cultural life; see Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic Culture." He became governor of Baghdad in 255 (868–69); see Ṭabarī, III, 1506, etc.; Zambaur, Manuel, 197–98. See Table 3.

10. A raṭl (<Gr. litra) in the early Islamic period in Mecca was = 1.5 kg.; in Medina in the tenth century = 625 gr.; Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 28. The standard weight of a dirham (silver) was 3.125 grams; Hinz, 3. Nominally, 13 dirhams = 1 dīnār. To be sure, the exchange rate always varied. Ashtor, Prix, 49–50, notes that a similar quantity of bread in ninth- or tenth-century Iraq cost merely 1/20 dirham. See also *EI*², s.v. Dirham.

11. The Place for Standing is the place of halting, or station (wuqūf), in the valley of 'Arafāt, in front of Jabal al-Raḥmah, during the pilgrimage celebrations. The halting takes place on the ninth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. The Day of Sacrifice, on the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, is commemorated by the sacrifice of animals, usually sheep and goats, at Minā. Jamrat al-'Aqabah is a construction on the western side of the valley of Minā. The jamrah is stoned by pilgrims on the Day of Sacrifice prior to the festival sacrifice.

unprecedented. A mountain slide at Jamarat al-'Aqabah killed a number of pilgrims.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.[12]

12. The 'Abbāsid Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā, son of Dāwūd b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā (above, n. 5), was governor of Mecca during the caliphates of al-Amīn and al-Ma'mūn (221–33/835–47), and led pilgrimages during the caliphates of al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq. He was governor of Mecca, 221–33 (835/6–847/8); Ṭabarī, III, 982 (Bosworth, Reunification, 20–21); Marin, Reign, Index, 136; Zambaur, Manuel, 20.

The Events of the Year

229

(September 30, 843–September 17, 844)

In this year al-Wāthiq bi-llāh imprisoned and fined the secre-[1331] taries.[13] He remanded Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl to Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh, captain of the guard, and ordered that Isḥāq flog him ten

13. A number of sources ascribe al-Wāthiq's measures against the secretaries to the initiative of his wazīr Ibn al-Zayyāt; see, for instance, Tanūkhī, Faraj, 102–03; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 136–37. And see Pseudo-Tanūkhī, Mustajād, 141. According to Tanūkhī, Ibn al-Zayyāt had the property of the secretaries confiscated in order to secure funds to maintain the Turks. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 587, stresses the misdemeanors of the secretaries who were punished. See also Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 301. As the secretaries were often in the employ of the Turkish military commanders and officials, the steps taken against them may have been aimed indirectly against the Turks as well. See also Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXI, 162, where a version is given according to which al-Wāthiq's caliphate depended upon the Turks Itākh (or Aytākh) and Ashnās and their secretaries Sulaymān b. Wahb and Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb. According to this version, Ibn al-Zayyāt wrote an ode, which he ascribed to a military figure, denouncing the excessive wealth and power of Sulaymān b. Wahb and Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb, and inciting al-Wāthiq to take action against the secretaries. This was done by comparing the caliph's relationship to the secretaries to that of Hārūn al-Rashīd and the Barmakids. This version, as far as the analogy is concerned, is consistent with the account given below. In our text, however, Ibn al-Zayyāt is not presented as an instigator of the attack, but only as hostile to Ibn Abī Du'ād and others in charge of the maẓālim courts.

lashes daily.[14] He is said to have flogged him about a thousand lashes, whereupon he handed over 80,000 dīnārs.[15] Al-Wāthiq seized 400,000 dīnārs from Sulaymān b. Wahb,[16] secretary of Itākh;[17] 14,000 dīnārs from al-Ḥasan b. Wahb;[18] and he seized 14. Abū Ja'far Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl al-Anbārī was later wazīr of al-Mu'tazz; 252–55 (866/67–868/69). He was arrested and killed along with Abū Nūḥ 'Īsā b. Ibrāhīm in 255/869; see Ṭabarī, III, 1720–23; Tanūkhī, Faraj, 52, 142, 173–74; Sourdel, Vizirat, 281, 290, 295–99; Index, 753. Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh was governor of Damascus in 191 (806–807) and of Egypt in 235 (849–50); Kindī, Wulāh, 198–99; Maqrīzī, Mawā'iẓ, I, 338; Ṭabarī, III, 1133 (Bosworth, Reunification, 223); Zambaur, Manuel, 27, 28. He became captain of the caliphal guard in 225 (839–40), replacing Afshīn; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 590; Ṭabarī, III, 1303 (Marin, Reign, 110). For his grant in Sāmarrā, see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 260, 272=Wiet, Les pays, 52, 79. His father had been a commander in the war against Bābak (Ṭabarī, III, 1233; Marin, Reign, 56). On Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā and his genealogy, see also Crone, Slaves on Horses, 183–84. For his brother Aḥmad, see below, n. 587.

15. The standard weight of a dīnār (gold) was 4.233 grams; see Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 1; Goitein, A Mediterranean Society, I, 359. Goitein put the purchasing power of a dīnār in medieval Egypt (ca. A.D. 1000) at about a hundred U.S. dollars (1967). See also EI[2], s.v. Dīnār.

16. Sulaymān b. Wahb b. Sa'īd, of the Banū Wahb, served as secretary of al-Ma'mūn, then of Itākh and Ashnās, and thereafter as wazīr under al-Muhtadī and al-Mu'tamid. He was arrested with Itākh in 235 (849–50; Ṭabarī, III, 1386; below, p. 85). And he was arrested under al-Muwaffaq and died in prison in 271 (884–85) or 272 (885–86); Ṭabarī, III, 1315; Marin, Reign, 120, 123; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 138–44 (138, n. 2); Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 45; EI[1], s.v. Sulaimān b. Wahb; Amedroz, "Tales," 418ff.; Sourdel, Vizirat, 300–03, 310–13; Index, 782.

17. Itāk (Aytākh), a Turkish army commander, had been a Khazar slave, a cook, who belonged to Sallām al-Abrash al-Khādim. He was purchased by al-Mu'taṣim from Sallām in 199 (814–15; below, 1383, p. 81 and n. 281). He served as chief of the security police at Sāmarrā under al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq, then as ḥājib (chamberlain) of al-Mutawakkil and commander of the royal guard. Itākh was made governor of the Yemen by al-Wāthiq in 229 (843–44), and after the death of Ashnās, in 230 (844–45), he became governor of Egypt. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 585, al-Wāthiq also made him governor of Khurāsān, Sind, and the sub-provinces of the Tigris. He was later imprisoned by al-Mutawakkil and killed in 235 (849–50); see below, pp. 83–86. See Ṭabarī, III, 1195; Marin, Reign, 27 and n. 162; Index, 135; Kindī, Wulāh, 196–97; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 255–56, 275; Zambaur, Manuel, 27; Sourdel, Vizirat, 264, n. 2; Index, 769.

18. Al-Ḥasan b. Wahb was a brother of the more influential Sulaymān b. Wahb; see the family tree of the Banū Wahb in Sourdel, Vizirat, 745; and see 256, n. 3; Index, 765. He was the main aide de camp of the wazīr Ibn al-Zayyāt. He was also a poet, and was in touch with Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī; some of his poetry is preserved by Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 149, 152, 167. See also Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XX, 54–55; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 138, n. 2.

one million dīnārs from Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and his secretaries;[19] 100,000 dīnārs from Ibrāhīm b. Rabāḥ and his secretaries;[20] 60,000 dīnārs from Najāḥ;[21] and 140,000 dīnārs from Abū al-Wazīr by way of settlement.[22] This was aside from what he seized from financial agents on the basis of their revenues.[23]

Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik[24] evinced hostility to Ibn Abī

---

19. Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb al-Jarjarā'ī belonged to the famous Jarjarā'ī family of government officials and wazīrs. His father had been governor of Egypt. Under al-Wāthiq he was secretary to Ashnās. He became wazīr to al-Muntaṣir (247–48/861–63) after the latter became caliph, having served formerly as his tutor and secretary. He was later exiled to Crete, in 248 (862–63), as a result of the enmity he aroused among Turkish military commanders in Sāmarrā, and he died there in 265/878–799; see Ṭabarī, III, 1262 (Marin, Reign, 80, and n. 379, 81); 1471–73 (below, p. 195ff.); 1508 (Saliba, 7); Fragmenta, 557; Ibn Abbār, I'tāb 136, 138–39, 141, 166; Sourdel, Vizirat, 287–89, Index, 753; *EI*², s.v. al-Djardjarā'ī.

20. Ibrāhīm b. Rabāḥ b. Shabīb al-Jawharī was appointed over the Bureau of Expenditure under al-Ma'mūn. Under al-Wāthiq he was in charge of administration of the Bureau of Estates. His name is variously given as Ibn Rabāḥ or Ibn Riyāḥ (an orthographic variant—one diacritic marks the difference). See Dhahabī, Mushtabih, 302–03 (cited in Leiden edition, note ad loc.). Dhahabī notes that the name was common among mawlās (cf., inter alios, Rabāḥ, who was a mawlā of Muḥammad). Ibrāhīm died in 245 (859–60); see below, 1440 (p. 158); Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 145; Sourdel, Vizirat, 240, n. 1, 262–63, 733.

21. Abū al-Faḍl Najāḥ b. Salamah was secretary under al-Wāthiq, and later secretary and in charge of inspection of fiscal officials under 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā, wazīr of al-Mutawakkil. He was executed in 245 (859–60) after a falling out with 'Ubaydallāh; below, 1440 (p. 157); Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 601; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 59, 61, 493; Sourdel, Vizirat, 262–63, 272, n. 5, 280, Index, 776.

22. Abū al-Wazīr Aḥmad b. Khālid was fiscal prefect of Egypt in 226 (840–41); Kindī, Wulāh, 449; Sourdel, Vizirat, 263, n. 2, citing A. Grohmann, Arabic Papyri in the Egyptian Library (Cairo, 1938), III, 143. Abū al-Wazīr was involved in purchasing land for the construction of Sāmarrā, along with Ibn al-Zayyāt, Ibn Abī Du'ād, and 'Umar b. Faraj; Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 258 = Wiet, Les pays, 48; Herzfeld, Samarra, 93. The four disappeared from public life at about the same time; Wiet, Les pays, 48, n. 5. And see Ṭabarī, III, 1179 (Marin, Reign, 15). He was briefly wazīr under al-Mutawakkil in 233 (847–48). In the same year he fell from grace, and was removed from office; below 1378 (p. 74); Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 592; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 148, 197; Zambaur, Manuel, 6; Amedroz, "Tales," 423; Sourdel, Vizirat, 257, n. 1, 263, 268, 271.

23. For 'umālāt = "revenues," see Glossarium, CCCCLXXVII; Lane, Lexicon, 2159. Dozy, Supplément, II, 177, gives also "financial administration, district, province."

24. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Zayyāt, at first chancellery secretary at the end of the caliphate of al-Ma'mūn, served as wazīr under al-Mu'taṣim, al-Wāthiq, and al-Mutawakkil. The name al-Zayyāt means oil merchant, a profession that his grandfather and father practiced. It is both a family name (Ibn al-Zayyāt) and a personal cognomen (al-Zayyāt), as he himself was apparently an oil Du'ād[25] and others in charge of the maẓālim [courts], as a result of which they were investigated and imprisoned. Called upon to preside, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm[26] deliberated their case. They were publicly displayed and treated harshly.

The Reason for al-Wāthiq's Action against the Secretaries This Year

'Azzūn b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Anṣārī[27] reportedly said: We were in al-Wāthiq's company one evening this year. He remarked, "I have no desire for wine tonight; let's have a discussion instead." He sat in his middle portico in the Hārūnī [Palace],[28] in the first edifice, merchant. He was later arrested and his property confiscated under al-Mutawakkil in 232 (846–47), and he died in 233 (847–48); see Ṭabarī, III, 1183; Marin, Reign, 19 and n. 119, Index, 136; below, pp. 65ff.; Amedroz, "Tales," 416ff.; Sourdel, Vizerat, 252–69, esp. 254, n. 3; Index, 788; Sezgin, GAS, II, 576; *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Zayyāt.

---

25. Abū 'Abdallāh Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād, the famous judge, who served under the caliphs al-Ma'mūn and al-Mu'taṣim (who appointed him chief judge) and al-Wāthiq, was a leading Mu'tazilite. He played an active role in the miḥnah (inquisition) and in the interrogation of Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, and had considerable influence upon al-Wāthiq, a strong upholder of Mu'tazilite doctrine. He and Ibn al-Zayyāt were staunch rivals. He died in 240 (854–55); below, 1421 (p. 131); and see earlier, Ṭabarī, III, 1139. See also Sourdel, Vizirat, 258–60; Index, 753; *EI*², s.v. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād.

26. The Ṭāhirid Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, governor of Baghdad under al-Ma'mūn, was appointed chief of security police (ṣāḥib al-shurṭah) of Baghdad by al-Mu'taṣim, and served thereafter during the reigns of al-Wāthiq and al-Mutawakkil. When al-Mu'taṣim went to Sāmarrā, Isḥāq served as his deputy in Baghdad. He participated actively in the inquisition of al-Ma'mūn. Isḥāq's father Ibrāhīm was a brother of Ṭāhir I, and he was therefore occasionally called al-Ṭāhirī. He died in 235 (849–50). See Bosworth, Reunification, Index, 274; Marin, Reign, Index, 135; below 1403 (p. 105); Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād 18–19, 37–38; Shābushtī, Diyārāt, Index, 437; Zambaur, Manuel, 44, 197–98; Patton, Aḥmed ibn Ḥanbal, 70ff. et passim; Sourdel, Vizirat, 260, n. 4, 265–66; Index, 769 (234, n. 1, is not relevant); Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic Culture," 46, 67–68; idem, "The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffarids," 90ff., 101. See Table 3.

27. 'Azzūn b. 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Anṣārī's name is given by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 6, as 'Arūd (with variants). Ṭabarī Ms. C has 'Azūr; Ms. O reads 'Arūz. Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 56, says that he was a boon companion of al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq. Ṭabarī, III, 1503 (Saliba, 4) mentions a street named for Zurāfah (or Zarāfah) and 'Azzūn; see Herzfeld, Samarra, 119, n. 1 (dār 'Azzūn). 'Azzūn's account of the reason for the fall of the Barmakids is not noted by Ṭabarī in his description of this episode, where he lists different versions.

28. The Hārūnī was a palace complex that al-Wāthiq constructed in Sāmarrā and named after himself. His full name was Abū Ja'far b. al-Mu'taṣim Hārūn al-

[1332] which Ibrāhīm b. Rabāḥ had erected. Over one of the sections of this portico was a very high dome that was white as an egg, except for what appears[29] to be a cubit-thick[30] belt around the middle, which was teak plated with lapis lazuli and gold. It was called the Dome of the Girdle, and the portico was called the Portico of the Dome of the Girdle.

'Azzūn said: We conversed the whole evening. Al-Wāthiq inquired, "Who among you knows the reason why my ancestor [Hārūn] al-Rashīd assailed the Barmakids and removed them from favor (ni'mah)?"[31]

'Azzūn said that he responded: By God, I'll tell you, Commander of the Faithful. The reason for this was that a slave girl (jāriyah) belonging to 'Awn al-Khayyāṭ[32] was mentioned to al-Rashīd, whereupon he sent for her and had her presented. Pleased by her beauty, intelligence, and cultural refinement, he asked 'Awn what price he proposed.

'Awn replied, "Commander of the Faithful, the issue of her price is well-known. I have taken an irrevocable oath to free her and all my slaves and to donate my property to charity. I summoned legal representatives to witness that I would not set her price any lower than 100,000 dīnārs, and I cannot circumvent this

---

Wāthiq. He was named Hārūn after his grandfather Hārūn al-Rashīd. Al-Wāthiq's successor, al-Mutawakkil, also dwelled in the Hārūnī. (Another Hārūnī Palace, named for Hārūn al-Rashīd, existed in Baghdad.) The Hārūnī was situated near the Dār al-'Āmmah (Public Audience Hall), south of the caliph's residence on the Tigris River. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 264–65 = Wiet, Les pays 57–58; Ta'rīkh, II, 590; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 364; Yaqut, Mu'jam, IV, 946; Herzfeld, Samarra, 95, 104, 118–19. See also EI[1], s.v. Sāmarrā; Le Strange, Lands, 154; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 228, 254. and Rogers, "Samarra," 148–49; al-'Amid, Architecture, 16 (Fig. 1), 134.

29. The words "what appears" render fīmā tarā al-'ayn; see Glossarium, CCCLXXXIV.

30. The dhirā' (cubit) was of various lengths (ca. 50 cm.), depending upon time and place; see Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 55ff.

31. The term ni'mah relates to "benefit" and "ties created by benefit"; see Mottahedeh, Loyalty, 73–79, 82–84. The decline of the Barmakids (Ṭabarī, III, 674ff.) has been a subject of speculation from their time until today; EI[2], s.v. 'Abbāsa, and s.v. Barāmika. The account given here traces their fall to the pecuniary, or perhaps rather circumspect, behavior of Yaḥyā b. Khālid, and implies an inordinate degree of control over the caliph and his purse. See also Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, I, 28ff., especially p. 30.

32. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 6–7, gives the name as 'Udūl al-Khayyāṭ (with the variant Ghawn, which differs from 'Awn by a single diacritical point).

by any legal subterfuge. This is her legal status." The Commander of the Faithful responded that he was ready to purchase her for 100,000 dīnārs.

He then wrote to Yaḥyā b. Khālid[33] informing him about the slave girl and ordering Yaḥyā to send him 100,000 dīnārs. Yaḥyā commented that this was a bad precedent, because if al-Rashīd dared request 100,000 dīnārs to pay for a single slave girl, he was liable to go on requiring commensurate sums of money. Thus, Yaḥyā wrote back informing him that he could not do it. Al-Rashīd then became angry with Yaḥyā and exclaimed, "Aren't there 100,000 dīnārs in the treasury?" And he reiterated to Yaḥyā that he had to have the money. [1333]

Yaḥyā gave word that the sum should be drawn up in dirhams so that upon seeing it al-Rashīd would consider it excessive and perhaps return it. Yaḥyā then sent the money in dirhams, stating that it was the equivalent of 100,000 dīnārs. He ordered that the dirhams be placed in al-Rashīd's portico,[34] which he passed through on the way to the place of the ritual ablution for the noon prayer.

ʿAzzūn said: Al-Rashīd went out around this time and came upon a pile of coins. When he asked what it was, he was told that it was the payment for the slave girl, and that as dīnārs were unavailable an equivalent sum of dirhams was delivered. Al-Rashīd thought that this was excessive. He summoned one of his servants (khādim)[35] and asked him to take the money into his custody and to make a treasury (bayt māl) for him so that he

33. The famous Yaḥyā b. Khālid al-Barmakī, former governor of Ādharbayjān, became tutor and secretary to al-Rashīd while he was still a prince, and ascended to power alongside him. When al-Rashīd became caliph, Yaḥyā was appointed wazīr, with his sons al-Faḍl and Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā serving in the government with him. He served as wazīr from 170 (786–87) to 187 (802–03); EI[1], s.v. Yaḥyā b. Khālid; EI[2], s.v. Barāmika.

34. The portico was presumably in the Khuld Palace (Qaṣr al-Khuld), where al-Rashīd usually stayed when he was in Baghdad.

35. The word khādim may mean "eunuch," and this is the primary and virtually universal meaning for the term as suggested by Prof. David Ayalon in many publications. The evidence adduced by Ayalon points in this direction, but as not every khādim was a eunuch, I have left the cognomen untranslated in the case of high-ranking officers (e.g. Ītākh al-Khādim) and have otherwise rendered the noun khādim as "servant." Whether the servant (or: slave) was a eunuch or not I therefore leave undetermined.

might store there what he wished. He called it the Treasury of the Bride (Bayt Māl al-'Arūs). And he ordered that the slave girl be returned to 'Awn.

He then began to investigate the treasury and discovered that the Barmakids had squandered it. Consequently, he began to suspect them but held back.

It was al-Rashīd's custom to send for companions and for a number of cultured men so as to pass the evening in conversation and repast with them. Among the attendants was a man renowned for his cultural refinement, known by his teknonym, Abū al-'Ūd.[36] He was among those in attendance one night, and his conversation impressed al-Rashīd. He thereupon ordered one of his servants (khādim) to go to Yaḥyā b. Khālid when the latter arose in the morning and order Yaḥyā to give him 30,000 dirhams. He did so.

Yaḥyā said to Abū al-'Ūd, "I'll do it, but we have no ready cash today. Tomorrow, when money is available, we'll give it to you, God willing." He then put him off to the point of tediousness. Abū al-'Ūd began to angle for an opportunity to incite al-Rashīd against the Barmakids. Al-Rashīd's suspicions concerning their conduct had become public knowledge.

Abū al-'Ūd visited al-Rashīd one night, and as they conversed, [1334] Abū al-'Ūd kept turning the conversation deftly until he got al-Rashīd to the saying of 'Umar b. Abī Rabī'ah:[37]

Hind promised and it wasn't her custom to promise.
Would that Hind had fulfilled to us her promise.

Would that she had acted independently for once!
It is the weakling who does not act independently.

Al-Rashīd commented, "Yes, by God, only the weakling does not act independently." He went on this way until the session ended.

Yaḥyā had procured one of al-Rashīd's servants (khādim) to provide him with information about the caliph. When Yaḥyā called upon al-Rashīd in the morning, al-Rashīd proclaimed upon seeing him, "I wanted to send you a poem yesterday that someone in my company recited to me, but then I refrained from disturbing you." He then recited the two verses to him. Yaḥyā remarked, "How beautiful they are, O Commander of the Faithful!"—wondering what it was that he intended. Having departed, Yaḥyā sent a message to this servant, inquiring about the recitation of the poem. The servant replied that Abū al-ʿŪd had recited it.

36. Abū al-'Ūd is a nickname, 'ūd meaning "lute."

37. For the verses by 'Umar b. Abī Rabī'ah, in slightly different form, see his Dīwān, ed. P. Schwarz, 115; ed. Beirut, 101–02; Sharḥ Dīwān 'Umar b. Abī Rabī'ah of al-Makhzūmī, 312–13; Arberry, Arabic Poetry, 40/41. Hind, often mentioned by the poet, is Hind bt. al-Ḥārith of the Banū Murrah.

The wazīr Yaḥyā thereupon summoned Abū al-ʿŪd and said to him, "We withheld your money, but now we have funds ready at hand." He then told one of his servants (khadam), "Go and give him 30,000 dirhams from the treasury of the Commander of the Faithful, and give him 20,000 dirhams from my own funds for our having put him off. Go also to al-Faḍl and Jaʿfar and tell them, 'This man deserves to be treated well. The Commander of the Faithful ordered that he be given money but I put him off. When the funds were available I ordered that they be handed over. I also gave him a donation from my own resources. I should like you to give him a contribution as well.'" When they asked how much the contribution should be, Yaḥyā replied: "20,000 dirhams." Whereupon each one gave him 20,000 dirhams, and Abū al-ʿŪd left for his residence with all this money. [1335]

Al-Rashīd applied himself in earnest to the matter of the Barmakids until he eventually assailed them and removed them from favor (niʿmah). He had Jaʿfar killed as he did with all the rest.

Al-Wāthiq remarked, "By God, my ancestor was right. The weakling does not act independently." And he launched into a discussion of disloyalty and what its perpetrators deserve.

ʿAzzūn said: "I reckon that he will assault his secretaries." In less than a week he did so. He seized Ibrāhīm b. Rabāḥ, Sulaymān b. Wahb, Abū al-Wazīr, Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and the whole lot of them.

ʿAzzūn said: Al-Wāthiq ordered that Sulaymān b. Wahb, secretary of Ītākh, be imprisoned, and he confiscated 200,000 dirhams from him, or according to another version—dīnārs.[38] Sulaymān was fettered and dressed in a woolen sailor's tunic,[39] whereupon he handed over 100,000 dirhams, and requested that the balance be deferred for twenty months. Al-Wāthiq acceded to this. He ordered that he be set free and returned to the secretariat of Ītākh, authorizing him to don black [garments].[40]

38. According to the account above (p. 9), 400,000 dīnārs were confiscated from Sulaymān b. Wahb. A description of Sulaymān b. Wahb's arrest and torture (by Ibn al-Zayyāt) appears in Pseudo-Tanūkhī, Mustajād, 85. See also Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXI, 162.

In this year Shār Bāmiyān governed the Yemen for Ītākh.[41] He departed for there in Rabī' II (December 28, 842–January 25, 843).

In this year Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās became governor of Medina.[42]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

---

39. The midra'ah was a woolen sleeveless tunic worn by slaves and the lower classes; Dozy, Vêtements, 181; *EI*², s.v. Libās.

40. Dignitaries in the 'Abbāsid court customarily wore black garments, and wearing black thus signified that an official was in caliphal service; see, e.g., Hilāl al-Ṣābi', Rusūm, 91 (tr. Salem, 74); Ahsan, Social Life, 51–52.

41. Harthamah Shār Bāmiyān, an associate of Ītākh, is mentioned also below, 1373 (p. 69). Ibn al-'Adīm, Ta'rīkh Ḥalab, I, 71–72, gives a list of the places he governed. See Zambaur, Manuel, 114. Shēr (Shīr or Shār) is a Persian word meaning "king," and was the title of the rulers of Bāmiyān, a city in the Hindu Kush. In the 'Abbāsid period descendants of the Bāmiyān dynasty served in the 'Abbāsid court; see *EI*², s.v. Bāmiyān.

42. For Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Hāshimī, 'Alid governor of Medina, see also below, 1336, 1341 (pp. 18 and 25); Zambaur, Manuel, 25. Al-Wāthiq tended to favor 'Alids.

The Events of the Year

230

(September 18, 844–September 6, 845)

One of the events was al-Wāthiq's dispatching Bughā al-Kabīr[43] to the Arab tribesmen who had created havoc in Medina and its environs.

An Account of the Dispatch of Bughā al-Kabīr to the Tribesmen

It is reported that the trouble began when the Banū Sulaym[44] behaved insolently toward the people around Medina. Whenever [1336]

43. Bughā al-Kabīr (the Elder) was a military commander of Turkish descent (Bughā = "bull") active during the reigns of al-Mu'taṣim, al-Wāthiq, and al-Mutawakkil. He died in 248 (862–63); Ṭabarī, III, 1174; Marin, Reign, 11 and n. 91; Index, 134; EI[2], s.v. Bughā al-Kabīr. Another Bughā, called al-Ṣaghīr ("the Younger"), makes his appearance below.

44. The Banū Sulaym were a northern tribe, descendants of Qays 'Aylān, very powerful east of the Medina-Mecca line. They consisted of both sedentary and nomadic (or seminomadic) elements; Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 92; II, 517; Jamharah, 120a; EI[1], s.v. Sulaim. See also Tanūkhī, Ta'rīkh, II, 586–87. Dr. Michael Lecker has kindly answered a number of my queries about the Banū Sulaym.

the Banū Sulaym came to a market in the Ḥijāz they would fix its prices according to their whim. This matter went so far that they attacked members of the Banū Kinānah[45] and Bāhilah[46] in al-Jār,[47] injuring some and killing others. This was in Jumādā II, 230 (February 13–March 13, 845). Their chief was 'Uzayzah b. Qaṭṭāb al-Sulamī. As a result, Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. al-'Abbās al-Hāshimī, then governor of Medina—the city of the Messenger—dispatched Ḥammād b. Jarīr al-Ṭabarī against them.

Al-Wāthiq had sent Ḥammād to Medina along with an armed party[48] consisting of 200 Shākiriyyah horsemen to prevent the Arab tribesmen from infiltrating into the town. Ḥammād set out against them with a contingent of regular army troops and with volunteers from the Quraysh, the Anṣār and their clients, along with residents of Medina. While Ḥammād was heading for the Banū Sulaym, their scouts encountered him. The Banū Sulaym were reluctant to fight, but Ḥammād b. Jarīr gave orders to do combat with them. He attacked them at a place called al-Ruwaythah, three days march from Medina.[49]

The Banū Sulaym and their reinforcements then came from the desert, 650 altogether, along with all who joined them from those Banū 'Awf[50] belonging to the Banū Sulaym, including Ashhab b.

---

45. The Banū Kinānah b. Khuzaymah were related to Asad. They lived in the mountains north and northeast of Mecca and on the coast. Many were indigent and tended to indulge in plunder and warfare. See Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 3; II, 371; Jamharah, 4b; EI², s.v. Kināna b. Khuzayma.

46. The Bāhilah were a sedentary and semisedentary tribe in middle Arabia. Their center was Sūd (Sawd). They occupied both sides of the road from Riyāḍ to Mecca; Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 92, 137; II, 220; EI², s.v.

47. Text: bi-l-Jār; Ms. C and Cairo ed.: bi-l-Ḥijāz (and cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 8). Jār, half on the mainland and half on an island, was the port of Medina; see EI², s.v. al-Djār. "Al-Jār" is the lectio difficilior; and "Ḥijāz" may be influenced by the occurence of this word two lines above.

48. Literally, "as an armed party" (maslaḥatan). For the term, see Glossarium, CCXCCV; Lane, Lexicon, 1403. It may also refer to one person. The function of a maslaḥah is to occupy an observation point, to go before an army and warn of an enemy approach, to look for spies, and to prevent enemies from entering Muslim territory. It is, then, a reconnaissance patrol or scouting unit.

49. Al-Ruwaythah, diminutive of al-Rawthah, was a station for watering animals on the pilgrimage route between Mecca and Medina in the territory of the Banū Sulaym; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 875; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-'Arab, 171, 180, 181, 184; Bakrī, Mu'jam, II, 685, s.v. Ruwaythah.

50. The Banū 'Awf were a northern tribe, descendants of Sulaym; Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 265; II, 212; Jamharah, 205.

Duwaykil b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥimyar al-ʿAwfī, his paternal uncle Salamah b. Yaḥyā, and ʿUzayzah b. Qaṭṭāb al-Labīdī of the Banū Labīd b. Sulaym. These were their commanders. Their cavalry[51] consisted of 150 horses. Ḥammād and his forces fought them. Then 500 of their reinforcements[52] joined the Banū Sulaym, having come from a place where their bedouins[53] were located, called the heights of al-Ruwaythāh, four mīl (eight km.)[54] from the battlefield. They fought fiercely. The blacks (sūdān) of Medina[55] were thoroughly routed, whereas Ḥammād and his entire force, along with the Quraysh and the Anṣār, stood firm. They engaged in battle until Ḥammād and his entire force were killed, along with a substantial number of the Quraysh and Anṣār who had stood firm. The Banū Sulaym gained possession of sheep and oxen, weapons, and clothing. [1337]

The matter of the Banū Sulaym now became grave. The villages and watering places that lay between them and Mecca and Medina were looted to the point that no one could travel along this route. In addition, the bedouin tribes that were allied to them interdicted the roads.[56]

Consequently, al-Wāthiq sent Bughā the Elder, Abū Mūsā the Turk, against them, along with the Shākiriyyah, the Turks, and the Maghāribah. Bughā proceeded at their head to Ḥarrat Banī Sulaym,[57] with Ṭardūsh the Turk at his vanguard, in Shaʿbān, 230 (April 13–May 11, 845), a few days before the end of the month. He encountered them at one of the watering places of the Ḥarrah. The skirmish took place at Shaqq al-Ḥarrah,[58] beyond al-Suwāri-

51. Instead of "their cavalry" (khayluhum), Ms. O reads jumlatuhum, "all of them," which the note in the Leiden edition prefers.

52. Ms. O reads: wa-amdāduhā instead of amdāduhā, i.e., "Then the Banū Sulaym and their reinforcements came."

53. The Banū Sulaym, as stated (above, n. 44), consisted of nomadic (or semi-nomadic) bedouins and a settled population.

54. See Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 63.

55. The sūdān al-Madīnah were black slaves who formed a kind of fighting force; see also Shaban, Islamic History, I, 110.

56. For taṭarraqa "infiltrate, penetrate," see Glossarium, CCCCXXXIX; Lane, Lexicon, 1847, "found a way, sought to gain access."

57. Ḥarrat Banū Sulaym was the large bed of lava in the area of the Sulaym settlements; See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 248; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-ʿArab, 170, 185; Bakrī, Muʿjam, II, 436.

58. Shaqq al-Ḥarrah is the eastern part of Ḥarrat Banī Sulaym.

qiyyah—their village where they would take refuge.[59] Al-Suwāriqiyyah consists of strongpoints. Most of the Banū Sulaym who encountered Bughā were of the Banū 'Awf, including 'Uzayzah b. Qaṭṭāb and Ashhab, their two commanders-in-chief at the time. Bughā killed about fifty of their men, taking captive a like number, and the remainder were routed. As a result, the Banū Sulaym became vulnerable, and after the skirmish Bughā invited them to accept a guarantee of safe conduct under the jurisdiction of the Commander of the Faithful al-Wāthiq.

Bughā remained in al-Suwāriqiyyah, and the Banū Sulaym [1338] came and rallied to him. He mustered them by the tens and fives and singly,[60] and seized from among those gathered at al-Suwāriqiyyah, aside from the Banū Sulaym, people of unknown origin. The lightly equipped among the Banū Sulaym fled, except for a few. These were the ones who would assail people and interdict the roads. Most of those who came into Bughā's custody were of the Banū 'Awf who had remained steadfast. The last of those seized belonged to the Banū Ḥubshī of the Banū Sulaym. Those marked as evil and vicious—about 1,000 men—were imprisoned under Bughā's jurisdiction. The rest he freed.

Bughā then left al-Suwāriqiyyah for Medina along with the Banū Sulaym captives and those given a guarantee of safe-conduct. This was in Dhū al-Qa'dah, 230 (July 10–August 9, 845). He incarcerated the captives in Medina in the palace complex named after Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah.[61] Bughā made the pilgrimage to Mecca in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 9–September 6, 845). When the festive season ended, he headed for Dhāt 'Irq.[62] He dispatched someone

59. Al-Suwāriqiyyah was a populous settlement on the pilgrimage route northeast of Mecca, in the territory of the Banū Sulaym. It was also called Qāriyat Banī Sulaym. Some of the Banū Sulaym resided in the town and some lived as bedouins in the surrounding area and infiltrated into the Ḥijāz and Najd pilgrim road; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 180; Bakrī, Mu'jam, III, 764; Samhūdī, Wafā, II, 325.

60. For the distributive sense of the numbers given here, see Glossarium, CDXCIV. Ms. O omits "two," which occurs in the text but appears out of place.

61. A palace named after 'Atīka bt. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah is mentioned by Samhūdī, Wafā', II, 725.

62. Dhāt 'Irq is a town near 'Irq, a mountain slightly northeast of Mecca and on the Mecca Road. An 'irq is a vein formed by sand; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 651; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-'Arab, Index, 45; Bakrī, Mu'jam, s.v.

to the Banū Hilāl,[63] who proposed to them something along the lines of what was offered the Banū Sulaym. When the Banū Hilāl approached, he seized about 300 of their insurgents and violent men and freed the rest. He then returned from Dhāt 'Irq. It is a day's journey from al-Bustān (the Garden),[64] and it is a two-day journey from Dhāt 'Irq to Mecca.

In this year Abū al-'Abbās 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir died in Naysābūr, on Monday,[65] 11 Rabī' I (December 26, 844), nine[66] days after the death of Ashnās the Turk. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir died. He had been in charge of the security police (al-ḥarb wa-l-shurṭah),[67] al-Sawād, Khurāsān and its districts, al-Rayy, Ṭabaristān and its adjacent territories, and Kirmān. The tax of these districts was, on the day he died, forty-eight million dirhams. Al-Wāthiq appointed 'Abdallāh's son Ṭāhir[68] governor of all the districts of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. [1339]

Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab went on the pilgrimage this year and was in charge of the events of the festive season.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

---

63. The Banū Hilāl were descendants of the eponymous ancestor Hilāl, whose genealogy is traced back to Muḍar, 'Aylān, and Qays. Some of the tribe emigrated to Egypt with the Banū Sulaym in the eighth century. In the tenth century they fought alongside the Carmathians. In the eleventh, they invaded North Africa along with the Banū Sulaym. They are related to the Banū Numayr; Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 92; II, 282; Jamharah, 121a; *EI*², s.v. Hilāl.

64. The Garden is the Bustān Ibn 'Āmir (or Ibn Ma'mar); Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 611.

65. But 11 Rabī' I was a Wednesday. For the Ṭāhirid Abū al-'Abbās 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, army commander, poet, companion of caliphs, and patron of the arts, son of the founder of the dynasty, See Ṭabarī, III, 1044ff; Rothstein, "Zu aš-Šābuštī's Bericht über die Ṭāhiriden," 162–65; Zambauer, Manuel, 197, and Index, 318; Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic Culture," 58ff.; idem, The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffarids," 97–101. His greatest protégé was the poet Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'ī. See Table 3.

66. Ms. C reads "Seven," as do Cairo edition Mss. A and D.

67. Chiefs of the security police (shurṭah) are occasionally called "chiefs of war," or "chiefs of war and police" (wulāt al-ḥarb wa-l-shurṭah); Tyan, Histoire, 578.

68. For Ṭāhir b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, i.e. Ṭāhir II, see Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Arabic Culture," 69–70; idem, The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffarids, 98, 101. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 9–11, adds here a long passage on 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir. In the Cairo edition, a note suggests that the material may have gone back to Ṭabarī, but this is doubtful. See Table 3.

The Events of the Year 231

(SEPTEMBER 7, 845–AUGUST 28, 846)

A prisoner exchange was carried out between the Muslims and the Byzantines by Khāqān al-Khādim in Muḥarram (September 7–October 6, 845).[69] The number of Muslims allegedly came to 4,362.

It was in this year that members of the Banū Sulaym were killed in Medina in Bughā's prison.

The Reason for the Liquidation of the Banū Sulaym and Its Consequences

It is reported that, when the Banū Hilāl came to Bughā in Dhāt 'Irq, and he seized those I mentioned, he went on the small pilgrimage ('umrah) of al-Muḥarram. He then departed for Medina. All of the Banū Hilāl whom he had seized he imprisoned in his custody along with the members of the Banū Sulaym whom he had previously apprehended. He assembled all of them, in fetters and chains, in the palace complex named after Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. The Banū Sulaym had previously been incarcerated for several months.

69. A Khāqān al-Khādim had served Hārūn al-Rashīd; Ṭabarī, III, 1140; Baladhurī, Futūḥ, 381 (Kāqān al-Khādim al-Ṣughdī). On the prisoner exchange, see below, pp. 38ff. The number of Muslims given there is 4,460.

Bughā then went to the Banū Murrah.[70] In the prison of Medina there were about 1,300 men belonging to the Banū Sulaym and Hilāl. They breached the palace in order to escape. But a Medinese woman noticed the breach and alarmed the inhabitants of Medina, who thereupon approached. The Medinese discovered [1340] that the prisoners had assaulted the prison custodians, killing one or two, and that some or all had come out, having seized the custodians' weapons. The Medinese, free (aḥrār) and slave ('abīd), rallied against them—the governor of Medina at the time being 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Dāwūd al-Hāshimī[71]—and prevented their escape. Their besiegers passed the night surrounding the palace until the morning.

Their assault had been on Friday evening. This was because 'Uzayzah b. Qaṭṭāb had said to the prisoners that he foresaw an evil omen for Saturday.

The Medinese kept pressing the battle, and the Banū Sulaym fought back. But the Medinese defeated them and killed every last one of them. 'Uzayzah would recite in rajaz verse:

A push is needed be the gate narrow.
I indeed am 'Uzayzah b. Qaṭṭāb.

Death is preferable to disgrace for a true man.
This, my Lord, is the gatekeeper's work.

He freed the fetter on his hand, and was then shot in the leg, falling over prostrate. They were all killed. The blacks of Medina killed the tribesmen they encountered in the lanes of Medina—those who had entered in order to bring provisions—until they met a tribesman emerging from the tomb of the Prophet and killed

70. On the Banū Murra, see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 125; II, 433; Jamharah, 162b.

71. An 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. 'Isā b. Mūsā was governor of Mecca in 239 (853–54); see below, 1420 (p. 129); Zambaur, Manuel, 20.

him. He was one of the Banū Abī Bakr b. Kilāb,[72] a descendant of 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Zurārah.[73]

Bughā was away. When he arrived and discovered that they had been killed, he was deeply distressed. It is reported that the gatekeeper had accepted a bribe from the prisoners in exchange for a promise that he would open the gate for them, but they came too soon, before the appointed time.

They would recite in rajaz verse while fighting:

Death is preferable to disgrace for a true man.
The gatekeeper took a thousand dīnārs.

[1341] And they set about reciting when Bughā seized them:

O finest benefit (bughyah), sword of the vigilant,
Remover of wrongdoing, remote and perverse,

I do not hold with whoever of us is delinquent.
Do—may God guide you—what you are commanded.

He replied, "I have been commanded to kill you."

When the comrades of 'Uzayzah b. Qaṭṭāb, chief of the Banū Sulaym, were killed, he fled and entered a well. A Medinese fellow went in after him and killed him. The dead were heaped one on top of the other over the Gate of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

I have received an account on the authority of Aḥmad b. Muḥammad[74] that the muezzin of the Medinese summoned the Banū Sulaym to prayer during the night when they were under guard in order to warn them that the dawn was breaking, but that they had already been awake. The Arab tribesmen began to laugh, saying, "O tipplers of barley soup,[75] you teach us about the night. We know it better than you."

---

72. For the Banū Abī Bakr b. Kilāb, a subtribe of Kilāb, see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 93, 94; II, 222; Jamharah, 121b.

73. For 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Zurārah, see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 94.

74. He is Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Makhlad. See also below, 1358 (p. 45), and note 169.

75. Sawīq is dried wheat or barley, usually made into a heavy soup by mixing water, butter, honey, oil, etc. It was also eaten dry. Sawīq was often taken by travelers on journeys or by troops on campaigns. A skirmish between the Muslims and Meccans after the battle of Badr was called Ghazwat al-Sawīq. In our text, the Medinese, who indulged in this repast, are the butt of the bedouins' derision; see Glossarium, CCCII; Lane, Lexicon, s.v.; Dozy, Supplément, s.v.; EI[1], s.v. Sawīq; EI[2], s.v. Ghidhā', II, 1059.

A man of the Banū Sulaym recited:

When Ibn ʿAbbās[76] was amīr,
The mere gnashing of his canine teeth clamored.

He oppressed with impunity,
And attacked what was weak[77] against his blow.

We were such as to repel oppression
With swords unsheathed in our hands.

The Commander of the Faithful rose against us
Like a lion bestirring from the thicket.

If he be gracious, we hope for God's pardon,
And if he kills, at least our killer is noble.

The reason for Bughā's absence was that he had gone to Fadak [1342] to combat the Banū Fazārah[78] and Murrah there who had conquered it. When he could see them, he sent a Fazārī to offer them a guarantee of safe conduct and to get information about them. When the Fazārī came to them, he warned them of Bughā's impending assault and suggested that they escape, whereupon they fled for the open country, abandoning Fadak, except for a few who remained. Their destination was Khaybar and Janafā'[79] and the surrounding areas.

Bughā overcame some of them and offered a guarantee of safe conduct to others, the rest having fled with a chief of theirs called al-Rakkāḍ ("the Runner") to a place in al-Balqā',[80] in the district of Damascus. Bughā remained for about forty nights in Janafā', a village on the border of the district of Syria, adjacent to the Ḥijāz.

---

76. Ibn ʿAbbās is Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. al-ʿAbbās, ʿAlid governor of Medina, mentioned above, 1335 (p. 16). "ʿAbbās" is one of the Arabic terms for "lion," and also means "stern, austere, morose" (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.). Thus the images in our poem are quite apposite.

77. The word ḍaʿīf is used here as a substantive; see Glossarium, CCCXXXIV.

78. The Banū Fazārah were a subtribe of Ghaṭafān; Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 92, 130; II, 246; Jamharah, 166b; *EI*², s.v. Fazāra.

79. Janafā' is an oasis in the region of Syria, near the Ḥijāz; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 133; Thilo, Ortsnamen, 45.

80. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 728; *EI*², s.v. al-Balḳā'.

He then departed for Medina with the Banū Murrah and Fazārah who had fallen into his hands.

During this year, a contingent from the tribes of Ghaṭafān,[81] Fazārah, and Ashja'[82] came to Bughā. He had sent emissaries to them and to the Banū Tha'labah.[83] When they came to him, it is reported, he ordered Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Ja'farī[84] to have them swear a firm oath that they would not fail to show up when he summoned them; they did so.

Bughā then headed for Ḍariyyah[85] to pursue the Banū Kilāb.[86] He sent his emissaries to them, and it is alleged that about 3,000 of their men rallied to him. He imprisoned about 1,300 of them, of those who were miscreants, and freed the rest. Bughā then brought them to Medina in Ramaḍān, 231 (May, 846) and imprisoned them in the palace complex of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. After that he went to Mecca and remained there until he witnessed the festive season.

[1343] The Banū Kilāb remained in custody. Nothing happened to them during the period of Bughā's absence until he returned to Medina. Then, when he arrived in Medina, he sent for the members of Tha'labah, Ashja' and Fazārah, and he required them to swear the oath. They did not respond, however, but dispersed throughout the countryside. He had them pursued, but not[87] one was overtaken.

In this year a group rebelled in Baghdad, in the suburb (rabaḍ) of 'Amr b. 'Aṭā', rendering the oath of allegiance to Aḥmad b. Naṣr al-Khuzā'ī.[88]

---

81. See *EI*², s.v. Ghaṭafān.

82. The Ashja' were a principal tribe of Ghaṭafān; see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 92, 135; II, 201; Jamharah, 166a; *EI*², II, 1023, s.v. Ghaṭafān.

83. See Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 141; II, 552; Jamharah, 195a; *EI*¹, s.v. Tha'laba.

84. On Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Ja'farī, see below, 1358–62 (pp. 46–50). He was a guide of Bughā in the campaign against the Banū Numayr and, according to the account, a member of that tribe.

85. Ḍariyyah is a village of the Banū Kilāb on the road from al-Baṣrah to Mecca; *EI*², s.v.

86. Banū Kilāb b. Rabī'ah are a tribe of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah, ultimately of Qays 'Aylān; see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 92, 93; II, 371; Jamharah, 121a; *EI*², s.v. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'a.

87. For kathīr aḥad in this sense, see Glossarium, CVI.

88. On the rebellion of Aḥmad b. Naṣr, see Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 589; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 169; Abū al-Ḥusayn, Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanābilah, I, 80–82; Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, V, 173–84; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 13–15; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 303–

The Reason for the Rebellion of the Baghdad Group and the Consequence of Their Action and That of Aḥmad b. Naṣr

The reason for this was that Aḥmad b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzā'ī[89] . . . Mālik b. al-Haytham was one of the *naqīb*s of the 'Abbāsids, and his son was occasionally visited by Ḥadīth scholars, such as Yaḥyā b. Ma'īn,[90] Ibn al-Dawraqī,[91] and Abū Khaythamah.[92] Aḥmad b. Naṣr would openly express disagreement with the exponents of the doctrine of the Qur'ān's creation, notwithstanding the position his father held with the governing authorities of the 'Abbāsid regime.[93] He would excoriate those 06. And see Patton, Aḥmed ibn Ḥanbal, 116ff.; Laoust, Ibn Baṭṭa, xxxiv–xxxv; idem, Schismes, 110; Lapidus, "Separation," 381–82.

---

89. Aḥmad b. Naṣr's father was a close associate of the 'Abbāsids. The Market (suwayqah) of Naṣr, on the Mahdī Canal below the Rūm Quarter, named for him, was given to him by al-Mahdī as a grant; Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, V, 173; Le Strange, Baghdad, 214–15; Lassner, Topography, 78, 79, 104. Aḥmad's grandfather, Mālik b. al-Haytham, an agent (naqīb) of the 'Abbāsids in Khurāsān, was governor of Mosul in 142 (759–60); Azdī, Ta'rīkh Mawṣil, Index, 465; Zambaur, Manuel, 36. The sentence is an anacoluthon; part of the text may be lacking at this point, perhaps a comment on Naṣr b. Mālik; see the note in the Leiden edition. For Aḥmad b. Naṣr and his ancestry, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 181–83; Kennedy, The Early Abbasid Caliphate, 80–81; Daniel, Political and Social History, Index, 219.

90. Abū Zakariyyā' Yaḥyā b. Ma'īn b. 'Awn was a famous Ḥadīth scholar, an associate of Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal; died in 233 (847) in Medina; see Sezgin, GAS, I, 106.

91. Abū 'Alī Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Kathīr al-Dawraqī, a Ḥadīth scholar, died in 246 (860–61); Sezgin, GAS, I, 112. Fragmenta, 529, has here ibnā al-Dawraqī, i.e., the two Ibn al-Dawraqīs. According to the Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, V, 174, both Aḥmad and Ya'qūb al-Dawraqī were associated with Aḥmad b. Naṣr. On Ya'qūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Dawraqī, the older brother, see Khaṭīb, XIV, 277–80. Ṭabarī is said to have studied with Ya'qūb al-Dawraqī; see Introductio, LXIX.

92. Text: Ibn Khaythamah. But Abū Khaythamah Zuhayr b. Ḥarb b. Shaddād al-Nasā'ī is obviously intended. He died in 234 (848–49); Sezgin, GAS, I, 107. Fragmenta, 529, has correctly Abū Khaythamah. Al-Ma'mūn had summoned Yaḥyā b. Ma'īn, Abū Khaythamah and Aḥmad b. al-Dawraqī, inter alios, for interrogation concerning the question of the Qur'ān's creation. They responded, under intimidation, that it is created; Ṭabarī, III, 1116 (Bosworth, Reunification, 204); Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 187; Patton, Aḥmed ibn Ḥanbal, 64; Lapidus, "Separation," 379. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 14.1, adds an Abū Zuhayr (variant: Zuhr); but this appears to be a truncated version of Abū Khaythamah Zuhayr.

93. From the time of al-Ma'mūn until al-Mutawakkil, the Mu'tazilite view that the Qur'ān is created was followed by 'Abbāsid caliphs, and a supporter of the regime was expected to embrace this doctrine. Aḥmad b. Naṣr, however, adopted the Ḥanbalite position advocating the Qur'ān's eternity. See Patton, Aḥmed ibn Ḥanbal, passim; Madelung, "Origins."

who held this doctrine, despite al-Wāthiq's severity toward those who professed this, the inquisition he directed against them, and the prevailing influence Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād had upon him.[94]

I received an account from some(one) of our shaykhs, on the authority of the one who reported it. He had dropped in on Aḥmad b. Naṣr one of those days. A group of people was with Aḥmad, and al-Wāthiq was mentioned in his presence, whereupon he launched into saying, "Didn't this pig do . . . . ?" Or he said, "This infidel (kāfir)." This behavior of his was bruited [1344] about. People made him afraid of the government authorities[95] by saying they have learned of your business, and he got afraid of them.

Among his visitors there was reportedly a man named Abū Hārūn al-Sarrāj:[96] another called Ṭālib; and another, who was a Khurāsānī and associate of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, chief of the security police. These men openly professed to him adherence to his doctrine. The Ḥadīth scholars who surrounded him, namely, Aḥmad b. Naṣr and those Baghdadīs who denied the doctrine of the Qur'ān's creation, incited Aḥmad and induced him to agitate against this doctrine. In this matter they had recourse to him in particular because of the influence his father and grandfather had with the 'Abbāsid regime and on account of his assets in Baghdad.

He was one of those to whom the residents of the East Side had given the oath of allegiance concerning "the promotion of the good, the discouraging of evil and obedience to Him." This was in 201 (816–17), when dissolute people were rampant in Madīnat al-Salām and corruption out in the open, al-Ma'mūn being then in Khurāsān—we gave an account of this above.[97] He persisted in

---

94. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 146, says that al-Wāthiq followed his father (al-Mu'taṣim) and uncle (al-Ma'mūn) on the question of justice (a Mu'tazilite principle); and see Murūj, VI, 21. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād, a staunch supporter of Mu'tazilism, is often said to have had great influence upon al-Wāthiq.

95. Text: fa-khuwwifa bi-l-ṣultān. Leiden O and Cairo edition D read fa-khawwafa al-sulṭān. The term sulṭān, usually translated "government authorities," may mean "caliph" here, as it occasionally does in historical writings of the ninth and tenth centuries.

96. The text of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 14, gives the name pointed as al-Saddākh (variant: al-Sarrāj).

97. Aḥmad b. Naṣr received the oath of allegiance in 201, according to Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, V, 176; but Ibn Kathīr says it was his father Naṣr b. Mālik; this undertaking until al-Ma'mūn came to Baghdad in 204 (819–20). They had hoped that the general populace would respond to his call, as he had acted for the reasons that have been mentioned.

It is reported that Aḥmad b. Naṣr reacted favorably to those who requested this of him, that those who strove on his behalf by summoning people to him were the two men whose names I mentioned previously, and that Abū Hārūn al-Sarrāj and Ṭālib distributed money among people, giving a dīnār to each person.

Aḥmad b. Naṣr fixed with them an appointed night when a drum would be beaten, signaling a rallying together the next morning for an assault against the government authorities. Ṭālib [1345] was on the West Side of Baghdad together with those in league with him, and Abū Hārūn was on the East Side together with those in league with him. Ṭālib and Abū Hārūn gave dīnārs to two sons of the commander Ashras, among others, for distribution among their neighbors. Some of them drank wine (nabīdh), and a number of them gathered around to partake of it. Having become drunk, they beat the drum on the night of Wednesday, one night before the appointed time. The set time for this was the night of Thursday, 3 Sha'bān, 231 (April 4, 846). They thought that it was the night of Thursday, the one that they had set for the uprising. They beat the drum vigorously, but no one responded.

Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm was away from Baghdad, his proxy there being his brother, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm.[98] The latter dispatched to them a page (ghulām) of his by the name of Rakhsh,[99] who came and questioned them concerning their story. None of those men-

---

Bidāyah, X, 303. According to Ṭabarī, Naṣr b. Ḥamzah b. Mālik al-Khuzā'ī, was appointed governor over the East Side in 201; Ṭabarī, III, 1002 (Bosworth, Reunification, 47). The Khaṭīb states that Aḥmad b. Naṣr acted (in 201) along with Sahl b. Salāmah al-Anṣārī. See Ṭabarī, III, 1009 (Bosworth, 57), where Sahl, Khālid al-Daryūsh, and other "good citizens" (ṣulaḥā') are said to have defended their neighborhoods from criminal elements and self-styled protectors. See Lapidus, "Separation," 375, 379–81, on the movement of al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf; and Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 81.

98. The Ṭāhirid Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. [al-Ḥusayn b.] Muṣ'ab, brother of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, died in 236 (850–51); see below, 1404 (p. 107); and see Ṭabarī, III, 1236; Marin, Reign, 61 and n. 304; Index, 136; Zambaur, Manuel, 46, 197, 198; Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffarids," 101, 102. See Table 3.

99. Rakhsh, a Persian name, means "lightning, the rainbow, reflection of light," etc., and "happy, fortunate, prosperous," as well as "mottled or swift horse" (the name of Rustam's steed); Steingass, Dictionary, 572.

tioned as having beaten the drum showed up. A man was pointed out who was a bathhouse attendant, afflicted in his eye, by the name of 'Īsā al-A'war ("the One-Eyed"). Rakhsh threatened to have him beaten. He consequently informed on the two sons of Ashras, on Aḥmad b. Naṣr b. Mālik and others whom he named.

Rakhsh searched for the group that very night, apprehending some of them. He seized Ṭālib, whose residence was in the suburb on the West Side, and Abū Hārūn al-Sarrāj, whose residence was on the East Side. And he pursued for several days and nights those whom 'Īsā al-A'war had named. They were taken into cus-[1346] tody on the East Side and the West Side, each group being seized in its own section. Abū Hārūn and Ṭālib were each shackled with seventy[100] *raṭl*s of iron. In the residence of the two sons of Ashras two green banners with red on them were found in a well.[101] One of the supporters of Muḥammad b. 'Ayyāsh brought them up. He was prefect of the West Side. The prefect of the East Side was al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. Jibrīl al-Qā'id ("the Commander") al-Khurāsānī.[102] Afterwards a eunuch (khaṣī) of Aḥmad b. Naṣr was seized and threatened. He thereupon confirmed what 'Īsā al-A'war had confessed.

Rakhsh went to Aḥmad b. Naṣr, who was then in the bath. He said to the government officers, "This is my residence. If you come upon a banner or equipment, or weapons for rebellion, you are free to expropriate them and to shed my blood with impunity." The residence was searched, but not a thing was found in it, whereupon he was brought to Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab. Two of his eunuchs and two of his sons were seized, as well as a man who often visited him by the name of Ismā'īl b. Muḥammad b. Mu'āwiyah b. Bakr al-Bāhilī, whose residence was on the East Side.

---

100. Ms. O and Cairo edition Ms. D: ninety.

101. Green was actually the color that had been adopted by al-Ma'mūn after he appointed the 'Alid 'Alī al-Riḍā as heir apparent. The choice of green may have signified paradise (al-janna) or the beginning of a new era. It was later used by the Ottomans, who claimed an 'Abbāsid precedent. See Fārūq 'Umar, Buḥūth, 242ff. Red was a color used by rebels (e.g. al-Muḥammirah) against government authority; Hilāl al-Ṣābi, Rusūm, 75 (to Salem, 61).

102. For al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad and his ancestry, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 179–80.

These six were brought on mules, having saddles without cushions underneath, to the Commander of the Faithful al-Wāthiq, who was in Sāmarrā. Aḥmad b. Naṣr was shackled in a pair of fetters. They were brought out from Baghdad on Thursday, 28 Sha'bān, 231 (April 29, 846).

Al-Wāthiq was informed about their whereabouts. He invited Ibn Abī Du'ād and his partisans and convened a public assembly for them so that they might undergo an open inquisition (imtiḥān). The group was assembled in his presence. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād was reportedly averse to having Aḥmad b. Naṣr killed in [1347] public.[103]

When Aḥmad b. Naṣr was brought in, al-Wāthiq did not argue with him about the uprising, nor about the report of his intention to rebel against him. He asked him instead, "What do you have to say concerning the Qur'ān?"

He replied, "It is the word of God." Defying death, Aḥmad b. Naṣr had smeared himself with a depilatory (tanawwara)[104] and perfumed himself.

When al-Wāthiq asked, "Is the Qur'ān created?" Aḥmad replied, "It is the word of God."[105]

When he asked, "What is your view concerning your Lord? Will you see Him on the Day of Resurrection?" Aḥmad replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, according to traditions of the Messenger of God, he said, 'You will see your Lord on the Day of Resurrection as you see the moon. You will not be harmed by viewing Him.' We follow the tradition."[106] He went on to say,

---

103. Ibn Abī Du'ād's reluctance may indicate that Naṣr had wide public support in Sāmarrā, as he did in Baghdad. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād's hesitancy here (and see below, 1348, p. 33) is occasionally adduced as a sign of his moderation.

104. See Glossarium, DXXXIV. And see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. nāra.

105. This is the very response that Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal and his supporters gave under the inquisition in the days of al-Ma'mūn; Patton, Aḥmed ibn Ḥanbal, 70–72. Note, however, that the reply dodges the question, as it is not stated that the Qur'ān is the uncreated or eternal word (or speech) of God.

106. The question relates to the vision of God (ru'yat Allāh) and ultimately to the issue of tashbīh ("anthropomorphism"). One of the principles of Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal was the vision of God on the day of Resurrection and the belief that the Prophet saw his Lord. See, for instance, McCarthy, Theology, Kitāb al-luma', pars. 68–81; and Appendix IV, p. 242 (from al-Ash'arī, Maqālāt al-Islāmiyyīn, I, 292): "They [Aṣḥāb al-Ḥadīth, Ahl al-Sunnah] hold that God will be seen by eyes on the Day of Resurrection as the moon is seen on the night of full moon." The Mu'ta-

"And I have received a tradition on sound authority from Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah[107] that 'the heart of a human being is between two of God's fingers; He scrutinizes it.' The Prophet would pray, 'Scrutinizer of hearts, make my heart steadfast in your religion.'"[108]

Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm[109] said to Aḥmad b. Naṣr, "Watch what you are saying." He replied, "You ordered me to say this." Disturbed by his remark, Isḥāq asked, "Did I really order you to say this?" He replied, "Yes, you ordered me to give sincere counsel to him, as he is the Commander of the Faithful. My sincere counsel to him is not to controvert a tradition of the Messenger of God."

Al-Wāthiq asked those around him what they had to say concerning Aḥmad b. Naṣr. They went on quite a bit. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq[110] said—he had been a judge on the West Side who was removed from office, and he was present, and Aḥmad b. Naṣr was devoted to him—"O Commander of the Faithful, his blood may be shed with impunity." Abū 'Abdallāh al-Armanī, an associate of Ibn Abī Du'ād, said, "Give me his blood to drink, O Commander of the Faithful." Whereupon al-Wāthiq said, "He [1348] will be killed as you wish."

But Ibn Abī Du'ād commented, "O Commander of the Faithful, zilites, on the other hand, held that God cannot be seen. For the tradition, tarawna rabbakum fī yawm al-qiyāmah . . . , see Wensinck, Concordance, II, 202; Bukhārī, Mawāqīt, 16, 26; Adhān, 129; Tafsīr 50, 2, etc. And see below, 1353–54 (p. 40), where it is reported that Muslim captives in Byzantine hands were interrogated on these two questions prior to their being ransomed.

---

107. Sufyān b. 'Uyaynah b. Maymūn al-Hilālī, the famous Ḥadīth scholar, jurist and exegete, died in 196 (811) in Mecca; Sezgin, GAS, I, 96. Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal studied with him. For his view that the Qur'ān is the speech of God, see Madelung, "Origins," 511.

108. For the tradition, inna qalb ibn ādam bayn uṣbu'ayn . . . , see Wensinck, Concordance, V, 454; Ibn Ḥanbal, Musnad, II, 173. In Ibn Ḥanbal's version, the epithet al-jabbār appears instead of Allāh as here; and it ends idhā shā'a an yuqallibahu qallabahu. In the version of Tirmidhī, Da'wat, 89, 60 (Wensinck, loc. cit.): laysa ādamī illā wa-qalbuhu . . . . The ḥadīth continues, in the version of Ibn Ḥanbal: yā muṣarrif al-qulūb (instead of yā muqallib al-qulūb, as in our text). And see the versions in Wensinck, V, 459, from Musnad, II, 168, etc.

109. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm had been one of the leaders of the inquisition at the time of al-Ma'mun; see above, n. 26.

110. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Isḥāq al-Qāḍī had been a judge in Baghdad at the time of al-Ma'mūn and al-Mu'taṣim; Ṭabarī, III, 1120, 1128 (Bosworth, Reunification, 209, 218), 1235 (Marin, Reign, 60 and n. 295); Massignon, "Cadis et naqībs," 107.

an infidel is asked to rescind thrice in case he has some infirmity or mental derangement."[111] He was apparently loath to have Aḥmad b. Naṣr killed on his account.

Al-Wāthiq said, "When you see that I have gotten up to go toward him, let no one else rise along with me. I shall reckon my steps toward him."[112] He called for al-Ṣamṣāmah, the sword of ʿAmr b. al-Maʿdī Karib al-Zubaydī. It was in the storeroom, having been presented to Mūsā al-Hādī, who ordered Salm al-Khāsir, the poet, to describe it for him, which he did, whereupon the caliph gave him a present.[113]

Al-Wāthiq took hold of al-Ṣamṣāmah. It had a wide blade, joined at the base by three nails that connected the blade with the joint of the hilt. Al-Wāthiq approached Aḥmad, who was in the middle of the palace. He called for a leather mat, in the middle of which Aḥmad b. Naṣr was placed, and a rope. Aḥmad's head was bound and the rope stretched. Al-Wāthiq gave him a blow that fell upon the rope that was on his shoulder. Then he gave him another blow on his head. At this point, Sīmā al-Dimashqī unsheathed his sword and struck the nape of Aḥmad's neck, severing his head.[114] Bughā al-Sharābī reportedly gave him another

111. An unbeliever (kāfir) who is an apostate (murtadd), as opposed to an unbeliever by birth (kāfir aṣlī = mushrik), who is confined to a choice of death or slavery if captured, must be asked to rescind three times according to Islamic law; see EI[1], s.v. Murtadd.

112. That is, go slowly and deliberately. Abū al-Ḥusayn, Ṭabaqāt, I, 81, adds "to this infidel who worships a Lord we neither worship nor recognize by the attributes which he ascribes to Him."

113. Abū Thawr ʿAmr b. al-Maʿdī Karib al-Zubaydī, a renowned Arab poet and warrior, fought with his famous sword named "al-Ṣamṣāmah" in the Jāhiliyyah and continued wielding his weapon after converting to Islam; EI[2], s.v. ʿAmr b. Maʿdīkarib. Salm b. ʿAmr al-Khāsir, d. 186 (802) (Sezgin, GAS, II, 511), was a panegyrist of al-Mahdī and al-Hādī. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 143, al-Wāthiq had a polisher temper the sword.

114. Sīmā al-Dimashqī (the Damascene), also called Sīmā al-Turkī ("the Turk"), was purchased by al-Muʿtaṣim from the wazīr Faḍl b. Sahl; Ṭabarī, III, 1325 (Marin, Reign, 129); Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 591; Buldān, 256, 262 = Wiet, Les pays, 45, 54; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 307; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 93. In the version of Abū al-Ḥusayn, Ṭabaqāt, I, 81, it is the caliph himself who kills Aḥmad b. Naṣr, but the account there appears to be telescoped. Abū al-Ḥusayn adds "a marvelous report" according to which the severed head uttered, "There is no God but Allāh . . ." and relates other stories about the head reciting Qurʾān verses.

blow.[115] Al-Wāthiq stabbed him with the point of al-Ṣamṣāmah in his abdomen.

He was then carried seated backward to the enclosure in which Bābak[116] was. There he was suspended, with a pair of fetters on his feet, dressed in trousers (sarāwīl) and a shirt (qamīṣ).[117] His head was brought to Baghdad, where it was displayed first on the East Side and then on the West Side, and thereafter returned to the East Side. The head was placed in an enclosure, a pavilion erected about it, and a guard placed over it. This spot was known as Ra's Aḥmad b. Naṣr. A note was placed upon Aḥmad's ear, on which was written:

[1349] This is the head of the infidel, polytheist, and deviant, namely, Aḥmad b. Naṣr b. Mālik. He was of those killed by God at the hands of 'Abdallāh Hārūn al-Imām al-Wāthiq bi-llāh, Commander of the Faithful, after the latter had given him proof concerning creation of the Qur'ān and denial of anthropomorphism (tashbīh). He offered Aḥmad repentance, making possible return to the truth. But he refused, save open opposition. Praise to God who dispatched him to His fire and to His grievous punishment. When the Commander of the Faithful interrogated him about this, he confirmed anthropomorphism and uttered infidelity, whereupon the Commander of the Faithful regarded his blood as licit and cursed him.

Al-Wāthiq ordered that whoever was named as belonging to the associates of Aḥmad b. Naṣr, who was reported to be a follower of his, should be interrogated. They were put into prisons. Afterwards, about twenty men who had been named were placed in dark dungeons. They were prevented from receiving the alms given to prisoners and from having visitors, and were encumbered with irons. Abū Hārūn al-Sarrāj was brought along with others to Sāmarrā. They were thereafter taken back to Baghdad and imprisoned.

115. For Bughā al-Ṣaghīr al-Sharābī, see *EI*², s.v.; Sourdel, Vizirat, Index. His cognomen al-Sharābī apparently means "the Cupbearer" (and not "the Tippler," as occasionally rendered). A sharābī is also a seller of juice or a preparer or seller of potions; Goitein, Mediterranean Society, I, 151; II, 46, 253, 261. On the cognamen, see also Shaban, Islamic History, II, 82–83 (< Shārbāmyānī).

116. Bābak is the famous heresiarch who revolted during the period of al-Mu'taṣim; Marin, Reign, esp. 8–15, 21–57, 59; *EI*², s.v. He was killed and suspended on a gibbet in Sāmarrā, which became a favored spot for hanging religious deviants and criminals.

117. Sirwāl means "underdrawers," and in the later Islamic period the term "included also pantaloons, kneebreeches, long trousers, and close-fitting drawers"; *EI*², s.v. Libās, V, 733. A qamīṣ is a body shirt; ibid.; see also Ahsan, Social Life, 45–46, 55, 60 (sirwāl); 10, 34, 36–39 (qamīṣ).

The cause for apprehending the men who were seized on account of Aḥmad b. Naṣr was that a certain man, a fuller, who was in the suburb, came to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab and proclaimed that he would name the followers of Aḥmad b. Naṣr. Isḥāq sent men along with the fuller to pursue them. When they were rounded up, the pursuers found cause for imprisoning the fuller along with them. He had date palms in al-Mihrizār,[118] which were cut down, and his residence was plundered. Among those imprisoned [1350] on account of Aḥmad b. Naṣr was a group of people who were the offspring of 'Amr b. Isfandiyār. They died in prison.

One of the poets recited the following concerning Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād:

Whenever you stray from Iyād
You become a punishment against mankind.[119]

You belong, as you claim, to Iyād,
So be gentle to these men, Iyādite.

In this year, al-Wāthiq intended to go on the pilgrimage and prepared himself for it. He sent 'Umar b. Faraj[120] on ahead to put 118. For Mihrizār, Ms. O has M-h-d-r-ā-n. Read perhaps Mihrijān. See Schwarz, Iran (IV), 170; (V), 546. A place called Mihrawān is mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 697; Le Strange, Lands, 375.

119. The word for mankind is 'ibād, lit. "servants" (of God). There may be an allusion here to the connection of the tribe of Iyād with the Christian community of al-Ḥīrah called 'Ibād; see note in Leiden edition. Some members of the tribe of Iyād had settled in al-Ḥīrah. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād claimed to belong to Iyād.

120. 'Umar b. Faraj al-Rukhkhajī was one of the officials who had purchased land for the founding of Sāmarrā. He was later punished by al-Mutawakkil and his property confiscated in 233 (847–48); see below, 1377–78 (pp. 73–74). See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 357; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 592; Buldān, 258 = Wiet, Les pays, 48 and n. 4; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 148 (read 'Umar), 228; Tanūkhī, Nishwār, II, 12–18, 20; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 145; Pellat, "Une charge," 38–39; Sourdel, Vizirat, 237, 257, n. 1, 259, n. 3, 263, 268, 280, n. 1. A palace in Baghdad was named for his father, Faraj al-Rukhkhajī; Lassner, Topography, 79. And see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 190, on both father and son.

the route in order. 'Umar returned and notified him that water was scarce, whereupon al-Wāthiq changed his mind.[121]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

In this year al-Wāthiq appointed Ja'far b. Dīnār governor of the Yemen.[122] He went there in Sha'bān (April 2–May 1, 846). He and Bughā the Elder went on the pilgrimage. Bughā the Elder presided over the events of the festive season. Ja'far went to the Yemen accompanied by 4,000 horsemen and 200 infantry, and was given six[123] months of service allotments.

In this year, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt appointed, in the Caliphal Palace, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Abī Khamīṣah, client of the Banū Qushayr, of the people of Uḍākh, over al-Yamāmah, al-Baḥrayn, and the Mecca Road adjacent to al-Baṣrah.[124] Aside from the caliph, no one except Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt is reported to have made appointments in the Caliphal Palace.[125]

In this year, a group of brigands broke into the treasury, which was in the Public Palace (Dār al-'Āmmah) situated in the interior [1351] of the palace complex.[126] They took 42,000 dirhams and a small

---

121. Text; fa-bada'a lahu. Addenda, DCCLXXV: fa-badā lahu.

122. Ja'far b. Dīnār al-Khayyāṭ was an army commander who served under al-Mu'taṣim and governed the Yemen from 224 (838–39) until he was deposed in 225 (839–40). He was later reinstated by al-Wāthiq, as we have it in our text; see on him, Ṭabarī, III, 1103; Marin, Reign, 27 and n. 161; Index, 135; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 593; Zambaur, Manuel, 114. He became supervisor of the Mecca Road and the events of the festive season in the years 241–43 (1433–36; below, pp. 145–50).

123. Ms. C: seven.

124. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Abī Khamīṣah was of the Banū Qushayr b. Ka'b b. Rabī'ah, a northern tribe, descendants of Qays 'Aylān (Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 101; II, 473; Jamharah, 129b). Uḍākh is a village of the Banū Numayr in al-Yamāmah; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 303. Al-Baḥrayn in the pre-Islamic and early Islamic period was on the Eastern Arabian coast, southwest of the present-day island of Baḥrayn; Yaqut, Mu'jam, I, 148, 506; Thilo, Ortsnamen, 34; *EI*², s.v. al-Baḥrayn.

125. On the Caliphal Palace in Sāmarrā, also known as al-Jawsaq al-Khāqānī, see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 261 = Wiet, Les pays, 53; Herzfeld, Samarra, 104; Sāmarrā'ī, Ta'rīkh, I, 78; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 230; Rogers, "Samarra," 137. And see al-'Amid, Architecture, 91ff. It was excavated by H. Viollet and thereafter by F. Sarre and E. Herzfeld. It should not be confused, of course, with the Caliphal Palace (Dar al-Khilāfah or Khalīfah) in Baghdad (see Le Strange, Baghdad, 233, 243, 314; Lassner, Topography, Index, 317).

126. The Public Palace, or Public Audience Hall (Dār al-'Āmmah), containing the public treasury (bayt al-māl), was the open palace of the Caliphal Palace complex, in which the caliph would sit on Mondays and Thursdays. The treasury storehouses were in the northeast corner of the palace, which was bordered on the north by the Sarījah Road. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 261 = Wiet, Les pays, 53; amount of dīnārs. They were subsequently apprehended. Yazīd al-Ḥulwānī, chief of the security police and deputy of Ītākh, relentlessly pursued the brigands until he apprehended them.[127]

In this year, Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Khārijī, of the Banū Zayd b. Taghlib, along with thirteen men, rebelled in Diyār Rabīʿah.[128] Ghānim b. Abī Muslim b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī went out to engage him with a like number [of fighters]—the latter was responsible for the security police of Mosul.[129] Four of the rebels were killed. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr was taken captive and sent to Sāmarrā, and subsequently to the Maṭbaq [Prison] of Baghdad.[130] The heads of his followers and his banners were raised [for public display] near Khashabat Bābak.[131]

In this year, Waṣīf, the Turk, arrived from the area of Iṣbahān, al-Jibāl, and Fārs.[132] He had gone in pursuit of the Kurds, for they had been trying to infilitrate into these areas. About 500 of the Kurds came with him, including young slaves (ghilmān), bound together in chains and fetters. Waṣīf ordered that they be impris-

---

Herzfeld, Samarra, 104–5; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 230; Samarrāʾī, Taʾrīkh, I, 82, 91; al-ʿAmid, Architecture, 98ff.

127. Yazīd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥulwānī (al-Turkī) became governor of Egypt under al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān in 242 (856–57); Kindī, Wulāh, 199, 202–04, 206–10; Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, I, 249; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 308, 314; Zambaur, Manuel, 27.

128. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 589 (Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Shaybānī al-Khārijī). Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 16, gives the name as Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khārijī al-Thaʿlabī (Taghlibī?). Khārijite "revolts" in Diyār Rabīʿah were fairly common; see also Ṭabarī, III, 1500 (below, p. 224), where the same man is said to have revolted in the area of Mosul. He was finally killed in Diyār Rabīʿah in 252 (866); III, 1685 (Saliba, 144). The frequent Khārijite uprisings in the area of the Jazīrah were often no more than disturbances by Arab nomads and seminomads; see Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 21.

129. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 16, reads: Ghānim b. Abī Muslim b. Aḥmad al-Ṭūsī; Zambaur, Manuel, 37. For his family affiliation, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 174–75.

130. The Maṭbaq was a formidable prison built by al-Manṣūr in southwest Baghdad on the road leading to the al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah gates; Le Strange, Baghdad, 27; Lassner, Topography, 243.

131. Khashabat Bābak was a section of Sāmarrā named after the gibbet where Bābak was hanged; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 259 = Wiet, Les pays, 51; Herzfeld, Samarra, 101, 103; Samarrāʾī, Taʾrīkh, I, 44. See above, n. 116.

132. Waṣīf, a slave purchased by al-Muʿtaṣim, was a Turkish army commander who served under him and later became a chamberlain (ḥājib) for al-Wāthiq and al-Mutawakkil; Ṭabarī, III, 1237; Marin, Reign, 62, and n. 313; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 591; Buldān, 256, 258, 262, 264 = Wiet, Les pays, 45, 52, 54, 58. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 255, 300; Tanbīh, 361–63. The name waṣīf means "servant" or "page." Waṣīf had estates in Iṣbahān and the Jabal that al-Mutawakkil later sequestered in favor of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān; below, 1452 (p. 171).

oned. He was awarded 75,000 dīnārs and invested with a sword and apparel.

In this year, the prisoner exchange between the Muslims and the Byzantine ruler was carried out.[133] The Muslims and Byzantines met near the Lamos River at Seleucia, a one day march from Tarsus.[134]

The Reason for the Prisoner Exchange and How It Took Place

It is reported on the authority of Aḥmad b. Abī Qaḥṭabah,[135] an [1352] associate of Khāqān al-Khādim, a servant (khādim) of al-Rashīd—he had been raised in a frontier town (thaghr)—that this Khāqān presented himself to al-Wāthiq, together with a group of prominent people of Tarsus and other places, lodging grievances against an official over them in charge of complaints (maẓālim) whose teknonym was Abū Wahb. The official was summoned, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik kept confronting him with Khāqān and the others in the Public Audience Hall on Mondays and Thursdays after the notables had departed. They would remain until noon, when Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik and they would leave. The official was deposed.

Al-Wāthiq ordered that the inhabitants of the frontier towns (ahl al-thughūr) be subjected to an inquisition (imtiḥān) concern-

---

133. On the prisoner exchange of 231 (845–46), notable because the Muslims made confession of the Mu'tazilite creed a condition for release of Muslim captives, see Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 589; Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 190–91; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 16–17; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 307; Bury, History, 274–75; Ostrogorski, History, 196; Vasiliev, History, 276–77; idem, Byzance, I, 198–204, 310–15. Ṭabarī's report is particularly valuable for its detail and eyewitness accounts.

134. The Lamos River, on the border between Islamic and Byzantine territory, between Cilicia Trachea and Arab Cilicia, was the locale of prisoner exchanges on various occasions; the first between al-Rashīd and Nicephorus I in 189–90 (805); the second in 192 (808); and the third, the one treated here. See also below, anno 241, p. 140; Marin, Reign, 61, n. 306, 62, 63, 66; Rosenthal, Return, 33, n. 175; *EI*², s.v. Lamas-Ṣū.

135. Aḥmad b. Abī Qaḥṭabah is mentioned here and on p. 1353 (Ibn Abī Qaḥṭabah) as an associate of Khāqān al-Khādim. On p. 1354 an Abū Qaḥṭabah is mentioned as the emissary of Khāqān to the Byzantines, and Abū Qaḥṭabah al-Maghribī al Ṭurṭūsī is cited in connection with the prisoner exchange of 241 (855-56) on 1427 (below, p. 139 and n. 462). But we assume that the same person is intended.

ing the Qur'ān. All except four individuals declared its createdness, whereupon al-Wāthiq ordered that the four be decapitated unless they acknowledged it. He ordered that all the inhabitants of the frontier towns be given grants (jawā'iz) as Khāqān saw fit. The inhabitants of the frontier towns hastened to their places, Khāqān tarrying a bit after them.

Emissaries of the Byzantine ruler—he was Michael son of Theophilus, son of Michael, son of Leo, son of George[136]—came to al-Wāthiq, requesting that the caliph ransom Muslim captives who were under the Byzantine ruler's jurisdiction. Al-Wāthiq consequently sent Khāqān to carry out the transaction. Khāqān and his companions left in order to ransom the Muslim captives at the end of 230 (844–45), in keeping with the appointed time set between Khāqān and the emissaries of the Byzantine ruler, which was the Day of the 'Āshūrā',[137] that is, 10 Muḥarram, 231 (September 16, 845).

Al-Wāthiq thereafter appointed Aḥmad b. Sa'īd b. Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī[138] governor over the frontier towns (thughūr) and provinces ('awāṣim), and ordered him to be present at the prisoner exchange. He departed with seventeen[139] postal couriers. There was a dispute between the Byzantine emissaries who came to request the prisoner exchange and Ibn al-Zayyāt concern- [1353] ing the matter at hand. The Byzantines stated that they would not accept in exchange old women, old men, or children.[140] This dispute went on between the emissaries and Ibn al-Zayyāt for a number of days until they consented to an equal exchange.

Al-Wāthiq sent to Baghdad and al-Raqqah in order to buy 136. See above, n. 3, for Michael III (842–67), son of Theophilus (829–42), son of Michael II (820–29). Michael II was preceded by Leo V, the Armenian (813–20), who was, however, not his father, and Leo V was preceded by Michael I Rangabé (811–13).

137. The 'Āshūrā' is a voluntary fast day on the tenth of Muḥarram.

138. For Aḥmad b. Sa'īd b. Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī and his ancestry, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 136–38, and sources cited there; and see also Ibn al-'Adīm, Ta'rīkh Ḥalab, I, 70. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 17, has Muslim instead of Salm, an obvious error.

139. Ms. O: fifteen.

140. According to Bar Hebraeus, Chronography, 140–41, the Christian ambassador claimed that the Arab prisoners were all soldiers captured in battle, but that the Christian prisoners taken by the Arabs included, aside from soldiers, old men and women and very young boys and girls who were apprehended in villages.

mamlūk slaves available for sale. He purchased all those that he could, but the requisite number [for the prisoner exchange] was not reached. Al-Wāthiq therefore brought from his palace elderly Byzantine women[141] and others until the right number was met. He then sent two men who were associated with Ibn Abī Du'ād, one named Yaḥyā b. Ādam al-Karkhī, who had the teknonym Abū Ramlah, and [the other] Ja'far b. al-Ḥadhdhā'.[142] He sent with them one of the secretaries of the military administration[143] by the name of Ṭālib b. Dāwūd. Al-Wāthiq ordered Ṭālib and Ja'far to interrogate the captives. Whoever professed that the Qur'ān was created was to be ransomed, and whoever denied this was to be left in the hands of the Byzantines. Al-Wāthiq ordered that Ṭālib be given 5,000 dirhams, and that all those ransomed professing that the Qur'ān was created be given one dīnār from the money[144] brought with them. The group then departed.

It is reported on the authority of Aḥmad b. al-Ḥārith:[145] I questioned Ibn Abī Qaḥṭabah, an associate of Khāqān al-Khādim—he was the intermediary between the Muslims and the Byzantines who had been sent to determine the number of Muslims in Byzantine territory. Aḥmad had come to the Byzantine ruler and calculated their number prior to the ransoming. He reported that their number came to 3,000 men and 500 women.

Al-Wāthiq subsequently ordered that they be ransomed. He dispatched Aḥmad b. Sa'īd posthaste to carry out the prisoner exchange, and he sent as well men to interrogate the Muslim [1354] prisoners. Those who professed that the Qur'ān was created, and that God cannot be seen in the Afterlife, were ransomed, and those who did not profess this were left in the hands of the Byzantines. There had not been a prisoner exchange since the days of Muḥammad b. Zubaydah in 194 (809–10) or 195 (810–11).[146]

---

141. Ms. O: Byzantine women and old women.

142. Text: al-Ḥadā'. In Ṭabarī, Index, 102, the name is given as Ja'far b. (Aḥmad) al-Hadhā'. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh (II, 588), has Ja'far b. Aḥmad al-Ḥadhdhā' ("Shoemaker") and says that he was ṣāḥib al-jaysh ("army commander"). See also Addenda, DCCLXXV.

143. The kuttāb al-'arḍ served in the dīwān al-jaysh; *EI*², II, 507, s.v. Djaysh; Glossarium, CCCCLVII.

144. Text: min māl. Cairo edition Ms. A: min mālihi.

145. An Abū Ja'far Aḥmad b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Mubārak, historian and pupil of al-Madā'inī, died in 258 (871–72); Sezgin, GAS, I, 318.

146. That is, the caliph al-Amīn, Muḥammad, son of Hārūn al-Rashīd by Zubaydah.

Aḥmad b. al-Ḥārith said: On the Day of the ʿĀshūrāʾ, on 10 Muḥarram, 231 (September 16, 844), the Muslims and the non-Arab peasants (ʿulūj)[147] with them met with two Byzantine officers, one called Anqās and the other, Telesios.[148] The Muslims and the volunteers numbered 4,000, including horsemen and infantry.[149] They met at a place called Lamos.

It is reported that Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Saʿīd b. Salm b. Qutaybah al-Bāhilī received a letter from his father[150] that stated that the Muslims and the Dhimmīs[151] with them who were ransomed numbered 4,600. Six hundred of them were women and children and fewer then five hundred were Dhimmīs. The rest were men from various regions.

Abū Qaḥṭabah reported—he was the emissary of Khāqān al-Khādim to the Byzantine ruler whose task was to examine the number of prisoners and to ascertain the accuracy of what Michael, the Byzantine ruler, claimed—that the number of Muslims prior to the exchange was 3,000 men, 500 women, and children who were in Constantinople and elsewhere, save those whom the Byzantines brought forth and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ṭarsūsī[152] who was in their custody.

Abū Saʿīd b. Salm sent Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ṭarsūsī and Khāqān, along with a number of prominent captives, to al- [1355] Wāthiq. Al-Wāthiq placed each one of them upon a horse and gave him 1,000 dirhams.

---

147. The term ʿulūj is polysemous and thus difficult to translate by a single word. It means, according to Kazimirski, s.v., someone ignorant, savage, rustic, barbarian, or a non-Arab who is not a Muslim. One may say that the term refers to the autochthonic, as yet not arabicized, population. Thus, the terms "peasants" and "infidels" are occasionally employed to render the sense. ʿUlūj occasionally means "peasants" in the pejorative sense, even when referring to Muslims, like English "rube" or "yokel."

148. The first name may also be read Ayqās; Ms. C: Nifās? The second—Ṭalsiyūs or the like—yields Telesios; Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 313.

149. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrikh, II, 589, gives the number as more than 70,000 men.

150. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad's father is mentioned above, 1352 (p. 39); and see n. 138.

151. The Dhimmīs are the non-Muslim minorities, primarily Christians and Jews, living under Muslim protection, the beneficiaries of a contract (dhimmah) with the Muslims stipulating their obligations in return for this protection. See *EI*², s.v. Ahl al-Dhimma.

152. Leiden Ms. O gives his toponymic nisbah as Ṭurṭūsī. The difference determines whether he, or his family, hailed from Tarsus in Asia Minor (which is most likely) or from Tortosa in Spain; see also below, n. 462.

This same Muḥammad reported that he had been a captive in the custody of the Byzantines for thirty years, and that he was taken captive in the raid of Rāmiyah.[153] He had been one of the sellers of provender when he was taken captive, and was among those ransomed in this exchange.

Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh said: We were ransomed on the Day of the 'Āshūrā', on the Lamos River at Seleucia, near the sea. The number of ransomed captives came to 4,460. There were 800 women, with their husbands[154] and children, and more than one hundred Dhimmīs of the Muslims. The exchange took place on a one-to-one basis, whether young or old. Khāqān endeavored to evacuate[155] all the Muslims that could be located in Byzantine territory.

Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh continued: When they were assembled for the exchange, the Muslims stood on the east side of the river, the Byzantines on the west side. The river was fordable. Each party would send forth a man, and the two would meet in the middle of the river. When a Muslim reached the Muslims, he and they would exclaim, "God is the greatest." And when a Byzantine reached the Byzantines, they said something in their language equivalent to "God is the greatest."

It is reported on the authority of al-Sindī, mawlā of Ḥusayn al-Khādim:[156] The Muslims and Byzantines built bridges over the river. We would send a Byzantine over our bridge, and the Byzantines would send a Muslim over their bridge. The one would come to us and the other to them. He denied that the river was fordable.

[1356] It is reported on the authority of Muḥammad b. Karīm: When

153. The Index gives Rāmiyah as a toponym. For a Rāmiyah ca. 22 km, southeast of Tyre, see Dussaud, Topographie, 11; Pauly-Wissowa, s.v. Rama. Vasiliev, on the other hand (Byzance, I, 313), translates: "expédition de troupes légères."

154. The phrase "with their husbands" is omitted in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 17. Ṭabarī cites conflicting accounts of the number of Muslims freed: p. 1339 (4,362), 1354 (4,600), 1355 (4,460). Ya'qūbī gives a low number of 500 men and 700 women. Other sources stay in the neighborhood of 4,000; see Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 202, n. 4.

155. The words "endeavored to evacuate" render istafragha; see Glossarium, CDI.

156. Perhaps Ḥusayn al-Khādim 'Araq al-Mawt; see Ṭabarī, III, 1841; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 621; Jahshiyārī, Wuzarā', 82.

we were restored to the Muslims, Ja'far and Yaḥyā interrogated us. We responded appropriately and were given two dīnārs apiece.

Muḥammad b. Karīm said: The two Byzantine Patrikioi who brought forth the captives did not mind associating[157] with Ja'far and Yaḥyā.

He said: The Byzantines were disturbed by the number of Muslims, as they were few and the Muslims many, but Khāqān reassured them in this regard. He established a truce of forty days between the Byzantines and the Muslims, during which time the Byzantines would not be raided, so that they could reach their territory and place of safety. The exchange went on for four days. A large number of Byzantine captives remained with Khāqān, whom the Commander of the Faithful had designated for ransoming the Muslims. Khāqān turned over to the Byzantine ruler one hundred persons of those who remained with him. Thus, the Byzantines would be in arrears owing to the difference, thereby assuring an exchange for the Muslims who might be captured before the ransom period expired. He returned the rest to Tarsus, where he sold them.

Muḥammad b. Karīm said: About thirty ransomed Muslims who had converted to Christianity in Byzantine territory departed with us. When the forty-day period of truce between Khāqān and the Byzantines elapsed, Aḥmad b. Sa'īd b. Salm b. Qutaybah undertook a winter raid. Snow and rain afflicted the men, and approximately 200 died. Many drowned in the Podandos [River],[158] and about 200 were taken prisoner. The Commander of the Faithful al-Wāthiq was angry with Aḥmad b. Sa'īd for this. The total number of men who died and were drowned came to 500.

A Patrikios who was one of the Byzantine commanders ad- [1357] vanced upon Aḥmad b. Sa'īd, who was accompanied by 7,000 men. Aḥmad b. Sa'īd withdrew before him, whereupon the [Muslim] notables said to him. "An army of 7,000 men should not be frightened away. If you cannot face them head on, then at least

157. Text: lā ba'sa bi-himā fī mu'āsharatihimā; see Glossarium, CXXVI.

158. Badandūn or Budandūn (Budhandūn) = Podandos of the Romans and Byzantines, now called Bozanti (Pozanti), is ca. 13 km. north/northwest of the Cilician Gates; Le Strange, Lands, 133–35; Honigmann, Ostgrenze, Index, 253; Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 78, 220; *EI*² s.v. Bozanti.

infiltrate their territory." So he seized about 1,000 head of cattle and 10,000 sheep and departed. As a result, al-Wāthiq deposed him and appointed Naṣr b. Ḥamzah al-Khuzā'ī,[159] on Tuesday, 16 Jumādā I of this year (January 18, 846).

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn, brother of Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, died in Ṭabaristān in Ramaḍān (May, 846).[160]

In this year, al-Khaṭṭāb b. Wajh al-Fals died.[161]

In this year, Abū 'Abdallāh b. al-A'rābī al-Rāwiyah died on Wednesday, 13 Sha'bān (April 14, 846) at the age of 80.[162]

In this year, Umm Abīhā bt. Mūsā, sister of 'Alī b. Mūsā al-Riḍā, died.[163]

In this year, Mukhāriq al-Mughannī ("the Singer")[164] died, as did Abū Naṣr Aḥmad b. Ḥātim, the transmitter of al-Aṣma'ī,[165] 'Amr b. Abī 'Amr al-Shaybānī,[166] and Muḥammad b. Sa'dān al-Naḥwī.[167]

---

159. For Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, a cousin of Aḥmad b. Naṣr, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 183. He was appointed governor of Baghdad in 201 (816–17); Ṭabarī, III, 1002 (Bosworth, Reunification, 47); and was later governor of Damascus.

160. For the Ṭāhirid al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muṣ'ab, see Ṭabarī, III, 1066, etc.; Marin, Reign, 91, 93–106; Zambaur, Manuel, 198 (Ṭāhirids); Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffarids," 97, 100. And see Table 3.

161. Al-Khaṭṭāb b. Wajh al-Fals, a mawlā of Banū Umayyah, supported the revolt of the Sufyānid 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. al-Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah against al-Amīn; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VI, 172, anno 195 (810–11).

162. He was a transmitter of poetry (rāwiyah), grammarian, poet, etc. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, III, 131–32, 138; Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 15–16, and n. 9 ad loc. for additional sources.

163. Umm Abīhā bt. Mūsā was the daughter of Mūsā al-Kāẓim, seventh imām of the Imāmī/Twelver Shī'ites. 'Alī b. Mūsā al-Riḍā, her brother, is the eighth imām, who had been designated by al-Ma'mūn as heir apparent.

164. Mukhāriq b. Yaḥyā al-Mughannī, a famous court musician, was active from the time of al-Amīn to that of al-Wāthiq; Ṭabarī, III, 967, etc., Guidi, Tables, 613; Farmer, History, 121–22, Index, 254; Neubauer, Musiker, 199–201; Stigelbauer, Sängerinnen, 36, 81, 111–13, especially 81, n. 537.

165. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 121; Suyūṭī, Bughyat al-wu'āh, 130; Sezgin, GAS, II, Index, 728; EI[2], I, 718, s.v. al-Aṣma'ī;

166. 'Amr b. Abī 'Amr al-Shaybānī, a philologist, was son of the philologist and poetry expert, Abū 'Amr Isḥāq b. Mirār al-Shaybānī; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 150; Sezgin, GAS, II, 88, 183, 354;

167. Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. Sa'dān al-Naḥwī, a philologist and Qur'ān reader, was son of the philologist Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Sa'dān b. al-Mubārak; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 154; Sezgin, GAS, IX, 135.

The Events of the Year

232

(August 28, 846–August 16, 847)

One of the events was Bughā the Elder's march against the Banū Numayr and his attack upon them.

The Reason for Bughā the Elder's March against the Banū Numayr and What Took Place between Them [1358]

I was informed[168] by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Makhlad[169] concerning most of their account. He was said to be with Bughā on this journey. But the rest of the account derives from someone else.

It is reported that the reason for Bughā's march against the Banū Numayr was that ʿUmārah b. ʿAqīl b. Bilāl b. Jarīr b. al-Khaṭafī[170] eulogized al-Wāthiq in an ode, and then visited him 168. O begins with "Abū Jaʿfar said," i.e., Ṭabarī.

169. Text: Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Khālid. C reads Makhlad (without points); and see also Index and Addenda, DCCLXXV; and Cairo edition (on basis of A and D).

170. A panegyrist of al-Wāthiq, ʿUmārah was son of the poet ʿAqīl b. Bilāl; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XX, 183–88; Sezgin, GAS, II, 559.

and recited the ode to him, whereupon al-Wāthiq ordered that he be given 30,000 dirhams and lodging. 'Umārah told al-Wāthiq about the Banū Numayr, informing him about their mockery and corruption upon earth, and about their making raids upon people, including al-Yamāmah and its adjacent territories. Al-Wāthiq thereupon wrote commanding Bughā to wage war against them.

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad reported that when Bughā was ready to march against the Banū Numayr from Medina he brought with him Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Ja'farī as a guide along the way. He headed for al-Yamāmah, and encountered a contingent of theirs in a place called al-Shurayf.[171] They engaged him in battle, and Bughā killed about fifty of their men, taking forty captive.

Bughā then went to Ḥuẓẓayyān, and thereafter to a village of the Banū Tamīm called Mar'ah in the district of al-Yamāmah.[172] He encamped there, and then dispatched his emissaries to propose to the Banū Numayr a guarantee of safe-conduct, summoning them to obedience. They refused him, however, reviling his emissaries, and slipped away to do combat with him. This went [1359] on until he dispatched two last emissaries, one of the Banū 'Adī of Tamīm and the other of the Banū Numayr. They killed the Tamīmī and wounded the Numayrī.

Consequently, Bughā set out for them from Mar'ah. His march against them was on 1 Ṣafar, 232 (September 27, 846). He came to Baṭn Nakhl and kept marching until he entered Nukhaylah, whereupon he sent word to them that they should come to him.[173]

The Banū Ḍabbah of Numayr broke camp and ascended their mountain—on the left side of the Sawd Mountain—it was a mountain to the rear of al-Yamāmah, most of whose inhabitants

171. There were two places named Shurayf, one in al-Yamāmah and the other in the Yemen. For the Yamāmah Shurayf, where the Banū Numayr were located, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 285.

172. For Ḥuẓẓayyān, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 292; for Banū Tamīm, see EI[1], s.v. Tamīm; for Mar'ah in al-Yamāmah, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 481; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-'Arab, 140, 181.

173. For Baṭn Nakhl, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 667; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-'Arab, 180, 189. There were many locations named Nukhayl (diminutive of nakhl, "date palm") or Nukhaylah, including the well-known Nukhaylah close to al-Kūfah (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 771).

were of the Bāhilah.[174] Bughā sent emissaries to them, but they refused to come to him, so he sent a detachment against the Banū Numayr, which, however, failed to overtake them. As a result, he sent detachments that eventually caught up with them and took captives. Bughā then sent in their wake one of the contingents accompanying him. It consisted of about 1,000 men, aside from the weak (ḍuʿafā')[175] and attendants who stayed behind in the army camp. He encountered the Banū Numayr, and they rallied to fight him, numbering then about 3,000 men. They were in a place called Rawḍat al-Abān and Baṭn al-Sirr, two days journey from al-Qarnayn and one day from Uḍākh.[176] They routed his vanguard and put his left wing to flight, killing about 120 or 130 men of Bughā's force and hobbling about 700 camels and 100 riding animals in his army camp, as well as plundering the impedimenta and some of the material that was with him.

I was informed by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad: Bughā encountered them and attacked them, but the night came over him. Bughā thereupon began to implore and summon them to return to obedience[177] of the Commander of the Faithful. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Jaʿfarī argued this with them.

They set about saying to him, "By God, Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, we brought you into the world,[178] but you have not respected your blood relations. Now you come to us with these slaves and peasants (ʿulūj) with whom you fight us. By God, we'll show you hot tears"—and such kind of talk.

When morning approached, Muḥammad b. Yūsuf said to Bughā, "Attack them before the light of dawn when they see how few we are and move boldly against us." But Bughā refused him. [1360] When dawn broke and the Banū Numayr took notice of the number of men with Bughā—they had placed their infantry in

174. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 183, and Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-ʿArab, 149, 169, mention Sawd (or Sūd) Bāhilah as a village belonging to the Bāhilah.

175. The term ḍuʿafā' (pl. of ḍaʿīf), meaning "weak, infirm," refers in this context to women, children, slaves, etc.

176. For Baṭn al-Sirr, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 666; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-ʿArab, 174, 176. And for al-Qarnayn (the Two Peaks), named for two small mountains, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 73.

177. Text: wa-ilā ṭāʿah. Addenda, DCCLXXV; ilā ṭāʿah . . . .

178. The word waladnāka, lit. "we gave birth to you," has the sense of "your mother is of our folk"; see Glossarium, DLXVI.

front of them and their horsemen at their rear, with their livestock—they attacked and routed us, all the way to our camp, and we were certain to be wiped out.

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad said: Bughā learned that some of the horses of the Banū Numayr were located at a certain place in their territory, and so he sent there about 200 horsemen from his force. Just as we were about done for, Bughā and his men having been routed, the contingent that Bughā had dispatched at night to these horses came on the scene. Coming from the place to which they had been sent from the camp, they arrived at the rear of the Banū Numayr, who had routed Bughā and his forces. Bughā's men blew their trumpets. And when the Banū Numayr heard the clarion, and spotted those who emerged against them at their rear, they exclaimed, "By God, the slave has deceived us!"[179] They turned their backs in flight, their horsemen abandoning their infantrymen after having protected them to the utmost.

I was informed by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad: Not more than one of their infantrymen survived; every last one of them was killed. But the horsemen took off in flight on the backs of their steeds.

Someone aside from Aḥmad b. Muḥammad said that the rout of Bughā and his force went on from morning to noon, on Tuesday, 13 Jumādā II, 232 (February 4, 847). The Banū Numayr were then engaged in plundering and in hobbling the camels and horses until Bughā's men who had been put to flight returned to him, and those who were separated from him rejoined him. This force attacked and routed the Banū Numayr, and from noon until afternoon killed about 1,500 of their men. Bughā stayed at the site of the skirmish at the watering place known as Baṭn al-Sirr[180] until [1361] the heads of the Banū Numayr who were killed were gathered for him. He and his companions then rested for three days.

I was also informed by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad that the Numayrī horsemen who fled from the skirmish sent messengers to Bughā requesting a guarantee of safe conduct, which he granted them. Thus, they came to him; he bound them in fetters and went off with them.

---

179. Text: 'udhr. Addenda, DCCLXXV; ghadara; see Glossarium, CCCIV; so Cairo edition on basis of D. "The slave" is pejorative for Bughā.

180. See Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-'Arab, 145.

However, someone other than Aḥmad b. Muḥammad said: Bughā went from the place of the skirmish in pursuit of those who had eluded him, but he overtook only the weak who were exhausted and some livestock, and then returned to the fortress of Bāhilah.

He said: Those of the Banū Numayr whom Bughā fought were the Banū ʿAbdallāh b. Numayr, the Banū Busrah and Bilḥajjāj, the Banū Qaṭan, the Banū Salāh, the Banū Shurayḥ, and clans that remained behind who belonged to the Banū ʿAbdallāh b. Numayr.[181] Only a few of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Numayr participated in the fighting. The Banū ʿĀmir b. Numayr are cultivators of date palms and ewes, and not horsemen. [The Banū] ʿAbdallah b. Numayr are the ones who fought the Arab tribesmen. ʿUmārah b. ʿAqīl recited to Bughā:

You left the rough ones and rugged clan,
And filled the prisons with refuse.

I was informed by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad that after Bughā had bound, arrested, and taken with him the Banū Numayr who received his guarantee of safe-conduct, they rioted along the way and tried to break their fetters and escape. He ordered that they be brought forward one at a time. As each one was presented, he had him beaten about 400 to 500 lashes. Aḥmad[182] b. Muḥammad claimed that he witnessed their beating, and that not one of them gave vent to his pain. A shaykh of theirs was brought forth who had hung a text of the Qur'ān on his neck.[183] Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, who was seated next to Bughā, laughed at him, saying, [1362]
"This is the most offensive thing that has happened—may God give you prosperity." This was when he hung the text on his neck. He then beat him 400 or 500 lashes but the shaykh did not give in to his pain or appeal for help.

181. On the Banū ʿAbdallāh b. Numayr, see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 228; II, 116, Jamharah, 354. For the Banū Busrah and Bilḥajjaj of Numayr b. ʿĀmir, see ibid., I, 92; II, 450; Jamharah, 121a. And for Banū Qaṭan, see ibid., I, 290; II, 468. On Shurayḥ and Salāh, see Kaḥḥālah, Muʿjam, II, 590, 529.

182. Text: aḥad. Cairo edition (on the basis of Mss. A and D): Aḥmad.

183. For other instances of Qur'ān texts suspended from the neck, see, for example, Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, ʿIqd, I, 212; al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, III, 946 [ʿAbdallāh b. Khabbāb], which were brought to my attention by Dr. Khalil Athamina.

It is reported that a horseman of the Banū Numayr, called[184] "the Madman" (al-majnūn), encountered Bughā and stabbed him in the course of the skirmish that I have described. One of the Turks shot the Madman, but he escaped and lived for three days before succumbing to his wound.

Then Wājin al-Ushrūsanī al-Ṣughdī[185] joined Bughā, along with an auxiliary force of 700 men of the Ushrūsaniyyah-Ishtīkhaniyyah.[186] Bughā sent Wājin and Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Ja'farī after the Banū Numayr. They pursued the latter relentlessly until they penetrated deep into the territory of the Banū Numayr, coming to Tabālah[187] and its environs at the border of the district of the Yemen, but the Banū Numayr eluded him.

Bughā departed, having apprehended only six or seven of them, and then stayed at the fortress of Bāhilah. Bughā sent detachments from Halān, Sawd, and other places in the district of al-Yamāmah to the mountains and plains of the Banū Numayr to fight those who accepted the guarantee of safe conduct and then held out. The detachments killed one contingent and took another captive. A number of the leaders of the Banu Numayr began to request a guarantee of safe conduct, each one for himself and for his own clan. Bughā acceded to them, and was magnanimous and conciliatory. He remained until all those suspected of being in these regions were rounded up for him. Seizing about 300 men, he fettered them with irons and brought them to al-Baṣrah, in Dhū al-Qa'dah, 232 (June 19–July 18, 847).

---

184. Text: bi-du'ā'. Addenda, DCCLXXV and Cairo edition (Ms. D): yud'ā.

185. Wājin (or: Wājan) al-Ushrūsani al-Ṣughdī (the Ṣughdian) was from Ushrūsanah, the name of a province and a town east of Samarqand in Transoxania; Le Strange, Lands, 474–76. See also Ṭabarī, III, 1306–07 (Marin, Reign, 113) and 1503 (Saliba, 3); Ya'qūbī; Ta'rīkh, II, 602.

186. Text: Al-Ushrūsaniyyah al-Ishtīkhaniyyah. Ishtīkhan is a town slightly to the north of Samarqand; Le Strange, Lands, 466. The compound term may refer to citizens of the town of Ishtīkhan in the province of Ushrūsanah. But the two formed separate elements in the mixed population of military personnel living in Sāmarrā, that is, the Farāghinah, Ushrūsaniyyah, Ishtīkhanjiyyah and others, from various districts of Khurāsān; see, e.g., Yāqūt, Mu'jam, 263 = Wiet, Les pays, 55. Perhaps the word "and" must be supplied or understood.

187. Tabālah is in northwest Yemen, in the interior of 'Asīr; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 816; EI[1], s.v.

Bughā sent a dispatch to Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAbbāsī[188] to march with those of the Banū Kilāb, Fazārah, Murrah, Thaʿlabah, and others who were with him in the city and to meet up with him. Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAbbāsī overtook Bughā in Baghdad, and both of them went to Sāmarrā in al-Muḥarram, 233 (August 17–September 15, 847).

The number of Arab tribesmen whom Bughā and Ṣāliḥ [1363] al-ʿAbbāsī brought, aside from those who died, fled, and were killed in these skirmishes that we have described, were 2,200, including men of the Banū Numayr, Banū Kilāb, Murrah, Fazārah, Thaʿlabah, and Ṭayyiʾ.[189]

In this year, the pilgrims were stricken upon the return journey by fierce thirst at four stations to al-Rabadhah.[190] A drink fetched the price of a few dīnārs. Many people died of thirst.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab was appointed governor of Fārs.

In this year, al-Wāthiq gave orders to desist from tithing seagoing vessels.

In this year, the cold was so severe in Nīsān (April) that water froze on the fifth day of the month.

In this year, al-Wāthiq died.

An Account of the Illness from Which al-Wāthiq Died

A number of our colleagues informed me that the illness from which al-Wāthiq died was dropsy. He was treated by being seated in a heated oven, where he found relief and comfort.[191] Al-Wāthiq ordered them the next day to increase the heat of the oven. This was done, and he sat in it longer than on the previous day. But he 188. On Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAbbāsī (al-Turkī), see also below 1422 (p. 134), where the governor of Damascus sends him with troops to quell a revolt in Ḥimṣ. Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 262 = Wiet, Les pays, 55, notes a street and palace named for him in Sāmarrā. See Herzfeld, Samarra, 112.

189. See Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, I, 176; II, 555, Jamharah, 87.

190. Al-Rabadhah was an important station on the Mecca Road near Medina, about 6 km. from Dhāt ʿIrq; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 312 = Wiet, Les pays, 146; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II 748; Hamdānī, Ṣifat Jazīrat al-ʿArab, 142, 171, 185.

191. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 590, the ground was dug out to form a cavity, which was then heated with tamarisk wood.

was overcome with heat, and was then removed from the oven and placed on a litter. Al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī, 'Umar b. Faraj, and others were present. Then Ibn al-Zayyāt and Ibn Abī Du'ād arrived. They were unaware of the caliph's death until his face struck the litter, at which point they realized that he had died.

According to another version, Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād attended him, and was with him when he lost consciousness[192] and died, whereupon Aḥmad approached to close his eyelids[193] and fit him out [for burial].[194] His death was on 23 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 10, [1364] 847). He was buried in his palace in the Hārūnī. The one who recited funeral prayers, attended to his burial, and took care of his affairs was Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād. Al-Wāthiq had ordered Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād to lead the public prayer on the Day of Sacrifice (10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah) in the oratory. Aḥmad led the festival prayers, for al-Wāthiq was very ill, and could not attend the oratory. He died of this illness.

A Portrayal of al-Wāthiq, His Years, and the Extent of His Caliphate

Someone who knew him personally reported that al-Wāthiq was fair, tending to a ruddy complexion, and was handsome, of medium height and well-built. His left eye was paralyzed and had a white fleck.[195] He died, as some claim, at the age of thirty-six; according to others, he succumbed at the age of thirty-two. Those who claim that he was thirty-six say that he was born in 196

192. Text: a'mā 'alayhi. Addenda, DCCLXXV and Cairo edition (Mss. A and D): ghumiya 'alayhi.

193. The word ghammaḍa means "to close the eyelids of a dead person"; Glossarium, CCCXCII; Introductio, LXXXIX.8, and note d, which refers to Ṭabarī, III, 1136.13; see also Dozy, Supplément, II, 227.

194. For yuṣliḥu min sha'nihi in the sense of "fit him out" or the like, see Glossarium, CCCXXVI.

195. A fair (abyaḍ) complexion connoted nobility, and ruddy (aḥmar) was often used for northern people (Byzantines and Greeks), according to Fischer, Farb- und Formbezeichnungen, 338–39. For similar physical descriptions of al-Wāthiq, see also Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 361; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 263; Suyūṭī, Ta'rīkh, 342 = tr. Jarrett, 356. William Beckford, in his famous novel Vathek (1786), calls particular attention to al-Wāthiq's terrible eye that no one could bear to behold. Beckford's source was D'Herbelot's reference to al-Wāthiq's "oeil si terrible" in Bibliothèque Orientale (1697), 912. On al-Wāthiq's awesome glare, see, for example, Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if, 111.

(811–12) and that his caliphate lasted five years, nine months, and five days. And some of them say seven days and twelve hours. He was born along the route of the Mecca Road. His mother was a Byzantine slave named Qarāṭīs. His name was Hārūn, his teknomyn, Abū Ja'far.

It is reported that when he was stricken with the sickness from which he died—his abdomen had become afflicted with dropsy—he ordered that the astrologers be brought into his presence, and they were. Among those in attendance were al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, the brother of al-Faḍl b. Sahl;[196] al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī;[197] Ismā'īl b. Nawbakht;[198] Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Khwārazmī; al-Majūsī al-Quṭrabbulī;[199] Sanad, the associate of Muḥammad b. al-Haytham;[200] and all those engaged in astrology. They considered his illness, star, and horoscope, and predicted that he would live a long time, estimating fifty years in the future. But in less than ten days he died.

Some Reports about al-Wāthiq [1365]

Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk[201] reported that he saw al-Wāthiq a few days after al-Mu'taṣim died. He was seated at the first soirée that 196. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl was court astrologer and finance minister and governor for al-Ma'mūn; d. 236 (850–51); Bosworth, Reunification, Index, 272; Sourdel, Vizirat, Index, 766, and especially 215–18; Sezgin, GAS, VII, 122; *EI*², s.v. His brother al-Faḍl b. Sahl, Dhū al-Riyāsatayn, was court astrologer for Hārūn al-Rashīd and then wazīr of al-Ma'mūn, who had him killed in 202 (817–18) or 203 (818–19); Bosworth, Index, 271; Sourdel, Index, 761, and especially 196–213; Sezgin, GAS, VII, 115; *EI*², s.v. Sezgin cites our passage on p. 119.

197. Al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī was presumably the son of Isḥāq b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī, who served in the court of al-Ma'mūn; Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, I, 79; Sezgin, GAS, VII, 119.

198. See on him, Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 164.

199. The mathematician-astronomer Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. al-Khwārazmī was born in Khwārazm and served in the court of al-Ma'mūn; Ṭabarī, III, 1085 (Bosworth, Reunification, 158); Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 29, 79, 116, 192; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 652; Ibn al-Qifṭī, Ta'rīkh, 286; Sezgin, GAS, V, 228; *EI*², s.v. Kh^{w}ārazmī, Abū Dja'far. Al-Majūsī al-Quṭrabbulī is unidentified.

200. For the mathematician and astronomer/astrologer Sanad (or Sind) b. 'Alī Abū al-Ṭayyib, see Sezgin, GAS, V, 242; VI, 138; VII, 119. For Muḥammad b al-Haytham b. 'Adī al-Ṭā'ī, see Ṭabarī, III, 1141, 1156 (Bosworth, Reunification, 232, 249); and Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 89, 144.

201. Text: al-Ḥasan. Addenda, DCCLXXV, and Cairo edition (Mss. A and D): al-Ḥusayn. Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Bāhilī al-Ashqar al-Khalī' ("the Dissolute"), a he convened. The first song at this soirée was rendered by Shāriyah, the slave girl of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī:[202]

When the bearers raised his bier they knew not
If it be for abiding or perdition.

May your female mourners say about you what they wish,
Morning and night.[203]

Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk said: He wept and, by God, we wept to the point that the weeping totally possessed us. Then one of the singers proceeded to sing:[204]

Bid farewell, Hurayrah, for the cavalcade is departing.
O man, can you endure saying farewell?[205]

Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk said: And the caliph wept, by God, even more, exclaming, "I have never heard a condolence[206] for a father or an elegy as I did today." Then the soirée dispersed.

Al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk reported on the authority of 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' that 'Alī b. al-Jahm recited concerning al-Wāthiq after he became caliph:[207] well-known Baṣrian poet, court poet of 'Abbāsid caliphs, confidant of al-Amīn, was a panegyrist of al-Wāthiq; d. 250 (864–65); *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk; Sezgin, GAS, II, 518–19.

---

202. Shāriyah al-Jāriyah, a famous singing girl, was freed by the 'Abbāsid prince Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, who then married her; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIV, 109–114; Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 8,100,110-11, 154; Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, par. 144; Farmer, History, 134; Stigelbauer, Sängerinnen, Index, 173, especially 39–49.

203. Text: wa-waqt. Read wa-'inda (with Ibn al-Athīr and Ṣūlī). At this point the Leiden edition begins to cite variants from Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī, Kitāb al-awrāq (see Translator's Foreword).

204. Ṣūlī: fa-ghannā Mukhāriq ("Mukhāriq sang").

205. This is the beginning of one of the most famous odes in Arabic literature. See Geyer, Zwei Gedichte von al-'A'šâ, II, 10. Hurayrah, a singing girl of Bishr b. 'Amr of Ḥīrah, is the beloved of the poet al-A'shā.

206. Text: wa-baghī. Addenda, DCCLXXV, and Cairo edition: wa-na'ī.

207. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. al-Faḍl b. al-Rabī' was a singer and composer of melodies in caliphal courts from the time of Hārūn al-Rashīd to that of al-Muntaṣir; d. 227 (841–42); Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVII, 121–41; Farmer, History, 160; Neubauer, Musiker, 161. 'Alī b. al-Jahm b. Badr was a well-known poet and sometime judge; d. 249 (863). He was court poet during the reign of al-Mutawakkil; *EI*², s.v. 'Alī b. al-Djahm; Sezgin, GAS, II, 580–81. For the poem, see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 117, and 'Alī b. al-Jahm, Dīwān, 188.

Both the worldly and the pious Thrive during the regime of al-Wāthiq Hārūn.

He abounds with justice and generosity,
Sustaining this world along with religion.

Goodness prevails through his kindness,[208]
And people are at comfort and ease.

How many wish him a long life [1366]
And how many intone "amen."

ʿAlī b. al-Jahm also recited concerning him:[209]

People trust (wathiqat) the king al-Wāthiq bi-llāh.
With this monarch wealth is wretched, not the companion.[210]

The sword is congenial to him,
The precious object alien.

A lion he, stern battle smiles at his might.
Sons of al-ʿAbbās, God wills that only you govern.[211]

Qalam, the slave girl of Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, sang these two songs, and she rendered the song of Muḥammad b. Kunāsah:[212]

I may be respectful and timid,
But when I sit with people of faith and honor

208. Text: qad ʿamma bi-l-iḥsān fī faḍlihi. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 117 (cited in note): wa-ʿamma bi-l-iḥsān min fiʿlihi.

209. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 117, has the poem with slight variants; see also ʿAlī b al-Jahm, Dīwān, 13.

210. The meaning is that his generosity puts the wealthy to shame, while his companion benefits.

211. Text: yaʾbī...illā. Addenda, DCCLXXV: yaʾba...illā, Note the association here of the lion metaphor with the name ʿAbbās. See above, n. 76.

212. On Qalam, or Qalam al-Ṣāliḥiyyah—Qalam means "Reed Pen"—the slave girl of Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII 115–117, VIII, 173; Herzfeld, Samarra, 162. For Abū Yaḥyā Muḥammad b. Kunāsah, see Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 198, 362; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 111–16. The poem and the following account appear in Aghānī, XII, 116.

I let my soul behave naturally
And say what I like without being shy.

When her tune was sung in al-Wāthiq's presence,[213] he liked it and sent a message to Ibn al-Zayyāt: "Woe unto you, who is this Ṣāliḥ b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb? Summon him and have him bring along his slave girl." Ṣāliḥ brought her to al-Wāthiq, and she was introduced to him. Pleased with her singing, he sent to Ṣāliḥ asking that he state his price. Ṣāliḥ replied, "100,000 dīnārs, O Commander of the Faithful, as well as the governorship of Egypt." So the caliph returned her. Then Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb, brother of Ṣāliḥ, recited concerning al-Wāthiq:

The house of the lovers does not wish you to separate,[214]
What you see has made you a new helper for them.

The souls of those who loved Laylā[215] were tormented
And remained unrequited and uncompensated.

Qalam, the slave girl of Ṣāliḥ, composed this song. And Zurzur [1367] the Elder[216] sang it for al-Wāthiq. The caliph asked whose song it was, and Zurzur responded that it was composed by Qalam. Al-Wāthiq sent word to Ibn al-Zayyāt to bring Ṣāliḥ and Qalam along with him.

When she entered, al-Wāthiq asked her if she had composed the song, and she replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful." He said, "May God bless you." And he sent a message to Ṣāliḥ asking him to name a reasonable price.

Ṣāliḥ replied by message, "I give her as a gift to the Commander of the Faithful, and may God bless the Commander of the Faithful through her," The caliph replied, "I accept her. [And turning to

213. Text: fa-ghannathu. The translation follows the reading suggested in the note (fa-ghunniya laḥnuhā bayn yaday). In Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 116, where the poem is cited and the following anecdote related, the caliph immediately asks who composed the music and is told that it was Qalam.

214. The translation is uncertain.

215. The allusion is to Laylā, the beloved of Majnūn, in the popular romance Majnūn Laylā. A certain Qays b. al-Mulawwaḥ loved Laylā bt. Sa'd, but he could not have her and thus lost his mind. See EI[2], s.v. Madjnūn Laylā.

216. Zurzur or Zurzūr ("Starling") b. Sa'īd al-Kabīr was a page (ghulām) of Ja'far b. Mūsā al-Hādī and court singer during the caliphates of al-Ma'mūn, al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 92–93; Neubauer, Musiker, 210.

Ibn al-Zayyāt, he said,] "Muḥammad, pay him 5,000 dīnārs." He called her Ightibāṭ ("Delight").

Ibn al-Zayyāt put Ṣāliḥ off, and she went on singing, "The house of the lovers does not wish. . ."

Al-Wāthiq said to her, "May God bless you and the one who taught you."

She replied, "Sir, and how does the one who taught me benefit?" You have ordered that he be given something that he has not received." Al-Wāthiq said, "Sammānah, the inkwell!"[217] He wrote to Ibn al-Zayyāt: "Pay Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb the price for Ightibāṭ, 5,000 dīnārs, and double it."

Ṣāliḥ said: I went to Ibn al-Zayyāt, who received me well. He said, "Take this first 5,000. As for the other 5,000, I shall pay you in a week. If you are asked [about this], say that you have received the money."

Ṣāliḥ said, "I didn't want to be asked and have to acknowledge that I received the money, so I hid in my house until he paid me. When Sammānah asked me if I had received the money, I said yes."

Ṣāliḥ left government service and used the money for business ventures until he died.

---

217. Text: Saymānah. Addenda, DCCLXXV, and Cairo edition: Sammānah. Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XII, 116.22, mentions here only an anonymous servant (khādim).

The Events of the Year

232 (cont'd)

(AUGUST 28, 846–AUGUST 16, 847)

In this year Ja'far al-Mutawakkil was given the oath of allegiance as caliph. He is Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad Dhū al-Thafināt b. 'Alī al-Sajjād b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.[218] [1368]

The Occasion of Ja'far's Becoming Caliph and the Period of His Caliphate

I was informed by more than one authority that when al-Wāthiq died Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād, Ītākh, Waṣīf, 'Umar b. Faraj, Ibn al-Zayyāt, and Aḥmad b. Khālid Abū al-Wazīr were present in his

218. Dhū al-Thafināt means "The Callused," referring to calluses on the knees caused by frequent praying. Sajjād is "The Worshipper," designating one who prostrates himself often. Thus, the two are virtually synonomous in meaning, and it is not surprising that the nicknames of Muḥammad and 'Alī are occasionally reversed. See, for instance, Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 54; Mubarrad, Kāmil, II, 573; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 216–20; 592–94; Abū al-Faraj b. al-Jawzī, Kitāb al-alqāb, s.v. And see Ṭabarī, III, 2497. On the caliphate of al-Mutawakkil, see M. Shamsuddin Miah, The Reign of al-Mutawakkil.

palace.[219] They decided to render the oath of allegiance to Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq, who was a beardless lad.[220] They dressed him in a black lined robe (durrā'ah)[221] and a Ruṣāfī cap.[222] It turned out that he was too small.

Waṣīf said to them, "For God's sake, can you assign the caliphate to someone like this, who is not even permitted to lead public prayer?"

My authorities said: They went on arguing about whom they would appoint, mentioning several candidates. One of those present in the palace with them reportedly said, "I left the place where I was and passed by Ja'far al-Mutawakkil, who was dressed in a shirt and trousers, sitting with the sons of the Turks. He asked me what news there was, and I replied that their deliberation was still going on. They thereafter summoned him."

Bughā al-Sharābī gave him the news and brought him. Al-Mutawakkil responded that he feared that al-Wāthiq had not died.

My authorities said: Al-Mutawakkil passed by al-Wāthiq and saw that he was garbed in a shroud, whereupon he came and sat. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād dressed Ja'far with a tall hat,[223] affixed a [1369] turban and kissed him between his eyes, saying, "Peace upon you, O Commander of the Faithful, and God's mercy and blessings." Then al-Wāthiq was washed, the funeral prayer was offered, and he was buried. Following this, they went immediately to the Public Audience Hall. Al-Mutawakkil had not yet been given his regnal title.

On the day that al-Mutawakkil received the oath of allegiance, he was reportedly twenty-six years old. He set aside pay allot-

---

219. Note in this company the combination of government officials/secretaries (Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād, 'Umar b. Faraj, Ibn al-Zayyāt, Aḥmad b. Khālid) with Turkish army commanders (Itākh, Waṣīf). For this passage, see also Chejne, Succession, 121–22.

220. Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq later became caliph with the throne name al-Muhtadī.

221. Ahsan, Social Life, 39–40, infers from our passage that caliphs occasionally wore a durrā'ah at their installation. On durrā'ah, see also *EI*², s.v. Libās, V, 737.

222. For qalansuwah Ruṣāfiyyah, see Dozy, Vêtements, 188, citing Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, I, 315; Ahsan, Social Life, 30, 52; *EI*², s.v. Libās, V, 734–35. The qalansuwah was at first a close-fitting cap, but it may also be a cowl or hood.

223. The word al-ṭawīlah is short for al-qalansuwah al-ṭawīlah; Glossarium, CCCXLIV. It was "a tall, conical Persian hat"; see Ahsan, Social Life, 15, 30, 55; *EI*², s.v. Libās, V, 737.

ments for the regular army for a period of eight months. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-Zayyāt drafted the oath of allegiance for him. He was responsible at the time for the Bureau of the Chancellery (dīwān al-rasā'il).

They assembled afterward to choose a regnal title for the caliph. Ibn al-Zayyāt suggested that they call him al-Muntaṣir billāh. The notables discussed the matter thoroughly until they came to a definite conclusion. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād came to al-Mutawakkil early the next day and said, "I've come up with a regnal title that I hope will be appropriate, God willing. It is al-Mutawakkil ʿalā-llāh." Al-Mutawakkil then gave word that this regnal title should be adopted. He summoned Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik and ordered that this be conveyed in writing to the notables. Letters were dispatched to them bearing the following text:

> In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate. The Commander of the Faithful, may God give him long life, has ordered, may God preserve you, that his official title be on his pulpits[224] and in his letters to his judges, secretaries, officials, and functionaries in his government bureaus and others with whom he is customarily in correspondence, "From ʿAbdallāh Jaʿfar al-Imām al-Mutawakkil ʿalā-llāh, Commander of the Faithful." I await your response indicating your readiness to execute this order and informing me of my letter's successful arrival, God willing.

It is reported that when the caliph ordered that the Turks be given service allotments for four months, and that the regular army, the Shākiriyyah, and those of a like status among the Hāshimites be given allotments for eight months, he ordered that [1370] the Maghāribah be given allotments for three months. They, however, refused to accept.[225] He wrote to them, "Whoever 224. For a'wād manābirihi in this sense, see Glossarium CCCLXXXII; Dozy, Supplément, II, 186.

225. The translation follows the Leiden text. But in the Mss. used for the Leiden edition the Shākiriyyah appear after the words "eight months." The reading of the Leiden text is based upon a collation of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, 23; Fragmenta, 536, ll. 12–13; and ʿAynī, ʿIqd al-Jumān (which the notes begin to cite here from manuscript). In these sources, however, it is stated: "He commanded to give the Shākiriyyah of the regular army [allotments] for eight months."

among you is a slave (mamlūk) shall go to Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād to be sold, and whoever is free will be treated by us along the lines of the regular army." They accepted this. Waṣīf persuaded them until they were brought around. They were given three months' service allotments, and then were paid along the lines of the Turks.

Al-Mutawakkil received the notables' oath of allegiance at the hour of al-Wāthiq's death, and [he received] the public oath of allegiance at sunset on the same day.

It is reported on the authority of Sa'īd the Younger[226] that before al-Mutawakkil was made caliph he told Sa'īd and a number of people who were with him that he dreamt that Sulaymānī sugar[227] would descend upon him from heaven, on which was written "Ja'far al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh." He discussed the dream's significance with us. We said, "It is, by God, O amīr—may God strengthen you—the caliphate."

Sa'īd said: When al-Wāthiq learned of this, he held Ja'far in custody, and Sa'īd along with him, and harassed Ja'far because of it.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

---

226. Abū 'Uthmān Sa'īd al-Ṣaghīr appears below as confidant of al-Muntaṣir; below, 1471ff. (pp. 195ff.); see also p. 1743, where he is mentioned as belonging to al-Muntaṣir.

227. Sugar is called sukkar Sulaymānī at the second stage of preparation, according to EI[1], s.v. Sukkar. See also Ahsan, Social Life, 100ff., especially 101, n. 208 (citing N. Dear, The History of Sugar, London, 1949, I, 68ff., 74ff.; Rodinson, EI[2], s.v. Ghidhā'; idem, JESHO, 7 [1964], 57–72).

The Events of the Year

233

(August 17, 847–July 7, 848)

One of the events was al-Mutawakkil's anger at Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-Zayyāt and his incarcerating him.

The Reason for al-Mutawakkil's Anger at Muḥammad b. al-Zayyāt and Its Consequences

The reason for al-Mutawakkil's anger at him was reportedly as follows:

Al-Wāthiq had made Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-Zayyāt wazīr and delegated affairs to him. Al-Wāthiq had become angry with his brother Jaʿfar al-Mutawakkil for certain things and authorized ʿUmar b. Faraj al-Rukhkhajī and Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlā' al-Khādim to observe him at all times and record information about him.[228] [1371]

228. Muḥammad b. al-ʿAlā' al-Khādim is said to have been active under al-Maʾmūn along with the police chief ʿAyyāsh; Herzfeld, Samarra, 174, n. 2. Al-Wāthiq's annoyance was presumably triggered by the suspicion that his brother Jaʿfar wished to follow him in the line of succession, thus displacing al-Wāthiq's own son.

Jaʿfar went to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik to request that he intercede with his brother al-Wāthiq on his behalf so that he might be restored to favor. After entering, Jaʿfar remained standing before Muḥammad for a while without being addressed. Then Muḥammad motioned for him to be seated, at which point he sat down. When Muḥammad was finished going over his correspondence, he turned to Jaʿfar in a menacing way and inquired why he had come.

He replied, "I came so that you might ask the Commander of the Faithful to look upon me with favor."

Muḥammad commented to those around him, "Look at this one. He infuriates his brother and then asks me to restore him to favor. Go, and if you make amends, then you will be reinstated."

Jaʿfar rose, dejected and morose as result of the poor audience and his having been slighted. He left Muḥammad's company and approached ʿUmar b. Faraj to request that he sign his chit for receipt of pay allotments. But ʿUmar b. Faraj let him down. He took the chit and tossed it into the courtyard of the mosque. It was ʿUmar's custom to sit in a mosque.

Abū al-Wazīr Aḥmad b. Khālid was present. When he got up to depart, Jaʿfar rose along with him. Jaʿfar inquired, "O Abū al-Wazīr, did you see what ʿUmar b. Faraj did with me?" Abū al-Wazīr replied, "What may I do for you?"

Jaʿfar said, "I am ʿUmar's steward,[229] and yet he does not sign my chit without my importuning and groveling. Send me your agent." Abū al-Wazīr sent Jaʿfar his agent and paid him 20,000 dirhams, telling him, "Use this for spending until God straightens out your affairs."

Jaʿfar took the money and sent Abū al-Wazīr's messenger back to him a month later asking Abū al-Wazīr for help. Abū al-Wazīr sent him 10,000 dirhams.

Immediately after leaving ʿUmar, Jaʿfar went to Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād. When he entered, Aḥmad rose to meet him. He received him at the door of the house, kissed him, and acted obligingly toward him.

---

229. Text: zammām. Addenda, DCCLXXV: zimām. See Glossarium, CCLXXIX ("inspector, controller"). The zimām was the Bureau of Control, that is, an auditing body, as of taxes or expenditures; see Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Wuzarāʾ, 284, 380; Sourdel, Vizirat, Index, 759.

Aḥmad asked him, "Why have you come? What may I do for you?" Jaʿfar replied, "I have come to try and secure the favor of the Commander of the Faithful." Aḥmad said, "It is my pleasure and honor to do it [for you]."

Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād then spoke to al-Wāthiq about this, and, although he promised [to restore Jaʿfar to favor], he was still not receptive to him. On the day of the races, Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād spoke with al-Wāthiq.[230] [1372]

Aḥmad said, "I am ever-mindful of al-Muʿtaṣim's kindness, and Jaʿfar is his son. I have spoken to you about him, and you promised to extend your grace. You owe it to al-Muʿtaṣim, O Commander of the Faithful, to show favor to him." Al-Wāthiq immediately showed kindness to him and attired him. Al-Wāthiq then departed. As Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād had spoken flatteringly of Jaʿfar, causing his brother to show him favor, Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād was in good stead with Jaʿfar when the latter assumed rulership.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik had reportedly written to al-Wāthiq when Jaʿfar left him: "Commander of the Faithful, Jaʿfar b. al-Muʿtaṣim came to me, requesting that I ask the Commander of the Faithful to be kind to him. He was, however, dressed in an effeminate fashion and had long hair in the back."

Al-Wāthiq wrote to Muḥammad, "Send for him and have him presented. Order someone to cut the hair in the back, then give word to someone to take some of his hair[231] and strike his face with it, and send him back to his residence."

It is reported on the authority of al-Mutawakkil: When al-Wāthiq's emissary came to me, I was wearing a new black garment, and I came to him, hoping that he would be favorably disposed toward me.

When I arrived he said, "Page, summon me a cupper (ḥajjām)," whereupon one was summoned. He said, "Cut his hair[232] and gather it together." The cupper sheared it upon the new black 230. On ḥalbah ("races"), see Mercier, La chasse, 200–04. A hippodrome in Sāmarrā stood slightly to the southeast of the Great Mosque of al-Mutawakkil.

231. The expression akhadha min shaʿrihi, lit. "to take (from) his hair," may mean "to cut his hair"; Glossarium, CVII; Lane, Lexicon, 28. But here the first sense fits better.

232. See previous note.

garment, not bothering to catch it on a piece of cloth (mandīl).[233] He took Ja'far's hair, including the hair from the back, and struck him in the face with it.

Al-Mutawakkil said: I was never so distressed by anything as I was when al-Wāthiq had my hair sheared upon the new black garment. I came to him so attired, hoping to please him, but he had my hair cut upon it.

When al-Wāthiq died, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik nominated al-Wāthiq's son as his successor.[234] The matter was discussed[235] while Ja'far was in another room, not where they were deliberating the investiture.[236] [Ja'far remained in that other room] until [1373] he was sent for, and he was invested [with the symbol of the caliphate] there. [His preference for al-Wāthiq's son] was the cause of Ibn al-Zayyāt's demise. Bughā al-Sharābī was the emissary who summoned Ja'far. On the way, he greeted him as caliph, and they invested him [with the symbol of the caliphate] and rendered him the oath of allegiance.

Ja'far bided his time until Wednesday, 7 Ṣafar, 233 (September 22, 847). Resolved to hurt Ibn al-Zayyāt, al-Mutawakkil ordered Ītākh to seize and punish him. So Ītākh sent for him. Ibn al-Zayyāt thought that he was being summoned [for an audience]. He rode out early the next day, supposing that the caliph had summoned him, but, when he was opposite the residence of Ītākh, he was told to turn in the direction of Abū Manṣūr's (Ītākh's) residence. He turned apprehensively, and, when he came to Ītākh's residence, he was diverted to the right,[237] and thus he sensed something ominous. Ibn al-Zayyāt was then brought into a room. His sword, ornamental belt, cap, and lined robe (dur-

---

233. A mandīl (from Latin mantellum; cf. Spanish mantilla and English mantle) is a small or medium-size kerchief or piece of cloth, occasionally used as a head veil; see Rosenthal, Four Essays, 63ff., especially 67; Ahsan, Social Life, 53; EI[2], s.v.

234. This act is consistent with Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik's previous coolness toward Ja'far.

235. Text: wa-takallama dhālika fī dhālika. Omit first dhālika with note ad loc. (see also Addenda, DCCLXXV) and Cairo edition.

236. Text: yaq'udūna. Cairo edition (Ms. A): ya'qidūna.

237. Text: 'anhu ("he was diverted from it"); Cairo edition, Mss. A and D: yamnatan ("to the right"). A vaulted cellar (Persian: serdāb) in Ītākh's residence was occasionally used as a prison; Ṭabarī, III, 1267 (Marin, Reign, 85). See below, n. 282.

rā'ah)[238] were confiscated. His pages were paid and told to leave, which they did, confident that he was staying with Ītākh to drink wine.

[My informant] said: Ītākh had prepared for the arrival of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik two of his eminent companions, named Yazīd b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥulwānī and Harthamah Shār Bāmiyān. When Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik arrived, they galloped off to his palace with their troops and Shākiriyyah. Muḥammad's pages asked them, "Where do you want to go? Abū Ja'far [Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik] has ridden off." At that, they fell upon his palace and seized everything in it.

Ibn al-Ḥulwānī reportedly said: I came to the house in which Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik usually resided, and I noticed that it was shabby in appearance and sparsely furnished. I beheld there four carpets (ṭanāfis)[239] and flasks (qanānī ruṭliyyāt) that contained a beverage. I also saw a house where his slave girls slept, in which there were mats (būriyyān)[240] and cushions (makhādd) stacked at its side, although his slave girls slept there without household effects.

It is reported that on the same day al-Mutawakkil sent someone to seize the contents of Muḥammad's residence, including furniture, livestock, slave girls, and pages. He had all of this brought to the Hārūnī [Palace]. The caliph sent Rāshid al-Maghribī[241] to Baghdad to confiscate Muḥammad's property and slaves that were there. And he ordered Abū al-Wazīr to seize his estates and those belonging to his family wherever they were located. What was in Sāmarrā was brought to the storehouses of Masrūr Sammānah[242] after it was purchased for the caliph. [1374]

---

238. Ahsan, Social Life, 39, points out that the durrā'ah was the main part of the vizier's garb, along with an ornamental belt (wishāḥ) and sword.

239. For ṭanāfis (sg. ṭinfisah or ṭanfasah), see Lane, Lexicon, 1886; Sadan, Mobilier, 113, note 440, Index, 176 ("tapis, selle, coussin [?]").

240. Būrī is an arabicized form for Persian būriyā/būriya, meaning a woven mat made of reeds; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. Bāra; Steingass, Dictionary, s.v.

241. For Rāshid al-Maghribī's grant in Sāmarrā, see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 261 = Wiet, Les pays, 53. And on him, see Ṭabarī, III, 1749; Herzfeld, Samarra, 103, 107. He had a brother named Mubārak al-Maghribī; see below, n. 246.

242. Masrūr Sammānah al-Khādim had a grant and was in charge of the storehouses in Sāmarrā, according to Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 261 = Wiet, Les pays, 53. He may be identical with Masrūr al-Khādim al-Kabīr, an official of Hārūn al-Rashīd. See below, n. 567. The storehouses are also known as the bayt al-māl; see above, 1350 (p. 36); Herzfeld, Samarra, 91, 103, 104; Sāmarrā'ī, Ta'rīkh, 82, 91.

Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik was told to delegate an agent to sell his furnishings. They brought to him al-'Abbās b. Aḥmad b. Rashīd, the secretary of 'Ujayf,[243] and Muḥammad made him his agent. Muḥammad remained in prison for several days unfettered. Then it was ordered that he be bound, and so he was. He refrained from eating; he would not taste a thing. He was extremely despondent in prison, wept copiously, talked little, and pondered much. He remained this way for a few days, and then was forced to stay awake and prevented from sleeping. This was done by pricking him with a large needle. Then he was left alone for a day and night, and he slept. When he awoke, he expressed a desire for fruit and grapes, and so they were brought in and he took refreshment. He was then forced to stay awake again, and after that it was ordered that he be placed in a wooden oven-like chest that had iron spikes.[244]

It is reported on the authority of Ibn Abī Du'ād and Abū al-Wazīr that Muḥammad had been the first to order use of [an iron maiden]. He tortured Ibn Asbāṭ al-Miṣrī with it to the point that he extracted from him all that he had.

Ibn al-Zayyāt was then afflicted and tortured in [the iron maiden] for a few days. Al-Dandānī[245] reports on the authority of the keeper deputized to torture Ibn al-Zayyāt: I would go out and lock [1375] the door on him, and he would stretch both hands upward so that his shoulders were narrowed. Then he would enter the chest and sit. The chest had iron spikes in it, and in the middle there was a cross board on which the victim would sit when he wanted some

243. 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasah was an army commander who served under al-Mu'taṣim; see Marin, Reign, Index, 137, and p. 4, n. 32. He was governor of Ādharbayjān in 217 (832–33); Zambaur, Manuel, 177. And see Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 146–47; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 570ff.; Buldān, 260, 294 = Wiet, Les pays, 52, 112; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, V, 74–75; XVIII, 179; etc. (Guidi, Tables, 478); Herzfeld, Samarra, 107.

244. According to several sources, the tannūr (lit. "oven") was made of iron. See, for instance, Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 194; Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, II, 343; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 254; and Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 235. The poetic justice of Ibn al-Zayyāt's fall became thematic in historical and belletristic literature; see e.g. (in addition to the above) Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 591; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, I, 147; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 268; Tanūkhī, Faraj, 102–03; Nishwār, I, 17; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XX, 49; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, IV, 187; and Yāqūt, Irshād, VI, 57.

245. Text: al-Dandānī. Mss. used in the Leiden edition have al-Ladhaydānī (?), which the note ad loc. says may also represent al-Raydānī or al-Kuzburānī.

relief. He would sit on the board for a while. Then the keeper would come, and, when the victim heard the sound of the door opening, he would stand as before. Then they would intensify the torture.

His torturer said: I fooled him one day, I led him to think that I had locked the door without actually doing so. I merely closed it with the bolt and waited for a while, at which point I pushed the door by accident, and seeing that he was sitting in the chest on the board I commented, "I see that you are doing this thing!" When I went out afterward, I tightened his strangling cord so that he was unable to sit, and I pulled out the board so that it would be between his legs. He tarried after that for only a few days before he died.

There were different opinions concerning the cause of death. One version had it that he was thrown prostrate and whipped fifty times on his abdomen, and was then turned over and beaten likewise on his posterior, and thereby died under the beating without their being aware. He died, his neck having been twisted and his beard pulled out. According to another version, he died without having been beaten.

It is reported on the authority of Mubārak al-Maghribī:[246] I think that during the entire time of his incarceration he ate only one loaf of bread, and he would eat one or two grapes.

[His torturer] said: I would hear him talking to himself, this being two or three days before he died, "O Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik, you were not content with prosperity, choice horses, fine palaces, and splendid clothes. You were in wonderful shape until you sought the wazīrate. Now taste what you have brought upon yourself." He would go on repeating this to himself. A day before he died his self-reproach ceased and he merely recited the confession of faith and invocation of God. When he died, his two sons, [1376] Sulaymān and ʿUbaydallāh, were present.[247] They too were under arrest. He had been thrown upon a wooden door in the shirt that he wore when he was imprisoned. It had become filthy. His sons said, "Praise God who has given relief from this criminal." His corpse was turned over to them, and they washed it on the wooden door and buried him in a shallow grave. It is reported that dogs dug him up and ate his flesh.

246. On Mubārak al-Maghribī, see Yāqūt, Buldān, 261 = Wiet, Les pays, 53 (his grant and small market in Sāmarrā). Mubārak's residence became the scene of an attack by the populace against the Turks in 248 (862–63), III, 1505 (Saliba, 5). He was brother of Rāshid al-Maghribī; above, n. 241.

247. Text: aḥḍarahu; Cairo edition, Ms. A: iḥḍirā.

Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās was governor of Ahwāz, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik was a friend of his.[248] Muḥammad sent to him Aḥmad b. Yūsuf Abū al-Jahm,[249] who made a public example of Ibrāhīm,[250] so that the latter reached a settlement with him at the cost of 1,500,000 dirhams.

Ibrāhīm recited:[251]

You were my brother in the brotherhood of fate,[252]
But when the time came, you became constant war.

I used to complain of fate to you,
And now it is because of you that I complain of fate.

I used to consider you for help in adversity,
Now I seek safety from you.

And he recited:[253]

Because of the opinion of Abū Ja'far
I have fallen into a state boding loss.

Without any crime save
Enmity of the heretic to the Muslim.

After Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik's property was confiscated [in Sāmarrā], he was brought with Rāshid al-Maghribī to Baghdad

248. Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. Ṣūl (al-Ṣūlī), of a Turkish mawlā family, a great-uncle of Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī, was a well-known secretary and poet. He died in Sāmarrā in 243 (857–58); Sourdel, Vizirat, Index, 767; Sezgin, GAS, II, 578.

249. For the poet Aḥmad b. Yūsuf Abū al-Jahm, see Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 367; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIII, 23.

250. The expression aqāmahu li-l-nās stands for aqāmahu 'alā al-bulūs; Glossarium, CDXXXXIX; Lane, s.v. bulūs.

251. The poem appears in Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IX, 28, with minor variations (not noted in apparatus of Leiden edition). See also Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās al-Ṣūlī, Dīwān, 166.

252. The "you" here is Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik.

253. See Dīwān, 165.

in order that his property there might also be confiscated. When he arrived, he took Rawḥ, his page, who was also his household manager (qahramān), in charge of his funds, with which he did business. He also took a number of his family and with them the packload of a mule. Buildings of his were discovered in Baghdad containing all kinds of merchandise, including wheat, barley, flour, grain, olive oil, raisins, figs, and one filled with garlic. Everything that was confiscated of his, along with the value of what was found, was assessed at 90,000 dīnārs.

Al-Mutawakkil had Muḥammad arrested on Wednesday, 7 Ṣafar (September 22, 847), and he died on Thursday, 19 Rabīʿ I (November 2, 847). [1377]

In this year, al-Mutawakkil turned his wrath upon ʿUmar b. Faraj, in the month of Ramaḍān (April 9–May 8, 848). ʿUmar was turned over to Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab and was imprisoned in his custody. The caliph sent word to have ʿUmar's estates and property sequestered. Najāḥ b. Salamah went to his house but found there only 15,000 dirhams. Masrūr Sammānah, who was present, seized his female slaves. ʿUmar was fettered with thirty *raṭl*s [of chain], and his mawlā Naṣr brought from Baghdad. The former had 30,000 dīnārs of his own property delivered, and Naṣr delivered 14,000 dīnārs more. Forty thousand dīnārs belonging to ʿUmar were also found in Ahwāz, along with 150,000 dīnārs belonging to his brother Muḥammad b. Faraj. Sixteen camel loads of furnishings (furūsh) were delivered from his palace along with jewels worth 40,000 dīnārs. His provisions and furnishings were brought on fifty camels that made several return trips. ʿUmar was dressed in a woolen long-sleeved robe (farajiyyah)[254] and fettered, and remained this way for a week before being released. His palace was confiscated and the members of his family were seized and searched. There were one hundred slave girls. A settlement was then made for ten million dirhams on condition that only his estates seized in Ahwāz would be returned to him. The woolen tunic (jubbah) and fetters were removed. This was in Shawwāl (May 9–June 6, 848).

254. For farajiyyah, see Dozy, Vêtements, 327, where it is said to be a long cloak with sleeves beyond the fingers and lacking slits. See also Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Rusūm, 96–97 (tr. Salem, 77); *EI*² s.v. Libās, V, 741.

'Alī b. al-Jahm b. Badr recited to Najāḥ b. Salamah, inciting him against 'Umar b. Faraj:[255]

Bring a message to Najāḥ, hero of the secretaries,
Which the wind will carry to and fro.

The property will not depart from 'Umar's hands on its own, [1378] Unless a sword be sheathed in his temples.

The Rukhkhajī men will not fulfill what they promised,
Nor will the Rukhkhajī women fail to keep an appointed time.[256]

And 'Alī b. al-Jahm also recited, satirizing 'Umar:[257]

You joined two things which together effaced prudence
The vanity of kings (mulūk) and the behavior of slaves (mamālīk).

You wished to receive thanks without showing kindness and generosity;
You have indeed traveled an untrodden path.

You thought your honor would not meet calamity,[258]
But I see that you will not be passed over.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil ordered that Ibrāhīm b. al-Junayd al-Naṣrānī, the brother of Ayyūb, secretary of Sammānah, be beaten with poles. [This was done] until he confessed to [having stashed away] 70,000 dīnārs. Al-Mutawakkil sent Mubārak al-Maghribī along with him to Baghdad to appropriate the sum from his residence. Ibrāhīm was brought [back to Sāmarrā] and incarcerated.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil turned his wrath upon Abū al-

255. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IX, 114; and 'Alī b. al-Jahm, Dīwān, 124.

256. 'Umar b. Faraj was from Rukhkhaj (in Sijistān). For the place, see Le Strange, Lands, 339, 345.

257. 'Alī b. al-Jahm, Dīwān, 161.

258. The note in the Leiden edition cites Ṣūlī who has: za'amta annaka lā tu'lā bi-dāhiyah "You thought that a calamity would not befall you." Ms. C and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, have yurmā for yuqra' of the text.

Wazīr, in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 7–August 4, 848), and ordered that accounts be settled with him. About 16,000 dīnārs were delivered, and tens of thousands of dirhams and jewelry. Sixty-two baskets of Egyptian furnishings were confiscated, as well as thirty-two pages (ghulām) and many carpets. Because of Abū al-Wazīr's betrayal, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik—he was the brother of Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Malik—as well as al-Haytham b. Khālid al-Naṣrānī and his nephew Saʿdūn b. ʿAlī were all arrested. A settlement was made with Saʿdūn for 40,000 dīnārs, and with his two nephews, ʿAbdallāh and Aḥmad, for about 30,000 dīnārs. Their estates were simultaneously confiscated.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil made Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl al-Jarjarā'ī secretary.[259] [1379]

In this year, on Wednesday, 17 Ramaḍān (April 25, 848), al-Mutawakkil removed al-Faḍl b. Marwān[260] from the Bureau of Taxation (dīwān al-kharāj) and appointed over it Yaḥyā b. Khāqān al-Khurāsānī, a mawlā of the Azd.[261] On the same day, he appointed Ibrāhīm b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. Ṣūl over the Bureau of Controlling Expenditures (dīwān zimām al-nafaqāt) and removed Abū al-Wazīr.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil appointed his son Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir over the two sanctuaries [Mecca and Medina], the Yemen and al-Ṭā'if, tying the banner of his office for him on Thursday, 11 Ramaḍān (April 19, 848).

In this year, Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād had a paralytic stroke on 6 Jumādā II (January 17, 848).

---

259. That is, wazīr. For Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl al-Jarjarā'ī, d. 250 (864–65), see Zambaur, Manuel, 6; Sourdel, Vizirat, 271–73, 275–76, 293; *EI*², s.v. Djardjarā'ī [1]. A gifted poet and writer, he had been secretary to al-Faḍl b. Marwān. He returned to the wazīrate in the days of al-Musta'īn in 249 (863).

260. Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Faḍl b. Marwān, a secretary of Christian origins, had been wazīr under al-Muʿtaṣim; d. 250 (864–65); Ṭabarī, III, 1181–86, 1326, 1329; Marin, Reign, 17–21, 130, 132; Sourdel, Vizirat, Index 761, and esp. 233–34, 246–53; *EI*², s.v. al-Faḍl b. Marwān.

261. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān al-Khurāsānī, mawlā Azd, was a member of the Khāqānid family, brother of al-Fatḥ and Jaʿfar; see Zambaur, Manuel, 12; Sourdel, Vizirat, 273 and n. 3; Index, 787. He had been secretary of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl during the caliphate of al-Ma'mūn. For the circumstances of this appointment, see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 592–93. See Table 2.

In this year, Yaḥyā b. Harthamah[262] came to Mecca from Medina, along with 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Riḍā b. Mūsā b. Ja'far.[263] Yaḥyā was in charge of the Mecca Road.

In this year, Michael, son of Theophilus, assailed his mother, Theodora, exposed her, and placed her in a convent. He also killed the Logothete (al-Lughuthīṭ), for it was on his account that Michael suspected her. She had ruled for six years.[264]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

---

262. Yaḥyā b. Harthamah, son of Harthama b. A'yan (Crone, Slaves on Horses, 177–78), was later rewarded for a steadfast stand against the Turks in 251 (III, 1560; Saliba, 47). And in the same year (III, 1621; Saliba, 91) we find him defeating Abū al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh. See on him, Qummī, Ta'rīkh Qumm, 103, 185, 201.

263. 'Alī b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Riḍā b Mūsā b. Ja'far, or Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Hādī, was the tenth imām of the Shī'ites. He died on 25 Jumādā II, 254 (June 21, 868), according to Ṭabarī, III, 1697 (Saliba, 155). See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 591–92, where Yaḥyā b. Harthamah is said to have escorted him from Medina to Baghdad, whence he was brought to Sāmarrā. According to Ya'qūbī, al-Mutawakkil summoned him from Medina because of popular support there for his cause.

264. Ṭabarī alludes here to the fall of the Byzantine empress Theodora. This took place when her son Michael became old enough to conspire (with the backing of his uncle Bardas) against his mother and her chief minister, Theoktistos the Logothete. A plot was hatched in 856, which led to Theoktistos' murder and Theodora's deposition and banishment to a monastery. Michael had ruled for fourteen years along with Theodora; Bury, History, 157ff., 469ff. Theodora's fall was in 856–58 not, as here, in 847–48. Note also that Ṭabarī has Theodora as empress in 241 (855–56); below, 1426 (p. 138 and n. 456).

The Events of the Year

234

(August 5, 848–July 26, 849)

One of the events was the escape of Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth b. Ḥalbas. He had been brought as a prisoner from Ādharbayjān and was subsequently incarcerated.[265]

The Reason for Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth's Escape and the Consequences of His Affair

It is reported that the reason for this was [as follows]: Al-Mutawakkil had taken ill this year. Now there was a man who served [1380]
Ibn al-Baʿīth by the name of Khalīfah.[266] Khalīfah informed Ibn al-Baʿīth that al-Mutawakkil had died, and prepared horses for him. Ibn al-Baʿīth and Khalīfah, who had given him the news, fled to Ibn al-Baʿīth's place of residence in Ādharbayjān, namely, Ma-

265. Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth b. Ḥalbas, a brigand and rebel chief, followed in the footsteps of his ancestors and fortified Marand. Once an ally of the rebel heresiarch Bābak, he later contributed to his defeat; Ṭabarī, III, 1171–72, 1190, 1193 (Marin, Reign, 9, 10, 24–26); and see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 503.

266. On the slave Khalīfah, who belonged to Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth, see also below, 1387 (p. 86).

rand.[267] It is said that he had two fortresses, one called Shāhī and the other Yakdur.[268] Yakdur was outside the lake, and Shāhī was in the midst of it. The lake is about fifty *farsakh*s (three hundred km.),[269] [extending] from the border of Urmiya toward the district (rustāq) of Dākharraqān,[270] the country of Muḥammad b. al-Rawwād.[271] Shāhī is a fortified stronghold of Ibn al-Baʿīth, surrounded by water. People sail by way of Lake Urmiya from the outer limits of Marāghah[272] to Urmiya. It is a lake lacking fish and resources.[273]

It is reported that Ibn al-Baʿīth had been in the prison of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab. Bughā al-Sharābī spoke in his favor and secured about thirty guarantors [of good behavior] on his behalf, including Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mazyad al-Shaybānī,[274] such that Ibn al-Baʿīth could move about freely in Sāmarrā. Afterward he escaped to Marand, where he hoarded food, and where springs of 267. Marand is north of Lake Urmiya. Balādhuri, Futūḥ, 405, says that Ḥalbas Abū al-Baʿīth was the first to settle there and that it was fortified by al-Baʿīth, father of Muḥammad. Balādhurī also mentions Muḥammad's revolt and its suppression by Bughā; see also EI[2], s.v. Marand. Marand is described briefly below, 1381 (p. 79).

---

268. Text: Shāhī and Yakdur. Ms. C: Bakdur. Shāhī is mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 1171 (above, n. 265). It is the name of the peninsula on Lake Urmiya. See EI[1], IV, 1037, s.v. Urmiya, where there is a reference to the fortresses of Shāhī and Yakdur (Bakdur), which, it is proposed, may be related to the mountain of Bakyir (Bakdir). Ṭabarī, III, 1171–72 (Marin, Reign, 9) calls the fortresses Shāhī and Tabrīz.

269. Fragmenta, 539, says that the lake was twenty *farsakh*s (120 km.) from the border of Urmiya.

270. Dākharraqān (Dihkharghān; in local speech of Turks, according to Minorsky—Tukharghan) is in Ādharbayjān between Tabrīz and Marāghah; Le Strange, Lands, 164; Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 395.

271. Muḥammad b. al-Rawwād was a member of the house of local rulers of the Rawwādid dynasty of Ādharbayjān, descendants of al-Rawwād al-Azdī; see, for instance, Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 405; Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 395–96; Bosworth, Islamic Dynasties, 88–89. Cf. also Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 119.

272. Marāghah, east of Lake Urmiya, is the old capital of Ādharbayjān, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 476; Le Strange, Lands, 164; EI[2], s.v.

273. The lack of life is due to Lake Urmiya's salt water. But Muslim geographers and travelers mention a fish there called "water dog"; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 513; Le Strange, Lands, 160.

274. Ṭabarī, III, 1577–78 and 1615 (Saliba, 59, 87), describes two encounters in which Muḥammad b. Khālid fled from battle. Zambaur, Manuel, 181, lists him as Shīrwānshāh, i.e. as belonging to the lords of Shīrwān (= Shīrvān, Sharvān); Minorsky, History, Index, 183. He had been governor of Ādharbayjān, Armenia, and Arrān. See also Crone, Slaves on Horses, 170. He was a descendant of Maʿn b. Zāʾida al-Shaybānī/Rabīʿah.

water were also available. Ibn al-Baʿīth repaired its dilapidated walls. Those seeking to rebel—about 2,200 men—came to him from all sides, from the Rabīʿah and others.[275]

The governor of Ādharbayjān, Muḥammad b. Ḥātim b. Harthamah,[276] failed in his pursuit of Ibn al-Baʿīth. Al-Mutawakkil then appointed Ḥamdawayh b. ʿAlī b. al-Faḍl al-Saʿdī governor of Ādharbayjān,[277] sending him from Sāmarrā posthaste. When Ḥamdawayh arrived there, he rallied the regular army and the Shākiriyyah and those who responded to his call. They numbered 10,000 men.

Ḥamdawayh advanced toward Ibn al-Baʿīth, forcing him to take [1381] refuge in the town of Marand. It is a town whose circumference is two *farsakh*s (twelve km.). There are many gardens within the town, and outside it is surrounded by trees, except for where its gates are located. Ibn al-Baʿīth amassed siege instruments inside the town, where there were springs of water.

After Ibn al-Baʿīth had held out for a long time, al-Mutawakkil sent Zīrak the Turk[278] against him along with 200,000 Turkish horsemen, but Zīrak accomplished nothing. Al-Mutawakkil then sent against him ʿAmr b. Saysil (?) b. Kāl[279] along with 900 of the Shākiriyyah, but to no avail. Al-Mutawakkil thereupon sent against him Bughā al-Sharābī, along with 4,000 troops, comprising Turks, Shākiriyyah, and Maghāribah. Ḥamdawayh b. ʿAlī, ʿAmr b. Saysil and Zīrak advanced upon the city of Marand. They cut down about 1,000 trees surrounding it, as well as other trees of the thicket, and they set up twenty mangonels against the city. Opposite the city they erected a parapet. Ibn al-Baʿīth set up mangonels in a similar manner. The non-Arab peasants (ʿulūj) in his districts would shoot with slingshots, preventing anyone from

275. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 594, describes Ibn al-Baʿīth's supporters as lawbreakers or brigands (ṣaʿālīk). Muḥammad's family was of the tribe of Rabīʿah.

276. See Zambaur, Manuel, 177, who makes him governor of Ādharbayjān as of 233 (847–48; following Ibn al-Athīr). For his family ties, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 177–78.

277. See Zambaur, Manuel, 177. And for a similar account, see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 594.

278. Zīrak al-Turkī makes his first appearance here; see also below 1414–16 (pp. 122ff); and see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 594.

279. Ms C: Sasīl; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 28: Saysīl; Fragmenta, 540: ʿUmar b. Saysil.

approaching the walls of the town. In the course of eight months, about one hundred supporters of the central government were killed fighting Ibn al-Baʿīth, and about four hundred were wounded. A similar number of Ibn al-Baʿīth's forces were killed and wounded.

Ḥamdawayh, ʿAmr, and Zīrak kept pressing the battle. The wall in front of the city was low, about twenty dhirāʿ (ca. ten meters) from the foundation. A contingent of Ibn al-Baʿīth's men, bearing spears, were lowered by ropes and gave battle. When the forces of the central government attacked them, they retreated to the wall.
[1382] They occasionally opened a gate called the Water Gate, from which a number of men would exit, fight, and then return.

When Bughā al-Sharābī approached Marand, he reportedly sent ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh b. al-Salīl al-Shaybānī,[280] bearing letters of safe-conduct for the prominent followers of Ibn al-Baʿīth and for Ibn al-Baʿīth, on condition that they and he surrender to the authority of the Commander of the Faithful. If not, Bughā would fight them, and if he defeated them no one would be spared. Whoever surrendered, however, would be granted safe-conduct. The vast majority of those who were with Ibn al-Baʿīth belonged to the Rabīʿah, of the folk of ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh. Many of them came down [the walls] by ropes. Ibn al-Baʿīth's son-in-law Abū al-Agharr surrendered.

It is reported on the authority of this Abū al-Agharr: They then opened the gate of the city, and the forces of Ḥamdawayh and Zīrak entered. Ibn al-Baʿīth fled from his house trying to escape from another direction, but a contingent of the army caught up with him. They had along with them Manṣūr, his household manager. Ibn al-Baʿīth was riding a horse, with a sword about his neck, and he was attempting to get to a river, near which was a millstone, so that he could hide therein. They took him prisoner, and the regular troops plundered his house, the houses of his companions, and some of the houses of the townsmen.

When the people had finished plundering, it was announced that the perpetrators would be exempt from responsibility. They seized two of Ibn al-Baʿīth's sisters, three daughters, and his maternal aunt, the rest being female slaves. The central government authorities acquired possession of thirteen women of his female entourage. And, of his eminent companions who have been mentioned, they seized about two hundred men, the rest having fled.

280. ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh died in 269 [882–83]; Ṭabarī, III, 2048.

Bughā al-Sharābī showed up the next day, and his herald announced that plunder was forbidden. Bughā al-Sharābī took personal credit for the victory.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil went out to al-Madā'in in Jumādā I (December, 848).

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Ītākh. He was in charge of Mecca and Medina and the festivities, and his name was invoked on the pulpits. [1383]

The Reason for Ītākh's Pilgrimage This Year

Ītākh was reportedly a Khazar slave (ghulām), a cook, belonging to Sallām al-Abrash. Al-Mu'taṣim bought Ītākh from Sallām in 199 (814–15).[281] As Ītākh was manly and intrepid, al-Mu'taṣim, and al-Wāthiq after him, promoted him to the position where many of the administrative functions (a'māl) of the central government were assigned to him. Al-Mu'taṣim appointed him governor of the security police (ma'ūnah) of Sāmarrā along with Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm. Both Ītākh and Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm were represented by deputies. Whoever al-Mu'taṣim or al-Wāthiq wished to have killed would be imprisoned and killed by Ītākh. Among them were Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, the sons of al-Ma'mūn whose mother was Sundus, Ṣāliḥ b. 'Ujayf, and others.[282]

When al-Mutawakkil took office, Ītākh retained his rank, being responsible for the regular army, the Maghāribah, the Turks, the *mawlā*s, the Postal and Intelligence Service (barīd), the office of 281. Ītākh was, then, one of the first Turkish slaves acquired by al-Mu'taṣim, who made them into a formidable military unit; see Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, 167. Sallām al-Abrash is cited as a translator of scientific works by Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 587; Qifṭī, Ta'rīkh, 196 (al-Abrash). But a Sallām al-Abrash al-Khādim is mentioned by Ṭabarī as having led an army uprising in Jumādā I, 207 (III, 1065; Bosworth, Reunification, 134). See also Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 256 = Wiet, Les pays, 45. Abrash = "Speckled" (or for Abraṣ, "Leprous").

282. Al-Mu'taṣim had turned over sons of al-Ma'mūn born to Sundus to Ītākh, who incarcerated them in a vaulted cellar of his residence; Ṭabarī, III 1267 (Marin, Reign, 85). Ṣāliḥ, mentioned only here, maybe a son of 'Ujayf b. 'Anbasa, mentioned above, 1374 (p. 70).

chamberlain, and the Caliphal Palace. Once firmly ensconced in the office of the caliphate, al-Mutawakkil went out for a vacation to the district of al-Qāṭūl.[283] While drinking one night, the caliph picked a quarrel with Ītākh, as a result of which the latter thought to kill him. When al-Mutawakkil awoke the next morning, he was told what had taken place. He apologized to Ītākh and was conciliatory toward him, saying, "You are my father and you have reared me."

When al-Mutawakkil returned to Sāmarrā, he got someone to suggest that Ītākh ask permission to go on the pilgrimage. He did so, and was given permission. Al-Mutawakkil made him amīr of every town he entered [on the way to Mecca] and bestowed a robe of honor upon him. All the army commanders rode with him. Many of the Shākiriyyah, army commanders, and pages went out with him, aside from his own pages and retinue. After he departed, the office of chamberlain was turned over to Waṣīf. This [1384] was on Saturday, 18 Dhū al-Qaʿdah (June 13, 849).

Another version holds that this episode concerning Ītākh took place in 233 (847–48), and that al-Mutawakkil turned over the office of chamberlain to Waṣīf on 17 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 233 (July 23, 848).

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā.[284]

---

283. The Qāṭūl district, according to Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 256 = Wiet, Les pays, 46, was north of Shammāsiyyah and south of Sāmarrā. See also Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 922; Herzfeld, Samarra, 71; and the discussion by Rogers, "Samarra," 130, n. 21.

284. Text: Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā. Addenda, DCCLXXV, and Cairo edition: ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, followed here.

The Events of the Year 235

(JULY 26, 849–JULY 14, 850)

One of them was the killing of Ītākh al-Khazarī.[285]

How Ītākh Was Killed

It is reported that, when Ītākh left Mecca heading back to Iraq, al-Mutawakkil sent to him Sa'īd b. Ṣāliḥ the Chamberlain[286] with attire and precious gifts, ordering Sa'īd to meet Ītākh in al-Kūfah or somewhere along his route. Al-Mutawakkil had already broached his order concerning Ītākh to his chief of security police in Baghdad.

Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir reportedly said:[287] I went out with Isḥāq 285. The episode of Ītākh's murder is related by Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 593, in a slightly different way.

286. Sa'īd b. Ṣāliḥ, at this point a chamberlain, was later made chief of the police; III, 1549 (Saliba, 39).

287. Abū Isḥāq Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. al-Mudabbir (d. 279 [892]), a well-known secretary and poet, was later wazīr under al-Mu'tamid: see Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 160–64; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 270, 321, 367; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIX, 114–27; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 159–63; Sourdel, Vizirat, 316.

b. Ibrāhīm as Ītākh was approaching Baghdad. Ītākh intended to take the Euphrates Road to Anbār and then proceed to Sāmarrā. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm wrote to him: "The Commander of the Faithful—may God give him long life—has ordered that you come to Baghdad, that the Hāshimites and notables meet you, and that you hold an audience for them in the palace of Khuzaymah b. Khāzim,[288] and have rewards given to them."

Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir said: We went as far as al-Yāsiriyyah.[289]
[1385] Ibn Ibrāhīm stationed the regular army and the Shākiriyyah on the bridge and went out with his special commanders. A bench (ṣuffah) was set down for him at al-Yāsiriyyah, upon which he sat, until he was told that Ītākh was approaching. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm then rode out to receive him. When Isḥāq saw Ītākh, he was ready to dismount, but Ītākh implored him not to do so.

Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir continued: Ītākh was accompanied by 300 of his men and pages. He was wearing a white sleeved robe (qabā'),[290] and was girded with a sword and sword belts. Both Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm and Ītākh marched as far as the bridge.[291] Isḥāq then preceded him and passed over [the bridge], going to the door of [the palace of] Khuzaymah b. Khāzim. He said to Ītākh, "Enter, may God cause the amīr to prosper." Whenever one of Ītākh's pages passed by the guards at the bridge, they let him proceed until Ītākh remained with his intimate pages. A group of men then moved in front of Ītākh. The palace of Khuzaymah had been fitted out for him.

Isḥāq remained behind and ordered that only three or four of

---

288. The palace of Khuzaymah b. Khāzim was located where the road begins at the Main Bridge (al-jisr) connecting the West Side of Baghdad with Bāb al-Ṭāq. The land had been granted as an allotment by al-Mahdī to Khuzaymah b. Khāzim, for whom see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 180; Kennedy, Early Abbasid Caliphate, Index, 235; see Le Strange, Baghdad, 218 and Map V, facing p. 107, no. 59; Lassner, Topography, 76, 78, 280, n. 1, 281, n. 6.

289. Al-Yāsiriyyah is said by Yāqūt (Mu'jam, IV, 1002) to be a large village on the bank of Nahr 'Īsā, 6 km. from Baghdad. He notes its fine masonry bridge (qanṭarah). Ṭabarī mentions here a pontoon bridge (jisr). Fragmenta, 543, speaks of "the two pontoon bridges" (jisrayn). One might suppose that what was a pontoon bridge at the time of Ṭabarī became a masonry bridge by the time of Yāqūt. On the other hand, sometimes jisr and qanṭarah mean the same thing.

290. The qabā' was a sleeved, close-fitting coat, and was typical attire of the Turks, according to Ahsan, Social Life, 41–42.

291. The Main Bridge in Baghdad is intended, not the bridge in al-Yāsiriyyah.

Itākh's pages should enter the palace, and that the doors be seized. And he ordered his guardian escort on the side of the river embankment to wreck all the stairs leading to the palace of Khuzaymah b. Khāzim. When Itākh entered, Isḥāq locked the door behind him, at which point Itākh looked around and, realizing that only three pages were with him, he exclaimed, "They have done it!"

Were he not seized in Baghdad, they would have been unable to apprehend him. Had he entered Sāmarrā and wanted his men to kill all his opponents, he would have been able to accomplish this.

Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir went on: Food was brought around evening, and Itākh ate. He stayed for two or three days. Then Isḥāq came, sailing in a fast boat (ḥarrāqah), and prepared another for Itākh.[292] He sent Itākh a message for him to come to the boat, and ordered that Itākh's sword be confiscated. They lowered him into the vessel, and Isḥāq sent an armed escort with him. Isḥāq then traveled upstream as far as his residence. Reaching Isḥāq's palace, Itākh was taken out [of the boat] and brought into a section of it. He was thereafter bound and fettered, irons being placed on his neck and feet.

At that, Itākh's two sons, Manṣūr and Muẓaffar, and his two [1386] secretaries, Sulaymān b. Wahb and Qudāmah b. Ziyād al-Naṣrānī, were brought to Baghdad.[293] Sulaymān was responsible for the administrative functions (a'māl) of the central government; Qudāmah, for the estates of Itākh in particular. They were imprisoned in Baghdad, and Sulaymān and Qudāmah were flogged. Qudāmah embraced Islam; Manṣūr and Muẓaffar were imprisoned.

Turk, mawlā of Isḥāq, reportedly said:[294] I stood at the door of 292. A ḥarrāqah is a light all-purpose craft, used in warfare as a fire ship. It was convenient for travel on the Tigris; Kindermann, "Schiff," 22. Itākh and his captors had to travel upstream on the Tigris from the area of the Main Bridge to that of the Upper Bridge.

---

293. Sulaymān b. Wahb is mentioned above (n. 16). His arrest and torture are related in detail by Tanūkhī, Faraj, I, 51, on the basis of Sulaymān's own report transmitted by his son 'Ubaydallāh. Qudāmah b. Ziyād, a Christian secretary, was father of the distinguished secretary Ja'far b. Qudāmah and grandfather of the famous Qudāmah b. Ja'far; *EI*², s.v. Ḳudāma b. D̲ja'far.

294. For Turk, the mawlā of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, see Ṭabarī, III, 1194 (Marin, Reign, 27); Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 147.

the chamber in which Ītākh was imprisoned. He called to me, "O Turk." I replied, "What do you want, Abū Manṣūr?" He said, "Give the amīr greetings and tell him, 'You know what al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq ordered me to do in your case. But I protected you as far as I could. This should put me in good stead with you. As far as I am concerned, I have experienced adversity and comfort, and I don't care about what I eat and drink. But these two young men have lived in luxury and are not used to misery. So give them soup and meat and something from which to eat.'"

Turk continued: I stood at the entrance to the audience hall of Isḥāq. He asked me, "What is it, Turk? Do you wish to discuss something?" I answered that I did, and that Ītākh had said to me such and such.

Turk went on: The rations of Ītākh were a loaf of bread and a cup of water. Isḥāq ordered that Ītākh's sons be given a table on which were seven loaves of bread and five ladles of water. This remained in effect during Isḥāq's life. I do not know what was done with them afterward. As for Ītākh, he was shackled with eighty raṭls [of iron] about his neck and a heavy fetter. He died on Wednesday, 5 Jumādā II, 235 (December 21, 849). Isḥāq called Abū al-Ḥasan Isḥāq b. Thābit b. Abī 'Abbād[295] to attest to his death, along with the chief of the Post and Intelligence of Baghdad and the judges. He showed them that Ītākh had not been beaten or marked.

I was informed by some[one] of our shaykhs that Ītākh's death [1387] resulted from thirst. That is, he was fed, and when he asked for water it was withheld until he died from the lack of drink. His two sons remained in prison during the lifetime of al-Mutawakkil. When al-Muntaṣir acceded to rule, he freed them. Muẓaffar lived after he was freed from prison for only three months before he died, Manṣūr surviving him.

In this year, Bughā al-Sharābī delivered Ibn al-Ba'īth in Shawwāl (April 18–May 16), as well as Khalīfah and Abū al-Agharr[296] and 295. An Abū al-Ḥasan b. Abī 'Abbād, a secretary, is mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 1180 (Marin, Reign, 16).

296. Text: wa-bi-khalīfatihi Abī al-Agharr ("and with his deputy Abū al-Agharr"). Ms. C (without points); wa-bi-Khalīfah. The note suggests wa-bi-Khalīfah wa-Abī al-Agharr ("and with Khalīfah and Abū al-Agharr"). Ṭabarī, Index, 172, implicitly identifies this Khalīfah with Khalīfah, the ghulām of Ibn althe two brothers of Ibn al-Baʿīth, Ṣaqr and Khālid—they had surrendered in return for a guarantee of safe-conduct—and a son of Ibn al-Baʿīth called al-ʿAlā' who gave himself up for a guarantee of safe-conduct. Bughā al-Sharābī delivered about 180 of the prisoners, the rest of them having died before they arrived. When they approached Sāmarrā, they were placed upon camels so that the people could view them. Al-Mutawakkil ordered that Ibn al-Baʿīth and the others be imprisoned, and he had Ibn al-Baʿīth shackled in irons.

ʿAlī b. al-Jahm reportedly said: Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth was brought to al-Mutawakkil. He ordered that he be decapitated, whereupon he was thrown down upon a leather mat. The swordsmen came and brandished their swords at him.

Al-Mutawakkil spoke to him harshly, "What prompted you to do what you did, Muḥammad?"

He replied, "Distress. You are the rope stretched between God and His creatures. I have two notions concerning [what] you [will do]. And I consider preferable what is most proper for you, namely, a pardon." He then launched into the following:[297]

People wish only that you be my killer today,
Imām of right guidance, whereas forgiving people[298] is better.

I am merely a sinful creature, [1388]
While your pardon is created of the light of prophecy.

Baʿīth, mentioned on 1380 (p. 77). A certain Abū al-Agharr Khalīfah b. al-Mubārak al-Sulamī (Ṭabarī, Index, 47) is mentioned in Rosenthal, Return, but (inter alia) he died in 303 (916); see Rosenthal, Index, 220.

297. The poem appears also, with variants, in Ṣulī, Awrāq; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 279; Fragmenta, 541; and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 32; see note in the Leiden edition. For Ibn al-Baʿīth's literary talent and the significance of his Persian poetry as evidential of Persian poetry in northwestern Iran in the ninth century, see Barthold, "Early Persian Poetry."

298. Text: bi-l-nās. Masʿūdī, Murūj VII, 279: bi-l-ḥurr = "for a free man." Fragmenta: fi-llāh. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: bi-l-marʾ = "for a man." Both bi-l-ḥurr and bi-l-marʾ fit here. Ṣūlī: wa-l-ṣulḥ awlā wa-ajmal = "but reconciliation is more fit and finer," and he then adds another line of verse: "My sin is diminished a bit by your pardon/ Whoever is pardoned by you finds pardon better."

You are the best of those who proceed to glory,
And the best of the two options you shall surely carry out.

ʿAlī b. al-Jahm said: Then al-Mutawakkil turned to me and said that Ibn al-Baʿīth possessed literary talent (adab). I hastened to say [to Ibn al-Baʿīth], "The Commander of the Faithful will carry out the best of the two [options] and will favor you." Al-Mutawakkil said, "Return to your residence."

I have received a report on the authority of . . . .:[299] "A group of shaykhs in Marāghah recited to me Persian poems by Ibn al-Baʿīth, and they noted his literary talent and courage. There are many stories about him."

I was informed by someone who reportedly was a witness when Ibn al-Baʿīth was brought to al-Mutawakkil, and Ibn al-Baʿīth spoke with him as he did. Al-Muʿtazz interceded for him while sitting with his father, al-Mutawakkil. Al-Muʿtazz asked that Ibn al-Baʿīth be turned over to him, which he was, and he was pardoned.

When Ibn al-Baʿīth fled he recited:[300]

How many things have I achieved that others have shirked,
And now that failure has begun to stifle me,

Do not rebuke me with what does not avail me.
Go, leave me, my fate is already sealed.

I shall squander money whether in hardship or in ease;
The generous person gives though having nothing.

[1389] When Ibn al-Baʿīth fled, he left behind in his residence three sons of his, called al-Baʿīth, Jaʿfar, and Ḥalbas, as well as slave girls. They were imprisoned in Baghdad in the Gold Palace (Qaṣr al-Dhahab).[301] After the death of Ibn al-Baʿīth—he died a month after he entered Sāmarrā—Bughā al-Sharābī spoke on behalf of Abū al-Agharr, his son-in-law, whereupon the latter was released.

---

299. There is a lacuna in the text at this point instead of the informant's name.

300. See Les Séances de Ḥarīrī, ed. S. De Sacy (Paris, 1847), 75–76, note (on bi-l-kaẓm) (cited in note ad loc. in Leiden edition).

301. The Gold Palace was in the Round City; Lassner, Topography, 49; Index, 322.

A maternal aunt of Ibn al-Baʿīth was released from the prison and died from joy that very day. The rest [of his household] remained in prison.

A hundred raṭls [of iron] had reportedly been placed upon the neck of Ibn al-Baʿīth, and he remained bent over face forward until he died.

When Ibn al-Baʿīth was seized, those who were imprisoned as his guarantors were released. Some of them had died in prison. The rest of his family was thereafter freed. His sons—Ḥalbas, Baʿīth, and Jaʿfar—joined the number of of Shākiriyyah who were with ʿUbaydallah b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān.[302] They were treated as guests.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil ordered[303] that the Christians and all other Dhimmīs wear yellow hoods (ṭayālisah)[304] and zunnār belts,[305] ride on saddles with wooden stirrups, affix two pommels at the rear of their saddles, and place two buttons to the caps

302. Abū al-Ḥasan ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān, of the Banū Khāqān (Zambaur, Manuel, 12; Sourdel, Vizirat, 746), appears here for the first time. ʿUbaydallāh later became wazīr under al-Mutawakkil (236–47) and then under al-Muʿtamid (256–63). He died, according to Ibn al-Jawzī (Muntaẓam, V, 45), from a blow received in a polo match, on 10 Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 262 (August 5, 876). See also Zambaur, Manuel, 7–8, 12; Herzfeld, Samarra, 213; Sourdel, Vizirat, 274–86, 305–09, etc. (Index, 785). Ṭabarī was employed as a tutor for his sons. See Table 2.

303. The type of restriction imposed upon the Dhimmīs by al-Mutawakkil was first enacted by ʿUmar II, and was thereafter refined and systematized by Hārūn al-Rashīd; see Abū Yūsuf, Kitāb al-kharāj, 127–28; tr. Fagnan, 195–97; Fattal, Statut légal, 69, 96. See also Lichtenstädter, "Distinctive Dress"; Ashtor, "Social Isolation"; and Tritton, Caliphs, 117ff. Our text (up to the caliph's letter to his governors) is translated by Lewis, Islam, II, 224–25. And see his translation (pp. 225–26) of Mutawakkil's degree in Qalqashandī, Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā (Cairo, 1331–37 [1913–18]), XIII, 368. See also the translation by N. A. Stillman, Jews of Arab Lands, 167–68. Bar Hebraeus, Chronography, 141, noting al-Mutawakkil's "hatred for Christians," relates the following decrees with his leveling the tomb of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī (see below, 1407, p. 110). In other words, the caliph's decrees vis-à-vis the Dhimmī minority were, in his view, connected with his hostility toward Shīʿites.

304. Ṭayālisah (sg. ṭaylasān) is translated here as "hoods." Ashtor, "Social Isolation," uses "mantle." According to Y. Stillman, *EI*², s.v. Libās, the ṭaylasān in this period was evidently a cowl. See also A. Arazi's Introduction to Suyūṭī, Aḥādīth; Ahsan, Social Life, 42–43. According to Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyyah, Aḥkām ahl al-dhimmah, II, 738 (cited by Ahsan, 63), Jews were permitted to wear the ṭaylasān because it was traditional gear of theirs.

305. On zunnār (< Greek zonarion), see Dozy, Vêtements, 196; N. A. Stillman, Jews of Arab Lands, 167, n. 2; Ahsan, Social Life, 61–63 (where the dress of the Dhimmī is treated in general).

(qalānis)[306] of those who wore them, which were to be of a different color from the cap worn by Muslims. [He also ordered them] to put two patches on their slaves' outer garment, the color of which was to differ from that of the outer garment, that one of the patches be in front of his chest and the other on his back, and that each patch be four finger spans (eight cm.)[307] in diameter and be yellow. [Those Dhimmīs] who wore a turban ('imāmah) should wear one whose color was also yellow. The [Dhimmī] women [1390] who went out and showed themselves in public should only appear in a yellow wrap (izār).[308] Al-Mutawakkil also ordered that their slaves wear zunnār belts and prohibited them from wearing those of a decorative variety (manāṭiq).[309] In addition, he ordered that their renovated places of worship be destroyed, and that one-tenth of their residences be seized.[310] If the location was sufficiently spacious, it was to be turned into a mosque. If it was not suitable for a mosque, it was to be [destroyed and] the area made an open tract of land.

And he ordered that wooden images of devils[311] be nailed to the doors of their houses in order to distinguish between their residences and those of the Muslims.[312]

Al-Mutawakkil prohibited the employment of Dhimmīs in government bureaus and in official functions, in which their authority would be exercised over Muslims. He prohibited their children from studying in Muslim elementary schools (katātīb), or being taught by Muslims. And he prohibited their displaying 306. The qalansuwah (pl. qalānis) might be a close-fitting cap or a tall cap of conical shape; see above, n. 222.

307. An iṣba' ("finger") = 2.078 or 2.252 cm. (Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 54).

308. On izār, see Dozy, Vêtements, 24; N. A. Stillman, Jews of Arab Lands, 167, n. 4; Lichtenstädter, "Distinctive Dress," 41, n. 22; Ashtor, "Social Isolation," 80. Y. Stillman, *EI*², s.v. Libās, V, 732, describes it as "a large sheet-like wrap worn both as a mantle and a long loin cloth or waist cloth." She compares the term to late-Biblical ēzōr.

309. Dozy, Vêtements, 420, explains minṭaqah as being a girdle or waist belt fastened by a buckle or clasp; see also Lichtenstädter, "Distinctive Dress," 41, 22; N. A. Stillman, Jews in Arab Lands, 167, n. 5; Ahsan, Social Life, 62.

310. Tritton, Caliphs, 50, claims that al-Mutawakkil was the first caliph to ban renovation of Christian and Jewish places of worship by law. See also Ashtor, "Social Isolation," 86.

311. For shayāṭīn, 'Aynī (citing Sibṭ b. al-Jawzī, Mir'at al-zamān) has asāṭīn ("columns"). See also Ashtor, loc cit.

312. See Tritton, Caliphs, 23.

crosses on their Palm Sundays and holding religious processions. In addition, he ordered that their graves be made level with the ground so as not to resemble the graves of the Muslims.[313]

Thus, he wrote to his district governors:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Now then, God—may He be blessed and exalted—by His might which cannot be gainsaid and by His power to do whatever He wills has chosen Islam and wished it for Himself. Through Islam He has honored His angels, sent His messengers, and assisted His saints. He embraced Islam with righteousness, encompassed it with succor, protected it from infirmity. He gave Islam victory over other religions, and made it free from doubts, immune from faults, endowed with outstanding virtues. He distinguished it among the religious laws by making it the most pure and virtuous, among precepts by making it the most pristine and noble, among statutes by making it the most just and convincing, and among actions by making it the most beautiful and fitting. He has honored its professors by what he has permitted and prohibited for them. He expounded for them His laws and statutes, set [1391] down for them His rules and customs, and prepared for them His expansive reward and recompense.
>
> He says in His Book, by which He commands and prohibits, urges and counsels: "Verily Allāh commands justice and kindness, and giving to kindred, and He forbids indecency and disreputable conduct and greed: He admonishes you, mayhap you will be reminded."[314]
>
> He says, prohibiting His people from partaking of offensive food,[315] drink and sexual relations, exalting them above this, purifying their religion, and making His people superior over others: "Forbidden to you are the dead (carcass), blood, the flesh of swine, that over which any

313. Muslim graves were supposed to be made level with the earth, but were in fact more often raised and even constructed in the form of mausoleums.

314. Qur'ān 16:90/92. The Qur'ān translations throughout are from R. Bell.

315. Text: 'umiṭa. Addenda, DCCLXXV, suggests ṭu'ima. Cairo edition ghumiṭa is followed here.

other (name) than Allāh has been invoked, that which has been strangled," etc.[316]

Then He concludes, referring to what He prohibits them to partake of, with this verse, protecting His religion from whoever opposed it and perfectly benefiting His chosen people. God—may He be powerful and exalted—says: "Today those who have disbelieved despair of your religion; fear them not but fear you Me. Today I have perfected your religion for you," . . . etc.[317]

God—may He be powerful and exalted—also says: "Forbidden to you are your mothers, your daughters," etc.[318]

And God says: "O you who have believed, wine, maysir, stone altars, and divining arrows are simply an abomination, some of Satan's work," etc.[319]

God thereby forbids Muslims to partake of the most abominable and impure foods of members of other religions and to imbibe the drink of theirs that most arouses enmity and hatred and that most impedes mentioning God's name and praying. And He forbids the most sinful and the most unlawful of their marriages in the eyes of the discerning.

He gives Muslims good qualities and noble virtues, and makes them professors of faith, fidelity, virtue, mercy, certainty, and veracity. And He has not posited in their religion division and opposition, nor fanaticism, haughtiness, treachery, perfidy, oppression, and injustice. He rather commands the former and forbids the latter, and promises for them His paradise and fire, His reward and punishment.

[1392]

The Muslims, through God's favor by which He has elected them, and the superiority He gave them by the religion He chose for them, are distinguished from members of other religions by their righteous laws, their fine

316. Qur'ān 5:3/4.
317. Qur'ān 5:3/4–5.
318. Qur'ān 4:23/27.
319. Qur'ān 5:90/92.

and upright statutes, and their evident proof. They are distinguished through God's purifying their religion by what He permits and forbids them, by God's decree to strengthen His religion, by His determination to manifest His truth decisively, and by His volition to perfect His benefit to His people, "and that those who perished might perish because of an Evidence [of Allāh's intervention] and that those who remained alive might remain alive because of an Evidence";[320] and that God may give victory and a fortunate outcome to the pious and disgrace in this world and the next to the unbelievers.

The Commander of the Faithful decided—may his success and guidance be through God—that he would compel all the Dhimmīs, elite and common, in his presence and in his near and distant provinces, to make their hoods (ṭayālisah)—which some of their merchants, secretaries, their old, and young wear—the color of yellow clothing. None of them shall evade this.

And those of their humble followers beneath these in station, whose circumstance prevents them from wearing hoods, shall affix two pieces of cloth of the same color [to their clothing]. The circumference of each piece shall be a complete span,[321] and shall be affixed in like manner on the outer cloak that he wears, front and rear. And all of [the Dhimmīs] shall fasten buttons to their caps having a color different from that of the caps. They shall protrude where they are fastened, so that they not adhere and be hidden, and so that what is affixed by plaiting not be concealed. [1393]

They shall also attach wooden stirrups to their saddles and fix protruding pommels to their saddlebows. They shall not be permitted to remove the pommels from their saddle bows and place them farther back on their sides. What they do shall be inspected to ensure that the orders of the Commander of the Faithful are carried out by their

320. Qur'ān 8:42/44.
321. A span (of the hand; shibr) = about 10 cm.

clear compliance. The inspector should be able to spot compliance readily, it being immediately apparent.

Their male and female slaves, and those of this class who wear girdles, shall wear zunnār belts and kustīj girdles[322] in place of the girdles that were on their waists.

You shall instruct your officers concerning the orders of the Commander of the Faithful, and do so in such a way that they are motivated to carry out their examinations as commissioned. And you shall warn them about circumventing and deviating from [these regulations], and about punishing whoever of the Dhimmīs contravenes these regulations, be it by opposition, neglect or whatever, so that all of them, regardless of class or profession, hew to the path that the Commander of the Faithful has ordered, God willing.

Know this, whoever considers the Commander of the Faithful and his order. And dispatch to your officers in the regions of your province the letter of the Commander of the Faithful, that is, the letter that you have received concerning what you shall do, God willing.

The Commander of the Faithful asks God, his Lord and Patron, to bless His servant and Messenger Muḥammad and His angels, and to preserve him, having made him caliph for His religion. May he carry out God's commission, which he rightly executes only with God's help, so that he fulfills what God has appointed him to do, and [1394] attains his consummate reward and most excellent recompense. For God is the Noble, the Compassionate.

Ibrāhīm b. al-ʿAbbās wrote this in Shawwāl, 235 (April 18–May 17, 850).

ʿAlī b. al-Jahm recited:[323]

The yellow things divide
Between the righteous and the errant,

322. For kasātīj, pl. of kustīj (<Persian kustī), meaning belt, girdle, see Glossarium, CDLI; Steingass, Dictionary, 1029.

323. See ʿAlī b. al-Jahm; Dīwān, 192.

What cares the wise if the errant increase?[324]
All the more for the booty!

In this year, a man named Maḥmūd b. al-Faraj al-Naysābūrī appeared in Sāmarrā. He claimed to be Dhū al-Qarnayn.[325] He had with him twenty-seven men in the vicinity of Khashabat Bābak. Two of his companions appeared at the Public Gate (Bāb al-ʿĀmmah). And in Baghdad, in the mosque of its administrative center, there were two others who claimed that Maḥmūd was a prophet and that he was Dhū al-Qarnayn. He and his companions were remanded to al-Mutawakkil, who ordered that Maḥmūd be beaten with scourges. He was flogged severely and died thereafter from this beating.

Maḥmūd's companions were imprisoned. They had come from Naysābūr and had with them some [text] that they recited. They brought their families with them. Among them was a shaykh who bore witness to Maḥmūd's prophecy, claiming that the latter had received a revelation from Gabriel.

Maḥmūd was flogged one hundred strokes, but did not disclaim his prophecy under the beating. The shaykh who had vouched for him was flogged forty times, whereupon he disavowed Maḥmūd's prophecy under the whipping. Maḥmud was brought to the Public Gate (Bāb al-ʿĀmmah), where he recanted.

The shaykh declared that Maḥmūd had duped him, and ordered Maḥmūd's companions to slap him, which each of them did ten times. A text was taken from Maḥmūd containing words that he composed. He stated that it was his Qur'ān, and that Gabriel—peace upon him—had revealed it to him. He died thereafter on Wednesday, 3 Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year (June 18, 850), and was buried in the Jazīrah.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil confirmed the oath of allegiance for his three sons as heirs apparent:[326] Muḥammad, whom he called

---

324. For kathura in the sense of "increase," see Glossarium, CDXLVIII.

325. Dhū al-Qarnayn ("the Two-Horned") appears in Qur'ān 18:83/82ff. and is often identified with Alexander the Great by both Muslim exegetes and Western scholars. Muslims regard Dhū al-Qarnayn as a believer who warned people of God's reward and punishment. See Paret, Koran: Kommentar, p. 318. Maḥmūd b. al-Faraj presumably regarded Dhū al-Qarnayn as a prophet.

326. Nabia Abbott, "Arabic Papyri," discusses the appointment of the three sons of al-Mutawakkil as heirs apparent and the division of the empire. Muḥam-[1395] al-Muntaṣir; Abū 'Abdallāh b. Qabīḥah—there was a difference of opinion concerning his proper name: according to one view his name was Muḥammad; according to another it was al-Zubayr—whom he gave the honorific title al-Mu'tazz; and Ibrāhīm, whom he called al-Mu'ayyad.

This was said to have been on Saturday, 26 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 11, 850), or, according to another version, on 27 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 12, 850).[327] He tied two banners for each, one black, as the banner of investiture, the other white, as the banner of the province. He assigned to each of his sons the province that I shall mention.

The caliph assigned to his son Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir: Ifrīqiyah and the entire Maghrib, from 'Arīsh Miṣr to where his sovereignty extended in the west; the district (jund) of Qinnasrīn; the Syrian and Jazīrah border provinces and towns; Diyār Muḍar, Diyār Rabī'ah, Mosul, Hīt, 'Ānāt, al-Khābūr, and Qarqīsiyā; the districts of Bājarmā and Takrīt; the subdistricts of the Sawād; the districts of the Tigris, the two holy places, the Yemen, 'Akk, Ḥaḍramawt, al-Yamāmah, al-Baḥrayn, al-Sind, Makrān, Qandābīl, and Farj Bayt al-Dhahab; and the districts of al-Ahwāz. He also gave him the annual income from produce in Sāmarrā; Māh al-Kūfah, Māh al-Baṣrah, Māsabadhān, Mihrajān Qadhaq, Shahrazūr, Darabādh, al-Ṣāmighān, Iṣbahān, Qumm, Qāshān, Qazwīn; the affairs of al-Jabal and the estates affiliated to al-Jibāl; and the income from alms taxes of the Arab tribesmen in al-Baṣrah.

He assigned to his son al-Mu'tazz: The districts of Khurāsān and its affiliated territories, Ṭabaristān, al-Rayy, Armenia, Ādharbayjān, and the districts of Fārs. In 240 (845–855), al-Mutawakkil mad al-Muntaṣir received the largest share, and Ibrāhīm, the last in line of succession, the smallest. See the accounts in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh II, 594–95; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 32–33; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 280; Ibn Khaldūn, 'Ibar, III, 275. They differ in details concerning the provinces assigned to each. Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir was thirteen (see below, 1471, where he is said to be twenty-five years old in 274/861–62); Ibrāhīm had not reached puberty; and al-Zubayr was only three. This meant that agents had to be appointed to administer their territories. The papyri published by Abbott concern village surveys ordered by Aḥmad b. al-Mudabbir, agent for the Syrian region assigned to Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad. Aḥmad b. al-Mudabbir was a brother of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir (above, n. 287).

---

327. Ṣūlī gives the date as 1 Muḥarram, 236 (July 15, 850).

assigned to al-Mu'tazz the contents of the treasuries in all the districts, and the mints, and ordered that his name be stamped on dirhams.

He assigned to his son al-Mu'ayyad the districts (jund) of Damascus, Ḥimṣ, al-Urdunn and Filasṭīn. [1396]

Abū al-Ghuṣn al-A'rābī recited:[328]

The majestic rulers of the Muslims
Are Muḥammad, then Abū 'Abdallāh.

Then there is Ibrāhīm, disdainful of baseness,
Blessed among the sons of God's caliph.

Al-Mutawakkil wrote a letter to his sons, the text of which is as follows:

> This is a letter written by the Servant of God, Ja'far al-Imām al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, The Commander of the Faithful, calling upon God and those who were present, including the members of his household, partisans (shī'ah), army commanders, judges, trusted deputies, jurists, and other Muslims, to witness its entire contents.[329]
>
> To Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, and to Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, and Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad bi-llāh, sons of the Commander of the Faithful, in the full competence of his judgment, complete health of his body, thorough understanding, free volition, and striving for obedience to his Lord and the well-being of his subjects, their compliance and the amplitude and integrity of their community.
>
> This was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah 235 (June 16–July 14, 850).[330]
>
> To Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of Ja'far al-

328. For the poet Abū al-Ghuṣn al-A'rābī, see, for instance, Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn, IV, 22.

329. The word shī'ah in this context has the sense of "followers, assistants, officers, etc."; Dozy, Supplément, I, 811. The letter is also translated by Chejne, Accession, 123ff.

330. Cairo edition adds annahu ja'ala, on the basis of Mss. A and D, according to which the translation would be: "It was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah . . . that he made Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir. . . ."

Imām al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, the Commander of the Faithful, heir apparent of the Muslims during al-Mutawakkil's life and caliph over them after him:

Al-Mutawakkil commended to al-Muntaṣir piety, which protects whoever cleaves to it, saves whoever takes refuge in it, and is the might and glory[331] of whoever contents himself with it. Good favor is attained by obedience to God, and mercy flows from God. God is forgiving and merciful.[332]

The Servant of God, Ja'far al-Imām al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, Commander of the Faithful, invested as [future] caliph after Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the [1397] Commander of the Faithful, Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful. Following Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, he ordered that the caliphate be transferred to Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful.

And the Servant of God, Ja'far al-Imām al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, Commander of the Faithful, imposed upon Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh and Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad bi-llāh, the two sons of the Commander of the Faithful, obedience and sincere counsel, alliance with [al-Muntaṣir's] friends and enmity toward his foes, secretly and publicly, whether in anger or favor, whether withholding or giving. He also enjoined them to uphold their oath of allegiance to al-Muntaṣir and to show loyalty to his investiture. They should not seek his ruin, nor should they endeavor to deceive him or make common cause against him. They should not act independently of al-Muntaṣir in any way that violates his investiture by the Commander of the Faithful as heir apparent, either while al-Mutawakkil lives or as caliph after him.

The Servant of God, Ja'far al-Imām al-Mutawakkil 'alā-

331. Text: 'izz. The note ad loc. suggests 'izzah, which may mean "glory" here, but the terms are virtually identical in meaning. I have used two words to encompass the possible semantic range.

332. Qur'ān 2:173/168 and parallels.

llāh, the Commander of the Faithful, has imposed [the following] upon Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, with respect to Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, the two sons of the Commander of the Faithful: Fidelity to what al-Mutawakkil has appointed for them and invested them with, namely, the caliphate after Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, the living succession being Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, becoming caliph after Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful. Al-Mutawakkil enjoins fulfillment of this.

Al-Muntaṣir, in turn, should not renounce any one of them, nor make an investiture excluding any one of them, be it by rendering the oath of allegiance to a son of his or to anyone else among all mankind. The order of succession shall not be altered. Al-Muntaṣir shall not violate any [of the arrangements] concerning the offices that the Servant [1398] of Allāh Jaʿfar al-Imām al-Mutawakkil ʿalā-llāh has assigned to each of them, including: [the supervision of] prayer, police services,[333] judgeships, maẓālim courts, taxes, estates, booty, income from alms taxes, and other privileges of their offices, and the office of each of them, including post,[334] [the monopoly on] embroidery (ṭuruz),[335] the treasury, subsidies, the mint houses, and all the offices that the Commander of the Faithful has assigned and will assign to each of them.

And al-Muntaṣir shall not transfer anyone servicing them in their districts, including commanders, troops, Shākiriyyah, mawlās, pages, etc. And he shall not interfere with them by reducing anything of their estates and fiefs and other properties and treasures and all that they

333. For the term maʿāwin in this sense, see Bosworth, Reunification, 99, n. 313. For maʿāwin in the sense of "payments" or "subsidies," see Glossarium, CCCLXXXIII.

334. Or: post and intelligence; see *EI*², s.v. Barīd.

335. For ṭirāz (sg. of ṭuruz), see R. B. Serjeant, "Islamic Textiles," Ars Islamica, 9 (1942), 6off.; *EI*¹, s.v.; Ahsan, Social Life, 68–70.

possess, as well as what they own of inherited and newly acquired wealth, old and renovated property, and all that they will acquire and will be acquired for them. And he shall not dispossess, harass, or interfere with any one of his partisans (shī'ah), secretaries, judges, slaves, agents, followers, and all their circumstances by [demands for] supervision and accounting or in any other way. And he shall not nullify what the Commander of the Faithful confirmed for the two of them in this contract and investiture by altering it, postponing its execution, or contradicting anything of it.

The Servant of God, Ja'far al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, the Commander of the Faithful, imposed upon Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, the same conditions regarding Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad billāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, as he imposed upon Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, should the caliphate pass to him after Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful. As caliph after Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh must behave toward Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, according to the conditions al-Mutawakkil set down for Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, including all that al-Mutawakkil designated in this letter, according to what he [1399] expounded, concerning loyalty on the part of Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful.

Inasmuch as the Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil assigned the caliphate to Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad billāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh must see to it that the agreement is fully carried out, in accordance with what he owes God and with what the Commander of the Faithful ordered him to do. He must not violate the agreement by dismissing it or substituting [provisions with it].

God threatens whoever opposes His command and deviates from His path in His perfect Book: "Then if any alter it having heard it, the guilt rests upon those who alter it; verily God is One Who hears and knows."[336]

Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, have a guarantee of safe-conduct from Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Comander of the Faithful, whether one or both of them are staying with him or are absent from him. That is, while Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, is not in his governorship of Khurāsān and its adjacent dependencies, those falling within the jurisdiction of Khurāsānī rule, and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, is not in his governorship in Syria and its districts (ajnād).

It is incumbent upon Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, to transfer Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, to Khurāsān and its adjacent dependencies, those falling within the jurisdiction of Khurāsānī rule, and to deliver to him the governorship of Khurāsān and all of its provinces (aʿmāl) and districts (ajnād), as well as the subdistricts (kuwar) included in what Jaʿfar al-Imām al-Mutawakkil ʿalā-llāh, the Commander of the Faithful, has assigned Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful.

Al-Muntaṣir shall not keep Abū ʿAbdallāh from them or detain him in his presence or in any land except Khurāsān and the districts and subdistricts falling under [1400]
Khurāsānī rule. He must see to it that Abū ʿAbdallāh gets to Khurāsān as governor over it and all its provinces, serving independently, with all its provinces assigned to him, so that he may reside where he wishes in the subdistricts of his province. Al-Muntaṣir shall not transfer al-Muʿtazz from them. All those whom the Commander of the Faithful has attached and will attach to his service shall go with him, including his *mawlā*s, commanders,

336. Qur'ān 2:181/177.

Shākiriyyah, companions, secretaries, agents, slaves, and the various people who follow him, along with their wives, children, families, and property. Al-Muntaṣir shall not detain anyone from going to al-Mu'tazz nor cause anyone else to share in anything of his administrative offices. He shall not send [to oversee him] a confidant, secretary, or courier. He shall not chastise him for any reason.

And Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh shall free Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, to go out to Syria and its districts, along with those whom the Commander of the Faithful has attached and will attach to his service, including his *mawlā*s, commanders, slaves, troops, Shākiriyyah, companions, agents, female slaves, and the various classes of people who follow him, including their wives, children, and property. He shall not detain anyone from going to them. He shall deliver to him his governorship (wilāyah), and all its provinces (a'māl), and districts (junūd). Al-Muntaṣir shall not prevent al-Mu'ayyad from having access to them or detain him in his presence, nor in any of the lands aside from them. He shall see to it that al-Mu'ayyad gets to Syria and its districts (ajnād) to govern them, and he shall not transfer him from them. He is responsible to him for those he attached to his service, including commanders, *mawlā*s, pages, troops, Shākiriyyah, and various classes of people in all circumstances. His responsibilities are governed by conditions similar to those set for Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, with regard to Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, in Khurāsān and its provinces, according to what [1401] has been prescribed, elucidated, adumbrated, and expounded in this letter.

If the caliphate passes to Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, and Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad bi-llāh stays in Syria, al-Mu'tazz must confirm Ibrāhīm there, whether he is in his presence or is absent from him. He must let Ibrāhīm go to his province ('amal) in Syria, and hand over to him its districts (ajnād), governorship (wilāyah), and all of its provinces (a'māl).

He shall not keep Ibrāhīm from them nor detain him in his presence nor in any land aside from it. He must see to it that Ibrāhīm gets to Syria quickly so as to govern it and all its provinces, in accordance with the conditions set down for Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, with regard to Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, in Khurāsān and its provinces, that is, according to what was prescribed, described, and stipulated as a condition in this letter.

The Commander of the Faithful will not permit any of those to whom these stipulations apply—Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, sons of the Commander of the Faithful—to expunge anything that we have made a condition in this letter and affirmed. Fidelity to it is incumbent upon all of them. God will accept only this from them. Adherence is accepting God's compact concerning this matter and that alone.

Jaʿfar al-Imām al-Mutawakkil, Commander of the Faithful, called God, Lord of worlds, and the Muslims who were in his presence as witnesses to all that is in this letter, that he (al-Mutawakkil) will execute what pertains to Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, sons of the Commander of the Faithful, along with all that he designated in it. God is sufficient as witness and helper to whoever obeys hopefully and is faithful to His compact out of fear and after taking careful measure. God punishes those who oppose Him or strive to shun His command. [1402]

This letter was written in four copies. The attestation of the witnesses in each copy was made in the presence of the Commander of the Faithful. There was a copy in the library of the Commander of the Faithful, a copy in the possession of Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir, son of the Commander of the Faithful, a copy in the possession of Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, and a copy in the possession of Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful.

Ja'far al-Imām al-Mutawakkil made Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, governor of the provinces of Fārs, Armenia, and Ādharbayjān, as well as the provinces and subdistricts of Khurāsān, its adjacent dependencies, and those falling within the jurisdiction of Khurāsānī rule. Al-Mutawakkil imposed on Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful, protection of al-Mu'tazz's life and firm commitment to the provinces in his jurisdiction and all the people who have recourse to him in Khurāsān and its adjacent dependencies and those falling within the jurisdiction of Khurāsānī rule, according to what is designated in this letter.

Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. Ṣūl recited, praising the three sons of al-Mutawakkil—al-Muntaṣir, al-Mu'tazz, and al-Mu'ayyad:[337]

The bonds of Islam, linked with Victory, power and confirmation,

Join now a Hāshimite caliph and three Heirs apparent surrounding the caliphate.

He is a moon (qamar) around which satellites (aqmār) turn,
Surrounding the ascent of its good fortune with good fortunes.

The ancestors protect them and are protected by them,[338]
They are distinguished by their noble souls and ancestry.[339]

[1403] He is also the author of a poem about al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh:[340]

The rising light of the east becomes bright by [the presence of] al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh.[341]

---

337. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IX, 32. And see Ibrāhīm al-Ṣūlī, Dīwān, 131, which omits the third verse, as does Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī, Kitāb al-awrāq.

338. Aghānī has "Fate has elevated them, and they are raised by it [read: bihā]."

339. The word judūd is a double entendre (jināṣ), meaning both "ancestors" and "good luck."

340. Ibrāhīm al-Ṣūlī, Dīwān, 130.

341. Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī, Kitāb al-awrāq, adds: "the investiture became so bright that it caused dawn to break at night,/ By it God has bestowed on the nation justice and kindness."

Al-Mu'tazz is indeed perfume
Sent to mankind giving fragrance.

And he is the author of another poem about them:[342]

It is God who has made his religion victorious
And strengthened it with Muḥammad.[343]

God ennobled with the caliphate
Ja'far b. Muḥammad.[344]

And God confirmed his investiture
Of Muḥammad and Muḥammad.[345]

And the one confirmed (Mu'ayyad) by those two confirmed, Back to the Prophet Muḥammad.

In this year, Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, Supervisor of the Bridge, died.[346] This was on Tuesday, 23 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 8, 850) or, according to another version, on 22 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 7, 850). Isḥāq had appointed his son as his successor. The latter was bedecked with five robes and girded with a sword. When al-Mutawakkil heard news of Isḥāq's illness, he sent his son al-Mu'tazz to visit him along with Bughā al-Sharābī and a contingent of commanders and soldiers.

The waters of the Tigris reportedly turned yellow[347] this year for three days. People were alarmed at this. They then turned to the color of flood water. This was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 16–July 14).

In this year, al-Mutawakkil brought Yaḥyā b. 'Umar b. al-Ḥu-

342. Ibrāhīm al-Ṣūlī, Dīwān, 132.

343. Muḥammad is apparently the caliph Abū Isḥāq Muḥammad al-Mu'taṣim (rather than the Prophet Muḥammad).

344. Ja'far b. Muḥammad is al-Mutawakkil, son of Muḥammad al-Mu'taṣim.

345. The two Muḥammads are Abū Ja'far Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir and Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad al-Mu'tazz. The next line alludes to their brother Mu'ayyad.

346. Text: ṣāḥib al-jisr. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab was chief of security police (ṣāḥib al-shurṭah), as Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 35, notes here, as though this were the correct reading. On the other hand, Ṭabarī reports, III, 1062 (Bosworth, Reunification, 129), that in 206 (821–22) he was put in charge of "the two bridges." Thus, he was called ṣāḥib al-jisr.

347. The color aṣfar/ṣufrā may be yellow, beige, orange, or yellowish brown; Fischer, Farb- und Formbezeichnungen, 358.

sayn b. Zayd b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib[348] from one of [1404] the provinces. He had reportedly assembled a group [of supporters]. 'Umar b. Faraj flogged him eighteen lashes, and he was incarcerated in Baghdad in the Maṭbaq [Prison].

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

---

348. Text: Yaḥyā b 'Umar b. Yaḥyā b. Zayd b 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī. Cairo edition, following Ms. D, has Yaḥyā b. 'Umar b. Ḥusayn b. Zayd. But cf. Ṭabarī, III, 1515 (Saliba, 15), where his name is given as Yaḥyā b. 'Umar b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥusayn b. Zayd, etc. And see Addenda, DCCXXV. He was called Abū al-Ḥusayn. Ṭabarī, III, 1515–24 (Saliba 15–21), describes his abortive uprising in al-Kūfah in 250 (864–65). His revolt had an interesting sequel in 255 (868–69; III, 1745), when a leader of the Zanj rebellion claimed to be the incarnated form of Yaḥyā b. 'Umar.

The Events of the Year 236

(JULY 15, 850–JULY 4, 851)

Among them was the killing of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab b. Zurayq, brother of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, in Fārs.

The Killing of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab and How It Took Place

I have been informed by more than one authority that when Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm's father, Isḥāq, learned that Muḥammad was an insatiable glutton, who demanded exorbitant amounts of food, Isḥāq sent a message summoning him.[349] Isḥāq ordered Muḥammad to eat, explaining, "I want to see how you consume food." He devoured a quantity that astounded Isḥāq. Then, when it seemed that he had reached his surfeit, a roast lamb was served, which he ravaged until only the bones remained. When he had consumed it, Isḥāq remarked, "My son, your father's money will not suffice to feed your belly. Go and associate with the Commander of the Faithful; he can better afford to support you than I."

349. For the Ṭāhirid Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, see Table 3.

Isḥāq sent Muḥammad to the gate [of the caliph][350] and made him stay there. Muḥammad was in the service of the central government during the lifetime of his father and was his father's proxy at the gate [of the caliph] until his father Isḥāq died.

Al-Mu'tazz appointed Muḥammad b. Isḥāq over Fārs, and al-Muntaṣir appointed him over al-Yamāmah, al-Baḥrayn, and the Mecca Road in Muḥarram (July 15–August 13, 850) of this year. Al-Mutawakkil assigned him all the districts of his father. Al-Mun-[1405] taṣir added the governorship of Egypt. This was because he reportedly delivered to al-Mutawakkil and his heirs apparent the contents of his father's storehouses, including jewelry and precious objects, thus gaining their favor so that they elevated his rank.

When Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm[351] learned what was done in the case of his nephew Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, he became hostile to the central government, and al-Mutawakkil discovered objectionable things about him.

I was told by some[one] of my informants that Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm's hostility was directed only against his nephew Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, the reason for it being as follows: The taxes (kharāj) of Fārs had been delivered to [Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm]. Now Muḥammad b. Isḥāq complained to al-Mutawakkil about the hostility of his uncle, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, whereupon al-Mutawakkil gave the former latitude to treat his uncle as he saw fit.

At that, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq appointed al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab governor of Fārs and deposed his uncle.[352] Then Muḥammad b. Isḥāq approached al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl about killing his uncle Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. It is reported that when al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl went to Fārs, he presented his uncle with gifts, including sweets, on the day of Nayrūz.[353] Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm 350. Text: al-bāb. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 36, says more explicitly bāb al-khalīfah.

351. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, uncle of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq, was the brother of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab; above, n. 98. See Table 3.

352. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab was a cousin of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm and (like him) a nephew of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm; Zambaur, Manuel, 46, 197, 198. He was very active as a military commander in the ensuing period; see Saliba, Index, 176.

353. Nayrūz is the Arabic form of the Persian Nawrūz, the ancient Iranian (Achaemenid) New Year, which was celebrated into Islamic times, and with particular enthusiasm in the period of al-Mutawakkil. On the days of Nawrūz, sweets were prepared and given as presents, for instance, ṣābūniyyah and lawzīnaj (basically, sugar and almonds); EI[1], s.v. Nawrūz; Ahsan, Social Life, 99–100, 287.

partook of them. Then al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl entered and ordered that he be brought into another place and that sweets be offered to him again. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm ate more of them so that he became thirsty and wanted to drink, but water was withheld. He tried to leave the place where he was brought, but was denied exit. Muḥammad survived for two days and nights, and then he died. His property and family were carried to Sāmarrā on one hundred camels.

When al-Mutawakkil heard the announcement of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm's death, he ordered that a letter concerning him be written to Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir expressing condolences, and it was written as follows:

> Now then. The Commander of the Faithful offers you, with every benefit and favor, felicitation for the gifts of God and consolation for the calamities of His destiny. God has determined for Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, His decree for mankind (ʿibād) so that they have transience and He have permanence. The Commander of the Faithful consoles you for [the loss of] Muḥammad, as God gives His rich reward and recompense to whoever acts according to His command in his misfortunes. May God and what brings you near Him take precedence in all your circumstances. With thanks to God comes His abundance; and with submission to God's command, His pleasure. And God gives success to the Commander of the Faithful. Peace. [1406]

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. Sahl died, according to one informant, on the first of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 5, 851).[354] The informant who stated this said that Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm died on the twenty-fifth of this month (June 29, 851).

Al-Qāsim b. Aḥmad al-Kūfī reportedly said: I was in the service of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān in 235 (849–50), while al-Fatḥ held administrative offices for al-Mutawakkil, including intelligence (akhbār) concerning the elite and commoners in Sāmarrā and the Hārūnī [Palace] and what was adjacent to it.[355]

354. Al-Ḥasan b. Sahl had been finance minister and governor under al-Maʾmūn; see above, n. 196.

355. He is al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, son of Khāqān b. ʿUrṭūj (Ghurṭūj). The Khāqānids were of Turkish stock, and were the ruling dynasty in Farghānah (see Zambaur,

A dispatch came from Ibrāhīm b. 'Aṭā', supervisor of Intelligence in Sāmarrā, reporting the death of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, stating that he took an overdose of medicine on the morning of Thursday, 25 Dhū al-Qa'dah (May 20, 851), that he died at noontime on this day, and that al-Mutawakkil ordered that his funeral equipment be furnished from his treasuries. When he was placed on his litter (sarīr), a number of merchants who were creditors of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl hung onto it, holding up his burial. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān,[356] Ibrāhīm b. 'Attāb, and a man known as Barghūth mediated their case.[357] They resolved the matter, and he was buried.

[1407] The next day a dispatch arrived from the chief of Intelligence in Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) with an announcement of the death of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm on the afternoon of Thursday, 5 Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 9, 851). Al-Mutawakkil grieved deeply over him. He said, "May God be great and exalted. How fate has overtaken al-Ḥasan [b. Sahl] and Muḥammad b. Isḥāq at the same time!"

In this year, al-Mutawakkil ordered that the grave of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī and the residences and palaces surrounding it be destroyed. The site of his grave was to be ploughed, sown, and irrigated, and people were to be prevented from visiting it.[358] It is reported that Manuel, p. 12—Khāqānids). His father was chief of the Turkish troops from Central Asia who formed part of the royal guard of al-Mu'taṣim. Al-Fatḥ was educated, from the age of seven, along with al-Mutawakkil, in the court of the caliph, who adopted him. Thus, he was the adopted brother of al-Mutawakkil, and became his secretary and close confidant. He was governor of Egypt, 242 (856–57)–47 (861–62); Zambaur, Manuel, 27. Al-Fatḥ was friend and patron of the great Jāḥiẓ (Pellat, Milieu, 66), as well as other writers and poets, and was himself an author. Al-Fatḥ assembled a large library at Sāmarrā, containing many philosophical works, and had an impressive command of Arabic; see, for instance, Yāqūt, Irshād, VI, 116ff; and see O. Pinto, "al-Fatḥ B. Ḫāqān"; *EI*², s.v. Al-Fatḥ died while protecting al-Mutawakkil on the night he was assassinated (see below, 1460, p. 180). See Table 2.

---

356. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān was the brother of al-Fatḥ and Ja'far (Zambaur, Manuel, 12).

357. For qaṭa'a amrahum in this sense, see Glossarium, CDXXVIII.

358. The grave of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī (Qabr al-Ḥusayn, Mashhad al-Ḥusayn) is located at Karbalā', where al-Ḥusayn and his followers were massacred by the Umayyads in 680. Al-Mutawakkil's obliteration of the site was part of his anti-Shī'ite policy. By 366 (977), when Ibn Ḥawqal visited Karbalā', during the rule of the Shī'ite Buwayhid dynasty, he found a large shrine over the tomb; it had once again become an attraction for pilgrims; see Ibn Ḥawqal, Masālik, p. 166; *EI*², s.v. Karbalā'. According to a tradition, the caliph was punished for destroying the tomb in such a way that after his death hardly a trace remained of Sāmarrā; see Qazvīnī, Nuzhat al-qulūb, 32, 42; tr. 39, 49.

an agent of the chief of security police announced in the area: "Whomever we find near al-Ḥusayn's grave after three days we shall send to the Maṭbaq [Prison]." People fled and refrained from going to the grave. This place was ploughed, and the area around it was sown.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil appointed as secretary 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān and dismissed Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl al-Jarjarā'ī.[359]

In this year, Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir went on the pilgrimage. His grandmother, Shujā', mother of al-Mutawakkil, went on the pilgrimage with him, al-Mutawakkil accompanying her as far as al-Najaf.

In this year, Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Marwazī al-Kabaḥa Fāhu perished.[360]

It is reported that Fāris b. Bughā al-Sharābī—he was the deputy of his father—appointed this Abū Sa'īd, a mawlā of Ṭayyi', as governor of Ādharbayjān and Armenia. He encamped in al-Karkh, that is, Karkh Fayrūz.[361] He died suddenly on 7 Shawwāl (June 28, 851) while he was in al-Karkh. He had put on one of his shoes and reached out to put on the other when he fell over dead.

---

359. Al-Jarjarā'ī had followed Ibn al-Zayyāt in the wazīrate. 'Ubaydallāh's appointment (Zambaur, Manuel, 6) indicates the growing power and influence of the Khāqānids.

360. The cognomen al-Kabaḥa Fahu, if correct, means "The One Who Bridled His Mouth." See Ṭabarī, Index, 235; al-Thaghrī al-Kabaḥa Fahu. Ms. C has al-Kakh (?). But the reading is uncertain. Cairo edition's text reads: al-Kabaḥa fujā'atan (the second word appears in the text farther on). See Fragmenta, 546: fujā'atan (after Yūsuf). He was an army commander from Khurāsān (Marw), who made his first appearance at the time of al-Ma'mūn, in 210 (816–17; Ṭabarī, III, 1093), when he participated in a campaign against the rebellious citizens of Qumm, along with (his uncle) 'Alī b. Hishām (al-Marwazī). His cognomen there is given as al-K-ḥ-b-q-w-ṣ (see Bosworth, Reunification, 166). He executed his uncle Ḥusayn b. Hishām in 217 (832–33) in the name of al-Ma'mūn (Ṭabarī, III, 1107; and Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 147). But Bosworth, 192, n. 598, does not identify him with our man. He was active under al-Mu'taṣim and participated in the campaign against Bābak; Marin, Reign, Index, 133. See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 198; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XVIII, 47, 108, 169–70; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 658 (with Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī< Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, 169–70). According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 598, he died on his way to a campaign in Armenia.

361. The words "that is Karkh Fayrūz" appear to be a gloss. A Karkh Quarter existed in Baghdad, and a Karkh Fayrūz in the area of Sāmarrā, which was situated between the villages of Karkh Fayrūz (or Karkh Bājaddah) on the north and al-Maṭīrah on the southeast. Karkh Fayrūz was a military cantonment occupied by a number of the caliphal Turkish guards, who were isolated from the local citizens. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 255; *EI*², s.v. al-Karkh.

[1408] Al-Mutawakkil appointed Abū Sa'īd's son Yūsuf over the security police (al-ḥarb), over which his father had been in charge. Following that, he assigned to him the taxes of the province [of Ādharbayjān and Armenia] and its estates. He went to the province, took control of it, and sent his administrative officers to every area.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Muntaṣir Muḥammad b. Ja'far al-Mutawakkil.

The Events of the Year

237

(JULY 5, 851–JUNE 22, 852)

One of the events was the revolt of the inhabitants of Armenia against Yūsuf b. Muḥammad.[362]

The Cause of the Revolt by the Inhabitants of Armenia against Yūsuf b. Muḥammad

We have previously mentioned the reason for al-Mutawakkil's appointing this Yūsuf b. Muḥammad governor of Armenia. The reason for the revolt of the inhabitants of Armenia against him was reportedly as follows:

When he went to his administrative prefecture in Armenia one of the Patrikioi named Buqrāṭ b. Ashūṭ, called the chief Patrikios, 362. Yūsuf, son of Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Marwazī, was governor of Armenia in 235 (849–50) and of Ādharbayjān in 237 (851–52); Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 248; Zambaur, Manuel, 177, 178. Armenia was the scene of periodic insurrections in the 'Abbāsid period; the rebellion against al-Mutawakkil reported here was the most serious; see also Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 598, and in general, *EI*², s.v. Armīniya.

rebelled, seeking to take rule.[363] Yūsuf b. Muḥammad seized him, bound him, and deported him to the gate of the caliph.[364] Buqrāṭ and his son then converted to Islam.

It is reported that when Yūsuf deported Buqrāṭ b. Ashūṭ, the latter's nephew and a number of Armenian Patrikioi rallied against Yūsuf. Snow had fallen in the town where Yūsuf was situated. It is said to have been Ṭarūn.[365] When the snow settled, the Armenians besieged it from every side, surrounding Yūsuf and those who were with him in the town. Yūsuf went out to the [1409] gate of the city and fought them. [The Armenians] killed him and all those who fought alongside him. Those who did not fight alongside him were told to strip and escape naked. Many of them discarded their clothing and escaped nude and barefoot. Most of them died from the cold, but some escaped, losing their fingers.

When Yūsuf deported Buqrāṭ b. Ashūṭ, the Patrikioi took an oath to kill Yūsuf and vowed to shed his blood. Mūsā b. Zurārah[366] went along with them in this. He was responsible for the daughter of Buqrāṭ.

Sawādah b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Jaḥḥāfī[367] discouraged Yūsuf b.

---

363. The rulers of Armenia were called Biṭrīq (Patrikios) by the Arabs. Buqrāṭ b. Ashūṭ (Bagrat son of Ashot Bagratuni) refused to pay tribute to Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad b. Yūsuf in 849 and had resisted the caliph's forces sent in 850. Balādhurī, who reports these events (Futūḥ, 248), does not mention the present rebellion of Buqrāṭ b. Ashūṭ that led to his deportation, thus magnifying the offence to the Armenian Patrikioi. See Laurent, L'Arménie, 117ff.; Vasmer, Chronologie, 91ff.; and Vardan's Universal History, tr. J. Muyldermans, 122ff. See also Grousset, Histoire, 357f; Minorsky, History, 24f.; and "Caucasia IV," 510. Armenian chronicles, including an eyewitness account of some of these events by Thomas Ardzruni (Artsruni), taken together with reports in Muslim sources, give a fairly clear and detailed picture.

364. That is, the Caliphal Palace in Sāmarrā.

365. Ṭarūn (Taron) is the area west of Lake Van; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 534; Le Strange, Lands, 115–17. The event took place in the town of Mūsh in Taron; Vasmer, Chronologie, 93. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 248, the Khuwaythiyah participated in this attack, a detail that is confirmed by our text farther on.

366. On Mūsā b. Zurārah (of Arzan), see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 248. In 849–50, he tried to take over Taron on the pretext that he would deliver tribute to the caliph. He was repulsed, however, by Bagrat of Taron and Ashot Ardzruni, after which he supported the Armenians against the Muslims. He came to negotiate with the Muslims but was seized and deported to Sāmarrā; see Laurent, L'Arménie, 119, 326. See also Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 598.

367. The Arab amīr Sawādah b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Jaḥḥāfī is mentioned in the Universal History of Vardan (tr. Muyldermans, 118) as having led 4,000 men in battle (in 823–24) against Ashot Msaker. Smbat, son of Ashot (Sunbāṭ b. Ashūṭ), made peace with him. See also Minorsky, "Caucasia, IV," 509.

Abī Sa'īd from remaining where he was and told him the news he heard concerning the Patrikioi. Yūsuf, however, refused to comply, and the [Armenians] caught up with him in the month of Ramaḍān. They surrounded the wall of the town, the snow being up to twenty dhirā' (ca. ten meters) in the vicinity of the town and as far as Khilāṭ and Dabīl.[368] Everything was snowed in.[369]

Before this, Yūsuf had divided his forces among the villages (rasātīq) of his province, groups of his forces heading [to be stationed in] each of its regions. A contingent of the Patrikioi and their allies were sent against each group and killed them in a single day. They had surrounded Yūsuf in the town for several days, at which point he went out to [confront] them. He fought until he was killed.

Al-Mutawakkil consequently sent Bughā al-Sharābī to Armenia, seeking vengeance for Yūsuf.[370] He headed for Armenia from the direction of the Jazīrah. He began in Arzan[371] [by attacking] Mūsa b. Zurārah[372]—he is Abū al-Ḥurr—and he had sisters and brothers, [namely] Ismā'īl, Sulaymān, Aḥmad, 'Īsā, Muḥammad, and Hārūn. Bughā deported Mūsā b. Zurārah to the gate of the caliph. He then proceeded to lay siege in the mountain of the Khuwaythiyyah.[373] They constituted the majority of the inhabitants of Armenia and were the killers of Yūsuf b. Muḥammad. [1410]
Bughā fought and defeated them, killing about 30,000 and taking

368. Khilāṭ (Akhlāṭ, Armenian Khlat') was a town and fortress immediately northwest of Lake Van; see *EI*², s.v. Akhlāṭ. Dabīl is Dvin, the capital of Armenia; *EI*², s.v. Dwin.

369. Literally, "The world was all snow" (wa-l-dunyā kulluhā thalj).

370. Ṭabarī says that it was Bughā al-Sharābī, that is, the Younger, who was dispatched, but other sources state that it was Bughā the Elder, governor of Ādharbayjān and Armenia in 237 (851–52); see, for instance, Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 248; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 598; Fragmenta, 547; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 39; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 290. See also Vasmer, Chronologie, 94, n. 16. It is possible that Bughā al-Sharābī participated in the early stages of the campaign. See also Bar Hebraeus, Mukhtaṣar, 247, 253, 254.

371. The most important town by this name in eastern Anatolia is on the east bank of the Arzanṣū (modern Garzansu) River; *EI*², s.v. Arzan. Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 248, says that Bughā al-Kabīr began in Badlīs, where he seized Mūsā b. Zurārah.

372. There is a lacuna in the text. Cairo edition reads (Mss. A and D): "And he is Abū al-Ḥurr," and then has "and he had sisters." Leiden Ms. C is corrupt but may be construed to yield the same as Cairo edition. The words "and he had sisters" also appear in Ibn al-Athīr.

373. The Khuwaythiyyah were rugged mountain folk who lived in the region of Sāsūn. See Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 206; Canard, Histoire, 185f.

many captive. He sold them in Armenia. He then went to the territory of Aghbagh[374] and took prisoner Ashūṭ b. Ḥamzah, Abū al-'Abbās, ruler of Aghbagh. Aghbagh was a subdistrict of al-Busfurrajān. Bughā also built al-Nashawā.[375] He then went to the city of Dabīl in Armenia and stayed there for a month, after which he went to Tiflis.[376]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm was appointed governor of Baghdad and over the security police of the Sawād.[377]

In this year, Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir[378] came from Khurāsān [to Sāmarrā] on 22 Rabī' II (October 2, 851), and was appointed over the security police, the poll tax (jizyah), and the administrative districts of the Sawād, and he was made the representative of the Commander of the Faithful in Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām). He then proceeded to Baghdad.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil removed Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād from the maẓālim courts and appointed Muḥammad b. Ya'qūb, known as Abū al-Rabī'.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil showed favor to Ibn Aktham.[379] He 374. The text reads: Albaq. The note in the Leiden edition says Albaq = Armenian Aghbagh, located, as the next sentence states, in the district of al-Busfurrajān (Vaspurakan). It lies between Lake Van and Lake Urmiya. See Canard, Histoire, 191–92 (citing, inter alia, our passage). For Ashūṭ b. Ḥamzah, see also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 248. He is Ashot Ardzruni, son of Hamazasp, whose son was Gregory; Vardan, Universal History, tr. Muyldermans, 123, n. 2. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 598, Ashūṭ was executed and suspended at the Public Gate.

375. The note in the Leiden edition suggests that some part of the text is lacking before the word wa-banā ("he built"). Al-Nashawā is a town north of the Aras River in Ādharbayjān; see Le Strange, Lands, 167.

376. On Tiflis, capital of Georgia, see EI[1], s.v. Bughā occupied all of Armenia systematically, beginning in the south with Taron, reaching the basins of the Araxes and the Kur Rivers, and going as far as Albania in the east and Georgia in the west (below, 1415; p. 122); Laurent, L'Arménie, 118–19.

377. 'Abdallāh b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm was apparently son of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, the Ṭāhirid, but he does not appear in Zambaur, Manuel, 197, 198, or in other references to the Ṭāhirids.

378. For the Ṭāhirid Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, d. 253 (867–68), see EI[1], s.v. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh; Zambaur, Manuel, 20, 25, 197, 198. See also Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Their Culture," 46, 68; idem, "The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffarids," 102, 103.

379. The judge Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā b. Aktham was active under al-Ma'mūn and al-Mutawakkil; d. 242. See Bosworh, Reunification, Index, 281; Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, Index, 219; Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, XIV, 191–204; Ibn al-Abbār, I'tāb, 97, 157; Massignon, "Cadis et naqībs," 107; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 238–39. Yaḥyā b.

was in Baghdad, and was sent to Sāmarrā and made chief judge. He was then appointed also over the maẓālim courts. Al-Mutawakkil removed Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād from the maẓālim courts of Sāmarrā on 19 Ṣafar this year (August 22, 851).

In this year, al-Mutawakkil became angry with Ibn Abī Du'ād and ordered that his estates be put in trust on 24 Ṣafar (August 27, 851). His son Abū al-Walīd Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād was imprisoned on Saturday, 3 Rabīʿ I (September 4, 851), in the [1411] Bureau of Taxation; and his brothers were imprisoned in the custody of 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī,[380] deputy chief of security police. On Monday (4 Rabīʿ [September 6]), Abū al-Walīd delivered 120,000 dīnārs and jewels valued at 20,000 dīnārs. A settlement was made thereafter in the amount of sixteen million dirhams. The sale of all their estates was witnessed. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād had been paralyzed. On Wednesday, 4 Shaʿbān (January 31, 852), al-Mutawakkil ordered that the children of Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād be remanded to Baghdad.

Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah recited:[381]

If your judgment were sound,
Your decision apposite,

Jurisprudence, were you content, would have diverted you
From professing that God's Word is created.

How can you do this when the root of religion creates consensus,
And ignorance and foolishness make one follow a branch.

Aktham was a fervent proponent of Sunnism and enemy of Muʿtazilism, and his appointment was clearly related to the deposition of the pro-Muʿtazilite Ibn Abī Du'ād, which is reported immediately below. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 315–16, 319–29, records that Ibn Ḥanbal recommended Yaḥyā to the caliph. Indeed, in this year al-Mutawakkil invited Ibn Ḥanbal to visit Sāmarrā; see Tarjamat al-Imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, in Musnad, ed. Shākir, 110ff.

380. For 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Sarī, see Ṭabarī, III, 1086–87 (Bosworth, Reunification, 159–60, and Index, 280). He was chief of police and then governor of Egypt (820, 822). See also Zambaur, Manuel, 27. And see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 75; 255, n. 578.

381. See Abū al-ʿAtāhiyah, Dīwān, 354.

Al-Khalanjī was displayed in public in Jumādā II (November 30–December 28, 851).[382]

In this year, Ibn Aktham appointed Ḥayyān b. Bishr[383] over the judiciary of the East Side [of Baghdad], and he appointed Sawwār b. 'Abdallāh al-'Anbarī[384] over the West Side. Both of them were blind in one eye.

[1412] Al-Jammāz recited:[385]

I have seen among grave offenses two judges,
Who are the gossip of East and West.

They divided blindness into two equal halves,
As they divided the judgeship of the two sides [of Baghdad].

You would think the one of them who nods his head
To look into inheritances and debts

Were like someone upon whom you placed a wine jug[386]
Whose bung you opened for a single eye.

They augur the demise of Yaḥyā
If he begins his judgeship with two one-eyed men.

In this year, on the Day of Breaking the Fast, al-Mutawakkil 382. On al-Khalanjī, see also Ṭabarī, III, 1639 (Saliba, 104), 1641 (106), 1684 (143). For uqīma li-l-nās, see Glossarium, CDXXXIX.

383. Ḥayyān b. Bishr b. al-Mukhāriq, d. 237 (851–52) or 238 (852–53), had been a judge in Iṣbahān at the time of al-Ma'mūn. See Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, VIII, 284–86; Massignon, "Cadis et naqībs," 108. The Khaṭīb cites (p. 285) our passage ('Alī b. al-Muḥassin [al-Tanūkhī]—[Abū al-Qāsim] Ṭalḥah b. Muḥammad b. Ja'far—Muḥammad b. Jarīr al-Ṭabarī]. The following poem is said to have been recited by 'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥammad al-Kātib, and it is ascribed to Di'bil (b. 'Alī al-Khuzā'ī) rather than to al-Jammāz, as in our text. See also Tanūkhī, Nishwār, VI, 101–02.

384. Sawwār b. 'Abdallāh al-'Anbarī; d. 245 (below, 1440 [p. 157]); Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 210; Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, IX, 210–12 Guidi, Tables, 393.

385. On Muḥammad b. 'Amr al-Jammāz, see Guidi, Tables, 272; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 18–19; Ibn al-Mu'tazz, Ṭabaqāt al-shu'arā', 99, 373–75; Sezgin, GAS, II, 508. He died by 255 (868–69).

386. The word dann means wine jug, or jar; but as the qalansuwa ṭawīlah, the conical Persian hat, was also called danniyyah because of its resemblance to a dann, there may also be an allusion here to the headgear of the judges. We are led to picture an inverted jar (or hat) pulled over the eyes, having one eye opening.

ordered that the corpse of Aḥmad b. Naṣr b. Malik al-Khuzā'ī be taken down and turned over to his friends.

What Was Done with Aḥmad b. Naṣr and the Result of This

Al-Mutawakkil reportedly ordered that Aḥmad b. Naṣr's corpse be turned over to his friends for burial, and this was done. When al-Mutawakkil had become caliph, he prohibited debate concerning the Qur'ān and so on, and sent letters about this to distant regions.[387] When he was considering the removal of Aḥmad b. [1413]
Naṣr from his gallows, the mob and riffraff assembled at the site, where they grew in number and talked [boldly] among themselves. When al-Mutawakkil heard about this, he sent Naṣr b. al-Layth to them. Naṣr seized about 20,000 of them, and flogged and imprisoned them. Al-Mutawakkil gave up the idea of removing Aḥmad b. Naṣr from his gallows when he learned of the growing involvement of the populace in his cause. Those who were seized on Aḥmad b. Naṣr's account remained in prison for some time, after which they were released.

When Ibn Naṣr's body was turned over to his friends at the time that I have mentioned, his nephew Mūsā brought it to Baghdad. It was washed and buried, and the head was brought together with the body. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥamzah brought his body in an Egyptian cloth[388] to his own residence, covered it in a shroud, and offered a funeral prayer. A merchant called al-Abzārī,[389] along with some members of Aḥmad b. Naṣr's family, undertook its burial.

The postmaster in Baghdad, who was named Ibn al-Kalbī, wrote from a place in the region of Wāsiṭ called al-Kaltāniyyah[390] to al-

387. This is Ṭabarī's only reference to al-Mutawakkil's anti-Mu'tazilite policy, and it is introduced en passant in connection with the report that the caliph gave a decent burial to the anti-Mu'tazilite, pro-Ḥanbalī rebel, Aḥmad b. Naṣr.

388. See Rosenthal, Four Essays, 74, who observes that Egyptian mandīls were popular in 'Abbāsid Iraq.

389. The word abzār (or ibzār < Pers. afzār) means "food seasoning." Thus, an abzārī is a "seller of food seasoning." It was also the man's family name, as he is called Ibn al-Abzārī below.

390. So Leiden text. Leiden Mss. and Cairo edition: al-Kalbāniyyah; see Addenda, DCCLXXV; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 299 (al-Kaltāniyyah); Minorsky, History, 181.

Mutawakkil concerning the populace and how they had gathered, and their wiping the funeral bier, that is, the bier of Aḥmad b. Naṣr, and the wood where his head had been.[391] Al-Mutawakkil then asked Yaḥyā b. Aktham how Ibn al-Abzārī had been admitted to the grave despite the great number[392] of the Khuzā'ah. He replied, "Commander of the Faithful, he was Aḥmad's friend."

Al-Mutawakkil ordered that a letter be sent to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir restraining the populace from assembling and agitating in this manner. Some(one) among them had nominated [1414] his son to alarm the populace at the time of Aḥmad's death. Al-Mutawakkil consequently sent a dispatch prohibiting public assembly.

'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī led the summer campaign this year.[393]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was 'Alī b. 'Īsā b. Ja'far b. Abī Ja'far al-Manṣūr. He was governor of Mecca.[394]

---

391. Text: wa-mijassat ra'sihi. Cairo edition: bi-khashabat ra'sihi, which is followed here.

392. Text: kibrah. Cairo ed. vocalizes kubrah and cites variant (Ms. A) kathrah, which is accepted here. On the Khuzā'ah in early Islam, see the detailed article in *EI*², s.v. Aḥmad b. Naṣr was, of course, from this tribe.

393. 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī ("the Armenian") engaged in several campaigns against the Byzantines. He was finally killed in battle in 249 (863–64); Ṭabarī, III, 1509 (Saliba 9–10). He had been governor of Egypt in 226 (840–41) and again in 234 (848–49); see Kindī, Wulāh, 195, 197; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 245, 246, 248, 257, 274, 278). 'Alī b. Yaḥyā was governor of Ādharbayjān and of Armenia, with his residence in Dabīl in 248 (862–63); Zambaur, Manuel, 27, 177, 178. See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 201, according to whom he built Sīsiyyah, the administrative center of 'Ayn Zarbah.

394. 'Alī b. 'Īsā was a Hāshimite, a great-grandson of the caliph al-Manṣūr; see Zambaur, Manuel, 20.

The Events of the Year

238

(JUNE 23, 852–JUNE 11, 853)

One of the events was Bughā's defeat of Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl, mawlā of the Umayyads, in Tiflis and Bughā's burning the town.[395]

Bughā's Role in the Defeat of Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl

It is reported that when Bughā went to Dabīl because of the murder of Yūsuf b. Muḥammad by the inhabitants of Armenia, he stayed 395. Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl, mawlā of the Umayyads, namely, of the caliph Marwān b. Muḥammad, was said to have been of Qurayshite descent. He governed Armenia from its capital, Tiflis. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 598, tells that, when Isḥāq once refused to answer Bughā the Elder's summons, the latter attacked him. ʿArīb, Ṭabarī continuatus, 153, refers to a Risālah on the killing of Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl. Ibn Khurrādadhbih, Masālik, 63, reports that when he passed through Armenia, bearing a letter of commendation from al-Wāthiq, Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl was the ruler there. Bughā's campaign against Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl is actually a continuation of the campaign of 237 (851–52) described above, pp. 1408–10 (pp. 113–16). The reason for the break in narrative is simply the annalistic form of Ṭabarī's History. Isḥāq was an energetic ruler, who had subdued the Abasges, Georgians, and Khazars and defeated a Byzantine army in 837 near Kars, as well as two other armies in 842. See Laurent, L'Arménie, 320–21; and Grousset, Histoire, 359ff. And see Minorsky, History, 25, where it is stated that the revolt of Isḥāq lasted thirty-five years before he was finally executed.

there for a month. On Saturday, 10 Rabī' I, 238 (August 30, 852), Bughā sent Zīrak the Turk, who crossed the Kur [River]. It is a large waterway, the size of the Ṣarāt [Canal] in Baghdad, even larger, and it is between the town [of Dabīl] and Tiflis on the west side and Ṣughdbīl on the east side. The camp of Bughā was on the east side [of the river]. Zīrak crossed the Kur to the Hippodrome (maydān) of Tiflis. Tiflis had five gates: the Hippodrome Gate, the Qarīs Gate, the Small Gate, the Suburb Gate, and the Ṣughdbīl Gate. The Kur is a river that flows down along the town.

[1415] Bughā also sent Abū al-'Abbās al-Wāthī al-Naṣrānī[396] against the inhabitants of Armenia, Arab and non-Arab alike. Zīrak assaulted them near the Hippodrome [Gate],[397] and Abū al-'Abbās, near the Suburb Gate. Isḥāq b. Ismā'īl went out to [confront] Zīrak and engaged him in battle, while Bughā stood on a hill overlooking the town near the Ṣughdbīl [Gate] to see what Zīrak and Abū al-'Abbās were doing. Bughā sent fire hurlers (naffāṭīn), who bombarded the town with fire. The [buildings in the] town [were made] of pine wood, and the wind fanned the flames, which ignited the pine.

When Isḥāq b. Ismā'īl came to the town to observe [what was happening], he noticed that the fire, which had engulfed his palace and surrounding area,[398] had trapped him. Then the Turks and Maghāribah attacked him, took him captive, seized his son 'Amr, and brought them to Bughā. Bughā ordered that Isḥāq be remanded to the Gate of Thorns, where he was decapitated. His head was brought to Bughā, and his body was suspended on a cross at the Kur [River].[399]

---

396. Text follows Ms. C. O: al-Wāritī; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: al-Wārithī. The note in the Leiden edition suggests either al-Wānandī (Armenean Vanant) or al-Qārithī (Garouts = Kars). Cairo edition Ms. A: al-Wādī. On p. 1416, his name is said to be Sunbāṭ (Smbat) b. Ashūṭ.

397. It appears that the word bāb must be supplied or understood here and immediately below.

398. Text: Wa-jawārīhi ("and his female slaves"). The combination of palace and female slaves—or place where they were—is possible but rather odd. Read: wa-jiwārīhi.

399. The History of Sharvān and al-Bāb, tr. Minorsky, History, 25, says that Isḥāq was suspended at the gate of Ṣughd in Tiflis. His head, according to Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, I, 136, was sent to the caliph in Sāmarrā. See also Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 598. In Georgian (according to Minorsky) the name is Sagodebeli, meaning "place of lamentations." See above, 1414, where a Ṣugdhbīl Gate is mentioned.

Isḥāq b. Ismāʿīl was a stocky old man[400] and had a large head. He was tattooed with blue (indigo) markings, and was ruddy, bald, and cross-eyed. His head was raised over the Gate of Thorns. Barghāmush,[401] deputy of Bughā, supervised his execution. About 50,000 men were burned in the city. The fire burnt itself out in a day and a night,[402] for it was a pine-wood fire that does not last. The Maghāribah arrived in the morning. They took the living captive and plundered the dead. [1416]

The wife of Isḥāq lived in Ṣughdbīl. It is opposite Tiflis, on the east side, and is a town that Kisrā Anūshirwān built.[403] Isḥāq had fortified it, dug its defensive trench, and manned it with Khuwaythiyyah warriors and others. Bughā gave them a guarantee of safe-conduct, stipulating that they lay down their arms and go where they wished. The wife of Isḥāq was the daughter of the Lord of the Throne (Ṣāḥib al-Sarīr).[404]

Then Bughā reportedly sent Zīrak to the fortress of Jardmān,[405] which is between Bardhaʿah[406] and Tiflis, along with a contingent of his troops. Zīrak conquered Jardmān and took captive its Patrikios, al-Qitrīj,[407] on the Jardmān Road, and brought him to the army camp.

---

400. For shaykh maḥdūr, see Glossarium, CLXXXV.

401. Text: Ghāmish. The note ad loc. suggests Barghāmush (unpointed); see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 262 = Wiet, Les pays, 54.

402. Ms. O has on Wednesday through the night.

403. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 396, describes Ṣughdbīl as a town on the east of the Kur River opposite Tiflis, and says that it was built by Kisrā Anūshirwān near the place where he founded Bāb al-Abwāb (Darband). Yāqūt also relates the account of Bughā's attack on Tiflis, his burning the city and killing Isḥāq. And he notes that Isḥāq had married the daughter of Ṣāḥib al-Sarīr. His report is presumably derived from Ṭabarī.

404. He is also called Wahrazān-Shāh. The district of Sarīr is named after him, in the middle of the Ḳoy-Su valley in southern Dāghistān; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳabḳ. See also Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 447; and see especially the account in the History of Sharvān and the Bāb, tr. Minorsky, History, 97, 155.

405. For the fortress of Jardmān or Gardmān, see Vardan, Universal History, tr. Muyldermans, 123, n. 5. Ms. C: al-Khazarmān; ʿAynī and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil: al-Ḥarazmān.

406. Bardhaʿah (Armenian Partav and modern Barda) was the former capital of Arrān, 28 km. from the Kur river; *EI*², s.v. Arrān, the present-day Soviet republic of Azarbayjan, is ancient Caucasian Albania; *EI*², s.v.

407. He is Ktričn, prince of Gardmān; Vardan, Universal History, tr. Muyldermans, 123, n. 5.

Bughā then attacked 'Īsā b. Yūsuf, the nephew of Stephanos.[408] He was in the fortress of Xtiš, belonging to the subdistrict of al-Baylaqān.[409] Xtiš is ten *farsakh*s (sixty km.) from al-Baylaqān and fifteen *farsakh*s (ninety km.) from Bardha'ah. Bughā made war against him and conquered [his fortress]. He seized 'Īsā b. Yūsuf and deported him along with his son and father. He deported Abū al-'Abbās al-Wāthī—his name was Sunbāṭ (Smbat) b. Ashūṭ—and along with him, Mu'āwiyah b. Sahl b. Sunbāṭ (Smbat),[410] Patrikios of Arrān, and Adharnarsē b. Isḥāq al-Khāshinī.[411]

[1417] In this year, 300 Byzantine vessels came, bringing Ooryphas, Nikētiatēs (?) and Martinakios (?).[412] They were naval commanders. Each of them commanded one hundred vessels.[413] Nikētiatēs besieged Damietta.[414] Between Damietta and the coast is a

---

408. See Ṭabarī, III, 1224, 1228 (Marin, Reign, 48, 51), where he is called 'Īsā b. Yūsuf b. Iṣṭifānūs. Read perhaps: b. ukht Iṣṭifānūs. On p. 1232 (Marin, 56), 'Īsā b. Yūsuf is said to be the nephew of Stephanos by the latter's sister. In the History of Sharvān and the Bāb, he is called Abū Mūsā; see Minorsky, History, 165; and "Caucasia IV," 512ff. He began to reign in 841, after the defeat of Bābak, and ruled for another thirteen years.

409. For the fortress Xtiš, Arabic Kithīsh, see Minorsky, History, 165, n. 4. For Baylaqān, the town and district of Arrān, south of the Caucasus, see idem, "Caucasia IV," 513; *EI*², s.v. Minorsky places the fortress, according to its location given here, in present-day Shusha (Shushi).

410. Mu'āwiyah's father, Sahl b. Sunbāṭ, had succeeded in dominating Arrān. See Ṭabarī, III, 1232 (Marin, Reign, 55), where Sahl sends Mu'āwiyah with Bābak to Afshīn. On Sahl b. Sunbāt, see Minorsky, "Caucasia IV," 506ff. Minorsky contends (p. 510), on the basis of Armenian sources, that it was rather Sahl b. Sunbāṭ who was deported, along with Armenian princes, and that his name was mistakenly replaced by that of his son.

411. On Adharnarsē (Adarnasē), see Minorsky, "Caucasia IV," 510, 514. The toponymic nisbah Khāshinī is from Khachen. See note in Leiden edition and Vardan, Universal History, tr. Muyldermans, 123; Minorsky, "Caucasia IV," 514, 526.

412. For the reading Ooryphas, see note on the text, and Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 214, n. 3. The second name is written clearly as Ibn Qaṭūnā. Vasiliev (apud Grégoire) proposes that it represents Greek Nikētiatēs (Ib[n] Nqaṭūnā), i.e. Sergios ho Nikētiatēs, who had commanded an expedition to Crete. Two other possibilities mentioned are Photinos (E. W. Brooks) and Kontomutēs. The third name, it is said (here and 315, n. 1), may be either Bardas (W-r-d) or Martinakios. See Grégoire, "Études," 516–17. And see Christides, Conquest, 164, n. 53; 165, n. 54. Christides rejects Grégoire's identification of Nikētiatēs and regards the others as mere guesswork.

413. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 596, says that there were eighty-five vessels.

414. Damietta is a well-known town in Lower Egypt, situated near the egress of the Nile. Its location exposed it to periodic naval raids. (Following the attack kind of lake in which water reaches the chest of a man.[415] Whoever crosses it to the land is safe from sea vessels. A group of people crossed it to safety, but many of the women and children drowned. Those who were able to take ships escaped [by going] to Fusṭāṭ. Fusṭāṭ is a four-day journey from Damietta.

ʿAnbasah b. Isḥāq al-Ḍabbī[416] was the chief of the security police (maʿūnah) of Egypt. When the festival approached, he ordered the troops that were in Damietta to come to Fusṭāṭ to help celebrate it. Thus, Damietta was vacated of troops. The vessels of the Byzantines arrived from the direction of Shaṭā, where shaṭawī [cloth] is manufactured.[417] One hundred shalandiyah vessels[418] besieged Damietta, each carrying between fifty and one hundred men. The Byzantines attacked Damietta and burned whatever of its houses and reed huts they reached. They carted away the weapons there that the [Muslims] intended to ship to Abū Ḥafṣ, ruler of Crete—about 1,000 lances along with their equip-described here, al-Mutawakkil constructed a fortress in Damietta as part of an overall strategy to fortify the coastal area.) The Byzantine attack on Damietta was an offshoot of the struggle between the Muslims and Byzantines for control of Crete. The Byzantines, led by the Logothete Theoktistos, had attacked that island, then ruled by Andalusian Muslims, and occupied it temporarily. See Christides, Conquest, 172. As the Muslims in Crete received their arms from Egypt, the Byzantine fleet besieged Damietta in order to capture arms there destined for Crete. The purpose of the invasion may have been also to relieve pressure on Sicily. See Maspéro-Wiet, Matériaux, 35, 92–93 et passim. And see Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 212ff., 315ff.; Bury, History, 292ff.; Grégoire, "Études"; Levi Della Vida, "A Papyrus Reference." And see accounts in Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 596–97; Kindī, Wulāh, 201; and Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, IV, 40; Christides, op. cit., 164–65; *EI*², s.v. Dimyāṭ.

---

415. Between Damietta and the coast is the northern part of Lake Manzala, where there are sandbars, inlets, and shallow water.

416. ʿAnbasah b. Isḥāq al-Ḍabbī was governor of Egypt as of 237 (851–52) or 238 (852–53); Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 596—237; Kindī, Wulāh, 200–02; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 293 (sub anno 238); Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, V, 139; Zambaur, Manuel, 27. According to some of these sources he was accused of tyranny and ineffective strategy against the enemies of the Muslims. ʿAnbasah had also been sent to govern Sind by Ītākh, according to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 585. It is possible that the Byzantine attack was timed with ʿAnbasah's absence from Damietta, as he and his garrison had left for Cairo; see Christides. Conquest, 164 (citing J. Shayyāl, al-Mujmal fī taʾrīkh Dimyāṭ [Alexandria, 1949], 10).

417. Shaṭā, a few miles from Damietta on the western side of Lake Manzalah, was famous for its fine shaṭawī cloth, mentioned here.

418. Shalandiyah vessels, also called Sharandī and Sharandiyah (<Greek chelandion) were often used by the Byzantines as warships, particularly troop carriers, as in our text; see Kindermann, "Schiff," 51 (where our text is cited).

[1418] ment.[419] They killed whomever of the men they could, and took furnishings, candy (qand)[420] and flax, which had been loaded for transport to Iraq. They took captive about 600 Muslim and Copt women. There were said to be 125 Muslim women, the rest being Copts.[421]

There were reportedly about 5,000 Byzantines in the shalandiyah vessels that besieged Damietta. They loaded their ships with furniture, property, and women, and burned the storehouse containing the sails—they are ship sails[422]—and set fire to the Friday Mosque and churches in Damietta. The women and children, who tried to escape and were thought to have drowned[423] in the lake of Damietta, outnumbered those whom the Byzantines took captive. The Byzantines thereafter withdrew from Damietta.

It is reported that Ibn al-Akshaf, who had been incarcerated in the prison of Damietta by 'Anbasah, broke his bonds and went out to fight the Byzantines. A group of men helped him, and he killed a number of the Byzantines.

Following that, the Byzantines proceeded to Ushtūm [near] Tinnīs.[424] As they could not manage to sail [as far as Tinnīs], and were afraid of running aground, they proceeded to Ushtūm. It is an anchorage four *farsakh*s (twenty-four km.), or somewhat less, from Tinnīs. Ushtūm has a wall with two iron gates, which al-

---

419. During the caliphate of al-Ma'mūn, Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar b. 'Īsā al-Andalusī raided Crete, gradually conquering its fortified places and expelling the Byzantines, and then setting up an "independent emirate" that recognized 'Abbāsid authority; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 279; Zambaur, Manuel, 70; EI[2], s.v. Iḳrītish; Christides, Conquest, 85ff. et passim. On the Muslim arsenals and shipyards in Damietta, see ibid., 164, citing A. M. Fahmy, Muslim Sea-Power in the Eastern Mediterranean (London, 1950), 30ff.; M. Abbady and E. A. Salem, Ta'rīkh al-baḥriyyah al-Islāmiyyah fī Miṣr wa-l-Shām (Beirut, 1972), 46ff.

420. Qand is from Persian qandī ("sugar, sugar candy"), which is related to English "candy" < French (sucre) candi < Italian (zucchero) candito.

421. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 597, says that the Byzantines took captive 1,820 Muslim women, 1,000 Copt women, and 100 Jewish women, as well as weapons. Christides, Conquest, 165, prefers Ṭabarī's count, as the Christian population in Damietta was greater than that of the Muslims.

422. The statement "they are ship sails" is apparently a gloss on the word qulū', which may be a plural of qal'ah = "fortress" but here is rather a plural of qil' = "sail"; Glossarium, CDXXXII. On shipyards in Damietta, see above, n. 419.

423. Text: wa-kāna man ḥadhira minhum. Cairo edition (Ms. A): huẓira.

424. Ushtūm is a fortified town situated between Tinnīs and Faramā on a branch of the Nile; Maspéro and Wiet, Matériaux, 17.

Muʿtaṣim had ordered to have built. The Byzantines destroyed all of it, burned the town with mangonels and ballistas, and carted away its two iron gates. They then headed for their own territory without any interference.

In this year, on Monday, 5 Jumādā II (November 22, 852), al- [1419]
Mutawakkil left Sāmarrā, heading for al-Madāʾin. He arrived at al-Shammāsiyyah[425] on Tuesday, 13 Jumādā II (November 30, 852), and stayed there until Saturday. He crossed in the evening to Quṭrabbul[426] and then returned, entering Baghdad on Monday, 18 Jumādā (December 5, 852). He went through its bazaars and thoroughfares and then halted at al-Zaʿfarāniyyah, thereafter going on to al-Madāʾin.[427] ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī led the summer expedition.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar.

---

425. Al-Shammāsiyyah is the well-known quarter in northeast Baghdad; Le Strange, Baghdad, 169–76, 199–216.

426. Quṭrabbul is a district northwest of the Round City, opposite the Shammāsiyyah Quarter. Al-Mutawakkil thus crossed the Tigris from east to west.

427. Al-Zaʿfarāniyyah is a village near Baghdad below Kalwādhā; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 931. Herzfeld, Samarra, 201, identifies it with modern Zimberāniyyah. Al-Madāʾin was the famous city, founded on the site of Ctesiphon and adjacent towns, along the Tigris, about 32 km. to the southeast of Baghdad; *EI*², s.v.

The Events of the Year

239

(JUNE 12, 853–JUNE 1, 854)

In al-Muḥarram (June 12–July 11, 853) this year al-Mutawakkil ordered that the Dhimmīs affix two yellow sleeves to their outer cloaks.[428] Then in Ṣafar (July 12–August 9) he ordered that they restrict their mounts to mules and donkeys and avoid riding and pack horses.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil banished ʿAlī b. al-Jahm b. Badr to Khurāsān.[429]

In this year, the ruler of the Ṣanāriyyah was killed at the Public Gate in Jumādā II (November 7–December 6).[430]

---

428. This regulation follows the above edicts (p. 1389, p. 89) by about four years. The word dhirāʿayn, sg. dhirāʿ, means "forearm," "cubit," but also "sleeve," as is appropriate here; Lane, Lexicon, 962; Ahsan, Social Life, 62.

429. Ṭabarī typically does not give a reason for the dismissal. ʿAlī b. al-Jahm was a strong supporter of Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal and the Sunnite camp, and thus, he was welcomed as a court companion of al-Mutawakkil, but his loose tongue and the envy of rivals landed him in trouble and led to his imprisonment and banishment; *EI*², s.v.

430. The Ṣanāriyah (Armenian Tsanar-kʿ; Georgian Tsʿanar) were Christians of a martial bent who lived in the central Caucasus area north of Georgia; Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 400–02; idem, History, 162, and Index, 183; "Caucasia IV,", 506. According to Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 598, Bughā was defeated by them.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil ordered that churches and synagogues newly built under Islam be destroyed.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah (May 3–June 1, 854) this year Abū al-Walīd Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād died in Baghdad. [1420]

In this year, ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī led the summer expedition.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī. He was the governor of Mecca.

In this year, Jaʿfar b. Dīnār went on the pilgrimage. He was the supervisor of the Mecca Road near al-Kūfah, and he was appointed over the events of the festive season.

In this year, Palm Sunday of the Christians and the Day of Nayrūz coincided on Sunday, 20 Dhū al-Qaʿdah (April 22, 854). The Christians reportedly claimed that these two days would never coincide under Islam.[431]

---

431. See below, n. 508.

The Events of the Year 240

(JUNE 2, 854–21 MAY 21, 855)

One of the events was the revolt of the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ against their chief of security police (maʿūnah).

The Cause for the Revolt of the Inhabitants of Ḥimṣ and Its Result

It is reported that their chief of security police (maʿūnah) killed a man who was one of their leaders. The chief at the time was Abū al-Mughīth al-Rāfiʿī Mūsā b. Ibrāhīm.[432] As a result, the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ revolted in Jumādā II (October 28–November 25) of [1421] this year and killed a number of his men. They then expelled him along with the tax supervisor from their town. When al-Mutawakkil heard this, he sent against them ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb, dispatching with him Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh Kirdās al-Anbārī.[433] The

---

432. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 599, describing this revolt, calls Abū al-Mughīth the ʿāmil (governor or fiscal administrator) of Ḥimṣ. See also Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 249ff., 301.

433. ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb al-Qāʾid appears in Ṭabarī, III, 1822, as a commander of the Shākiriyyah and is identified (p. 1826) as a Khurāsānian commander. See also caliph ordered ʿAttāb to tell them that the Commander of the Faithful had replaced al-Mughīth by Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh and that, if they obeyed and acquiesced, then the latter would be appointed over them. But if they refused and persisted in opposition, then [al-Mutawakkil ordered ʿAttāb], "Stay put, and write to the Commander of the Faithful to send you Rajāʾ or Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ al-Ḥiḍārī or some other cavalryman to wage war against them."[434]

ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb left Sāmarrā on Monday, 24 Jumādā II (November 20, 854).[435] They acquiesced to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh, whereupon al-Mutawakkil appointed him over them, and he accomplished wonders with them.

In al-Muḥarram (June 2–July 1) of this year, Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād died in Baghdad after his son Abū al-Walīd Muḥammad, his son having died there twenty days before him, in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (May 3–June 1, 854).

In this year al-Mutawakkil removed Yaḥyā b. Aktham from the office of judge in Ṣafar (July 2–30, 854).[436] He confiscated from him what he had in Baghdad, in the amount of 75,000 dīnārs.[437] He took 1,000 dīnārs from Yaḥyā's columned arcade in his palace, and he also seized 4,000 jarībs[438] of land in al-Baṣrah.

Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 594 (where he appears as one of the commanders sent against Muḥammad b. al-Baʿīth); Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 291 (in charge of the dīwān [al-]jaysh [wa]-l-shākiriyyah); and Tanūkhī, Faraj, 89–90. As for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh (b. Jabalah), see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 599. Yaʿqūbī mentions him earlier (p. 586) in connection with revolts in Damascus and Palestine.

434. Rajāʾ b. Ayyūb al-Ḥiḍārī, father of Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ al-Ḥiḍārī, had been an army commander at the time of al-Muʿtaṣim; Ṭabarī, III, 1194 (Marin, Reign, 27), and III, 1320 (Marin, 125). He was governor of Damascus in 226 (840–41); Zambaur, Manuel, 28. His son, Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ al-Ḥiḍārī (Leiden edition, Ms. O: al-Ḥiṣārī), was also an army commander. He led the rear guard of Waṣīf against the Byzantines in 248 (862–63). In 252 (866–67) he appears along with "Baghdadian commanders," including ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb. In 254 (868) he was governor of al-Baṣrah (Ṭabarī, III, 1745); Zambaur, Manuel, 41, gives 255 (868–69).

435. Ms. C: Rabīʿ.

436. As usual, Ṭabarī does not give a reason for the dismissal. See Ṭabarī, III, 1139 (Bosworth, Reunification, 230), on the "infamous conduct" of Ibn Aktham; and Marzubānī, Muʿjam, 431, for a poem on the same. He was renowned for his licentious behavior and pederasty.

437. Ms. O: twenty-five thousand; ʿAynī: eighty thousand.

438. A jarīb = 1592 sq.m., according to Hinz, Masse und Gewichte, 65.

In Ṣafar (July 2–30, 854) of this year, al-Mutawakkil appointed Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī as chief of the judiciary.

[1422] Leading the pilgrimage this year was 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd. Ja'far b. Dīnār went on the pilgrimage and was in charge of the events of the festive season.

The Events of the Year

241

(MAY 22, 855–MAY 9, 856)

Among them was the revolt of the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ against their chief of security police, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh.[439]

The Role of the Inhabitants of Ḥimṣ in the Revolt against Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh and Its Consequence for Them

It is reported that the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ revolted in Jumādā II (October 17–November 14, 855) of this year against Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh, their chief of security police, with some of the Christians of Ḥimṣ supporting their revolt. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh sent a dispatch about this to al-Mutawakkil.

Al-Mutawakkil then wrote ordering Muḥammad to resist them, and reinforced him with troops from the garrison[440] of 439. The population of Ḥimṣ was frequently restive from the time of Hārūn al-Rashīd. This was the second year in succession that they rebelled. The uprising this time included elements of the Christian population. The inhabitants of Ḥimṣ repeated in 250 (864–65); Ṭabarī, III, 1533 (Saliba, 27).

440. For rātibah, see Glossarium, CCLVIII.

Damascus, along with Ṣāliḥ al-'Abbāsī the Turk, who was governor there, and troops from al-Ramlah. Al-Mutawakkil ordered Muḥammad b. 'Abdawayh to seize three of their chiefs and flog them to death. And when they died, he was to suspend them on crosses at the doors [of their residences] and thereafter to take twenty of their notables and flog each of them thirty times and bring them in iron fetters to the gate of the Commander of the Faithful.

[The caliph also ordered Muḥammad to] destroy the churches and places of worship in Ḥimṣ, to join the house of worship[441] that was adjoined to the mosque of Ḥimṣ to it, to expel every single Christian from the city, and to make a prior announcement
[1423] among them to the effect that whoever he found there after three days would be severely chastised.[442]

Al-Mutawakkil ordered that Muḥammad b. 'Abdawayh be given 50,000 dirhams, and that his officers and eminent companions be given gifts. And he ordered that his deputy, 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, be given 15,000 dirhams and his officers 5,000 dirhams each. The caliph also ordered that robes of honor be presented [to them].

Muḥammad b. 'Abdawayh seized ten people from Ḥimṣ, and wrote that he had seized them, and that he had deported them to the palace of the Commander of the Faithful, but he did not flog them.[443] Al-Mutawakkil sent one of the associates of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān by the name of Muḥammad b. Rizqallāh to restore to Ḥimṣ those whom Ibn 'Abdawayh had deported—Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Ḥaydī and al-Qāsim b. Mūsā b. Fū'ūs[444]—and to flog them to death and suspend them on crosses over the gates of the city. Muḥammad b. 'Abdawayh returned them, flogged them to death, and then suspended them over the Ḥimṣ Gate. He had the rest brought to Sāmarrā. There were eight of them. When they

441. The term bī'ah may refer to a synagogue, but here a Christian place of worship is intended.

442. Ms. O: b-l-d-y-h; superscript: adabahu; read: ta'dībahu [note ad loc.].

443. Text: wa-lam yaḍribhum. Ms. O: wa-amara bi-ḍarbihim, "and ordered that they be flogged."

444. The reading Fū'ūs follows Ms. C. Ms. O and 'Aynī: Far'ūsh. Read perhaps Qar'ūsh, or Turkish Qarghūsh [for Qarāqūsh; note ad loc.].

445. Cairo text adds bi-Naṣībīn.

arrived in Naṣībīn, one of them died,[445] whereupon al-Mutawakkil had them take his head, and had the seven others brought to Sāmarrā along with the head of the deceased. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh thereafter wrote that he seized ten of the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ after this and flogged five to death. He then flogged five more, but they did not die.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdawayh wrote afterward that he defeated one [1424] of their rebels by the name of ʿAbd al-Malik b. Isḥāq b. ʿImārah. He was reportedly one of the leaders of the rebellion (fitnah). He flogged him at the Ḥimṣ Gate until he died, and suspended him on a cross above a fortress called Tall al-ʿAbbās.

In this year, people in Sāmarrā reportedly had abundant rain in Āb (August, 855).

In this year, in Muḥarram (May 22–June 21, 855), al-Mutawakkil appointed Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī as judge of the Sharqiyyah [Quarter].[446]

In this year, al-Mutawakkil flogged ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿĀṣim, the proprietor of Khān ʿĀṣim in Baghdad.[447] He was flogged, it is said, 1,000 stripes.

The Reason for Flogging ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. ʿĀṣim and the Caliph's Role in This

The reason for this was that seventeen men testified before Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī, judge of the Sharqiyyah [Quarter], against ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar to the effect that the latter had defamed Abū Bakr, ʿUmar, ʿĀ'ishah, and Ḥafṣah. Their testimonies reportedly differed in this regard.[448]

---

446. Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī, al-Ḥasan b. ʿUthmān, was a traditionist, historian, and judge under al-Mutawakkil. He died, according to Sezgin, GAS, I, 316, in 243 (857–68). But Ṭabarī, III, 1434, says that he died in Rajab, 242 (November 3–December 2, 856; see below, p. 147); see on him, Tanūkhī, Faraj, 159–63; Nishwār, II, 234; VI, 64; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 344; Massignon, "Cadis et naqībs," 108. For location of the Sharqiyyah suburb east of the Baṣrah Gate, see Lassner, Topography, 248, 275.

447. An alternative name given below, 1426 (p. 137), is Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. ʿĀṣim. The Khān ʿĀṣim was a caravanserai in the Market of the Perfumers (Sūq al-Rayḥāniyyīn); Le Strange, Baghdad, 271. See also Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 304.

448. The cursing of Abū Bakr, etc., indicates that ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar was a Shīʿite.

The postmaster of Baghdad wrote about this to 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān, and he transmitted it to al-Mutawakkil. Al-Mutawakkil then gave orders for 'Ubaydallāh to write to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, instructing him to flog this 'Īsā, and [to see to it that] when 'Īsā died he should be tossed into the Tigris, and that his body not be handed over to his folk. 'Ubaydallāh replied to al-Ḥasan b. 'Uthmān's letter to him concerning 'Īsā:[449]

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.

May God give you long life, protect you and extend His [1425] beneficence to you. Your letter has arrived concerning the man named 'Īsā b. Ja'far b. Muḥammad b. 'Āṣim, the proprietor of the caravanserais, and the witnesses' testimony as to his defaming the companions of the Messenger of God, cursing them, declaring them infidels, accusing them of grave sins and ascribing hypocrisy to them, and so on, by which he came out in opposition against God and His Messenger. [And the letter mentioned] your verification of these witnesses and their testimony, your validation of the probity of those who were qualified witnesses and their testimony that was evident to you, and your exposition of this in a note that went along with your letter.

You presented this to the Commander of the Faithful, may God give him power, whereupon he ordered that a letter be sent to Abū al-'Abbās Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, may God give him long life, concerning the ideas of the caliph, may God give him long life, about protecting the religion of God, reviving its tradition, and taking revenge upon those who deviate from it. And he ordered that the man ['Īsā b. Ja'far] be flogged as a fixed punishment (ḥadd)[450] for public defamation and be given 500 stripes beyond the 449. Al-Ḥasan b. 'Uthmān = Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī. He had apparently written a letter that was forwarded by the postmaster, who as chief of Intelligence included an account of his own.

450. The ḥadd punishments are those that are sanctioned in the Qur'ān for crimes committed against God (*EI*², s.v. Ḥadd). Defamation (shatm) is occasionally considered one of them.

fixed punishment for the grave things he dared to undertake. And, if he dies, he should be thrown into the river without a funeral prayer, thus deterring every deviant in religion who abandons the community of Muslims. I have informed you of this so that you shall know it, God—the exalted—willing. Peace upon you and the mercy and blessings of God.

It is reported that after this ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿĀṣim—one informant said that his name was Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. ʿĀṣim[451]—was flogged; he was left in the sun until he died and was then thrown into the Tigris. [1426]

In this year, there was a meteor storm visible in Baghdad. This was on Thursday night, 1 Jumādā II (October 17, 855).[452]

In this year, an epidemic[453] took place, so that horses and cattle perished.

In this year, the Byzantines raided ʿAyn Zarbah and took captive the Zuṭṭ who were there along with their wives, children, buffaloes, and cattle.[454]

In this year, there was a prisoner exchange between the Muslims and Byzantines.[455]

---

451. Ms. O omits this comment, which may, in fact, be an intrusive gloss or a supplementary parenthetical remark. The confusion in Ms. C points in this direction.

452. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 230, mentions the meteor storm immediately after noting the popular belief that after Ibn Ḥanbal's death the world darkened. See also Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 600. Ṭabarī does not mention Ibn Ḥanbal's death. In fact, he generally overlooks Ibn Ḥanbal (see Translator's Foreword). Sensitive to the silence, Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, X, 325, observes that Ṭabarī did not mention the death of any Ḥadīth scholars this year (so as to avoid mentioning the death of Ibn Ḥanbal). Ibn Kathīr then gives a long eulogy of Ibn Ḥanbal.

453. See Glossarium, CCCCXXIII; Lane, s.v. ṣidām.

454. The Zuṭṭ (Zoṭṭ), arabicized form of Jāt (see *EI*², s.v. Djāt), were an Indian people who raised buffaloes. They were brought by Muʿāwiya or al-Walīd to Antioch and the area north of the city; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 192. Many were settled by al-Ḥallāj in the marshes (al-Baṭīḥah) in southern ʿIrāq, where they indulged in robbery and plunder, and eventually revolted in the area of al-Baṣrah from 205–20 (820–35). The caliph al-Muʿtaṣim defeated them and transplanted them (220/835) to ʿAyn Zarbah on the frontier, where they were occasionally raided by the Byzantines; see Ṭabarī, III, 1167–70 (Marin, Reign, 4–8). See also Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 223.

455. On the prisoner exchange of 241 (855–56), see Vasiliev, 222ff.; 317ff.

The Reason for the Prisoner Exchange

It is reported that Theodora, empress of Byzantium, mother of Michael, sent a man named George, son of Cyriac, to request an exchange of Muslims who were in the hands of the Byzantines.[456] The number of Muslims approached 20,000. Al-Mutawakkil sent a Shī'ite by the name of Naṣr b. al-Azhar b. Faraj[457] to determine the exact number of Muslim captives in the hands of the Byzantines, so as to order their exchange. This was in Sha'bān (December 15, 855–January 12, 856) of this year. [Naṣr returned],[458] [1427] having remained with the Byzantines for some time.

It is reported that after Naṣr's departure, Theodora ordered that her prisoners be passed in review, and that conversion to Christianity be proposed to them. Those who converted were to be on an equal footing with those who had done so previously, but those who refused [to convert] were to be killed. She reportedly had 12,000 prisoners killed. Another view is that it was Theoktistos the Eunuch[459] who had them killed, without her having ordered this.[460]

The governors of the frontier towns of Syria and the Jazīrah

---

456. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 599, states that the emperor (ṭāghiyat al-Rūm) initiated the prisoner exchange, sending gifts, and that the caliph reciprocated with twice as many. See also Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 191. The Leiden edition gives the name Cyriac half unpointed. The Cairo edition has Q-r-y-ā-f-s. Vasiliev suggests the reading Qiriyāqus or Karbeas; Byzance, I, 225, 317. Thus, Ṭabarī makes Theodora empress in 241 (855–56), which is compatible with her actual fall in 243 (857–58). Cf., however, above, where he places her fall in 233 (847–48); 1379 (p. 76) and n. 264.

457. Text: Faraj. Ms. O is unpointed. C has Qarkh or the like. Cairo edition, Ms. D, has Farūkh. Naṣr b. al-Azhar was also involved in the prisoner exchange of 246 (860–61) and gives his own personal account; below, 1449 (pp. 168–70).

458. The note in the Leiden edition suggests that some words are lacking, such as fa-kharaja Naṣr. See also Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 317. The Cairo edition does not take this into account. Without the addition, the sentence would read something like: "This was in Sha'bān of this year after he remained with them for some time."

459. Text: Q-n-q-l-h. Ms. O is unpointed. C: F-n-q-l-h. Cairo edition text is like the Leiden text. Ms. A has Q-y-f-l-h. Theoktistos the Eunuch (Kanikleios) is suggested by the note in the Leiden edition, ad loc.; and see Vasiliev, Byzance, 225. The form Nīqōlā in Bar Hebraeus, Chronography, 142, is simply a mistake for Qaniqlā (Vasiliev).

460. Vasiliev regards these reports by Arab choniclers as "fort douteuses" (Byzance, I, 225). On laws for prisoners of war, see E. Gräf, "Religiöse und rechtliche Vorstellungen."

received a letter from al-Mutawakkil stating that negotiations had taken place between Shunayf al-Khādim and George, emissary of the Byzantine emperor, concerning the prisoner exchange, and that an agreement had been reached between them. This George had requested an armistice from 5 Rajab, 241 (November 19, 855), until 22 Shawwāl of this year (March 5, 856), in order to assemble the prisoners and give the Byzantines sufficient time to get to their place of sanctuary. The letter concerning this arrived on Wednesday, 5 Rajab (November 19), and the prisoner exchange took place on the Day of Breaking the Fast this year [1 Shawwāl (February 12, 856)].[461]

George, the emissary of the Byzantine empress, departed for the region of the frontier towns on Saturday, 22 Rajab (December 6, 855) with seventy mules that were leased to him. Abū Qaḥṭabah al-Maghribī al-Ṭurṭūsī[462] went along with him, so that they might observe the time of the Breaking of the Fast.[463] A number of Patrikioi and pages belonging to George came with him, about fifty men.

Shunayf al-Khādim departed for the prisoner exchange in the middle of Sha'bān (ca. 30 December, 855), along with one hundred horsemen, thirty Turks, thirty Maghāribah, and forty Shākiriyyah horsemen. Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid, who was chief judge,[464] requested that he be permitted to attend the prisoner exchange, and [1428] that someone be deputized to take his place. He was given permission, and 150,000 dirhams were allocated for him as a subsidy and 60,000 for service allotments. He deputized Ibn Abī al-

461. The 'Īd al-Fiṭr is celebrated at the conclusion of Ramaḍān.

462. An Abū Qaḥṭabah is said to be the emissary of Khāqān al-Khādim in the prisoner exchange of 231 (845–46); see above, 1352 (p. 38) and n. 135. The toponymic nisbah al-Ṭurṭūsī indicates a provenance from Tortosa, Spain. (Consider also the nisbah al-Maghribī.) But the reading "al-Ṭarsūsī" may also be considered.

463. Text: al-fiṭr. Ms. O al-fidā' = "the prisoner exchange." So Cairo edition (Ms. A).

464. Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Hāshimī al-Qurayshī had been chief judge in Sāmarrā in 240 (854–55); al-Musta'īn later deposed him and exiled him to al-Baṣrah (249–50/863–65). He died in 258 (871–72). See also Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 191; Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, VII, 173; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 11, 152; Yāqūt, Irshād, II, 258–59; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 330–331.

Shawārib,[465] who was then a young man. Jaʿfar departed and met Shunayf. And a group of leading Baghdadians[466] departed.

The exchange of prisoners reportedly took place in Byzantine territory, on the Lamos River, on Sunday, 12 Shawwāl, 241 (February 23, 856). The number of Muslim prisoners was 785 men and 125 women.[467]

In this year, al-Mutawakkil made the subdistrict of Shimshāṭ tithe (ʿushr) land, transferring [its inhabitants] from land tax (kharāj) to a tithe, and he sent them a letter to this effect.[468]

In this year, the Bujah[469] attacked a military guard (ḥaras)[470]

---

465. Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib al-Qāḍī belonged to the family of the Banū al-Shawārib (*EI*², s.v. Ibn Abīʾl-Shawārib), which included Ḥadīth scholars, jurists, and judges. They were strong advocates of Sunnism. Ṭabarī studied Ḥadīth with Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Abī al-Shawārib. Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad became chief judge in 252 (866–67; Ṭabarī, III, 1684, Saliba, 143). Ṭabarī says that he died in Mecca after going on the pilgrimage in 261 (874–75; III, 1891). Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, VII, 410–11, notes that he was deputy chief judge in Sāmarrā as of 240 (854–55); and see Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 27; Massignon, "Cadis et naqibs," 108.

466. In today's Arabic awsāṭ al-nās means "the middle class." Here it means "important people"; see Glossarium, DLVI (optimi); and Dozy, Supplément, II, 801; "les grands."

467. Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 191, says that there were 2,200 men and 100 women.

468. Shimshāṭ is ancient Greek Arsamosata, north of Āmid, on the Arsanas River. Yāqūt, III, Muʿjam, 319, warns the reader to distinguish it from Sumaysāṭ (Samosata). These two toponyms were indeed occasionally confused by scribes. See also Le Strange, Lands, 116–17; and see Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 393, on the confusion between Shimshāṭ and Sumaysāṭ, which is often spelled Shumayshāṭ. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 219, says that al-Mutawakkil transformed the territory of Shimshāṭ from kharāj to tithe land so that the area would be on the same footing as other thughūr. See also Balādhurī, 203, on these thughūr. The ʿushr rate amounted to 1/10 of the produce; the kharāj from 1/5 to 2/3, most often 1/2; see Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation, 72ff.

469. The Bujah, a people of Hamitic origin, were nomadic tribes that lived between the Nile and the Red Sea. They had submitted to Muslim control by treaty, but periodically withheld the annual tribute and mounted raids. See especially Masʿūdī, Murūj, III, 32–34; Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, III, 2, 267–80; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 295ff. Ibn Ḥawqal, Masālik, 53, gives an account of the episode described in our text. See Levtzion and Hopkins, Corpus, 21, 31, 40–41, 44, 184, 199, where classical sources concerning the Bujah and related groups are cited. See also *EI*², s.v. Beḏja; Hasan, The Arabs and the Sudan, Index, 281. Abū al-Maḥāsin places the blame for the Bujah's effrontery at this time upon the weak governorship of ʿAnbasah b. Isḥāq al-Ḍabbī.

470. For ḥaras, see Glossarium, CLXXXIX.

from Egypt, and al-Mutawakkil dispatched Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qummī[471] to wage war against them.

The Affair of the Bujah and Its Consequences

It is reported that the Bujah did not raid the Muslims, nor did the Muslims raid them because of the long-standing armistice between them, which we have mentioned previously in our book.[472] They are of the stock of the Ḥabash (Abyssinians), in the West. Among the black peoples (sūdān) in the West are the Bujah, the Nūbah, and the people of Ghānah, al-Ghaf-r, ?-y-n-w-r, R-ʿ-wīn, F-r-ww-iyah, B-k-sūm, M-kār-h, ʾ-k-r-m and al-Khams.[473] 1429]
There are gold mines in the territory of the Bujah. They bind by oath those who work in them. The Bujah deliver annually from their mines to the agents of the Egyptian government 400 *mithqāl*s[474] of gold ore, prior to smelting and refining. From the time of al-Mutawakkil's reign the Bujah refrained from delivering this tax for several consecutive years. Al-Mutawakkil reportedly appointed over the Egyptian Postal and Intelligence Service one of his servants (khadam) named Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Bādhghīsī, mawlā of al-Hādī. He was known as Qawṣarah.[475] Al-Mutawakkil assigned to him the Intelligence Service of Cairo, Alexandria, Barqah, and the provinces of the Maghrib.

Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm wrote to al-Mutawakkil that the Bujah had broken the treaty between them and the Muslims. They advanced 471. Ms. O has ʿĪsā with ʿUbaydallāh as a superscript. He is mentioned, for instance, by Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 282; Kindī, Wulāh, 200; Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, III, 275; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 297.

472. See Ṭabarī, I, 2593. For the treaty, see also Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, III, 273–75; and see Hasan, The Arabs and the Sudan, 39–40.

473. The names in the text are uncertain. For B-k-sūm, O reads Y-kshūm, which the note says may be identified with Axum. (But cf. Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 474.) And the note compares F-r-ww-iyah with bilād al-Faruwiyyīn (citing Bakrī, Muʿjam, ed. De Slane, 174).

474. A mithqāl is a dīnār of full weight.

475. The cognomen Qawṣarah means "date basket." Ṭabarī, III, 1296 (Marin, Reign, 105), mentions him as chief of Intelligence. He is called there Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm al-Būshanjī, mawlā of al-Hādī, known as Qawṣarah. Būshanj is a town, and Badhghīs (or: Badghīs) is a district, in Khurāsān. Fragmenta, 514, reads: Muṣʿab b. Ibrāhīm.

from their territory to the mines of gold and precious stones that were on the border between Egypt and the territory of the Bujah.[476] The Bujah killed a number of Muslims employed in the mines for mining the gold and precious stones, and took captive a number of the Muslim children and women. The Bujah claimed that the mines belonged to them and were in their territory, and that they would not permit the Muslims to enter them. This alarmed all the Muslims employed in the mines, so that they abandoned them in fear for their lives and for their children. The [1430] assessment of a fifth of the gold, silver, and precious stones that was excavated from the mines and levied for the central government thereby ceased.

Al-Mutawakkil was dead set against this and greatly annoyed. He therefore sought advice concerning the circumstances of the Bujah. He was informed [as follows]: They were a nomadic people, tenders of camel and livestock. Getting to their territory was difficult, and it was inaccessible to troops, for it consisted of desert and steppe. It was a month's journey from the land of Islam to the territory of the Bujah, through wasteland, mountains, and barren country, lacking water, vegetation, refuge, or a fortified position. Any government representative who entered Bujah territory would have to be supplied with provisions for his entire intended stay until he returned to the land of Islam. If the extent of his stay was greater than estimated, he and all his comrades would perish. And the Bujah would simply overcome them without hostilities. Their land did not remit to the central government land tax or any other tax.

Al-Mutawakkil therefore refrained from dispatching anyone against them. But the situation only got worse, and the boldness of the Bujah against the Muslims intensified to the point that the inhabitants of Upper Egypt feared for their lives and for their children. As a result, al-Mutawakkil appointed Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, known as al-Qummī, to wage war against them, and

476. The area was famous for its emeralds and other precious stones, mentioned by Mas'ūdī and Maqrīzī, among others. The gold and emerald mines were between Qūṣ, Wādī al-'Allāqī, and the Red Sea.

appointed him chief of security police[477] for these subdistricts, namely, Qift, Aqṣur, Isnā, Armant, and Uswān (Aswān).[478]

Al-Mutawakkil commissioned Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to wage war against the Bujah and to correspond with ʿAnbasah b. Isḥāq al-Ḍabbī, the officer in charge of the Egyptian security forces. Al-Mutawakkil also wrote to ʿAnbasah, instructing him to supply Muḥammad with all the requisite regular troops and [1431] Shākiriyyah stationed in Egypt. Thus ʿAnbasah removed Muḥammad's pretext [that he lacked forces].

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh departed for the land of the Bujah, and all those who had been employed in the mines and a large number of volunteers joined him. About 20,000 men[479] accompanied him, including horsemen and infantry. He sent to al-Qulzum[480] by sea seven vessels loaded with flour, olive oil, dates, sawīq,[481] and barley, ordering a contingent of his men to maneuver the vessels by sea so as to land at the coast of Bujah territory.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qummī forged on in Bujah territory until he traversed the mines, where gold was mined, and came to their fortresses and citadels. Their king encountered Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qummī—the king's name was ʿAlī Bābā, and the name of his son was Laʿīs[482]—with a great army, far outnumbering the men who were with al-Qummī. The Bujah were mounted on their camels, carrying their lances with them. Their camels were choice, of noble pedigree, like the camels of Mahrah.[483] The 477. The term muʿāwin is understood here as equivalent to ṣāḥib al-maʿūnah, which is similar to ṣāḥib al-shurṭah and ṣāḥib al-ḥarb; see Glossarium, CCCLXXXIII.

478. For these places in Upper Egypt, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 333 = Wiet, Les pays, 188–89 (Qift, Luqṣur, i.e., Luxor, Isnā and Aswān). See also Maspéro-Wiet, Matériaux, 185, for Qift, Aqṣur, Asnā, Armant, and Aswān; and for Qift, ancient Coptos, see 148–49; Luxor, 23, Armant, 7, 191, Aswān, 127–29 et passim. And see Maqrīzī, Mawāʿiẓ, III, 3, 5, 32, 194, 248, 249, 280, 295, 303, 304; and *EI*², s.v. Qift.

479. In his account, Abū al-Maḥāsin gives 7,000 men.

480. See *EI*², V, 367, s.v. Ḳulzum (where the Buja rebellion is mentioned).

481. For sawīq. see above, n. 75.

482. For "his son" Ms C has rather "his father" (abīhi); the note suggests ibn akhīhi, "his nephew." For Laʿīs, the note refers to Fragmenta, 550, note c, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, 52, note 2.

483. Mahrī (cf. French méhari) camels are speedy riding camels from the area of the Mahrah tribe in southeastern Arabia; see *EI*², s.v. Mahra. These camels were two sides began to confront each other on successive days. But they would only skirmish and not actually engage in combat. The Bujah king set about harassing[484] al-Qummī, so as to protract the time [of their stay] and exhaust the supplies and fodder that were with [al-Qummī and his men]. Thus they would lose strength and die from exhaustion, and the Bujah could then easily overcome them.

Just when the Bujah ruler figured that the supplies were ex-[1432] hausted, the seven vessels that al-Qummī had sent landed on the coast at a place called Ṣanjah.[485] Al-Qummī dispatched there a group of his men to protect the vessels from the Bujah. Al-Qummī divided the ships' freight among his followers, so that they had adequate supplies of fodder.

Seeing this, 'Alī Bābā, the Bujah chief, went on to do battle with the Muslims, rallying troops against them. The two sides clashed and fought violently. The camels upon which the Bujah fought were unseasoned[486] and tended to be frightened and alarmed by everything. Noticing this, al-Qummī rounded up all the camel and horse bells in his camp. He then attacked the Bujah, stampeding their camels with the clanging of the bells. Their alarm was considerable. It drove them over mountains and valleys, totally splintering the Bujah forces. Al-Qummī and his men pursued and seized them, dead or alive, until night overtook him. This took place at the beginning of 241 (855–56). Al-Qummī then returned to his camp and could not count the dead they were so many.

When al-Qummī arose in the morning, he discovered that the Bujah had rallied a contingent of infantry and had proceeded to a place where they felt safe from al-Qummī's pursuit. But al-Qummī with his cavalry overtook them at night. Their king fled, prized from ancient times for their fine, noble breed, and were valued by caliphs. Ibn Baṭṭūṭah, Travels, 69, who visited 'Aydhāb, took note of the superior camels of the Bujah. Maqrīzī, Mawā'iẓ, III, 268, notes the martial virtues of their camels and the effective use the Bujah made of lances while fighting from their backs.

---

484. For taṭarrada in this sense, see Glossarium, CCCXXXVIII. And see also Maqrīzī, Mawā'iẓ, III, 268.

485. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 282, states that the place of landing was rather 'Aydhāb. See also Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 297.

486. Text: za'iratan = "thin-haired." Ms O: ghirratan, i.e., "inexperienced," etc. Cf. Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 298: wa-hiya [al-ibl] 'alā ghāyah min al-za'ārah wa-l-nifār ("extremely peevish and timid").

taking his crown and furnishings. ʿAlī Bābā requested thereafter a guarantee of safe-conduct to return to his kingdom and territory. Al-Qummī granted him this, and ʿAlī Bābā delivered the taxes to him for the period of time for which he had withheld them, namely, four years, at 400 *mithqāl*s per year.

ʿAlī Bābā appointed his son Laʿīs as deputy over his kingdom. [1433] Al-Qummī departed with ʿAlī Bābā for the gate of al-Mutawakkil, and arrived there at the end of 241 (855–56). He attired this ʿAlī Bābā with a silk brocade-lined robe and a black turban and covered his camel with a brocaded saddle and brocade horse cloths. At the Public Gate, along with a group of the Bujah, were stationed about seventy pages, upon saddled camels, carrying their lances, on whose tips were the heads of their warriors who had been killed by al-Qummī.[487]

Al-Mutawakkil discharged al-Qummī on the Day of Sacrifice, 241 (April 20, 856), and appointed Saʿd al-Khādim al-Ītākhī[488] over the Bujah and the road between Mecca and Egypt. And Saʿd appointed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qummī. Al-Qummī departed with ʿAlī Bābā, who stuck to his religion. Some[one] of [the informants] reported seeing ʿAlī Bābā with a stone idol in the shape of a young boy to which he prostrated himself.

In this year, Yaʿqūb b. Ibrāhīm, known as Qawṣarah, died in Jumādā II (October–November 855).

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd.

Jaʿfar b. Dīnār went on the pilgrimage this year, and he was the supervisor of the Mecca Road and the events of the festive season.

---

487. Ms. O omits qutilū min ʿaskarihim.

488. Saʿd al-Khādim al-Ītākhī appears below (1465, p. 185) as a courtier of al-Mutawakkil.

The Events of the Year

242

(MAY 10, 856–APRIL 29, 857)

Among the events that happened this year were the enormous earthquakes that took place in Qūmis and its surrounding villages in Sha'bān (December 3–31, 856).[489] Homes were destroyed, [1434] and many people died from collapsing walls and the like. Their number reportedly came to 45,096. The greatest effect of the earthquakes was in Dāmaghān. It is reported that there were earthquakes and shocking noises this year in Fārs, Khurāsān, and Syria. The same thing took place in the Yemen along with a lunar eclipse.

In this year, the Byzantines advanced from the area of Samosata, following the summer expedition of 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī, as far as Āmid.[490] They then advanced from the frontier

489. Qūmis is a small province between the Alburz mountains to the north and the Great Desert to the south. Its administrative capital was Damghān, or Madīnat Qūmis (the City of Qūmis); Le Strange, Lands, 364–68; *EI*², s.v. Ḳūmis. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 600, mentions the earthquakes that took place in Qūmis and Naysābūr and the surrounding area in 242 (856–57), in which about 200,000 people are said to have perished.

490. Leiden and Cairo editions: Shimshāṭ. The note in the Leiden edition cites the reading Sumaysāṭ (i.e. Samosata) of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 53, and Abū al-towns of the Jazīrah and plundered a number of villages, taking captive about 10,000 men. They entered from the direction of Tephrikē,[491] a village [in the control] of Karbeas. They then departed, returning to their territory. Karbeas, ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh al-Aqṭaʿ, and a contingent of volunteers pursued them but did not catch one of them.[492] ʿUmar wrote to ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā to make a winter expedition into their territory.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil had ʿUṭārid killed.[493] He was a Christian, who had converted to Islam, and remained a Muslim for many years, and then he apostatized. He was asked to recant, but he refused to return to Islam. He was executed on 2 Shawwāl (February 1, 857), and was burned at the Public Gate.[494]

In this year, in Rajab (November 3–December 2, 856), Abū Ḥassān al-Ziyādī, judge of the East Side [of Baghdad], died.

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. al-Jaʿd, judge of Madīnat al-Manṣūr, died.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Mūsā b.

Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 307. It was Samosata that was, in fact, raided by the Byzantines during this campaign. For confusion in texts between Shimshāṭ and Sumaysāṭ, see above, n. 468. Āmid (or Amida), the most important city in Diyār Bakr, was located on the left bank of the Tigris; it was frequently attacked by the Byzantines in the tenth century. On this episode, see Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 233–34, 318–19.

491. Text: Abrīq. The note in the Leiden edition identifies Abrīq with Greek Tephrikē (citing Theophanes continuatus, p. 16). The name, it is pointed out, is also written Tibrikē, Brikē, and Aphrikē. See also Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 233; Bury, History, 278. The Arabic name appears to be derived from Brikē. Karbeas (Qarbiyās) belonged to the Paulician iconoclasts. On their beliefs, see Runciman, Medieval Manichee, 26–62. Persecuted by Theophilus and Theodora, who regarded them as Manichaeans, they took refuge in Muslim territory. Karbeas sought shelter with the amīr of Melitene (Malaṭiyah) and settled in the area of Tephrikē. Before the fall of Theodora, the Byzantines sent an army to raid Samosata and Āmid, and they thereafter attacked Tephrikē, the headquarters of Karbeas; Bury, ibid., 278f.

492. ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh al-Aqṭaʿ ("the One-Armed") was a military commander who fought on several occasions against the Byzantines. He led a summer raid in 246 (860–61; below, 1449, p. 167). He was finally killed in a battle with the Byzantines in 249 (863–64); Ṭabarī, III, 1509 (Saliba), 9, where he is called b. ʿUbaydallāh.

493. Ms. O and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 53, have rajulan ʿaṭṭāran, that is, a perfumer, pharmacist. ʿUṭārid is the planet Mercury.

494. Burning was occasionally used as a punishment for apostates (murtaddūn); see EI[1], s.v.

[1435] Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Imām b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī, who was governor of Mecca.[495] Ja'far b. Dīnār went on the pilgrimage this year. He was the supervisor of the Mecca Road and the events of the festival season.

---

495. An 'Abbāsid, he was governor of Mecca beginning with this year (Zambaur, Manuel, 20) and led the pilgrimage in 243, 244, and 249 (below, 1436, 1437, 1515 [Saliba, 14]).

The Events of the Year

243

(April 30, 857–April 18, 858)

In this year, al-Mutawakkil went to Damascus on 20 Dhū al-Qa'dah (March 8, 858).[496] He observed the Day of Sacrifice in Balad. Yazīd b. Muḥammad al-Muhallabī recited when he departed [from Baghdad]:[497]

---

496. On Mutawakkil's move to Damascus, see, e.g., Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 600; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 257; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 315. The reason for transferring the capital from Sāmarrā to Damascus was evidently the caliph's desire to avoid the powerful influence of the Turks in Sāmarrā by moving to Arab Syria. Balad is a town in the Jazīrah slightly northeast of Mosul; Le Strange, Lands, 99, 125. On the way to Damascus, al-Mutawakkil followed the route along the Tigris passing through Mosul. This was the postal road. See Le Strange, Lands, 84. On the way back, he took the route along the Euphrates to Anbār (below, 1436, p. 152).

497. Yazīd b. Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Muhallabī was a member of the famous Muhallabī family that supplied governors and wazīrs in the ninth and tenth centuries; Zambaur, Manuel, 11. He was a poet, a boon companion of al-Mutawakkil, and panegyrist of al-Muntaṣir; see Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, VIII, 176–77, XI, 165; Sezgin, GAS, II, 606. He wrote a fine elegy on the death of al-Mutawakkil; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, II, 26; Mubarrad, Kāmil, III, 1258. According to Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī, Ibrāhīm al-Ṣūlī recited the poem quoting al-Muntaṣir (note ad loc.). Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī also preserves two additional lines of verse: Muḥammad [al-Muntaṣir] says: "Let my soul be ransom for you, pity me and refrain from leaving./ If you depart, abandoning me, I shall have no joy but meeting again." Se also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 257; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 315.

I think that Syria gloats at Iraq,
Now that the Imām has resolved to depart.

If you abandon Iraq and its people,
Consider that a beauty may fade if divorced.

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. al-'Abbās [al-Ṣūlī] died.

Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad b. al-Jarrāḥ, deputy of Ibrāhīm, supervised the Bureau of Estates in Sha'bān (November 23–December 21, 857).[498]

Hāshim b. Bānījūr died in Dhū al-Qa'dah (February 19–March 20, 858).[499]

[1436] Leading the pilgrimage this year was 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. Mūsā.

Ja'far b. Dīnār went on the pilgrimage, and was supervisor of the Mecca Road and the events of the festival season.

---

498. Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad b. al-Jarrāḥ was a secretary of Christian background who had recently converted to Islam. He later served al-Mutawakkil and became wazīr under al-Mu'tamid; Sourdel, Vizirat, Index, 766; *EI*², s.v. Ibn Makhlad.

499. Hāshim b. Bānījūr belonged to the family of Bānījūr that ruled Balkh from 233 (847–48) until 337 (948–49); Zambaur, Manuel, 27, 41, 202 (genealogical table), 204; *EI*², Supplement, s.v. Banīdjūrids.

The Events of the Year 244

(April 19, 858–April 7, 859)

Among these events was al-Mutawakkil's entrance into Damascus in Ṣafar (May 19–June 16, 858). From the time he left Sāmarrā until he entered Damascus ninety-seven days elapsed or, it is said, seventy-seven days. He decided to take up residence there, transferred the royal bureaus, and gave orders for building in Damascus. The Turks were in a state of foment over [the withholding of] their service allotments and the allotments for their families, and so al-Mutawakkil gave orders to placate them.

Al-Mutawakkil thereafter found Balad unpleasant. This was because its air was cool and humid, the water unwholesome, the wind blowing from afternoon and continuing to intensify throughout the entire night. It had many fleas; prices were high; and snow interfered with supply of provisions.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil dispatched Bughā from Damascus to raid the Byzantines in Rabīʿ II (July 17–August 14, 858). Bughā undertook the summer expedition and conquered Ṣamāluh.[500]

500. Ṣamāluh is written here with final h; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 416, has final w. He places it at the Syrian frontier towns near Maṣīṣah (Mopsuestia) and Tarsus. Ṣamāluh = Sēmalouos kastron; Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 234; Minorsky, Ḥudūd, 220.

Al-Mutawakkil resided in Damascus for two months and a number of days. He then returned to Sāmarrā, staying along the Euphrates, turning off for al-Anbār, and then from al-Anbār taking the Ḥurf Road to Sāmarrā.[501] He entered Sāmarrā on Monday, 22 Jumādā II (October 5, 858).

In this year, some(one) of the informants allege(s), al-Mutawakkil[502] appointed Abū al-Sāj[503] supervisor of the Mecca Road in place of Ja'far b. Dīnār. What is correct, in my view, is that he appointed him as supervisor of the Mecca Road in 242 (856–57).

[1437] In this year, a lance that had belonged to the Prophet, called al-'Anazah, was reportedly brought to al-Mutawakkil.[504] It is said to have belonged to the Najāshī, king of Abyssinia, who gave it to al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām. Al-Zubayr gave it to the Messenger of God, and it remained in the possession of the muezzins. Someone marched with it before the Messenger of God on the two festivals. It was implanted before him in the courtyard,[505] and people prayed toward it.[506] Al-Mutawakkil ordered that it be carried before him. The chief of the security police would bear it before the caliph, and the deputy chief of security police would carry his lance.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil became angry with Bukhtīshū', confiscated his property, and banished him to al-Baḥrayn.[507]

---

501. Al-Mutawakkil stayed along the Euphrates road and headed southeast until Anbār instead of heading directly east from Ḥadīthah, which would have brought him straight to Sāmarrā. He then headed back north to Sāmarrā, thus doubling the distance he had to travel. Ḥurf is a village in the area of al-Anbār (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 243) after which this route is presumably named.

502. Ms. C and Cairo edition Ms. D have al-Muntaṣir instead of al-Mutawakkil.

503. Abū al-Sāj Dīwdād b. Dīwdast was an army commander who had supported Afshīn in his campaign against Bābak (Ṭabarī, III, 1222, 1228, Marin, Reign, 46, 52). He was commander of the Mecca Road until the struggle between al-Musta'īn and al-Mu'tazz erupted in 251 (865–66). He then continued to engage actively in warfare and politics; d. 266 (879–80); Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 56; Zambaur, Manuel, 32 (governor of Aleppo in 254/868–69), 43 (governor of al-Kūfah in 252/866–67), 179 (genealogy of Sājites in Ādharbāyjān); *EI*², Abū'l-Sādj Dīwdād.

504. On the famous lance called al-'Anazah, see *EI*², s.v. It was an emblem of prophetic and caliphal authority.

505. Text: al-fanā'. 'Aynī: fī al-asfār ("on journeys").

506. Ms. O adds fī al-faḍā' = "in the open space."

507. Bukhtīshū' b. Jibrīl, of the famous family from Jundaysābūr, died in 256 (869–70); Sezgin, GAS, III, 243. Bukhtīshū' was a court physician for al-Mutawak-

An Arab tribesman recited:

O anger that came with fateful force,
When the lion sprang upon him with might and main.

Bukhtīshūʿ was deluded
When he intrigued against the lords, the moons,

The amīrs, the pure leaders,
Heirs apparent of the chosen lord,

And against the *mawlā*s and the free.
He cast him to an isolated wasteland,

The shore of al-Baḥrayn, for his baseness.

In this year, the Festival of Sacrifice of the Muslims, Palm Sunday of the Christians, and Passover of the Jews coincided.[508]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Mūsā.

---

kil. He had been dispossessed and banished previously by al-Wāthiq, in 230 (844–45), but his situation improved under al-Mutawakkil, until the physician took liberties with the caliph, and was then banished on several occasions; Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿah, ʿUyūn, I, 138. In the poem here, he is said to have intrigued against the crown princes and the Turks (*mawlā*s).

508. Gil, Palestine, I, 385, n. 700, mentions that Muslim chroniclers (citing Ibn al-Athīr, Sibṭ b. al-Jawzī, Abū al-Maḥāsin) recorded an unprecedented occurrence in the year 244, namely, that the Day of Sacrifice, the Jewish Passover, and the Christian Palm Sunday (al-Shaʿānīn < Heb. Hōshaʿnōt) fell on the same day. The coincidence, as Gil shows, does not work out, as the Festival of Sacrifice was on March 19, 859, whereas Passover was on March 23.

The Events of the Year

245

(April 8, 859–March 27, 860)

[1438] In this year al-Mutawakkil gave orders to build al-Māḥūzah, and he called it the Ja'farī.[509] He granted there fiefs to his army commanders and companions. Al-Mutawakkil expended great effort in building it and withdrew to al-Muḥammadiyyah so that the construction of al-Māḥūzah could be carried out.[510] The caliph or-

509. The Ja'farī Palace complex, or al-Ja'fariyyah, was named after al-Mutawakkil whose name (ism) was Ja'far. It is not to be confused with the Ja'farī Palace in Baghdad, built by Ja'far al-Barmakī. Ya'qūbī (Buldān, 266–76 = Wiet, Les pays, 60–61) observes that al-Mutawakkil lived in the palaces of the Ja'farī for only nine months and three days before his assassination there. Al-Muntaṣir then ordered that al-Māḥūzah be abandoned and destroyed, and that the building material be brought back to Sāmarrā. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 601, al-Māḥūzah was 3 farsakhs (18 km.) from Sāmarrā. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 17, says that the renovation of the Ja'farī cost ten million dirhams. See also Mu'jam, III, 18 (poem of 'Alī b. al-Jahm). The remains of the Ja'fariyyah complex occupy about 1⅓ sq. km. between the Nahr al-Raṣāṣ canal and the Tigris (Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 277, and Plate 70a). See Herzfeld, Samarra, 125; Creswell, II, 277f.; Sāmarrā'ī, Ta'rīkh, I, 95–96; Rogers, "Samarra," 130, 136, 148, 150; al-'Amid, Architecture, 202ff.

510. Herzfeld, Samarra, 125, cites Ibn Serapion to the effect that the Muḥammadiyyah (named for Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir) was in al-Qāṭūl al-Kisrawī. According to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 430, it was formerly the monastary of Dayr Abū Ṣufrā, then the Itākhiyyah (after Itākh al-Turkī). See also Herzfeld, 72.

dered that the palaces of al-Mukhtār and al-Badīʿ be demolished and had their teak wood transferred to the Jaʿfarī.[511] It is said that he spent more than two million dīnārs on the Jaʿfarī.[512] He assembled therein Qur'ān readers, who recited the Qur'ān; and entertainers, to whom he gave two million dirhams, also attended. Al-Mutawakkil and his followers called it al-Khāṣṣah al-Mutawakkiliyyah.[513] And he constructed within it a palace which he named Lu'lu'ah. A taller structure had never been seen.[514]

Al-Mutawakkil ordered that a canal (nahr) be dug, beginning at a place called Karmā, five *farsakh*s (thirty km.) above al-Māḥūzah.[515] The canal would feed into the mouths[516] of the canals around it, providing drinking water. And he ordered the expropriation of Jabiltā, Upper and Lower al-Khaṣāṣah,[517] and Karmā, 511. Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 600, mentions the Badīʿ; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 17, mentions only Mukhtār (which he says cost five million dirhams to construct); see also Herzfeld, Samarra, 132–33; Samarrāʾī, Taʾrīkh, I, 135–36.

512. If this is the renovation that Yāqūt had in mind, the sum was ten million dirhams; Muʿjam, III, 17 (above, n. 509).

513. The administrative center al-Mutawakkiliyyah thus equals al-Jaʿfariyyah; see Herzfeld, Samarra, 124–25. Baladhuri, Futūḥ, 240, 364, states that al-Mutawakkil built a new administrative center (madīnah), calling it al-Mutawakkiliyyah between al-Karkh Fayrūz and al-Qāṭūl, in which al-Māḥūzah was included. He also takes note of the great mosque that he built there, which Ṭabarī does not mention in our text.

514. The Lu'lu'ah (Pearl) Palace, situated within the Jaʿfariyyah administrative center, according to Herzfeld, Samarra, 128, was either identical with the Jaʿfarī Palace or was its main building; see also 104, 132, 147. Rogers, "Samarra," 148, suggests that the Lu'lu'ah was not a vast building but most probably a kiosk or courtyard. According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 17, five million dirhams were spent on the Lu'lu'ah; it was built by al-Muʿtaṣim for Afshīn (Ṭabarī, III, 1307 and 1315; Marin, Reign, 114, 120). Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 365, calls it Lu'lu'at al-Jawsaq to distinguish it from Lu'lu'at al-Jaʿfarī. He notes that al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad were imprisoned there (see below, pp. 210f.). Both these Lu'lu'ahs are to be distinguished, of course, from the town Lulon in Asia Minor that the Arabs called Lu'lu'ah (below, n. 551).

515. On al-Mutawakkil's irrigation project, see Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 601; Buldān, 267 = Wiet, Les pays, 67. Herzfeld, Samarra, 125, and n. 2, says that Karmā (Syriac Karmē) had been a Nestorian bishopric from A.D. 486 to 554. See also Rogers, "Samarra," 145.

516. For the expression fūh al-nahr in the sense of "mouth of the canal," see Glossarium, CDVIII; Lane, Lexicon, 2465.

517. Jabiltā or Jabultā is on the east bank of the Tigris slightly northeast of Takrīt and opposite it on the post road from Baghdad to Mosul. It is sometimes mispointed as Ḥabiltā; Le Strange, Lands, 91, 92, n. 1, 125. For upper and lower Khaṣāṣah, Ms. O and ʿAynī have al-Khaṣāṣiyyah; see also Herzfeld, Samarra, 67, 125.

forcing their inhabitants to sell their residences and land. They were compelled to do this so that the land and residences in all these villages would be turned over to the custody of al-Mutawakkil, who would then evict the inhabitants. He allocated 200,000 dīnārs for expediture on the canal and assigned the money to Dulayl b. Ya'qūb al-Naṣrānī, secretary of Bughā.[518] This was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 245 (February 27–March 28, 860). He held 12,000 men responsible for the job of digging the canal. Dulayl [1439] continued to work at it, allocating ever increasing sums of money, dispersing all of it among the secretaries, until al-Mutawakkil was killed, whereupon the canal fell into disuse. Al-Ja'fariyyah was laid waste and demolished, and the canal project went uncompleted.

In this year, the territory of the Maghrib suffered an earthquake, which destroyed fortresses, residences, and bridges. Al-Mutawakkil ordered that three million dirhams be distributed among those whose residences were afflicted. 'Askar al-Mahdī in Baghdad suffered an earthquake this year, as did al-Madā'in.[519]

In this year, the Byzantine ruler sent Muslim prisoners and communicated a request for a prisoner exchange for those he still held.[520] The person who came to al-Mutawakkil as an emissary on behalf of the Byzantine sovereign was an elder named Triphylios.[521] With him were seventy-seven Muslim prisoners whom Michael, son of Theophilus, the Byzantine ruler, presented to al-Mutawakkil. Triphylios came to al-Mutawakkil on 24 Ṣafar (May 31) of this year (859). He resided with Shunayf al-Khādim. Then al-Mutawakkil dispatched Naṣr b. al-Azhar al-Shī'ī with the emissary of the Byzantine sovereign. He set out during this year, but the prisoner exchange did not take place until 246 (March 28, 860—January 16, 861).

---

518. Dulayl b. Ya'qūb al-Naṣrānī, a Christian secretary, served Bughā al-Turkī and al-Mutawakkil. He is first mentioned in Ṭabarī, III, 1184 (Marin, Reign, 1, 19, 20). Dulayl later served as supervisor of the ministry of estates (III, 1513; Saliba, 12). He still appears as Bughā's secretary in 251 (865–66; 1535, Saliba, 28); and see Saliba, Index, 174. See also Yāqūt, Irshād, II, 30.

519. 'Askar al-Mahdī is the older name of Ruṣāfah in Baghdad; Le Strange, Baghdad, 42, 189; Lassner, Topography, 150.

520. See Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 234–35, 319.

521. Text: Aṭrūbaylīs. The note in the Leiden edition identifies the elder as Triphylios (citing Theophanes continuatus, 122.8). Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 234, n. 5, cites Bar Hebraeus (Chronography, 144), where the reading is Aṭrōphilos (or Aṭrōphīlōs).

It is reported that in Shawwāl (December 30, 859–January 27, 860) an earthquake and tremor killed many people in Antioch. Fifteen hundred homes and about ninety towers along its walls collapsed as a result. Dreadful indescribable noises were heard emanating from the openings of the residences. The inhabitants of Antioch fled to the desert. [Part of] Mount al-Aqraʿ shook loose and sank into the sea.[522] The sea was stormy on that day, and black, murky, putrid vapors rose from it. A river in Antioch disappeared the distance of a farsakh (six km.), and it was not known where the waters vanished. [1440]

It is said that in this year the inhabitants of Tinnīs[523] in Egypt heard a continuous, dreadful clamor, from which many people died.

In this year, an earthquake effected Bālis, al-Raqqah, Ḥarrān, Raʾs ʿAyn, Ḥimṣ, Damascus, Edessa, Tarsus, Mopsuestia, Adana,[524] and the coasts of Syria. Laodicea was convulsed. Not a residence remained there, and only a few of its inhabitants escaped. Jabalah[525] and its inhabitants perished.

In this year, the level of Mushāsh—the spring of Mecca—declined, so that the price of a waterskin in Mecca reached eighty dirhams.[526] The mother of al-Mutawakkil sent funds that were disbursed for it.[527]

In this year, Isḥāq b. Abī Isrāʾīl, Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh, and Hilāl al-Rāzī died.[528]

In this year, Najāḥ b. Salamah perished.

---

522. Mount al-Aqraʿ is classical Casius. Earthquakes and seismic shocks were quite common in the Antioch region throughout history.

523. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 56: Sīs; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, I, 752: Bilbays.

524. Text: Adanah, Addenda, DCCLXXVI and Cairo edition, Ms. D: Adhanah.

525. Jabalah is a port on the coast of Syria, about 30 km. south of Laodicea. Its citadel had been built by Muʿāwiyah; see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 25; *EI*², s.v. Djabala.

526. Mushāsh is a canal near Mt. ʿArafāt that reaches Mecca; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 316 = Wiet, Les pays, 154; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 536. On the price of a waterskin, see above, 1330 (p. 6) and n. 10.

527. Ms. O has fa-baʿatha and omits umm, that is, "Al-Mutawakkil sent. . . ."

528. Isḥāq b. Abī Isrāʾīl Ibrāhīm al-Marwazī, a Ḥadīth scholar, died this year in Shawwāl (December 30, 859–January 27, 860) in Baghad, at the age of ninety-five, according to Dhahabī, ʿIbar, 444. For Sawwār b. ʿAbdallāh, see above, 1411 (p. 118) and n. 384. A Hilāl b. Yaḥyā, Abū Yaḥyā, called al-Rāʾī (not al-Rāzī), a Ḥanafī scholar, died in al-Baṣrah in 245; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 507; Sezgin, GAS, I, 435. [The Fihrist gives his surname as Abū Bakr.] The identification is uncertain.

The Cause of Najāḥ b. Salamah's Demise

I have received an account on the authority of al-Ḥārith b. Abī Usāmah, some of which I report on the basis of information from him and some from other informants:[529] Najāḥ b. Salamah was responsible for the Bureau of Registering and Supervising Government Officals (dīwān al-tawqī' wa-l-tatabbu' 'alā al-'ummāl). Before this he had been secretary of Ibrāhīm b. Rabāḥ al-Jawharī and was responsible for estates. The government officials all feared [1441] him and carried out his wishes, unable to deter him from doing whatever he wanted. Al-Mutawakkil often took him as a drinking companion.

Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad and Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Malik were associates of 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān, who was wazīr of al-Mutawakkil. They would carry out for 'Ubaydallāh whatever he ordered them to do. Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad was responsible for the Bureau of Estates (dīwān al-ḍiyā') and Mūsā for the Bureau of Taxation (dīwān al-kharāj).

Najāḥ b. Salamah wrote a note to al-Mutawakkil concerning al-Ḥasan and Mūsā, in which he reported that they had acted in bad faith and had been derelict in their duties, and that he would expropriate from them forty million dirhams [which they had allegedly embezzled].

Al-Mutawakkil invited Najāḥ to drink with him that evening. He said, "O Najāḥ, may God forsake whoever forsakes you, come to me early tomorrow so that I may turn al-Ḥasan and Mūsā over to you." Early in the morning Najāḥ organized his men, saying, "So-and-so, you seize al-Ḥasan; so-and-so, you seize Mūsā."

When Najāḥ came to al-Mutawakkil early in the morning, he came across 'Ubaydallāh. The latter had ordered that Najāḥ be kept away from the caliph. 'Ubaydallāh said to him, "O Abū al-Faḍl, take leave so that we and you can look into this matter, and let me give you advice that will redound to your benefit." Najāḥ asked, "What might it be?" 'Ubaydallāh replied, "I shall conciliate between you and the two of them [al-Ḥasan and Mūsā]. Write a note stating that while you were drinking you divulged things that you would rather reconsider. And I shall settle the matter with the Commander of the Faithful."

529. For al-Ḥārith b. [Muḥammad] Abī Usāmah, who died in 282 (895–96) at the age of ninety-six, see Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh Baghdād, VIII, 218–19; Sezgin, GAS, I, 160.

Thus 'Ubayadallāh tricked Najāḥ into writing a note as he requested.[530] [When Najāḥ had written a note in his own hand, 'Ubaydallāh took it with him. He then summoned al-Ḥasan and Mūsā. Informing them of the situation, he ordered them to draft two million dīnārs to the credit of Najāḥ and his colleagues. They did so, and 'Ubaydallāh took both notes] and brought them to al-Mutawakkil.

'Ubaydallāh said, "O Commander of the Faithful, Najāḥ has reconsidered what he said yesterday. And this is a note of Mūsā and al-Ḥasan stating that they guarantee [to pay Najāḥ] the [1442] amount that they have stipulated. Take the sum which they guarantee, but be considerate to them and take approximately what Najāḥ guaranteed to give you from them."[531]

Al-Mutawakkil was delighted and consented to do as 'Ubaydallāh had suggested. He said, "Hand Najāḥ over to the two of them." They took him along as they departed, ordering that his cap be removed from his head. It was silk. He was chilled as a result, and said, "Woe to you, O Ḥasan, I am cold." Ḥasan ordered that his cap be put back on his head. Mūsā then went with Najāḥ to the Bureau of Taxation.

They then went to Najāḥ's two sons, Abū al-Faraj and Abū Muḥammad. Abū al-Faraj was seized, and Abū Muḥammad b. bt. Ḥasan b. Shunayf fled.[532] And they also seized his secretary, Isḥāq 530. The bracketed material that follows is from Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 57, 11.5–8. The segment was omitted in our text due to homoeoteleuton. Fragmenta, 553, adds that 'Ubaydallāh threatened al-Ḥasan and Mūsā that, if they failed to comply with his advice, he would turn them over to the caliph, who would have them killed. The threat appears in the second version of the story, which is related by Ṭabarī below.

531. The drift of this account is that Najāḥ was tricked into writing a note informing the caliph that he did not take money from Mūsā and al-Ḥasan, but they wrote a note stating that he did, and thus he appears to be an embezzler. 'Ubaydallāh suggests that the caliph not take from Mūsā and al-Ḥasan all the money that Najāḥ was to receive from them but the lower sum that he was to turn over to the caliph. According to Ashtor, Prix, 40, in the mid-tenth century the ratio of dirhams to dīnārs was 25:1.

532. Najāḥ had two sons. The first, called here Abū al-Faraj, is named Muḥammad on 1443. The second son, called here Abū Muḥammad b. bt. Ḥasan b. Shunayf, is named Aḥmad on 1443.

b. Sa'd b. Mas'ūd al-Quṭrabbulī, and 'Abdallāh b. Makhlad, known as Ibn al-Bawwāb—he was devoted to Najāḥ.

Najāḥ and his son (Abū al-Faraj) confessed to al-Ḥasan and Mūsā to having about 140,000 dīnārs, aside from the value of their palaces, furnishings, and income-producing properties[533] in Sāmarrā and Baghdad, and from the many estates they had.

Al-Mutawakkil ordered that all this be confiscated. Najāḥ was repeatedly beaten with whips, about 200 lashes, in a place other than that used for flogging. He was smothered and suffocated. Mūsā al-Furāniq and al-Ma'lūf suffocated him.[534]

Al-Ḥārith, however, maintained that Najāḥ's testicles were [1443] crushed until he died. He expired on Monday, 22 Dhū al-Qa'dah, of this year (February 18, 860). Al-Mutawakkil ordered that he be washed and buried, and he was interred at night.[535]

Najāḥ's son Muḥammad, 'Abdallāh b. Makhlad, and Isḥāq b. Sa'd were beaten about fifty-five stripes. Isḥāq confessed to having 50,000 dīnārs, and 'Abdallāh b. Makhlad confessed to having 15,000 or, it is said, 20,000 dīnārs. Najāḥ's son Aḥmad b. bt. Ḥasan had fled. Aḥmad was caught after the death of Najāḥ and imprisoned in the Bureau [of Taxation]. All the furnishings in the palace of Najāḥ and his son Abū al-Faraj were seized; their palaces and estates were confiscated wherever they were; their families were evicted. His representative in the region of the Sawād was seized—he was Ibn 'Ayyāsh. The latter confessed to having 20,000 dīnārs. Ibn 'Ayyāsh sent to Mecca, seeking al-Ḥasan b. Sahl b. Nūḥ al-Ahwāzī and Ḥasan b. Ya'qūb al-Baghdādī. Because of Ibn 'Ayyāsh a group of people were seized and imprisoned.

It is reported that the reason for Najāḥ's demise was different from what we have mentioned. Accordingly, he was antagonistic toward 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān. Now, 'Ubaydallāh had great influence with al-Mutawakkil and was in charge of the wa-

---

533. Text: wa-mustaghallātihimā. Ms. O wa-musta'malātihimā. Glossarium, CCCLXXVII: "products," citing Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 603.

534. Mss. C and O: without points and add ibn after Mūsā. Ṣūlī omits ibn. The note identifies him with Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh al-Iṣfahānī (citing Ibn Khallikān; see Wafayāt, III, 59). Furāniq (< Pers. parwanak) means "courier, messenger." Al-Ma'lūf is apparently identical with Ja'far al-Ma'lūf, mentioned below on 1444.

535. See also Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, III, 59, where this account is given.

zīrate and all of its administrative functions. Najāḥ was in charge of [the Bureau of] the Public Registry (tawqīʿ al-ʿāmmah).

When al-Mutawakkil decided to build the Jaʿfarī [Palace], Najāḥ said to him—he was among the boon companions—"Commander of the Faithful, I shall name some men for you. Turn them over to me so that I can expropriate money from them with [1444] which you can build your administrative center, because you need to lay out quite a sum for its construction." He replied, "Name them." Najāḥ then sent a note in which he mentioned: (1) Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Malik; (2) ʿĪsā b. Farrukhānshāh, deputy of al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad;[536] (3) al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad; (4) Zaydān b. Ibrāhīm, deputy of Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Malik; (5) ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā and his two brothers (6) ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā and (7) Zakariyyā'; (8) Maymūn b. Ibrāhīm;[537] (9) Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Munajjim[538] and his brother (10) Aḥmad b. Mūsā; (11) ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Manṣūr;[539] and (12) Jaʿfar al-Maʿlūf, accountant (mustakhrij) of the Bureau of Taxation, and others—about twenty men.

This favorably impressed al-Mutawakkil, who bade Najāḥ to come early the next day. When al-Mutawakkil arose, he had no doubts about this. But ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā argued with al-Mutawakkil, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, Najāḥ wants to assault every single secretary and army commander. Who, O Commander of the Faithful, will perform the administrative functions?"

---

536. Zambaur, Manuel, 6, says that ʿĪsā was wazīr for al-Muʿtazz in 252 (866–67), but this is not mentioned by Ṭabarī, according to whom he was head of the Bureau of Taxation; III, 1513 (Saliba, 13), 1640 (Saliba, 105); see Saliba, Index, 177.

537. According to Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 271, he was a secretary in charge of correspondence under al-Mutawakkil; Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Wuzarā', 203–04, 250; Sourdel, Vizirat, 338, 738.

538. Text: Muḥammad b. Mūsā. Ms. C: Mūsā b. Mūsā; Ms. O: Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā. Muḥammad b. Mūsā was one of the famous Banū Mūsā b. Shākir. See, for instance, Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 645–46; Sezgin, GAS, V, 246; VI, 147–48. Muḥammad had two brothers, Aḥmad (mentioned here) and Ḥasan. Muḥammad, the eldest, died in 259 (872–73).

539. ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā, of the famous Banū al-Munajjim, was a protégé of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm and a close associate of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, for whom he assembled a great library. He was a leading boon companion of al-Mutawakkil; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 255, 313; Yāqūt, Irshād, V, 459–77; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 312–13; Stern, "Chronography," 437–38.

Najāḥ came early the next day, and 'Ubaydallāh let him take his place in his audience hall (majlis), but did not present him to the caliph.

'Ubaydallāh had Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Malik and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad presented and said to them, "If Najāḥ gets to see the Commander of the Faithful, he will turn the two of you over to him, and he will kill you and confiscate your property. So write a note to the Commander of the Faithful in which you stipulate that you guarantee [to pay] two million dīnārs."

They wrote a note in their hand, and 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā brought it to al-Mutawakkil.[540] 'Ubaydallāh began to go back and forth among the Commander of the Faithful, Najāḥ, Mūsā b. 'Abd [1445] al-Malik and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad. He kept going in and out [of the caliphal audience], keeping an eye on Mūsā and al-Ḥasan.[541]

Then 'Ubaydallāh brought Mūsā and al-Ḥasan in to al-Mutawakkil, and they guaranteed this amount. He went out with the two of them and handed Najāḥ over to them. All the people, including the inner circle of notables and the commoners, as well as Mūsā and al-Ḥasan, were certain that they two and 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā would be handed over to Najāḥ in view of the discussion between Najāḥ and al-Mutawakkil.

They seized Najāḥ. Mūsā b. 'Abd al-Malik supervised his torture and imprisoned him in the Bureau of Taxation in Sāmarrā and flogged him severely.

Al-Mutawakkil ordered that his secretary Isḥāq b. Sa'd—he supervised his private affairs and the estates of some(one) of his sons—be fined 51,000 dīnārs. He was made to swear an oath on this.

Al-Mutawakkil said, "He appropriated from me fifty dīnārs in the days of al-Wāthiq, when he replaced 'Umar b Faraj, until he freed my pay allotments. Take one thousand dīnārs for every dīnār [he appropriated] and then another thousand beyond that, just as he seized an exorbitant amount of money."

Isḥāq b. Sa'd was imprisoned, and three installment payments were arranged for him.[542] He was not released until he paid

---

540. The words "to al-Mutawakkil" are added in Ms. O.

541. Ms. O omits this sentence, which is not entirely clear.

542. Wa-nujjima 'alayhi fī thalāthati anjum. For the sense of "to discharge a debt through payments," see Glossarium, DII.

17,000 dīnārs in cash and only after guarantors were secured from him for the balance.

ʿAbdallāh b. Makhlad was seized and fined 17,000 dīnārs. ʿUbaydallāh [b.] al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl[543]—he was one of the chamberlains of al-Mutawakkil—and ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb were directed by a letter of al-Mutawakkil to flog Najāḥ fifty times if he did not confess and deliver the wealth he was reported to own.[544] He flogged him and then repeated the same a second and third day. [1446]

Najāḥ said, "Inform the Commander of the Faithful that I am dying." Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Malik ordered Jaʿfar al-Maʿlūf, along with an officer from the Bureau of Taxation, to crush his genitals, [which they did] until he turned cold and died.

Mūsā rode early in the morning to al-Mutawakkil and informed him that Najāḥ had died. Al-Mutawakkil said to Mūsā and al-Ḥasan, "I want my money which you two guaranteed." They used artful means to confiscate all [Najāḥ's] property and that of his sons. They imprisoned Abū al-Faraj—he was responsible for the Bureau of Control of Estates on behalf of Abū Ṣāliḥ b. Yazdād[545]—confiscated all his possessions and all his landed property, and assigned his estates over to the Commander of the Faithful, seizing what they did from his companions.

Al-Mutawakkil would often say to them when he was drinking, "Bring my secretary back to me; if not, bring the money." He assigned the Bureau of Public Registry[546] to ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā, and appointed as deputy over it his cousin, Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khāqān. Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Malik and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad were dilatory in this matter, and al-Mutawakkil kept demanding from them the money that they had guaranteed from Najāḥ.

Only a small amount of the money had been delivered before Mūsā b. ʿAbd al-Malik rode out accompanying al-Muntaṣir from the Jaʿfarī [Palace]. Al-Muntaṣir was heading for Sāmarrā to his 543. Ms. O: ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan.

544. For this translation of mā wuṣifa ʿalayhi, see Glossarium, DLVII.

545. Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Marwazī b. Yazdād ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad later became wazīr under al-Mustaʿīn in 249 (863–64); III, 1513 (Saliba, 13); Zambaur, Manuel, 6.

546. Text: dīwān tawqīʿ al-ʿāmmah. O: dīwān al-tawqīʿ al-ʿāmmah.

residence in the Jawsaq [Palace].[547] Mūsā arrived there with him [and stayed for][548] an hour, and then departed, heading back. While he was on the way, he cried out to someone who was with [1447] him, "Grab me." They rushed to him, and he fell paralyzed into their arms. He was carried to his residence. He held out that day and night and then died.

Al-Mutawakkil appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā also over the Bureau of Taxation. He appointed as deputy Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl, secretary of al-Mu'tazz. Aḥmad was also his deputy over the secretariat of al-Mu'tazz.

Al-Qiṣāfī recited:[549]

Najāḥ did not fear the assault of fate,
Until his power passed to Mūsā and al-Ḥasan.

He came wresting the benefits of the noble,
And he left deprived of purse and limb.

In this year, in Rajab (October 2–31, 859), Bukhtīshū' the physician was flogged one hundred and fifty times, and then shackled in irons and incarcerated in the Maṭbaq [Prison].

In this year, the Byzantines raided Samosata,[550] killing and

---

547. The Jawsaq al-Khāqānī was named for al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 17, says that al-Mutawakkil spent 500,000 dirhams on it. See Herzfeld, Samarra, 94–95, 104, 115, 132; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 232ff., and figure 194; Rogers, "Samarra," 147. It is identified with the Caliphal Palace; see above, n. 125.

548. The note in the Leiden edition suggests that aqāma be added here.

549. For Abū al-Fayḍ 'Amr b. Naṣr al-Qiṣāfī, panegyrist of Hārūn and his successors, d. ca. 247 (861–62), see Sezgin, GAS, II, 526. Ms. C: al-Qunāfī; Ṣūlī: al-Quḍāfī al-Shā'ir. Ṣūlī omits the last verse and adds four others:

His havoc befell people, crushing them
As though he were a rough-taloned lion.

Oppression has removed him humbly from this world
For it casts one from power to impotence.

He did not thank God for the health and benevolence
That embraced him.

Ingratitude brings one
From joy to misery and grief.

550. Text: Sumaysāṭ. Ms. O: Simshāṭ; Ms. C: Shimshāṭ. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 57; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 320: Sumaysāṭ. See above, n. 468. On the events, see Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 235f., 319f.

taking captive about 500 persons. ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī led the summer expedition.

The inhabitants of Lulon prevented their governor from entering the town for thirty days.[551] The Byzantine ruler sent to them [1448] a Patrikios who was to guarantee each of them 1,000 dīnārs if they would deliver Lulon to him. They let the Patrikios come up to them, and then, once they were given their back allotments and what they wished, they handed over Lulon and the Patrikios to Balkājūr in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (February 27–March 27, 860).[552] The Patrikios whom the Byzantine emperor dispatched to them was called "Logothete."[553]

When the inhabitants of Lulon handed him over to Balkājūr, [he brought the Patrikios to al-Mutawakkil.][554] Others say that ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī brought him to al-Mutawakkil. Al-Mutawakkil handed him over to al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, and he proposed Islam to him, but the Patrikios refused. When they said, "We'll kill you," he responded, "You know better." The Byzantine ruler wrote offering to exchange him for 1,000 Muslims.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Imām.[555] He was known as al-Zaynabī, and he was governor of Mecca.

The Nayrūz of al-Mutawakkil, which the supervisors of the land tax cooperated with him in postponing, fell this year on Saturday, 11 Rabīʿ I (June 16, 859), corresponding to 17 Ḥazīrān (June 17) and 28 Ordīwihisht.[556]

---

551. Lulon, Arabic Lu'lu'ah, was strategically located, having a fortress that overlooked the northern end of a pass that led over the Cilician Gates, from Podandos to Tyana; Le Strange, Lands, 134, 135, 139, 150. Lulon was under Byzantine control.

552. Balkājūr was the commander for the Muslims.

553. Text: Lughuthīṭ. For the title Logothete, see Bury, History, 210; idem, Imperial Administrative System, 111.

554. The words "he brought the Patrikios to al-Mutawakkil" are added from Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 57: fa-sayyarahu ilā al-Mutawakkil.

555. See Zambaur, Manuel, 20.

556. Nayrūz (Nawrūz) is the first day of the Persian solar year on which the land tax (kharāj) was collected. As the intercalation of one day per four years was disregarded under Islam, the date of Nawrūz and collection of the kharāj continued to advance so that by the time of al-Mutawakkil it fell two months early, permitting tax agents to collect taxes prematurely before crops were harvested. The new date fixed by al-Mutawakkil was meant to correspond with the old time. Bīrūnī, Chronology, 32, says that the fiscal reform of al-Mutawakkil took place in

Al-Buḥturī al-Ṭāʾī recited:[557]

The Day of Nayrūz has returned to the time
That Ardashīr enacted.

Muḥarram, 243 (April 30, 857–May 29, 857). Bīrūnī notes that the planned reform was not actually put into effect, so that al-Muʿtaḍid had to address himself to the problem later. See Ṭabarī, III, 2143 (Rosenthal, Return, 19 and n. 103). Yāqūt, Irshād, II, 128–29, relates an account, going back to Balādhurī, concerning the letter, drafted by Ibrāhīm b. al-ʿAbbās al-Ṣūlī, announcing the reform. He had made an error that was detected by the astronomers ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Munajjim and Muḥammad b. Mūsā. Ordīwihisht stands for Ordībihist (Ordībehesht), the second month of the Persian (Zoroastrian) calendar.

557. The famous poet Buḥturī died 284 (897–98); *EI*², s.v.; Sezgin, GAS, II, 560. He was companion and panegyrist of al-Mutawakkil and of later caliphs. Cairo edition cites his Dīwān, II, 57. Bīrūnī (see previous note) cites three additional verses of the poem.

The Events of the Year 246

(March 28, 860–January 16, 861)

One of the events was the summer expedition of ʿUmar b. ʿAbdallāh al-Aqṭaʿ. He brought back 7,000 head of livestock.[558] There was also the raid of Karbeas, who brought back 5,000 head of livestock. And then there was the raid of al-Faḍl b. Qārin.[559] He conquered the fortress of Anṭālya,[560] traveling by sea in twenty vessels. [1449]

There was the raid of Balkājūr; he brought back livestock and captives.

Finally, there was the summer expedition of ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī. He brought back 5,000 head of livestock and about 10,000 horses, mares, and donkeys.

---

558. Ms. O: 15,000 heads.

559. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 159, says that al-Faḍl b. Qārin was governor (ʿāmil) of Ḥimṣ. In 248 (862–63) he was again sent to put down a rebellion there (III, 1508, Saliba, 7). He was eventually killed, while he was governor, by the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ, supported by the Banū Kalb, in 250 (864–65); III, 1533 (Saliba, 27).

560. Mss. Anṭākiyah, that is, Antioch. So Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 59, and Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, III, 589. ʿAynī: Anṭālyah. Anṭālyah (Greek Attaleia) is a town on the southern coast of Anatolia; *EI*², s.v. Anṭālyah is easily confused with the more common Anṭākiyah. As Antioch is inland, and this was a sea raid, it is clear that Anṭālyah is meant.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil withdrew to the administrative center that he built in al-Māḥūzah and began to reside there on the Day of the 'Āshūrā' (February 25, 861).

In this year, there was the prisoner exchange in Ṣafar (April 27–May 25, 860) administered by 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī.[561] Two thousand three hundred and sixty-seven persons were exchanged. Some authorities say that the prisoner exchange this year was carried out in Jumādā I (July 24–August 22, 860).

The following is reported on the authority of Naṣr b. al-Azhar al-Shī'ī, who was the emissary of al-Mutawakkil to the Byzantine ruler for the prisoner exchange:[562] When I went to Constantinople, I visited [Emperor] Michael's palace with my black robe, sword, dagger, and cap. I had a discussion with the maternal uncle of the ruler, Bardas, who was in charge of the affairs of the realm.[563] They refused to let me enter with my sword and black robe, whereupon I said that I was leaving, which I did. But I was [1450] brought back while I was on my way. I had gifts with me, including about 1,000 musk bags, silk garments, much saffron, and exquisite pieces. The emperor had permitted delegations from Burjān to attend and others who had come to him.[564] The gifts that I brought were carried in to him.

When I was admitted into his presence, he was on an elevated throne,[565] with the Patrikioi standing around him. I greeted him and then sat down at the edge of the large dais where a seat had been prepared for me.[566] I placed the gifts before him.

In front of Michael there were three interpreters: a valet

---

561. On this prisoner exchange, and the mission of Naṣr b. al-Azhar, see Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 237ff., 320ff.; Bury, History, 279–81.

562. See also the description in Bar Hebraeus, Chronography, 144–45.

563. The Mss. are unpointed. The text has B-t-r-n-ā-s; 'Aynī: B-t-r-y-ā-s. Petronas was a brother of Theodora. Bury, History, 279, suggests that Bardas is intended. This makes sense in view of the fact that Bardas, also a brother of Theodora, was by 861 virtually the supreme authority in the empire, wielding power in his nephew's name. Bury suggests that Naṣr had written in his report "his uncle" and Ṭabarī added the explanatory "Petronas." But cf. Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 238, n. 1.

564. Burjān is the area of the Bulgars; *EI*², s.v. Bulghar; Minorsky, Ḥudūd, Index, 488.

565. Text: fa-idhā huwa 'alā sarīr fawqa sarīr, lit. "he was on a throne above a throne." The bottom sarīr must have been a dais. For sarīr ("seat, bench, sofa, royal seat/throne, bier"), see Sadan, Mobilier, 32ff.

566. That is, at the edge of the platform or elevation on which the royal throne was placed.

(ghulām farrāsh) of Masrūr al-Khādim,[567] a page of ʿAbbās b. Saʿīd al-Jawharī, and a veteran interpreter of his named Sergius.[568] They asked me how they should translate my words to him, and I answered, "Don't add anything to what I say to you." They set about translating what I was saying. The emperor accepted my gifts and did not give orders that any of them be handed on to anyone else. He was congenial to me and honored me, and had a house prepared for me close by him. I went out and took up residence there.

Inhabitants from Lulon approached the emperor expressing their desire to convert to Christianity and join up with him. They sent along two Muslims from there to serve as hostages.

Naṣr said: Michael disregarded me for about four months until he received a letter about the revolt of the inhabitants of Lulon, their seizing his emissaries, and the Arab conquest of the town. The Byzantines resumed speaking with me, and the negotiations between us concerning prisoner exchange led to the surrender of all the prisoners in their possession and all those whom I brought. There were a little over one thousand. And all the prisoners who were in their hands came to more than two thousand, including twenty women, along with ten children.

They accepted my request for a mutual oath. I asked that the emperor's maternal uncle swear, whereupon he did so on behalf of Michael. I said, "O king, your maternal uncle has sworn an [1451] oath to me. Does this oath bind you?" He responded affirmatively with a nod.[569] I did not hear him utter a word from the time I entered Byzantine territory until I left. Only the interpreter would speak, and he would listen and then nod yes or no without talking. His maternal uncle administered his affairs.

I then left him, along with the prisoners, who were in excellent condition. When we came to the place for the prisoner exchange, we released our respective groups of prisoners. More than two thousand Muslims came into our hands, including a few who had converted to Christianity. The Byzantines received a few more than a thousand.

567. A Masrūr al-Khādim al-Kabīr first appears at the time of Hārūn al-Rashīd; see Crone, Slaves on Horses, 192–93; and see Ṭabarī, III, 1166 (Marin, Reign, 4). According to Jahshiyārī, Wuzarāʾ, 254, he survived until the time of al-Mutawakkil. See above, n. 242.

568. Text: Surḥūn. Read perhaps Sarjūn, that is, Sergius; Vasiliev, Byzance, I, 238, n. 3.

569. For qāla bi-raʾsihi in the sense of gesturing, see Glossarium, CDXXXVII, where Ṭabarī, III, 1251, is also cited (Marin, Reign, 72).

A number [of Muslim prisoners] had converted to Christianity. The emperor said to them, "I will not accept you until you reach the site of the prisoner exchange. Whoever wishes me to receive him into Christianity should return from this place. If not, let him rejoin his companions and go off with them."

Most of those who had converted to Christianity were inhabitants of the Maghrib. The majority had converted in Constantinople. There were two goldsmiths who had converted, and they were friendly toward the [other] prisoners. Only seven Muslims remained in Byzantine territory of those whom the [Byzantine] ruler had taken captive. Five had been brought from Sicily, and I paid their ransom so that they could be sent back there. Two men were hostages from Lulon, whom I left, saying, "Accept these two,[570] for they wish to convert to Christianity."

The inhabitants of Baghdad had rain this year for twenty-one days in Shaʿbān (October 21–November 18, 860) and Ramaḍān (November 19–December 18). It rained so much that the grass grew beyond the roofs of houses.

[1452] Al-Mutawakkil performed the prayer of Breaking the Fast this year in al-Jaʿfariyyah. ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Mūsā prayed in its Friday Mosque, but no one led public prayer in Sāmarrā.

In this year, information was received concerning a neighborhood in the area of Balkh belonging to the dihqāns, where it rained pure blood.[571]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Zaynabī.

In this year, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir went on the pilgrimage, and supervised the events of the festival season.

The inhabitants of Sāmarrā observed the Day of Sacrifice this year (10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah [February 25, 861]) on Monday, on the basis of sighting the new moon, and the inhabitants of Mecca observed it on Tuesday.

---

570. Text: uqtuluhumā = "Kill these two." Addenda, DCCLXXVI: iqbaluhumā, which is followed here.

571. Balkh was the principal city in Khurāsān. The dihqāns were in this period hereditary rulers of a given area; Minorsky, Ḥudud, 523; *EI*², s.v. Dihḳān.

The Events of the Year 247[572] (July 5, 861–June 22, 862)

One of the events was the murder of al-Mutawakkil.

The Reason for al-Mutawakkil's Murder and How It Took Place

Abū Ja'far said:[573] It was reported to me that the reason for this was that al-Mutawakkil ordered that letters be drawn up concerning the confiscation of Waṣīf's estates in Iṣbahān and the Jabal so as to grant them as fiefs to al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān. The appropriate letters were written, and they were transmitted to the [Office of the] Seal to be executed[574] on Thursday, 5 Sha'bān (October 14, 861). Waṣīf learned of this and then confirmed that this was indeed al-Mutawakkil's order.

Al-Mutawakkil planned to lead the public prayer on the last Friday of Ramaḍān (December 5, 861). On the first day of Ramaḍān 572. Text: wa-thalāthīn. Addenda, DCCLXXVI: wa-arba'īn.

573. That is, Ṭabarī. The following account is translated by Sauvaget, Historiens, 24–31 ("Une tragédie de palais"); and see pp. 45–50 for a translation of Mas'ūdī's account.

574. Text: 'alā an tataqaddama. Cairo edition (Mss. A and D): 'alā an tunfadha.

(November 8, 861) it became common knowledge that the Commander of the Faithful would lead the public prayer on the last Friday of the month. The people assembled for this purpose, [1453] thronging together. The Hāshimites left Baghdad [for Sāmarrā] to present petitions to him and to speak with him when he went out riding.[575]

When Friday arrived, al-Mutawakkil decided to ride to the prayer service, whereupon 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā and al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, the people have assembled, and there are many, from your family and others, some registering grievances and some petitioning. As the Commander of the Faithful is complaining of dejection and indisposition,[576] if he wishes to order that one of the heirs apparent lead the prayer, and that we should all support him, let him do so."

The caliph replied that he agreed and ordered al-Muntaṣir to lead the prayer.

When al-Muntaṣir rose to ride to the prayer service, 'Ubaydallāh and al-Fatḥ said, "O Commander of the Faithful, we have an idea—but the Commander of the Faithful is more perceptive [than we]." He asked, "What is it? Propose it to me." They replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, give orders that Abū 'Abdallāh al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh lead the public prayer, so as to honor him on this exalted day." The members of his household and all the notables gathered together, for God has caused him to reach his appointed time.[577] Abū Ja'far said: A child had been born to al-Mu'tazz a day before this.

Thus al-Mutawakkil ordered al-Mu'tazz to ride out and lead the public prayer, while al-Muntaṣir remained in his residence, which was in al-Ja'fariyyah.[578] This only exasperated al-Muntaṣir further. When al-Mu'tazz had completed his sermon, 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā and al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān rose in his honor and kissed his hands and feet. Having finished praying, al-Mu'tazz departed, the two leaving with him, along with the notables, in the caliphal 575. Text: rakaba. Leiden Ms. C: rākib.

576. Text: wa-wa'kah. Leiden Mss. w-'-l-a. Cairo edition, Mss. A and D; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 60: wa-'illah bihi.

577. Text: balagha 'llāhu bihi; see Lane, s.v. balagha, I, 250a.

578. Text: fī manzilihi wa-kāna bi-l-Ja'fariyyah. Ms. O: bi-dārihi fī al-Ja'fariyyah.

procession. He marched with the insignias before him, until he was admitted into his father's presence, 'Ubaydallāh and al-Fatḥ [1454] accompanying him.

Dāwūd b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī, who entered with him, said, "O Commander of the Faithful, permit me to say something." He replied, "Speak." Dāwūd then said, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, I have known al-Amīn, al-Ma'mūn, al-Mu'taṣim, and al-Wāthiq bi-llāh as well. But, by God, I have never witnessed anyone occupy a pulpit who was superior in imposing stature, spontaneous speech, sonorous voice, mellifluous tone, and eloquence to al-Mu'tazz bi-llāh. May God give him power, O Commander of the Faithful, by your abiding survival, and may God give you and us pleasure by giving him life." Al-Mutawakkil replied, "May God let you hear glad tidings and delight us through you."

On Sunday—this was the Day of Breaking the Fast (December 8, 861)—al-Mutawakkil felt weak and requested that al-Muntaṣir be given orders to lead the public prayer. 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān then said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, the people had anticipated seeing the Commander of the Faithful on Friday and thronged together, but the Commander of the Faithful did not ride out. We fear that if he does not ride out [this time] people will spread alarming news about his illness. It would be best for the Commander of the Faithful to cheer his friends and daunt his enemies by doing so. Al-Mutawakkil then ordered them to make the necessary preparations for him to ride out. He did so and led the public prayer, and then turned back to his residence, remaining there on this day and the next without inviting any of his boon companions.

It is reported that, when he rode out on the Day of Breaking the Fast, lines had been formed for him for about four mīl (eight km.).[579] The people passed before him on foot, and he led the public prayer. He returned to his palace, took a handful of earth, and sprinkled it upon his head. Asked about this, he said, "I saw this mighty throng, and realizing that they were under my power, [1455] I wished to humble myself before God."

579. The following section on al-Mutawakkil's murder is translated by Lewis, Islam, 30–34; see also the reference by Goldziher, Muslim Studies, II, 63.

On the day after the Day of Breaking the Fast, he did not invite any of his boon companions. On the third day, which was Tuesday, 3 Shawwāl (December 10, 861), in the morning, he was vivacious and cheerful. He commented, "I feel as though I have recovered my pulse."[580]

Al-Ṭayfūrī and Ibn al-Abrash, who were his physicians, said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God determine what is good for you, go ahead [and summon your boon companions]."[581] And so he did. He craved camel meat and gave orders that it be served to him, and then grasped it with his own hand.

It is reported that Ibn al-Ḥafṣī the Singer attended the audience.[582] Ibn al-Ḥafṣī said: None of those who usually dined with him attended[583] except for me, 'Ath'ath,[584] Zunām,[585] and Bunān,[586] the page of Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh,[587] who came with al-Muntaṣir. Ibn al-Ḥafṣī went on: Al-Mutawakkil and al-

---

580. Text: mass al-dam. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 274: harakat al-dam.

581. Al-Ṭayfūrī is Isrā'īl b. Zakariyyā' al-Ṭayfūrī; Sezgin, GAS, III, 91, 97. An Ibn al-Ṭayfūrī is mentioned below, 1496 (p. 219), who may be his son. Al-Ṭayfūrī is a family name. The word ṭayfūr means "bird, winged insect"; Steingass, Dictionary, s.v. Al-Ṭayfūrī was the physician of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, who presented him to al-Mutawakkil; Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, 'Uyūn, I, 107–8. For Ibrāhīm b. Ayyūb al-Abrash, son of the translator-physician Ayyūb al-Abrash, see ibid., I, 158.

582. Ibn al-Ḥafṣī al-Mughannī was a court singer of al-Mutawakkil; Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 153; Neubauer, Musiker, 181. Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, par. 143, mentions him among a group of singers.

583. Text: mimman ya'kul ḥāḍiran. Cairo edition, Ms. A, adds bayn yadayhi after ya'kul.

584. 'Ath'ath al-Aswad was a black slave of Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh. See also below, 1459–61; Ibn Ṭayfūr, Baghdād, 106; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIII, 30–32; Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 154; Farmer, History, 140, 161.

585. Zunām al-Zamīr ("the Reed Pipe Player") was a musician who specialized on the mizmār, or reed pipe, and entertained in the courts of Hārūn, al-Mu'taṣim, al-Wāthiq, and al-Mutawakkil; Ṭabarī, III, 1323 (Marin, Reign, 127); Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 154; Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, par. 143; Farmer, History, 131; Neubauer, Musiker, 209–210; Stigelbauer, Sängerinnen, 67, 131.

586. Bunān b. 'Amr al-Ḍārib, Ra's al-Baghl ("Mule Head") was a court singer at the time of al-Mutawakkil and al-Muntaṣir and a close confidant of the latter; Farmer, History, 158; Neubauer, Musiker, 176; Stigelbauer, Sängerinnen, 144, 147–49.

587. Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh followed his father Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh as governor of the Jazīrah under al-Ma'mūn, in 206 (821–22); Ṭabarī, III, 1045, 1075 (Bosworth, Reunification, 109, 147); Ibn Ṭayfur, Baghdad, 18, 101; Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, V, 104. See also Crone, Slaves on Horses, 184. He was a brother of Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā b. Mu'ādh; above, n. 14.

Fatḥ b. Khāqān were dining together; we were nearby, across from them. The boon companions were dispersed in their chambers, as he had not yet invited any of them. The Commander of the Faithful turned to me and said, "You and ʿAthʿath dine before me, and let Naṣr b. Saʿīd al-Jahbadh dine with you."[588] I responded, "O my lord, Naṣr eats me out of house and home, by God. How can he be [permitted to] sit with us?" The caliph responded, "Go on and eat, by my life." And so we ate. Then we let our hands drop opposite him.[589] The Commander of the Faithful turned and looked at us with our hands dropped. He asked, "What is wrong with you that you are not eating?" I replied, "My lord, what was in front of us is gone." He ordered that more food be added. So [the [1456] food] that was before him was ladled to us.

Ibn al-Ḥafṣī said that the Commander of the Faithful was never more cheerful than on that day. He added: Al-Mutawakkil convened his court, summoning his boon companions and singers, who then attended. Qabīḥah, the mother of al-Muʿtazz,[590] gave him a green, silk ornamented gown (miṭraf).[591] People had never seen anything quite as beautiful. He kept staring at it with approval, admiring it greatly. He then ordered that it be cut in half and returned to her, commenting to her messenger, "It will remind her of me."[592] He went on, "By God, my heart tells me that I shall not wear it, and I don't wish anyone after me to do so. I ordered that it be torn only so that no one wears it after me." We said to him, "Our lord, this is a happy day, O Commander of the Faithful. God forbid that you should say this, our lord." Then he began to drink and revel while repeating,[593] "By God, I am leav-

588. Naṣr b. Saʿīd al-Jahbadh, a government banker, is apparently not the same as Naṣr b. Saʿīd al-Maghribī, an army commander, mentioned below, 1481 (pp. 205–6).

589. The expression ʿallaqa yadayhi means to drop one's hands at a banquet when nothing more remains on the table, as opposed to raising the hands as a sign of satisfaction; Glossarium, CCCLXXII.

590. For Qabīḥah, mother of al-Muʿtazz, see, for example, Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, Index, 550; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 48 (d. 264/877/78). She was called Qabīḥah ("Ugly") by al-Mutawakkil by way of antiphrasis; see Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 63.

591. A miṭraf is a garment with a (silk) embroidered border on either end; Ahsan, Social Life, 40–41; *EI*², s.v. Libās, V, 737.

592. Text: adhkaratnī bihi. ʿAynī: qul lahā tadhkurīnī bihi = "Tell her to remember me by it."

593. For lahija bi-qawl in this sense, see Glossarium, CDLXXIII.

ing you soon." He went on being frivolous and merry until the evening.

It is reported by some(one) of the informants that al-Mutawakkil decided—he and al-Fatḥ—that they would have lunch with 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar al-Bāzyār[594] on Thursday, 5 Shawwāl (December 12, 861), and arrange for him to assassinate al-Muntaṣir, and kill Waṣīf and Bughā, as well as other Turkish commanders and notables.

[1457] According to what Ibn al-Ḥafṣī reported, al-Mutawakkil's ridicule of his son al-Muntaṣir increased on Tuesday, one day earlier. He would alternately vilify him, get him drunk, give orders that he be cuffed, and threaten to have him killed.

It is reported on the authority of Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī: I was informed by some(one) of the women who was in the curtained-off area that al-Mutawakkil turned to al-Fatḥ and said to him, "I am acquitted of God and my relationship to the Messenger of God[595] if you do not cuff him," that is, al-Muntaṣir. Al-Fatḥ got up and cuffed him twice on the back of his neck. Al-Mutawakkil then said to those present, "All witness that I have deposed the Impatient One."[596] Then al-Mutawakkil turned to him and said, "I named you al-Muntaṣir ("the Victorious"), but because of your folly the people named you al-Muntaẓir ("the Expectant"), and now you have become al-Musta'jil ("the Impatient")."

Al-Muntaṣir replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you had given orders that I be decapitated, it would have been more bearable than your present treatment of me." The caliph said, "Let him drink." Al-Mutawakkil then ordered that supper be served, and it was brought in, this being in the middle of the night.

Al-Muntaṣir left the caliph's company and ordered Bunān, Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā's page, to accompany him. When he exited, 594. Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 7–8, mentions a Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Bāzyār as a boon companion of al-Mutawakkil. The cognomen al-Bāzyār means "the Falconer" or more correctly "the Ostreger"; see *EI*², s.v. Bayzara.

---

595. See Qur'ān 9:1.

596. Leiden text adds at this point: Fa-qāla al-Muntaṣir, yā Amīr al-Mu'minīn ("Al-Muntaṣir replied, "O Commander of the Faithful"). But no reply follows (see two lines below). Cairo edition indeed omits these words, retaining only the name "al-Muntaṣir," according to which we would translate ". . . the Impatient One, al-Muntaṣir" as a gloss (see also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 62: ya'nī al-Muntaṣir).

food[597] was placed in front of al-Mutawakkil, which he set about eating, devouring it while drunk. It is reported on the authority of Ibn al-Ḥafṣī that, when al-Muntaṣir went out to his chamber, he took the hand of Zurāfah,[598] saying to him, "Come with me." He replied, "My master, [I cannot, for] the Commander of the Faithful has not yet risen." Al-Muntaṣir then said, "The Commander of the Faithful has been overcome by wine, and right now [1458] Bughā and the boon companions are leaving. Now, I would like you to place the responsibility for your children with me. Ūtāmish[599] requested that I marry off his son to your daughter and your son to his daughter." Zurāfah said to him, "We are your slaves, my master. Command us as you please." Al-Muntaṣir took him by the hand and departed with him.[600]

Ibn al-Ḥafṣī said: Zurāfah had commented to me before this, "Take care, for the Commander of the Faithful has become drunk and is just now awaking. Tamrah[601] summoned me and requested that I ask you to come to him, and we shall all go to his chamber." I said to him, "I shall precede you to him." He added: Zurāfah had gone with al-Muntaṣir to his chamber.

Bunān, the page of Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā, reported that al-Muntaṣir said to him, "I have matched the son of Zurāfah with the daughter of Ūtāmish and the son of Ūtāmish with the daughter of Zurāfah." I said to al-Muntaṣir, "My master, where is the wed-

597. Mā'idah, the common word for "table," has the sense of "food" here (cf. English "spread"), as is evident from the word ya'kuluhā; see Glossarium, CDXCVII.

598. A fellow named after Zurāfah (or Zarāfah = "Giraffe") is mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 1504 (Saliba, 4); and see 1511 (Saliba, 11), where he leads a contingent of mawlās against attackers of the Sāmarrā prison. Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh, 362, says that he was a chamberlain (ḥājib) of al-Mutawakkil. See also Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 7, 40.

599. Ūtāmish later became wazīr under al-Musta'īn; Ṭabarī, III, 1502–03 (Saliba, 2). He was an army commander and nephew of Bughā the Elder. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 601–02, Ūtāmish, called 'ṣāḥib al-Muntaṣir,' took part in the plot to assassinate al-Mutawakkil. The note ad loc. gives his teknonym as Abū Mūsā and his patronymic as Khaṭarkīn. Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 273, says that he was a page of al-Wāthiq, and that he was close to al-Muntaṣir, who cultivated the Turks, for which reason al-Mutawakkil hated him. See also Tanūkhī, Faraj, 157, 159; Sourdel, Vizirat, 289–91, 294, 303, 673, 726, 735.

600. Al-Muntaṣir tried to cajole Zurāfah to be loyal to him, and thus he hoped to build up a coterie of followers.

601. Text: Tamrah ("date"). Ṣūlī and Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XIV, 52 (cited in note ad loc.) have Thamarah ("fruit").

ding felicitation?[602] It will enhance the betrothal [ceremony]." He replied, "Tomorrow, God willing, for this evening has already passed." Zurāfah departed for the chamber of Tamrah, and when he entered he called for food, which was brought in. He had eaten just a bit when we heard a clamor and screaming, at which point we got up.

Bunān continued: It was only after Zurāfah left Tamrah's residence that Bughā met al-Muntaṣir, who asked, "What is this clamor?" Bughā replied, "It's all right, Commander of the Faithful," whereupon al-Muntaṣir inquired, "What are you saying, woe unto you?" To which Bughā answered, "May God magnify your reward [for the loss of] our lord, the Commander of the Faithful. He was the Lord's servant, and when God summoned him, al-Mutawakkil responded."

Bunān said: Al-Muntaṣir held audience and gave orders that the [1459] door of the house and the audience hall in which al-Mutawakkil had been killed be locked. It and all the other doors were then locked. He thereafter sent a message to Waṣīf ordering him to bring al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'ayyad on the pretext that the message was from al-Mutawakkil.

It is reported on the authority of 'Ath'ath that al-Mutawakkil called for the repast after al-Muntaṣir had risen and left along with Zurāfah. Bughā the Younger, called al-Sharābī, was standing at the curtain [of the harem]. That day it was the turn of Bughā the Elder's patrol to guard the palace. His deputy in the palace was his son Mūsā, who was the son of al-Mutawakkil's maternal aunt.[603] Bughā the Elder was then away in Samosata.

Bughā the Younger entered the audience hall and ordered the boon companions to leave for their chambers. Al-Fatḥ said to him that it was not yet time for their departure, and that the Commander of the Faithful had not yet risen. Bughā then replied, "The Commander of the Faithful ordered me not to let anyone 602. Nithār is the strewing of fruits, nuts, sugar, or money on a festive occasion; Lane, Lexicon, 2764. The well-known sprinkling of coins on the head of a poet is mentioned below, 1466 (p. 186).

603. Mūsā, son of Bughā the Elder, died in Muḥarram, 264 (September 13–October 12, 877), and was buried in Sāmarrā, according to Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 49; and see Tanūkhī, Nishwār, IV, 110; VIII, 79–82; Sourdel, Vizirat, Index, 775.

remain in the audience hall after [he had imbibed] seven [raṭls], and he has already drunk fourteen." Al-Fatḥ still did not want the guests to rise. Bughā now said to him that the female relatives of the Commander of the Faithful were behind the curtain, and that he had become drunk, in which case they should get up and leave. They all went out except for al-Fatḥ, ʿAthʿath, and four of the caliph's personal servants (khadam al-khāṣṣah)—Shafīʿ, Faraj the Younger, Muʾnis, and Abū ʿĪsā Mārid al-Muḥrizī.[604]

ʿAthʿath said: The cook placed the repast before al-Mutawakkil, whereupon he set about eating voraciously, inviting Mārid to eat with him. The caliph was drunk, and when he finished part of his food he recommenced drinking.

ʿAthʿath reported that Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil [al-Muwaffaq], brother of al-Muʾayyad on his mother's side, was with them in the audience hall. He rose to go to the privy, but Bughā al-Sharābī had locked all the doors except the one that led to the riverbank, through which the group that was designated to kill the caliph entered. Seeing them, Abū Aḥmad bellowed at them, "What is this, low lifes!" At that point their swords were already [1460] drawn.

ʿAthʿath went on: At the head of the band that set about to assassinate the caliph were Baghlūn, the Turk; Bāghir; Mūsā b. Bughā; Hārūn b. Suwārategin; and Bughā al-Sharābī.[605] When al-Mutawakkil heard the cry of Abū Aḥmad, he raised his head, and seeing the group he asked, "What is this, Bughā?" The latter replied, "These are the men of the patrol who have put up for the night at the door of my lord, the Commander of the Faithful." The group withdrew to the rear when they heard al-Mutawakkil

---

604. For al-khadam al-khāṣṣah (khawāṣṣ), see Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Rusūm, 27, 80, 91; tr. Salem, 26, 65, 73. Inter alia they stand around and behind the caliphal throne. A Mārid al-Khādim is mentioned, op. cit., 73; tr., 60.

605. For Baghlūn the Turk, see Fragmenta, 556; Herzfeld, Samarra, 208. Bāghir, or Bāghar, the Turk, Abū Muḥammad, was killed in 251 (865–66; Ṭabarī, III, 1535–38 [Saliba, 28ff.]. The story connects with events in our text. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 263, 268, 269, 271–72; Tanbīh, 362. Bāghir is often singled out as the main assassin. The assassination scene is described, for instance, by Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, II, 601–02; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 271–74; Tanbīh, 362; Fragmenta, 554–57; Yāqūt, Irshād, VI, 117. Yaʿqūbī mentions among the assassins Bughā the Younger, Ūtāmish, Bāghir, Baghlūn, Wājin, Kindāsh (and two other names that are unclear). Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 271, mentions only Bāghir, accompanied by ten anonymous Turks.

speak to Bughā. Neither Wājin[606] and his companions nor the sons of Waṣīf were with them as yet.

ʿAthʿath reported: I heard Bughā say to them, "Low lifes, you are as good as dead, so at least die with honor," whereupon the group [of assassins] returned to the audience hall. Baghlūn rushed over to al-Mutawakkil and struck him with a blow upon his shoulder and his ear, cutting it off. Al-Mutawakkil cried out, "Hold it! May God cut off your hand!" Then the caliph tried to throw himself upon Baghlūn. The latter blocked him with his hand, which the caliph removed. Bāghir then came to Baghlūn's support.

Al-Fatḥ called out, "Woe to all of you! [This is the] Commander of the Faithful." To this Bughā replied, "Why don't you shut up, you idiot!" Al-Fatḥ then shielded al-Mutawakkil, but Hārūn slit him open with his sword, whereupon he cried out "Death!" Hārūn and Mūsā b. Bughā pounced upon al-Mutawakkil with their swords. They killed him and sliced him to pieces. ʿAthʿath was struck by a blow on his head. A young servant (khādim) who was with al-Mutawakkil slipped under the curtain [of the harem] and thus was saved. The rest fled.[607] [1461] Bunān reported: [The assassins] had approached Waṣīf and said to him, "Be with us. We fear that our plan will not work and we'll be killed." He replied, "Have no fear." They went on, "So send with us some of your sons," whereupon he sent with them five of his sons—Ṣāliḥ, Aḥmad, ʿAbdallāh, Naṣr, and ʿUbaydallāh[608]—so that they were able to accomplish their plan.

It is reported on the authority of Zurqān, the deputy of Zurāfah over the gatekeepers, and others that, when al-Muntaṣir took Zurāfah by the hand and led him from the palace and the group of assassins entered, ʿAthʿath looked at them and said to al-Mutawakkil, "We have gotten rid of the lions, snakes, and scorpions only to fall prey to the swords." The basis for this comment was

---

606. Ṣūlī adds al-Ṣughdī; cf. III, 1306 (Marin, Reign, 113), where he is called Wājin al-Ushrūsanī. Herzfeld, Samarra, 208, vocalizes Wājan.

607. Text: wa-taharraba. Leiden Ms. O, Cairo edition, Mss. A and D: wa-taṭayyara = "dispersed, vanished, disappeared."

608. Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf continued to play a role as a military figure in the following decades; d. 256 (III, 1832). Aḥmad b. Waṣīf is mentioned once again [Ṭabarī, III, 1833].

that al-Mutawakkil occasionally [amused himself] by inciting[609] snakes, scorpions, and lions [against prey].

When ʿAthʿath mentioned swords, al-Mutawakkil asked him, "Woe to you, what are you saying?"[610] He had just finished making his remark when the assassins burst in. Al-Fatḥ confronted them,[611] "Get out of here, you dogs, get out!" Bughā al-Sharābī rushed over to him and split open his belly with a sword. The others pounced upon al-Mutawakkil. ʿAthʿath fled headlong. Abū Aḥmad was in his chamber, and when he heard the commotion he came out and shielded his father. Baghlūn rushed up to him and struck him twice. When Abū Aḥmad saw the swords overtaking him, he exited, abandoning them.

The group of assassins went out to al-Muntaṣir and hailed him as caliph, informing him that the Commander of the Faithful had died. Brandishing swords over Zurāfah, they urged him to render the oath of allegiance, whereupon he did so. At this point, al-Muntaṣir sent a message to Waṣīf saying, "Al-Fatḥ assassinated my father, so I killed him in turn. Come with your eminent companions," whereupon Waṣīf and his companions presented themselves and rendered the oath of allegiance.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā was in his chamber executing affairs and [1462] thus knew nothing of the [assassination by] the group.

It is reported, however, that a Turkish woman delivered a note disclosing what the group had planned. Accordingly, the note came to the attention of ʿUbaydallāh, who consulted al-Fatḥ about it. The matter [first] came to the attention of Abū Nūḥ ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm,[612] secretary of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, who communicated it to al-Fatḥ. They concurred that al-Mutawakkil should be kept in the dark so as to preserve his cheerfulness, being loath to spoil his day. They did not take the plot of this group seriously, confident that no one would dare or be able to carry it out.

It is also reported that Abū Nūḥ planned to flee on that very 609. For the verb ashlā in this sense, see Lane, Lexicon, 1592; Ahsan, Social Life, 214–16.

610. Leiden Ms. O and Cairo edition Ms. A add: ay suyūf = "that is, swords," and then qāla "He said"], as though resuming the narrative.

611. Text: fa-qāla lahum; Ms. O: fa-ṣāḥa bihim = "He shouted at them."

612. See Fragmenta, 556, l. 4: Ibn Nūḥ. He died in 255 (868–69); Ṭabarī, III, 1723. And see Sourdel, Vizirat, 297–99, 304, 317, n. 4; 323, n. 6; 735.

night, while 'Ubaydallāh was poring over his work, executing affairs.[613] Ja'far b. Ḥāmid[614] was in front of him when one of the servants (khadam) suddenly intruded and said, "Why are you sitting, my master?" He asked, "What's the matter?" The servant replied, "The palace is a single sword."

'Ubaydallāh ordered Ja'far to go out, which he did.[615] He then returned and informed 'Ubaydallāh that the Commander of the Faithful and al-Fatḥ had been assassinated, whereupon 'Ubaydallāh left with his servants (khadam) who were with him and his personal entourage (khāṣṣah). He discovered that the doors were locked, and so headed in the direction of the riverbank, but the doors [leading to it] were also locked. He ordered that the [doors] on the side of the riverbank be forced open, whereupon three doors were forced, permitting him to exit to the riverbank. He went down into[616] a skiff[617] and took his place in it, accompanied by Ja'far b. Ḥāmid and a page of his. 'Ubaydallāh then traveled to the residence of al-Mu'tazz and asked for him, but did not find [1463] him. He remarked, "We belong to God and to Him we return."[618] It is my death and the caliph's. And he lamented for him.

'Ubaydallāh's companions rallied to him on Wednesday morning, including the Abnā',[619] Persians, Armenians, street thugs (zawāqīl), Arab tribesmen, outlaws (ṣa'ālīk) and others. [There was a difference of opinion concerning their number.][620] Some(one) of the informants said that there were about 20,000 horsemen. Others stated that he had 13,000 men with him, and still others claimed that he had 13,000 bridles (horses) with him. Those who gave a low count put it somewhere between 5,000 and 10,000 men.

---

613. Ms. O adds al-sulṭān (that is, affairs of the central government), probably as explanation.

614. See Sourdel, Vizirat, 284, n. 4 (concerning our text).

615. Ms. O has: "He went out, looked and then returned . . . ," which makes the text clearer.

616. Text: fa-ṣāra ilā. Leiden Ms. O: fa-nazala fī, which is preferred here.

617. The zawraq is a popular small craft that was often used in the rivers and canals of Iraq; Kindermann, "Schiff," 37.

618. See Qur'ān 2:151 and parallels.

619. The Abnā' (al-Dawla) were a military contingent in Baghdad; see *EI*², s.v.; and especially Lassner, Shaping, 129–36.

620. The bracketed words are added from Ms. O and from Cairo edition Ms. A.

They said to 'Ubaydallāh, "You have taken us as your protégés precisely for this kind of day; order us, then, to assail the group of assassins and kill al-Muntaṣir, the Turks, and his other associates. He refused this, commenting, "This is not the way of handling the situation, as our man is in their hands," meaning al-Mu'tazz.

It is reported on the authority of 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Munajjim:[621] I was reading to al-Mutawakkil, a few days before he was killed, one of the books of the Malāḥim.[622] Coming to a passage in the book stating that the tenth caliph would be killed in his audience hall, I stopped reading and put the book aside. The caliph asked me, "What is the matter that you have stopped?" I answered that it was all right. He said, "By God, you must read it." I then read it but refrained from mentioning the caliphs. Al-Mutawakkil commented, "I wish I knew who this poor fellow is who is going to be killed."

It is reported on the authority of Salamah b. Sa'īd al-Naṣrānī[623] that al-Mutawakkil saw Ashūṭ b. Ḥamzah al-Armanī a few days before he was killed. The caliph grumbled about having an audience with Ashūṭ and ordered that he be evicted. When asked [1464] whether he was satisfied with Ashūṭ's service, he replied, "Yes, indeed, but I dreamt a few nights ago that I had been riding him, when he turned to me, his head becoming like that of a mule,[624] and said to me, 'How much longer [do you suppose] you will molest us? Only a few days remain until the end of your appointed time of fifteen years.'" Salamah said: It tallied with the number of days [remaining of] his caliphate.

It is reported on the authority of Ibn Abī Rab'ī as follows: I dreamt that a man entered by way of the Rastan Gate[625] on a 621. See above, n. 539.

---

622. On Malāḥim books of prognostications concerning the length of rule of dynasties, see, for instance, Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, II, 187, 200, 202; Goldziher, Muslim Studies, II, 77; *EI*², s.v. Malāḥim, Malḥama.

623. Salamah b. Sa'īd al-Naṣrānī was a Christian who later became secretary to al-Musta'īn's mother (III, 1512, Saliba, 12); Sourdel, Vizirat, 304.

624. Text: al-baghl. Ms. O: al-ba'īr = "camel" and omits "to me."

625. Text: Bāb al-Rastan (cf. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 335.18). Ms. O: al-Rastīn; C: al-Rassīn. There was a Rastan Gate in Ḥimṣ. In both dreams, representatives of groups the caliph had suppressed (Armenians, citizens of Ḥimṣ) appear.

heifer, his face to the desert steppe and his back to the town, reciting:

O eyes, woe to you, shed copious tears.[626]
The killing of al-Mutawakkil means resurrection is nigh.[627]

Ḥubshī b. Abī Rab'ī reportedly died two years before al-Mutawakkil was assassinated.

It is reported on the authority of Muḥammad b. Sa'īd—Abū al-Wārith, the judge of Naṣībīn: I dreamt that someone came to me saying:

O sleepy-eyed in a body that is awake,
Why do your eyes not weep copiously?[628]

Have you not seen what fate's trials have done
With the Hāshimite and al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān?

[1465] They will be succeeded by their own people who betrayed them Until they too disappear like yesterday.[629]

After a few days, the postal courier conveyed the news that both the caliph and al-Fatḥ had been assassinated.

Abū Ja'far said: Al-Mutawakkil was assassinated an hour after dark on Wednesday night, 4 Shawwāl (December 11, 861). It is also said that he was killed on Thursday night. His caliphate had lasted fourteen years, ten months and three days at the time when he was assassinated. On the day of his murder, he was allegedly forty years old. Al-Mutawakkil was born in Fam al-Ṣilḥ[630] in Shawwāl 206 (February 27–March 27, 822). He had a light tan complexion, attractive eyes, and a sparse beard; he was slender.[631]

---

626. The second hemistich reads in the Leiden text: bi-l-dam' saḥḥan wa-'sbilī (for wa-asbilī). Ṣūlī and Ibn Badrūn, Sharḥ, 257: bi-l-dam' minki wa-asbilī.

627. Text: al-qiyāmah. Ṣūlī has al-maniyyah = "fate," "death."

628. Text and Cairo edition: bi-tahtāni. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 64: bi-buhtāni ("in dismay").

629. Ms. O, Ibn al-Athīr, and Ṣūlī omit this verse.

630. Fam al-Ṣilḥ is on the east bank of the Tigris River, at the mouth (fam) of the Ṣilḥ Canal, north of Wāsiṭ; Le Strange, Lands, 28, 38.

631. For asmar as light-brown complexion, see Fischer, Farb- und Formbezeichungen, 36ff. The term is probably used to depict the color of skin expressed below (see n. 656) by aṣfar. A portrait of al-Mutawakkil, from a coin or medallion

Some Things about al-Mutawakkil and His Way of Life

It is reported on the authority of Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb Abū al-Simṭ:[632] I recited to the Commander of the Faithful a poem about him in which I mentioned the Rāfiḍah.[633] He appointed me as governor of al-Baḥrayn and al-Yamāmah and bestowed four robes upon me in the Public Audience Hall. Al-Muntaṣir bestowed a robe upon me and ordered that I be given 3,000 dīnārs, whereupon they were sprinkled on my head. Al-Mutawakkil ordered his son al-Muntaṣir and Sa'd al-Ītākhī to collect them for me so that I would not handle any of them. They collected them, and I departed with the coins.

Marwān said that the poem which he recited about the caliph was:[634]

The kingdom of the caliph Ja'far
Bodes well-being for this world and the next.

Yours is the heritage of Muḥammad,
And by your justice oppression is banished.

The daughters' sons[635] hope for the heritage, [1466]
But they do not have a whit of it.

The son-in-law[636] is not an heir,
And the daughter does not inherit the caliphate.

---

dated 855, preserved in the Vienna Kunsthistorisches Museum, is printed by Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 277 (fig. 221). It is also shown in a large plate in Sourdel, Civilisation, plate no. 28. An "effigie hiératique," it depicts the caliph's coiffure, and shows him without crown or turban. He wears instead a large cap as a kind of diadem, from which a veil falls similar to those worn by Umayyad rulers. He has a large moustache and a double-pointed beard. See also the description of his garb in Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 26. See above, p. 59.

632. Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb Abū al-Simṭ was a panegyrist who served in the courts of al-Ma'mūn, al-Mu'taṣim, al-Wāthiq, and al-Mutawakkil; d. 240 (854–55); Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XI, 2-6; Sezgin, GAS, II, 582.

633. That is, Imāmi Shī'ites.

634. On this important poem, see C. E. Bosworth, Al-Maqrīzī's "Book of Contention," 21; Goldziher, Muslim Studies, II, 98–101.

635. That is, the descendants of Fāṭimah (and 'Alī).

636. That is, 'Alī, cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet.

Those who pretend to your legacy
Have only regret.

The deserving have received the inheritance,
So what does your reproach indicate?[637]

If you had a right to the caliphate,[638]
The resurrection would come to mankind.

The heritage is not for any but you,[639]
No, by God, and neither is honor,

I have come to show
The distinction between those who love and those who hate you.

After this, he sprinkled upon my head 10,000 dirhams for a poem I recited in the same vein.

It is related on the authority of Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb: When al-Mutawakkil became caliph, I sent to Ibn Abī Du'ād a panegyrical ode in which I eulogized him. At the end of the ode were two verses in which I mentioned the affair of Ibn al-Zayyāt, namely:

I was told that al-Zayyāt met his fate,
So I said that God has brought me conquest and victory.

Al-Zayyāt dug a pit with treachery
And was cast into it by falseness and betrayal.[640]

Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb continued: When Ibn Abī Du'ād received the ode, he mentioned it to al-Mutawakkil and recited the two verses to him. Al-Mutawakkil ordered that Marwān be presented to him. Ibn Abī Du'ād replied that he was in al-Yamāmah, where al-Wāthiq had banished him because of his affection for the Commander of the Faithful [al-Mutawakkil]. Al-Mutawakkil 637. "Your" here refers to the 'Alids.

638. Text: lahā. Ms. O; Cairo edition, Ms. A; Ibn al-Athīr: lamā. See also Addenda, DCCLXXVI, and Glossarium, CDXL. The verse is addressed to the 'Alids. I take lahā as referring to the caliphate.

639. Here "you" refers to the 'Abbāsids in general.

640. Ṣūlī has: "The betrayal, which he intended, cast him into it."

called for Marwān to be presented. Ibn Abī Du'ād replied that Marwān was in debt, and al-Mutawakkil then asked how much it was. He answered that it amounted to 6,000 dīnārs. Al-Mutawakkil then gave orders that the money be given to Marwān, and so it was. After that, Marwān was brought from al-Yamāmah to Sāmarrā, where he eulogized al-Mutawakkil in an ode: [1467]

Youth has departed, would that it had not.
Old age has come, would that it had not.

And when he came to the following two verses of the ode, al-Mutawakkil ordered that he be given 50,000 dirhams:

The caliphate of Ja'far resembles prophecy,
It came without his seeking it or laying claim.[641]

God gave him the caliphate as
He gave prophecy to the apostle.

It is reported on the authority of Abū Yaḥyā b. Marwān b. Muḥammad al-Shannī al-Kalbī[642]—Abū al-Simṭ Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb: When I went to the Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, I eulogized the heirs apparent and recited to him:[643]

May God water Najd, and peace be upon Najd,
How lovely is Najd in spite of distance.[644]

I looked to Najd, and Baghdad is far away.
Perhaps I shall see Najd, but O Najd!

In Najd there is a group who desire my visit, [1468]
And nothing is more pleasant than their visiting me.[645]

641. That is, borrowing from another people.

642. Ms. O: Abū Yaḥyā Ḥammād b. Muḥammad. Ṣūlī: "I was informed by Fatūḥ b. Maḥmūd b. Marwān—his father (Maḥmūd)—his father Marwān." Fatūḥ was thus the grandson of the poet Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb. Fatūḥ—or rather Mutawwaj?—was a poet in the court of al-Muktafī; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 354; Sezgin, GAS, II, 582 (Marzubānī, Muwashshaḥ, 303).

643. See Iṣfahānī, Aghani, XI, 2.

644. Ṣūlī has "from near and far."

645. Ṣūlī omits the last verse but gives nineteen others, according to the note in the Leiden edition.

Marwān said: When I finished reciting the poem he ordered that I be given 120,000 dirhams, fifty gowns, and three mounts: a horse, a mule, and a donkey. I did not depart before reciting in gratitude:[646]

The Lord of mankind has chosen Ja'far for them, Electing him to rule over them.

Marwān continued: When I came to the following verse, that is,

Restrain your generosity,
I fear I shall become overweaning—

Al-Mutawakkil exclaimed: "No, by God, I shall not hold back until I flood you[647] with my bounty, nor shall you depart[648] without stating a wish." I said: "O Commander of the Faithful, Ibn al-Mudabbir noted that the estate in al-Yamāmah, which you gave orders to present me as a fief, is waqf property[649] that al-Mu'taṣim gave to his offspring, and thus it may not be bestowed as a fief." Al-Mutawakkil replied, "I'll hold you responsible for [payment of] a dirham a year for one hundred years."[650] I replied, "It is not proper, O Commander of the Faithful, that one dirham be paid to the bureau." Ibn al-Mudabbir then asked if 1,000 dirhams [could be paid over one hundred years], and I said yes, whereupon al-Mutawakkil handed it over to me and to my descendants.

Following that, the caliph remarked, "This is not [the fulfillment of] a wish; it is a liability." I replied, "Al-Wāthiq ordered that the estates that I owned be granted to me as fiefs, but Ibn al-[1469] Zayyāt banished me, preventing me from taking possession of them, so deliver them to me." The caliph then ordered that they be handed over for one hundred dirhams per annum. They are the Suyūḥ.[651]

---

646. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XI, 3.

647. Text: u'arrifaka = "make you familiar with." The note in the Leiden edition suggests the reading ugharriqaka, which is followed here.

648. Text: bariḥta. O: tabraḥ.

649. Waqf is property that is inalienable, the profits from which go to charitable purposes.

650. He would thereby be paying a symbolic rent, and the waqf property would not be alienated.

651. The Suyūḥ were villages in al-Yamāmah that did not accept a peace treaty with Khālid b. al-Walīd when Musaylimah was defeated; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 222.

It is reported on the authority of Abū Ḥashīshah:[652] Al-Ma'mūn used to say, "The caliph after me will have an 'ayn in his name." It was assumed that it was his son al-'Abbās, and it turned out to be al-Mu'taṣim.[653] He would say that after him there would be a hā'. It was thought that it was Hārūn,[654] and it turned out to be al-Wāthiq. He would say that after him would be someone with yellow legs. It was surmised that it was Abū al-Ḥa-?-ā'iz al-'Abbās,[655] and it turned out to be al-Mutawakkil. I have seen him expose his legs when he sat on the throne, and they were yellow like the color of saffron.[656]

It is reported on the authority of Yaḥyā b. Aktham: I once attended the court of al-Mutawakkil when we mentioned al-Ma'mūn and his letters to al-Ḥasan b. Sahl. I went on quite a bit praising al-Ḥasan and depicting his merits, knowledge, learning, and intelligence, but none of those present concurred. Al-Mutawakkil asked what al-Ḥasan b. Sahl's view of the Qur'ān was.

I replied: He used to say, "Beyond the Qur'ān there is no need for further knowledge of precepts; beyond the Sunnah of the Messenger there is no need[657] for a single further action; and beyond clarification and exposition there is no need for further learning. And after rejection of demonstration and truth there are only swords to manifest proof." Al-Mutawakkil then said to Yaḥyā, "This is not what I wanted from you." To this Yaḥyā replied, "One who claims to be charitable should cite only the good qualities of someone who is absent."

The caliph now asked, "And what was al-Ḥasan accustomed to say during his discourse? For al-Mu'taṣim bi-llāh—may God have [1470] mercy upon him—used to recall it, but I have forgotten." Yaḥyā replied, "He used to say, 'O God, I praise you for the favors that

652. Abū Ḥashīshah Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Umayyah b. 'Amr al-Ṭunbūrī was a court musician (a tunburist) and poet, who entertained in caliphal courts from the time of al-Ma'mūn to al-Mu'tamid; Farmer, History, 158; Neubauer, Musiker, 196; Sezgin, GAS, II, 608.

653. For al-'Abbās b. Ma'mūn, see Bosworth, Reunification, Index, 267. He died in prison at Manbij in 223; see Ṭabarī, III, 1257f. (Marin, Reign, 76f.); Zambauer, Manuel, 4, 28, 32. Al-Mu'taṣim was al-Ma'mūn's brother.

654. Hārūn, son of al-Mā'mūn.

655. Ms. C: Abū al-'Abbās. His brother, Abū al-'Abbās Muḥammad?

656. Aṣfar means yellow or light-colored, and is the color by which the Arabs often described persons of Byzantine or European descent; See *EI*² s.v. It is probably intended to render what we call today "white." See also above, n. 631.

657. For waḥshah in the sense of necessity, see Glossarium, DLII.

only You can count, and I take refuge with You from sins that only Your pardon encompasses.'"

Al-Mutawakkil went on asking, "And what used he to say by way of approval or upon receiving some good news? Al-Mu'taṣim bi-llāh had ordered 'Alī b. Yazdād[658] to write it down for us. He did so and taught it to us, but we have forgotten." Yaḥyā replied that he would say, "Mentioning God's blessings and disseminating them, and counting his benefits and recounting them, is a precept which God has imposed upon their recipients, and is obeying His command regarding them and gratitude to Him for them. Praise be to God, Whose blessings are great and Whose favor is abundant, praise commensurate with His goodness that determines what is due Him and entails utmost gratitude to Him, thanks to His constant favor, kindness, and permanence—praise by someone who knows that this is from Him and gratitude to Him." Al-Mutawakkil said, "You are right. These are his very words, and all this is wisdom [which comes] from someone with experience and knowledge." The session then ended.

This year Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir came to Baghdad, having left Mecca in Ṣafar (April 16–May 14, 861). He complained that he was disturbed by the disagreement concerning the Day of Sacrifice. Al-Mutawakkil therefore ordered that a yellow mail pouch[659] be delivered from the gate [of the Caliphal Palace] to the celebrants of the festive season as to viewing the new moon of [1471] Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and that it be sent, as is the mail pouch that comes at the farewell ceremony of the festive season. He also ordered that wax be used instead of olive oil and naphtha for the pilgrimage station of Muzdalifah and other pilgrimage shrines.

In this year, al-Mutawakkil's mother died in al-Ja'fariyyah on 6 Rabī' II (June 19, 861).[660] Al-Muntaṣir offered the funeral prayer, and she was buried at the Friday Mosque.

In this year, the caliphal oath of allegiance was rendered to Muḥammad b. Ja'far, on Wednesday, 4 Shawwāl (December 11, 658. In Ṭabarī, III 1272, 1273 (Marin, Reign, 88–89), he is called 'Alī b. Yazdād al-'Aṭṭār. See also Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 241.

659. A kharīṭah is a leather pouch or envelope used for official mail; Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Rusūm, 17, 126, 127; tr. Salem, 21, 103.

660. Ms. O has Rabī' I.

861) or, it is said, on 3 Shawwāl (December 10). He was twenty-five years old, and his teknonym was Abū Ja'far. This was in al-Ja'fariyyah, where he stayed for ten days after the oath of allegiance was rendered. He then withdrew from there with his family, officers, and troops for Sāmarrā.

The Events of the Year

247 (cont'd)

(JULY 5, 861–JUNE 22, 862)

Those whom we have mentioned previously gave al-Muntaṣir the oath of allegiance on Wednesday night. It is reported on the authority of some(one) of them: On Wednesday morning the notables were present in al-Jaʿfariyyah, including the army commanders, secretaries, eminent men, Shākiriyyah, regular troops, and others. Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb read to them a letter reporting in the name of the Commander of the Faithful al-Muntaṣir that al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān had assassinated al-Muntaṣir's father, Jaʿfar al-Mutawakkil, and that al-Muntaṣir therefore killed al-Fatḥ in turn. The notables gave the oath of allegiance. ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān was present. He gave the oath of allegiance and then departed.

It is reported on the authority of Abū ʿUthmān Saʿīd the Younger: On the night that al-Mutawakkil was assassinated we were in the palace with al-Muntaṣir. Whenever al-Fatḥ went out, al-Muntaṣir accompanied him. And when he returned, al-Muntaṣir would rise or sit as al-Fatḥ did, and then exit in his wake. Whenever al-Fatḥ rode out, al-Muntaṣir held his stirrup and adjusted his attire on the saddle of his mount.

We received information that ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā had sta- [1472] tioned a group of men along al-Muntaṣir's way to assassinate him when he departed. Al-Mutawakkil had reviled and vexed al-Muntaṣir before he left. Offended by the caliph, al-Muntaṣir went out in anger, we along with him. When al-Muntaṣir reached his palace, he sent a message to his boon companions and inner circle of notables—he had arranged with the Turks before he departed to kill al-Mutawakkil while he was intoxicated from the wine.

Sa'īd the Younger went on: It was not long before a messenger arrived to summon me, informing me that emissaries of the Commander of the Faithful had come to the amīr al-Muntaṣir while he was riding. Our previous discussion came to my mind, that is, they were going to assassinate al-Muntaṣir, and this is why he was being summoned. I rode along, armed and prepared, and came to the gate of the amīr, where I found the men agitated. For Wājin had come to him and informed him of al-Mutawakkil's demise,[661] at which point he rode off. Alarmed, I caught up with him on one of the roads.

Realizing the state I was in, al-Muntaṣir said, "Don't worry. After we departed, the Commander of the Faithful choked on his drinking cup and died, may God have mercy upon him." I was overwhelmed and distressed by this. We proceeded—Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and a contingent of the commanders who were with us—until we entered al-Ḥayr,[662] and the news of al-Mutawakkil's murder followed us. The gates were seized and put in charge of guards.

I called out, "O, Commander of the Faithful," saluting al-Muntaṣir as caliph. I went on to say, "We should not leave you to the mercy of your mawlās[663] at this time."

He said, "By all means. You and Sulaymān al-Rūmī stay behind me." A piece of cloth was put down for him, which he then sat [1473] on, while we stood about him. Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and his secretary Sa'īd b. Ḥamīd[664] were present so as to render the oath of allegiance.

661. Text: qad fazi'a min amrihi. Cairo edition: qad faragha min amrihi (lit. "had finished his task" or the like; followed here). See also Addenda, DCCLXXVI.

662. A ḥayr is a park, enclosure, or pleasure garden. The al-Ḥayr section of Sāmarrā was, according to Herzfeld, Samarra, 100, between the Jawsaq Palace, the Great Mosque of al-Mutawakkil, and the site of modern Sāmarrā. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 258 = Wiet, Les pays, 50, 261–63/53–55, 265/58; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 229f., 241, 254. Al-Ḥayr was also the name given to the outer thoroughfare of the city.

663. That is, the Turks.

It is reported on the authority of Sa'īd b. Ḥamīd that Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb said to him, "Woe to you, O Sa'īd, don't you have two or three words by which the oath of allegiance may be rendered?" I answered, "Yes, and still more words." So I drew up the document of the oath of allegiance and administered it to those who were present and to all who came until Sa'īd the Elder arrived.

[Al-Muntaṣir] then sent the oath of allegiance to al-Mu'ayyad and told Sa'īd the Younger to go summon al-Mu'tazz.

Sa'īd the Younger reported: I said to him, "You shall not remain, O Commander of the Faithful, with less than the men who are [now] with you; and, by God, I shall not depart from behind you until the notables assemble." Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb then said, "There is someone here who is your equal, so go." I said, "I shall not go until enough men have assembled. I am at the moment more fit to serve him than you are." Then, when the number of army commanders rendering the oath of allegiance grew, I left in a state of despair. There were two pages with me. When I came to the gate of Abū Nūḥ,[665] the notables were coming and going in a state of agitation, for a great crowd with arms and equipment was at the gate.

When they became aware of me, one of their horsemen came over. He asked me who I was, for he did not know me. I gave him a cryptic reply about myself, telling him that I was one of al-Fatḥ's men. I proceeded to the gate of al-Mu'tazz, but did not find there any of the guards, gatekeepers or beggars,[666] nor any folk, until I came to the great gate. I knocked quite loudly but was answered only after some time. Asked who was there, I replied, [1474] "Sa'īd the Younger, emissary of the Commander of the Faithful 664. Sa'īd b. Ḥamīd, secretary of Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb, was appointed over the Bureau of Correspondence in 249 (863–64; III, 1514; Saliba, 13); see Sourdel, Vizirat, 288, 293, 735.

665. Abū Nūḥ = 'Īsā b. Ibrāhīm? See above, 1462 (p. 181). He was a secretary of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān.

666. Text (and Cairo Ṭ): wa-l-muktarīn. Ms. C (and Cairo A, D): wa-l-mukabbirīn. Ms. O: wa-l-mukthirīn. The note in the Leiden edition suggests the reading al-muktadīn = "beggars," accepted here. See also Wörterbuch, p. 22a, where meaning of "human beings" is given for mukabbirīn. And see Addenda, DCCLXXVI; Glossarium, CDXLV.

al-Muntaṣir." The messenger went away and left me waiting. I felt rejected and at a loss. But he then opened the gate and Baydūn al-Khādim[667] came out, bade me enter, and locked the gate behind me. I thought to myself that I was surely finished.

Baydūn then asked me for news, and I informed him that the Commander of the Faithful had choked on his cup of drink and died on the spot, that the notables had assembled and rendered the oath of allegiance to al-Muntaṣir, and that he dispatched me to the amīr Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh to summon him to attend the oath-of-allegiance ceremony. He went in and then came out to me and said that I should enter, whereupon I was admitted to al-Muʿtazz.

Al-Muʿtazz said to me, "Woe unto you, O Saʿīd, what news is there?" So I told him more or less what I had told Baydūn. I offered condolences to him and wept. I said, "Attend, my lord, and be among the first to give the oath of allegiance, thus gaining your brother's good will." He replied, "Woe unto you, [let us wait] until the morning." I kept diverting him,[668] with Baydūn al-Khādim lending a hand, until he prepared himself for the public prayer. He called for his clothing, got dressed, and a horse was brought out for him. He rode off, I along with him, avoiding the main road. I set about talking to him, trying to ease the situation for him. I kept reminding him of things he knew about his brother until we arrived at the gate of ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān. When al-Muʿtazz asked me about him, I replied that he would render the oath of allegiance with the notables, and that al-Fatḥ had already rendered the oath of allegiance, at which point he was relieved.[669]

[1475] A horseman caught up with us and went to Baydūn al-Khādim, confiding to him something I did not catch. Baydūn shouted at him, whereupon he went away, only to return three times. Each time Baydūn drove him away, shouting at him, "Leave us," until

667. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, IX, 118f. When Mutawakkil arrested ʿAlī b. al-Jahm, Baydūn went over to Qabīḥah. Herzfeld, Samarra, 212–13, says that he was the trusted servant of Qabīḥah and al-Muʿtazz.

668. For fa-mā ziltu aftiluhu al-ḥabla wa-l-ghārib in this sense, see Glossarium, CCCXCVII; Lane, Lexicon, 2333.

669. Text: fa-taʾannasa. Cairo edition, Mss. A and D: yaʾisa = "He then despaired."

we came to the gate of al-Ḥayr. I called for it to be opened. Asked who I was, I replied, "Sa'īd the Younger, with the amīr al-Mu'tazz," whereupon the gate was opened for me.

We went to al-Muntaṣir. Seeing al-Mu'tazz, he invited him to approach, embraced him, consoled him, and took the oath of allegiance from him. Then al-Mu'ayyad arrived with Sa'īd the Elder, and al-Muntaṣir did the same with him. When the notables arose in the morning,[670] al-Muntaṣir went to the Ja'farī [Palace] and ordered that al-Mutawakkil and al-Fatḥ be buried, and the notables[671] settled down.

Sa'īd the Younger said: I kept on demanding that al-Mu'tazz welcome the caliphate of al-Muntaṣir while he was immured in the palace until he gave me 10,000 dirhams.[672]

The text of the oath of allegiance that was rendered for al-Muntaṣir was as follows:[673]

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate.
>
> You render the oath of allegiance to the servant of God, al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, Commander of the Faithful, in obedience and contentment, with devotion, acceptance and sincere intention, not compelled but rather consenting, aware of what confirmation of this oath of allegiance entails, namely, obeying and fearing God and exalting the religion of God and His truth, the general welfare of God's servants, uniting the community, reforming affairs, tranquillity of the multitude, a secure future, power[674] of friends, repression of renegades.
>
> You are obligated to obedience and sincerity, and faithfulness to the rights and investiture of Muḥammad al-Imām, al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, the Servant of God and his

670. Text: wa-aṣbaḥa al-nās. But this is strange and is unrelated to their settling down. One expects a verb such as taḥarraka or iḍṭaraba ("were agitated"). See also below, 1479 (p. 202); and cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 68, ll. 8–9.

671. Text: li-nās. Read li-l-nās; see also Addenda, DCCLXXVI.

672. Cairo edition, Ms. A, adds: "In this year al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'ayyad abdicated, and [al-Muntaṣir] made public their abdication in the new Ja'farī Palace." But see below, 1485 (p. 210).

673. See the similar text in Ṭabarī, III, 1545f. (Saliba, 35f.).

674. Text: wa-'izz. O: wa-'izzah = "glory."

[1476] caliph. You shall not doubt, deceive, deviate, or have misgivings.

You shall heed him and give support, loyalty, and good counsel, secretly and openly, as well as ready devotion,[675] to all that the servant of God, al-Imām al-Muntaṣir billāh, Commander of the Faithful, orders.

You shall be allies of his friends and foes of his enemies, elite and common, far and near. You shall adhere to his oath of allegiance, in loyalty to [his] investiture, in responsibility for the covenant. Your heart shall be like your speech, your mind like your tongue, willing what the Commander of the Faithful wishes for you now and in the future.

After undertaking this oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful on your souls, confirming it on your necks, you shall render him your solemn oath, willing, obeying, with integrity of heart and intention.[676]

You shall not be permitted to violate anything that God has enjoined upon you.

No one among you shall deviate in this from support, devotion, good counsel, and friendship.

You shall not substitute [anything for this], and no one among you shall go back on his intention and deviate from his public position.

Your oath of allegiance, which you have sworn, is such that God will examine your hearts [to ensure] your commitment[677] and loyalty to its promise and your devotion to supporting it and assisting its recipient.

No defect, circumventing, artifice, or interpretation on your part shall adulterate this until the time when you [1477] meet God. You shall fulfill His covenant and carry out His claim upon you, not being presumptuous,[678] nor infringing [the oath of allegiance]. For those of you who render an oath of allegiance to the Commander of the

675. Text: al-khufūf wa-l-wuqūf; see Glossarium, CCXXVII.
676. Text: niyyatihi. See 1546, l. 20, in parallel text: bay'atihi.
677. Text: wa-i'tiqādihā. See 1547, l. 2; wa-i'timādihā.
678. Text: mustashrifīn. See 1547, l. 5: mustaribīn.

Faithful are actually rendering an oath of allegiance to God. God's hand is above your hands. Whoever violates [the oath] only violates his own interests. And whoever fulfills what God has imposed upon him shall be given a great award.

You are obligated by this, [namely] by this oath of allegiance that has been imposed upon you, through which you rendered your solemn vow, and by which loyalty, support, friendship, and sincerity are laid upon you. The divine covenant is incumbent upon you, for His covenant demands responsibility,[679] and the compact of God and His messenger. God has most strictly enjoined His prophets and messengers, and every one of His servants, in imposing His contracts,[680] that you heed this oath of allegiance, that you do not substitute [anything for this], that you obey and not disobey, that you are sincerely devoted without reservation, and that you adhere to what you promised, just as those bound to obedience obey, and those bound to a contract and loyalty remain steadfast in their loyalty and obligation. No whim or distraction shall divert you from this. And no error shall divert you from right guidance, while you expend your souls and effort, fulfilling the obligation of religion and obedience by means of your commitment. God will only accept from you loyalty to this oath of allegiance.

Whoever has rendered the oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful and then violates what he has affirmed, secretly or overtly, explicitly or deviously, deceiving with regard to his devotion to God, his commitment to the compacts of the Commander of the Faithful, and the divine covenants laid upon him,[681] using levity rather than seriousness, reliance upon falsehood rather than defending the truth, departing from the manner of [1478]

679. The words inna 'ahdahu kāna mas'ūlan, according to the note ad loc., are an intrusion from the margin. But cf. 1547, ll. 11–12.

680. Text: min muta'akkadi wathā'iqihi. See 1547, l. 14; min mawākīdihi wa-mawāthīqihi.

681. Text: mawāthīq Amīr al-Mu'minīn wa-'uhūd Allāh 'alayhi. See 1548, l. 9, which omits "the compacts of the Commander of the Faithful."

honorable men in their oaths—all that the betrayer owns who violates God's covenant in any way, whether money or immovable property, freely grazing livestock, or agriculture or stock farming, will become charity for the poor for the sake of God.[682] It is forbidden for him to restore deceitfully anything of this to his property. And whatever benefit he has for the rest of his life from property of little or great value shall be treated in this way, until his fate overtakes him and his appointed time comes upon him. Every slave (mamlūk) that he owns today up to thirty years of age, whether male or female, is free for the sake of God. And his wives on the day that the sin adheres to him and whomever he marries after them up to thirty years of age are divorced definitely by a legally approved[683] divorce, in which there is no exception or taking back. He is obligated to go to the sacred house of God for thirty pilgrimages. God will only accept from him fulfillment of this. He is quit of responsibility to God and His messenger, and God and His messenger are quit of responsibility to him.[684] God will not accept from him any substitute [for this].[685] God is your witness in this, and God is a sufficient witness.[686]

The following is reported: On the morning when al-Muntaṣir [1479] was given the oath of allegiance, the news spread in al-Māḥūzah—it is the administrative center that Ja'far [al-Mutawakkil] had built—and among the inhabitants of Sāmarrā[687] concerning the murder of Ja'far. At that time, the troops and the Shākiriyyah, as well as others from among the rabble and commoners, came to the Public Gate in the Ja'farī[688] [Palace]. Many people gathered,

682. Text: fī wujūh sabīl Allāh. 1548, l. 12 adds maḥbūs, that is, "given as a religious bequest."

683. The word wa-l-sunnah in the text is omitted by Ms. O.

684. See Qur'ān 9:1.

685. Qur'ān 2:48/45, 123/117.

686. Qur'ān 13:43; 29:52/51, etc.

687. Text: fī ahl Sāmarrā. Read: wa-fī ahl Sāmarrā; see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 68.

688. The Ja'farī Palace had a Public entrance where the Main Road [Shāri' al-A'ẓam] met it. Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 266 = Wiet, Les pays, 60, speaks of three monumental gates. Rogers, "Samarra," 150, states that the triple entrance of the Ja'farī word got around among them, and they rode to one another discussing the oath of allegiance.

ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb went out to them—or it is said that it was Zurāfah who did so—and told them something they would like concerning al-Muntaṣir, but they let him hear something offensive.[689] He then went in to al-Muntaṣir and informed him, whereupon the latter came out, with a number of Maghāribah before him. He shouted to them, "O those dogs, seize them." So they attacked the people and pushed them toward the three gates. The people were crushed and fell upon one another. They then scattered, [retreating] from several who had died from the crowding and trampling. Some said that six individuals [died], and some said that there were between three and six.

In this year, one day after the oath of allegiance was rendered to him, al-Muntaṣir appointed Abū ʿAmrah Aḥmad b. Saʿīd, mawlā of Banū Hāshim, to the maẓalim [court]. Someone recited:

O domain of Islam, when Abū ʿAmrah
Is appointed over public complaints

He is entrusted over a nation,
While he could not be entrusted even with dung.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 247 (February 5–March 6, 862), al-Muntaṣir brought ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaṣim[690] from Sāmarrā to Baghdad and placed him under custody.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Zaynabī.

---

was merely a facade with decorative function. The Jawsaq Palace also had a Public Gate with a triple portico that took up the entire entrance, where the caliph held audience twice a week; Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 261 = Wiet, Les pays, 63; Rogers, loc. cit.; Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture, II, 232, and Fig. 181. And see al-ʿAmid, Architecture, 207.

689. After fa-asmaʿūhu of the text ʿAynī adds: mā yakrahuhu.

690. ʿAlī b al-Muʿtaṣim was a brother of al-Wāthiq and al-Mutawakkil, and thus an uncle of al-Muntaṣir.

The Events of the Year 248

(March 7, 862–February 23, 863)

[1480] One of the events was al-Muntaṣir's dispatching Waṣīf the Turk on the summer expedition to Byzantine territory.

The Reason for Dispatching Waṣīf to Byzantium and His Role

It is reported that the reason for this was that there was rancor between Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and Waṣīf. When al-Muntaṣir became caliph and Ibn al-Khaṣīb was his wazīr, the latter incited al-Muntaṣir against Waṣīf. Aḥmad advised al-Muntaṣir to get Waṣīf to leave his army camp and to mount a campaign at the frontier. Ibn al-Khaṣīb persisted until al-Muntaṣir summoned Waṣīf and ordered him to go off on the campaign.

It is reported that when al-Muntaṣir decided to send Waṣīf to campaign at the Syrian frontier, Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb said to him, "Who will be bold against the *mawlā*s until you order Waṣīf to march?"

Al-Muntaṣir told some(one) of the chamberlains to permit those present in the palace to enter. He did, and among them was Waṣīf. The latter approached al-Muntaṣir, who said to him, "O Waṣīf, we have learned that the tyrant of Byzantium[691] is heading for the frontier towns. This is something that cannot be overlooked. Either you march, or I shall march." Waṣīf replied, "No, I shall march, O Commander of the Faithful," whereupon al-Muntaṣir said, "O Aḥmad, see to whatever he needs." When Aḥmad replied, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful," al-Muntaṣir exclaimed, "What do you mean by 'yes?' Get going right now."

[Al-Muntaṣir went on to say] "O Waṣīf, order your secretary to [1481] come to an agreement with Aḥmad as to what is required and stay with him until he settles matters with him."

Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and Waṣīf then stood up [and left the caliph's presence]. Waṣīf continued to make preparations until he departed, but he nevertheless failed to carry out [his objective].

It is reported that when al-Muntaṣir summoned Waṣīf and ordered him to go on the campaign, he said to him, "The tyrant—that is, the Byzantine king—is on the move, and I fear that he will destroy whatever he touches in the territory of Islam, killing [people] and taking children captive. If you go on the campaign and wish to return, you may proceed forthwith to the gate of the Commander of the Faithful."

Al-Muntaṣir ordered a contingent of commanders and others to set forth with Waṣīf and selected elite soldiers for him. There were about 10,000 men accompanying him of the Shākiriyyah, the regular army, and the mawlās.[692] At the head of his advance guard was Muzāḥim b. Khāqān, brother of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān.[693] Commanding his rear guard was Muḥammad b. Rajā'. On his right flank was al-Sindī b. Bukhtāshah.[694] And Naṣr b. Sa'īd al-

691. Ṭāghiyat al-Rūm is a common dysphemistic epithet for the Byzantine emperor.

692. Ms. O omits mawlās and has twelve thousand men.

693. Muzāḥim b. Khāqān, brother of al-Fatḥ, was governor of Egypt in 253 (867–68) and remained active as military commander in warfare and politics during the caliphates of al-Musta'īn and al-Mu'tazz. He was governor in Egypt as of 3 Rabī' I, 253 (March 16, 867); he died according to Ṭabarī (III, 1693, Saliba, 150) in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 253 (December 2–31, 867); see also Kindī, Wulāh, 207–9, 211; Abū al-Maḥāsin, Nujūm, II, 337; Zambaur, Manuel, 27 (giving date of death as 9 Rabī' II, 254); Sourdel, Vizirat, 274, n. 5.

694. Al-Sindī b. Bukhtāshah is mentioned during the caliphate of al-Mu'taṣim; III, 1266 (Marin, Reign, 84).

Maghribī[695] was responsible for the siege machines. Waṣīf placed his deputy Abū 'Awn at the head of the men and the camp. He was chief of the security policy in Sāmarrā.

When al-Muntaṣir sent his mawlā Waṣīf on the campaign, he forwarded a dispatch of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, the text of which is as follows:

> In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate. From the Servant of God, Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir billāh, Commander of the Faithful, to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful. Peace upon you. The Commander of the Faithful praises God for you—there is no God but He—and asks Him to pray for Muḥammad His servant and messenger, may God bless him and his family.
>
> [1482] Now then. God, to Him be praise for His blessings and gratitude for His favor, has chosen Islam, preferred and perfected it, and has made it a means to His approval and reward, an open road to His mercy and a way to the treasure of His glory. God has caused those who opposed Islam to incline toward it, and subjugated to it those who departed from its truth and preferred another way. He has favored Islam with the most complete and perfect of laws, the most excellent and just statutes. He has sent by way of Islam the best of mankind and the choicest of humans, Muḥammad, and has made the holy war the noblest of His precepts and the most expeditious means for reaching Him. For God has exalted His religion and has humbled the impudent polytheists.
>
> God says by way of commanding holy war and making it obligatory: "March out light or heavy (hearted), and strive with goods and person in the way of God; that will be better for you, if you have knowledge."[696] No mishap will befall the one who wages holy war for the sake of God. He will not suffer disease or harm as long as he is 695. Naṣr b. Sa'īd al-Maghribī later commanded the Maghāribah against the Turks, along with Muḥammad b. Rāshid, in 252 (866–67). They were both killed (Ṭabarī, III, 1680–81; Saliba, 140–41).

696. Qur'ān 9:41.

with God. He will not undergo the expense [of fighting], or clash with an enemy, or cross into a territory or tread on a land without having something written down [to his credit], abundant reward and hope for recompense.

God says: "That is because there befalls them not thirst or fatigue or lack of food in the way of God, nor do they make any invasion that rouses the anger of the unbelievers, nor do they wreak any stroke upon an enemy, but a good deed is thereby written down to their credit; verily God alloweth not to go lost the reward of those who do well. Nor do they make any contribution small or great, or cross a single wadi, but it is written down to their credit, that God may recompense them for the best they have been doing."[697] [1483]

Then God extols the superior rank of those who wage the holy war over those who refrain, His reward that He promised them and their proximity to Him. For He says: "Those of the believers who sit still—other than those who have some injury—are not on a level with those who strive with goods and persons in the way of God. God hath given preference in rank to those who strive with goods and persons over those who sit still, though to all God hath promised the good (reward). And God hath bestowed upon those who strive, in preference to those who sit still, a mighty hire."[698]

And through holy war God purchases the souls and property of the believers and makes His paradise a reward for them, His good pleasure a recompense for them for spending [their souls]. This is a promise from Him, truth in which there is no doubt, a fair judgment for which there is no substitute.

God says: "God has bought from the believers their persons and their goods at the price of the Garden (in store) for them, fighting in the way of God and killing and being killed—a promise binding upon Him in the Torah, the Evangel, and the Qur'ān; and who fulfills His cove-

697. Qur'ān 9:120–21/121–22.
698. Qur'ān 4:95/97.

nant better than God? So rejoice in the bargain you have made with Him; that is the mighty bliss."[699]

God has decided to revive those who strive for His victory and mercy, and has vouchsafed for those who die eternal life and proximity to Him, and an abundant share of His reward. He also says: "Count not those who have been killed in the way of God as dead, nay, alive with their Lord, provided for, delighting in what God has vouchsafed them of His bounty and rejoicing at (tidings [1484] of) those who, left behind, have not yet joined them, that fear rests not upon them nor do they grieve."[700]

Holy war is more noble and suitable for triumph in this world and the next than any action by which the believers approach God and by which they may lay down their burdens, liberate themselves, and merit reward from their Lord. For those who profess it have sacrificed their souls so that the word of God be the highest, and they were generous with their souls, apart from their brothers behind them and the Muslim women. They have subdued the enemy by holy war.

The Commander of the Faithful desires to come close to God by waging holy war against His enemy, by carrying out His obligations in the religion that He entrusted him with, and seeking proximity to Him by strengthening His friends and permitting injury and revenge against those who deviate from His religion, deny His messengers, and disobey Him.

Pursuant to the above, he has seen fit to urge Waṣīf, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, to march this year to the territory of the enemies of God, the Byzantine infidels, to mount a campaign, since God has informed the Commander of the Faithful of Waṣīf's obedience and good counsel, and his excellent disposition[701] and pure intention in all that brings him close to God and His caliph.

---

699. Qur'ān 9:111/112.
700. Qur'ān 3:169–70/163–64.
701. Text: ta'bi'atihi. Addenda, DCCLXXVI: naqībatihi.

The Commander of the Faithful—God is the sponsor of his help and success—has seen fit that Waṣīf, along with his mawlās, regular troops, and Shākiriyyah, whom the Commander of the Faithful has dispatched with him, arrive at the frontier of Malaṭyah[702] on 12 Rabīʿ II, 248, corresponding to 15 Ḥazīran of the months of the non-Arabs (June 15, 862), and that his invasion of the territory of the enemies of God take place on 1 Tammūz (July 1, 862).

Know this and send dispatches to the administrators in your provinces with the text of this letter of the Commander of the Faithful. Order them to read it to the Muslims before them and thus to motivate them for holy war, inciting and summoning them to it, and informing them of the reward that God has given those who wage it. This is so that those who have the intention, the readiness[703] and the desire for holy war will act in accordance with this letter by pouncing upon their enemy and speedily aiding their brothers, by defending their religion and protecting their territory when the army of Waṣīf, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, arrives in Malaṭyah, at the time that the Commander of the Faithful has designated for them, God willing. [1485]

Peace upon you and God's mercy and blessings. Written by Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb on 7 al-Muḥarram, 248 (March 13, 862).

It is reported that someone by the name of Abū al-Walīd al-Jarīrī al-Bajalī was sent to take responsibility for the expenditures of Waṣīf's army, the booty, and the division of spoils. Al-Muntaṣir sent a dispatch with him to Waṣīf, ordering him to stay at the territory of the frontier when he had completed his expedition. He was to stay for four years, mounting [additional] campaigns at the usual times until word from the Commander of the Faithful arrived.

---

702. Malaṭyah (Greek Melitene) on the upper Euphrates, on the frontier of the Byzantines, was exposed to periodic Byzantine attacks; *EI*², s.v.

703. For ḥisbah in jihād, see Lane, Lexicon, 566, "reckoning, preparing, seeking, laying in store reward in world to come; reward."

In this year, al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad abdicated, and al-Muntaṣir made public their abdication in the New Jaʿfarī Palace.

The Abdication of al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad

It is reported that, when Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh's rule [1486] had become stable, Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb said to Waṣīf and Bughā, "We have no guarantee against future events. The Commander of the Faithful may die, and al-Muʿtazz may assume rule, who then will wipe us out completely. The best course is to work toward deposing these two youths before they overcome us."

The Turks made every effort to accomplish this, urging it upon al-Muntaṣir by saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, depose them from [succession to] the caliphate and have the oath of allegiance rendered to your son ʿAbd al-Wahhāb." They importuned him to do this until he finally did so. The caliph went on paying respect to al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad, strongly favoring al-Muʾayyad. But then, forty days after he took office, he ordered that al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad be summoned after they had departed. They were summoned and installed in a palace residence.

Al-Muʿtazz said to al-Muʾayyad, "My brother, why do you think we were brought here?" He replied, "To depose us, O wretched one." Al-Muʿtazz said, "I don't think he will do this to us." Then, while they were going on this way, the messengers arrived with the deposition. Al-Muʾayyad announced right then, "I heed and obey." But al-Muʿtazz stated, "I am not the person who would do such a thing, and, if you wish to kill me, it's your business."

The messengers returned to al-Muntaṣir and informed him [of what took place]. They then came back and carried on very roughly. Seizing al-Muʿtazz violently, they ushered him into the chamber, shutting the door behind him.

It is reported on the authority of Yaʿqūb b. al-Sikkīt[704]—al-Muʾayyad: When I saw that, I said to them brazenly, "What is this, you dogs? You are spilling our blood. Is this how you attack your lord? Stay away—God damn you—and let me talk to him." They now responded to me tentatively after they had been acting impetuously. They paused for a while and then said to me, "Go [1487] meet with him if you like." I suspected that they had taken consultation [concerning this]. I rose and went to al-Muʿtazz, and found him in the chamber weeping. So I said to him, "Fool, in view of what they are known to have done to your father, and considering who he was, you still refuse to do what they want you to do! Abdicate, woe unto you, and don't discuss it any further with them."

704. He is Abū Yūsuf Yaʿqūb b. al-Sikkīt, a famous grammarian, tutor to al-Muʾayyad; d. 246 (860–61); Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 159; Yāqūt, Irshād, VI, 300–302; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, IV, 293; Sezgin, GAS, II, Index, 769; IV, 335; VII, 347; VIII, 129f.

Al-Muʿtazz said, "Praise God. Shall I divest myself of a right that I have already exercised, one that has come into effect in remote regions?"

I said, "This right killed your father. Would that it not kill you. Give it up, woe unto you! By God, if it is in God's prescience that you rule, then you surely will."

He then replied that he would [abdicate].

Al-Muʾayyad said: I came out and said that he had responded favorably, and that the messengers should inform the Commander of the Faithful. They went off and then returned and congratulated me for it. A secretary whose name al-Muʾayyad mentioned entered with them. He had with him an inkwell and a sheet of paper. He sat and then, turning to Abū ʿAbdallāh [al-Muʿtazz], he said, "Write your abdication with your own hand." When he hesitated, I said to the secretary, "Give me a sheet of paper and dictate what you wish."

He dictated to me a letter for al-Muntaṣir in which I informed him that I am incapable of ruling and I know that I cannot assume rule; that I am averse to having al-Mutawakkil held in error on my account if I am unsuitable; that I shall, therefore, ask the caliph for a deposition, and inform him that I abdicate and release the notables from their oath of allegiance to me. I wrote whatever he wanted. I then said, "Write, O Abū ʿAbdallāh." But al-Muʿtazz held back, so I said, "Write, woe unto you." At that point he wrote. The letter was then sent off.

After this the caliph summoned us. I asked, "Should we get new clothing or come in these?" He replied that we should get fresh clothes. I called for clothing and put it on, and Abū ʿAbdal-lāh did the same. We left and entered [the caliph's presence.] He [1488] was in his audience hall, the notables arrayed according to rank. We greeted them, and they returned our greeting, at which point he ordered that we be seated.

Al-Muntaṣir then asked, "Is this your letter?" Al-Mu'tazz was silent, so I took the initiative and said, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful, this is my letter by my request and wish." I told al-Mu'tazz to speak up, whereupon he said something of this sort. Al-Muntaṣir then turned to us, with the Turks standing by, and said, "Do you think that I have deposed you, aspiring to live until my son grows up and then have the oath of allegiance rendered to him? By God, I do not covet this for even a minute! And, by God, as this is not my ambition, I prefer that my fathers' sons rule rather than my cousins. But these—and he gestured toward all the mawlās[705] standing and sitting—urged me to depose you. And I feared that, if I did not do so, one of them would attack you with an iron weapon and finish you off. What do you recommend that I do? Could I then kill him? By God, the blood of all the mawlās does not equal the blood of one of you. It is more expedient for me to yield to their demand." [Ya'qūb b. al-Sikkīt] said: The two of them leaned over to him and kissed his hand. He embraced them, and they then departed.

It is reported that on Saturday, 22 Ṣafar 248 (April 27, 862), al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'ayyad abdicated. Each one wrote a document in his own hand, to the effect that he renounced the oath of allegiance that was rendered to him, that the notables were free to rescind it, and that they were incapable of executing any part of it. They then carried out the abdication in the presence of the notables, Turks, eminent men, companions, and judges—Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid was the chief judge. Also present were the army commanders; the Hāshimites; the administrators of the government bureaus; the officials;[706] the elite commanders of the guard; Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir; Waṣīf; Bughā the Elder; Bughā [1489] the Younger; and all those who were present in the Private Palace (Dār al-Khāṣṣah) and the Public Audience Hall (Dār al-'Āmmah).

705. That is, Turks.
706. For shī'ah in the sense used here, see above, n. 329.

The notables departed after this. The text that the two of them wrote was as follows:

> In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate.
> The Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil ʿalā-llāh, may God be pleased with him, assigned to me this matter and had the oath of allegiance rendered to me, without my consent, while I was a minor. When I understood my circumstances, I realized that I could not execute what he assigned to me and would not be suitable as caliph of the Muslims. Whosoever is bound by the oath of allegiance to me is free to rescind it. I free you from it and I release you from your oath. I have no binding covenant or compact with you. You are released from it.

Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb read the documents aloud. Then each one of them rose and declared to those present: "This is my document and this is my statement. Witness for me. I release you from your oath and free you from it."

Al-Muntaṣir thereupon said to them, "God has blessed you and the Muslims." He arose and went inside. He had been sitting in the presence of the notables and had al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad sit near him. Then he wrote a dispatch to government officials deposing al-Muʿtazz and al-Muʾayyad. This was in Ṣafar, 248 (March 7, 862–February 23, 863).

The text of the letter of al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh to Abū al-ʿAbbās Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, pertaining to deposing Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz and Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad was as follows:

> From the Servant of God, Muḥammad al-Imām al-Muntaṣir bi-llāh, Commander of the Faithful, to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful.
>
> Now then. God—to Whom belongs praise for His blessings and gratitude for His favor—has made His caliphs governors, who carry out what His Messenger was sent with. They defend His religion, preach His truth, and [1490] > execute His statutes. He has conferred His glory, by which He favored them, as support for His servants and welfare for His land, and as mercy causing His creatures to thrive. He has imposed obedience toward them and related it to obedience to Him and to His Messenger, Muḥammad. He has imposed it as an obligation in His unambiguous (muḥkam) revelation, because obedience brings about tranquillity of the multitude, harmony of passions, the creation of order out of disorder, security of roads, repelling of the enemy, protection of women, sealing frontiers, and setting affairs straight.

He says: "O you who have believed, obey God and obey the Messenger and those of you who have the command."[707]

It is an obligation of God's caliphs, those whom He has rewarded with His great beneficence, favored with the highest rank of His glory and entrusted with a way to His mercy, good pleasure, and reward, to prefer obeying Him in every circumstance, to discharge what is His due, each one of them in order of proximity [to God].

May their role in striving for whatever draws one near to God match their rank in Islam and ruling Muslims. The Commander of the Faithful requests from God, seeking Him humbly before His greatness, to entrust to him rulership that brings welfare to his subjects; to ease his burdens that He placed upon him; and give him success in obeying Him; for He is attentive and nigh.

You know what you witnessed concerning the delivery to the Commander of the Faithful of two documents, in their handwriting, that is, by Abū 'Abdallāh and Ibrāhīm, sons of the Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, may God be pleased with him. They mention in these documents what God informed them of concerning the Commander of the Faithful's sympathy and compas-[1491] sion, and his providing well for them. And they mention the investiture by the Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh of Abū 'Abdallāh as heir apparent of the Commander of the Faithful and of Ibrāhīm as heir apparent after Abū 'Abdallāh, and that when this investiture was made Abū ʿAbdallāh was an infant, not yet three years old, uncomprehending of his investiture and appointment. Ibrāhīm was young and had not yet reached puberty. They were not legally responsible, and the statutes of Islam therefore did not apply to them.

707. Qur'an 4:59/62.

They mention that, when they reached puberty and understood their incapacity to carry out their investiture and the administrative functions assigned to them, it might become necessary for them to exhort God and the community of Muslims to let them extricate themselves from this matter with which they were invested, and relinquish the administrative functions to which they were appointed, releasing thereby all those under obligation of an oath of allegiance to them, for they were unable to carry out what they were nominated for and unsuited to be assigned to it.

And those who are associated with them, in their provinces, including commanders of the Commander of the Faithful, his mawlās, pages, regular army, and Shākiriyyah, and all those who are with these officers in the court and in Khurāsān and all the other provinces shall be released from their service, and there shall cease to be any mention of association with the two of them. The two shall now become plebeians (sūqah) and commoners (ʿāmmah) among the Muslims.

They shall describe [themselves as such] whenever they mention this to the Commander of the Faithful and ask him about it from the time when God has brought His caliphate to him. They have abdicated and retired from the investiture. And they have released from their oath of allegiance, deposing them as they have deposed themselves, all those who have an oath of allegiance to them among the officers of the Commander of the Faithful, all his close associates, his subjects, near and far, present and absent. [1492]

They granted the Commander of the Faithful the right to impose upon themselves the covenant of God and the most strict covenant and compact rendered to His angels, prophets, and servants. And they have acknowledged all the oaths that the Commander of the Faithful has imposed upon them to render obedience, sincere counsel, and friendship to him, secretly and openly.

They ask the Commander of the Faithful to publicize and disseminate what they have done, and to invite all his close associates to hear this from them. This they request, desire, and obey without being compelled or forced. The two documents that they presented in their handwriting shall be read to the caliph's close associates, to the effect that the investitute as heirs apparent came to them while they were young, and that they abdicated after they had reached puberty. They request dismissal from the administrative functions that they undertook, and that their associates in these provinces, including officers of the Commander of the Faithful, his regular troops, pages, Shākiriyyah, and all those who are with these officers in the court, in Khurāsān and all the rest of the provinces, shall be released from their service, and there shall cease to be any mention of association with the two of them. A dispatch pertaining to this should be sent to all the administrative officers of the provinces.

The Commander of the Faithful acknowledged the veracity of what they reported and presented, and proceeded to summon all his brothers and those in his court, including his family, his officers, his *mawlā*s, his adjuncts, the chiefs of his regular troops, his Shākiriyyah, secretaries, judges, jurists, and others, and all the rest of his close [1493] associates to whom the oath of allegiance was rendered.

Present were Abū 'Abdallāh and Ibrāhīm, the sons of the Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil 'alā-llāh, God be pleased with him. Their documents, in their own hand, were read aloud in their presence to the Commander of the Faithful, to them, and to all those present. They repeated the statement, once the two documents were read, in accordance with what they had written. Responding to this, the Commander of the Faithful decided to disseminate and publicize what they had done. He carried this out in accordance with three rights: (1) The right of God, insofar as He entrusted al-Muntaṣir with his caliphate and obligated him to provide for his friends by consolidating their community at all times and reconciling their hearts. (2) The right of subjects, who are entrusted to him by God, so that the one appointed over their affairs supervises, night and day, with care, justice and compassion, and carries out the statutes of God for mankind while assuming the responsibility of governance and right management. (3) The right of Abū ʿAbdallāh and Ibrāhīm, obliging the Commander of the Faithful because of their brotherhood and mutual kinship; for had they persisted in what they relinquished, despite their incapacity, this might have harmed Islam, and the adversity would have affected all Muslims. Thus, the heavy responsibility would have redounded to them.

The Commander of the Faithful has deposed them, as they deposed themselves, from the investiture as heirs apparent. And all the brothers of the Commander of the Faithful deposed them, as did the members of his family in his court. All those who attended deposed them, including the officers of the Commander of the Faithful, his [1494] mawlās, officials, commanders of his regular troops, Shākiriyyah, secretaries, judges, jurists, and his other close associates who rendered the oath of allegiance.

The Commander of the Faithful has ordered that the letters concerning this be drawn up and dispatched to all the administrative officials, so that their contents be made known in the provinces. They will depose Abū ʿAbdallāh and Ibrāhīm from the investiture as heirs apparent since they had deposed themselves and released the notables and commoners, those present and absent, the near and far. They will eliminate any reference to them as heirs apparent and remove from their letters and formulas any reference to the genealogy[708] of al-Muʿtazz bi-llāh and al-Muʾayyad bi-llāh, nor are they to invoke their names from the pulpits. In addition, they will eliminate all the old and new offices established by the two of them in their government bureaus, that is, offices pertaining to their [former] associates. They will remove mention of them from emblems and flags,[709] and the officials are also obliged to remove their names where they were used to mark the horses of the Shākiriyyah and the frontier cavalry (rābiṭah).

708. Text vocalized: nisab. Addenda, DCCLXXVI: nasab.

Your station vis-à-vis the Commander of the Faithful will be determined by what God has chosen for him, namely, your obedience, sincere counsel and support, what God has granted your ancestors and yourselves, and what God has apprised the Commander of the Faithful of [1495] concerning your obedience, discernment,[710] and endeavor to discharge [your] duty.

The Commander of the Faithful has assigned you independently to your office and has released you from service to Abū ʿAbdallāh and from those [others] in your provincial seat and in all the rest of the provincial areas. The Commander of the Faithful will not place between you and himself anyone who will govern over you. His order concerning this has gone out to the administrative officers of his government bureaus.

Know this and write to your administrative officers according to the text of this letter of the Commander of the Faithful to you. Suggest to them that they act in accordance with it, God willing. Peace.

Written by Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb on Saturday, 19 Safar, 248 (April 24, 862).

In this year, al-Muntaṣir died.

The Illness That Caused al-Muntaṣir's Death, the Time When He Died, and How Long He Lived

There is disagreement about the illness that caused his death. Some[one] of the informants said that he was afflicted by angina in his throat, on Thursday, 25 Rabīʿ I, 248 (May 29, 862), and that he died at the time of the afternoon prayer on Sunday, 5 Rabīʿ II (June 8, 862). Another view is that he died on Saturday afternoon,

709. Text: maṭārid. For the sense here, see Glossarium, CCCXXXIX.
710. Text: wa-yumn naqībatika. Ms. O: wa-min tamyīz nafsika.

4 Rabīʿ II (June 7, 862), and that the cause of his death was an inflammation in his stomach that moved to his heart, causing his death, and that his illness lasted for three days or so.

I have been informed by some(one) of our colleagues that al-Muntaṣir, having a fever, summoned a physician whom he ordered to bleed him. He bled al-Muntaṣir with a poisoned lancet, from which he died. [1496]

The physician who bled the caliph returned to his residence, where he too was stricken with fever. He summoned one of his pupils and ordered him to bleed him, placing his lancets before the pupil, so that he might choose the best. The poisoned lancet with which he had bled al-Muntaṣir was among them. He had forgotten about it. The pupil did not find among the lancets placed before him any one better than the poisoned lancet. He therefore bled his teacher with it without being aware of what had taken place previously. When the pupil had bled his teacher with this lancet, his colleague noticed it and realized that he was about to die. The physician gave his bequest immediately and died the same day.

It is also reported that al-Muntaṣir was afflicted in his head. Ibn al-Ṭayfūrī[711] therefore put drops of oil in his ear. His head became inflamed, and he soon died. Another view is that Ibn al-Ṭayfūrī poisoned the caliph with his cupping glasses.

Abū Jaʿfar said: I often heard people say, when the caliphate passed to al-Muntaṣir, that from the time he acceded to rule until his death he would live for six months, as did Shīrawayh b. Kisrā after he killed his father. This [account] was spread among the populace and notables alike.[712]

It is reported on the authority of Yusr al-Khādim,[713] who was 711. See above, p. 174, and n. 581, for his father al-Ṭayfūrī. As son of a court physician of al-Mutawakkil, it is possible that he retained a residual loyalty to his father's patron. See also Ibn Badrūn, Sharḥ, 284.

712. Shīrawayh (Shīrūyah) b. Kisrā (591–628 A.D.) killed his father, Kisrā Parvīz. See the more elaborate account of Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 291, where it is told that the caliph saw a Persian inscription on a carpet telling the fate of Shīrawayh, which was translated for him; and see, for instance, Ibn Badrūn, Sharḥ, 283; Ibn al-Ṭiqṭaqā, Fakhrī, 239, Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif, 72, and n. 2.

713. Yusr al-Khādim is mentioned again by Ṭabarī, sub anno 255 (869–69; III, 1743), with other members of al-Muntaṣir's entourage, including Saʿīd the Younger.

said to be in charge of al-Muntaṣir's treasury in the days of his amīrate, that one day during his caliphate, al-Muntaṣir awoke, after sleeping in his sitting room (īwān), weeping and lamenting. Yusr said: I respected him too much to ask him about his weeping and stood behind the door, when 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar al-Bāzyār arrived and heard his lamenting and sobbing. 'Abdallāh asked me, [1497] "What is wrong with him, woe to you, O Yusr." I informed him that the caliph had awakened from sleep in tears. 'Abdallāh now approached al-Muntaṣir and said to him, "What is wrong with you, O Commander of the Faithful, that you are weeping, may God not let your eye shed tears?" Al-Muntaṣir replied, "Come close to me, O 'Abdallāh." He did. The caliph then said to him, "I was sleeping and dreamt that al-Mutawakkil had come to me and said, 'Woe unto you, O Muḥammad. You killed me, wronged me, and usurped my caliphate.[714] By God, you will only enjoy the caliphate after me for a few days; then you are bound for hell.' I then awoke and could not control my weeping or anxiety."

'Abdallāh said to him, "This is a dream, and dreams may be either true or false. No, God will prolong your life and give you happiness. Now summon wine and entertainment and never mind dreams."

Yusr continued: The caliph did just that, but nevertheless went on being dejected until he died.

It is reported that al-Muntaṣir had consulted a group of jurists about killing his father, informing them about his doctrines and relating unseemly things about him, which I am reluctant to put down in writing. They advised al-Muntaṣir to kill him. We have mentioned in part what happened to him.

It is reported that, when al-Muntaṣir's illness became severe, his mother came to him inquiring about his condition. He replied, "By God, I have lost this world and the next."

[Ibrāhīm b. Jaysh said:[715] I have been informed by the secretary Mūsā b. 'Īsā, secretary of my uncle Ya'qūb and my cousin Yazīd, that when al-Muntaṣir acceded to the caliphate he would carry on quite a bit while intoxicated about the murder of his father al-

714. Text: ghabantanī. 'Aynī: ghaḍibtanī, i.e. ghaṣabtanī = "you have usurped me" (note ad loc. in Leiden edition).

715. The bracketed text appears only in the Cairo edition, on the basis of Ms. A.

Mutawakkil. He would say with reference to the Turks, "These are murderers of the caliphs." In such fashion he mentioned what they feared. The Turks gave one of his servants (khādim) 30,000 dīnārs to try and poison him. And they also gave a sum of money to ʿAlī b. Ṭayfūr.

When served fruit, al-Muntaṣir tended to favor pears. Ibn Ṭayfūr therefore chose a large, ripe pear, pierced the top, and poured poison into it. And the servant placed it on top of the pears that he served al-Muntaṣir. Setting eyes on the pear, al-Muntaṣir ordered the servant to peel it and feed it to him. The servant peeled and cut it, and then gave it to him, piece by piece, until he devoured it. When he had finished eating the pear, he felt faint and told Ibn Ṭayfūr that he felt feverish.

Ibn Ṭayfūr said, "O Commander of the Faithful, have yourself cupped, and you will recover from the illness in your blood." He expected that with the emission of blood the poison would take better effect. The caliph was cupped and became feverish, and his illness became worse. But Ibn Ṭayfūr and the Turks feared that his illness would last for a long time.

So Ibn Ṭayfūr said to al-Muntaṣir, "O Commander of the Faithful, the cupping has not had the beneficial effect that we expected. You require bleeding, which will be more effective in your case." When the caliph told him to go ahead, Ibn Ṭayfūr bled him with a poisoned lancet. The doctor, in a state of confusion, threw the instrument among his lancets. It was the sharpest and the best.

Then ʿAlī b. Ṭayfūr became feverish himself and summoned a pupil of his to bleed him. The pupil looked through the lancets and did not find any that was sharper or better, so he bled him, and Ibn Ṭayfūr died as a result.]

It is reported on the authority of Ibn Dihqānah: We were in al-Muntaṣir's audience hall one day after al-Mutawakkil was killed when al-Masdūd al-Ṭunbūrī related a story.[716] When al-Muntaṣir asked, "When did this take place, he answered, "On a dangerous night."[717] This vexed al-Muntaṣir.

716. Ibn Dihqānah al-Nadīm appears as a boon companion of al-Muʿtaṣim in Hilāl al-Ṣābī, Rusūm, 72; tr. Salem, 60. Abū ʿAlī al-Ḥasan al-Masdūd al-Ṭunbūrī was a composer and tunburist who performed in the courts of al-Wāthiq, al-Mutawakkil and al-Muntaṣir. See Iṣfahānī, Aghānī, XXI, 256–58; Farmer, History, 158–59; Neubauer, Musiker, 193–94.

[1498] It is reported on the authority of Saʿīd b. Salamah al-Naṣrānī: Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb came to us in a cheerful spirit, mentioning that the Commander of the Faithful al-Muntaṣir dreamt at night that he had ascended a flight of stairs until he came to the twenty-fifth step, whereupon he was told, "This is your dominion." Ibn al-Munajjim learned of this, so Muḥammad b. Mūsā and ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Munajjim visited the caliph and congratulated him on the dream.

Al-Muntaṣir said, "The matter was not as Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb told you. Rather when I reached the end of the stairs I was told, 'Stop, this is the end of your life.'" He was extremely distressed and lived after this for some days, filling out a year, and then died when he was twenty-five years old.[718]

It is also said that he was twenty-five years and six months old when he died. Still another view is that he was twenty-four years old. According to the view of (some)one of the informants, his caliphate lasted six months and two days. Another version puts it at exactly six months. And still another view is that it lasted one hundred and seventy-nine days.

He died in Sāmarrā, in the renovated palace,[719] forty-four days after he came out publicly against his brothers.

It is reported that when death was upon him he said:

I never delighted in any worldly blessing I obtained,
But [I am joyous now that] I proceed to the noble Lord.

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Muʿtaṣim[720] said the funeral prayer over him in Sāmarrā, where he was born.

He had wide eyes, an aquiline nose, and he was short and well endowed.[721] He is said to have been capable of inspiring respect for his authority. He was allegedly the first ʿAbbāsid caliph whose

717. Literally, "a night of no prohibition or impediment"; hence a night of anarchy or danger.

718. O adds: and six months, and omits the next sentence (by homoeoteleuton).

719. Text: al-qaṣr al-muḥdath. According to Herzfeld, Samarra, 105, it is the renovated Jawsaq Palace.

720. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Muʿtaṣim became the caliph al-Mustaʿīn, succeeding al-Muntaṣir.

721. Text: jayyid al-biḍʿah. Addenda, DCCLXXVI: al-biḍāʿah. See also Glossarium, CXXXV; Dozy, Supplément, I, 92.

grave was known. This is because his mother requested that his grave be made public.[722] His teknomyn was Abū Ja'far and his mother's name was Ḥabashiyyah. She was a Byzantine concubine. [1499]

Something of al-Muntaṣir's Conduct

It is reported that when al-Muntaṣir assumed the caliphate the first thing he did was to remove Ṣāliḥ[723] from Medina and to appoint 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn[724] b. Ismā'īl b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad as governor there.

It is reported on the authority of 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn: When I visited him to bid farewell, he said to me: "O 'Alī, I am sending you to my flesh and blood." He pinched the skin of his forearm and said, "I am sending you to this. Watch how you are with these people and how you deal with them, that is, the family of Abū Ṭālib." I replied, "I hope to follow the opinion of the Commander of the Faithful, may God support him, concerning them, God willing." He said, "You will then thrive thereby[725] with me."

It is reported that Muḥammad b. Hārūn,[726] secretary of Muḥammad b. 'Alī Bard al-Khiyār[727] and his deputy over the Bureau of Estates of Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad, was struck dead on his bed

722. 'Aynī comments, citing al-Sibṭ [b. al-Jawzī], that Ṭabarī's statement here is surprising since the tombs of the 'Abbāsid caliphs are in fact known, e.g., the tomb of al-Saffāḥ is in Anbār beneath the minbar; and those of al-Mahdī in Māsabadhān, Hārūn in Ṭūs, al-Ma'mūn in Ṭarsūs, and al-Mu'taṣim, al-Wāthiq, and al-Mutawakkil in Sāmarrā.

723. O adds Ibn 'Īsā; Ibn al-Athīr Kāmil, VII, 76 and Ṣūlī have Ibn 'Alī. He is Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī b. 'Īsā.

724. Text and Cairo edition: al-Ḥusayn. Ms. O and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 76: al-Ḥasan.

725. Ṣūlī adds 'inda Allāh wa-, that is, "You will then thrive in this with God and with me." On al-Muntaṣir's new orientation in favor of the Shī'ah and policy of détente with the 'Alids, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 75–76; and Sourdel, "La politique religieuse," 6–8. Among other things, he permitted visiting the site of al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī's grave and restored Fadak to the descendants of al-Ḥusayn and al-Ḥasan, sons of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

726. Ms. O: Hārūn. Ms. C: Fragmenta, 561.5; Ṣūlī: Dāwūd.

727. Text: Muḥammad b. 'Ali Bard (or: Burd) al-Khiyār. C: Ibn Bard al-Ḥanār (?); O: Ibn Bard al-Khiyār. Fragmenta: Ibn Bard al-Khabbāz. Ṣūlī says that Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Anbārī (?) was a secretary of Bard (?) al-Kh-?-ār, that is, Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Ṣūlī. And elsewhere he mentions Muḥammad b. 'Alī al-Ṣūlī, known as Bard (?) al-Khiyār.

[1500] with a number of blows by a sword. His son summoned a black servant (khādim) of his and also Waṣīf. Waṣīf reportedly tried to get the black to confess. He was then brought before al-Muntaṣir, and Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was summoned, and questioned him about his murdering his patron. The black confessed, describing what he had done to Muḥammad and the reason for his killing him.

Al-Muntaṣir asked him, "Woe to you, why did you kill him?" The black replied, "Why did you kill your father, al-Mutawakkil?" Al-Muntaṣir then queried the jurists about the black's case, and they advised that he be killed, whereupon he had him decapitated and suspended near the gallows of Bābak.

In this year, Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Shārī (the Khārijite) rebelled in the region of Mosul.[728] Al-Muntaṣir sent against him Isḥāq b. Thābit al-Farghānī. He took Muḥammad captive with a number of his men, and they were killed and suspended.

In this year, Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār moved from Sijistān and proceeded to Herat.[729]

It is reported on the authority of Aḥmad b. ʿAbdallāh, son of Ṣāliḥ, the prefect of the oratory: My father had a muezzin. Some(one) of our family saw him in a dream summoning [the people] to one of the [daily] prayers. Then he approached a house where al-Muntaṣir was and called out, "O Muḥammad, O Muntaṣir, your Lord is waiting in ambush."[730]

It is reported on the authority of Bunān the Singer—he was allegedly the person most intimate with al-Muntaṣir during the life of his father (al-Mutawakkil) and after he assumed the caliphate: I asked al-Muntaṣir to give me a brocade robe when he was caliph. He said, "I have something better for you than a brocade robe." I asked what it was. He replied: "Feign illness so that I will visit you, and more than a brocade robe will be given to you."

[1501] Bunān said: He died during these days and did not give me anything.

---

728. See also above, 1351 (p. 37).

729. Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār was one of the two brothers who founded the Ṣaffārid dynasty; Bosworth, Dynasties, 103.

730. See Qurʾān 89:14.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXV

The Crisis of the ʿAbbāsid Caliphate

TRANSLATED BY GEORGE SALIBA

The Caliphate of al-Mustaʿīn

[1501]

The Caliphate of Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Muʿtaṣim, Known as al-Mustaʿīn. His Patronymic was Abū al-ʿAbbās

The Account of His Rule and the Time Allegiance Was Rendered to Him

It was reported that when al-Muntaṣir died—that was on Saturday afternoon, the fourth of Rabīʿ II, 248 (June 7, 862)—the mawlās[1] gathered at the Hārūnī[2] (Palace) on Sunday. Among them were Bughā the Elder, Bughā the Younger, and Utāmish. They took the oath of allegiance from the commanders of the Turks, the Maghāribah and the Ushrūsaniyyah. It was ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Abd al-Aʿlā al-Iskāfī, the secretary of Bughā the Elder, who took the oath

1. The word mawlā, pl. mawālī, has several meanings in Arabic. In this period it refers mainly to the military personnel who were employed by the ʿAbbāsid caliphs and were mostly of Central Asian origin.

2. That is, the palace built by al-Mutawakkil (847–861), Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 276.

from them. They were to accept whomever was acceptable to Bughā the Elder, Bughā the Younger and Utāmish, a procedure already arranged by Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb. The group took the oath; they had consulted with one another and were averse to having any of al-Mutawakkil's sons declared caliph, for the commanders had killed his father and were afraid that they would, in turn, be murdered by any of al-Mutawakkil's sons who assumed the caliphate. But Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and those mawlās who were present concurred in choosing Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Muʿtaṣim. saying, "The caliphate should not depart from the offspring of our patron Muʿtaṣim." Previous to this, they had mentioned some of the Banū Hāshim. They rendered the oath of allegiance to him at the time of [1502] the second 'ishā' prayer on Monday evening, the sixth of Rabīʿ II, 243 (June 9, 862). He was then twenty-eight years old,[3] and his patro-[1503] nymic was Abū al-ʿAbbās. Al-Mustaʿīn took Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb as his secretary, and Utāmish as his wazīr.

On Monday, the sixth of Rabīʿ II (June 9, 862), Abū al-ʿAbbās went

3. Note the account of Ṣūlī of the election of al-Mustaʿīn which is included by the Leiden editors: "I received an account on the authority of Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥafṣ b. ʿUmar al-Akhbārī —— ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā al-Iskāfī: When al-Muntaṣir Billāh died on Saturday afternoon, the fourth of Rabīʿ II, 248 (June 7, 862), the mawlās gathered together including Bughā the Elder and Utāmish. They took an oath from the commanders of the Turks and Maghāribah that they would accept whomever they themselves accepted. They did swear to that. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn said: I was taking the oath of allegiance from them as arranged by Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb. They were of the unanimous opinion that they would not elevate any of al-Mutawakkil's sons to the caliphate, lest he assassinate them in revenge for his father's blood. They then agreed upon Aḥmad b. al-Muʿtaṣim saying: 'The son of our lord al-Muʿtaṣim.' Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Munajjim came to Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and Bughā asking: 'Would you give authority to a man who thought that he is more worthy of the Caliphate than even al-Mutawakkil, and that you kept him from it, and that he is indeed worthier than both al-Mutawakkil and al-Muntaṣir? How then do you expect him to respect you? Wouldn't you rather obey a man who honors you?' Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Munajjim had done so on account that Aḥmad b. al-Muʿtaṣim was a friend of al-Kindī the philosopher, and al-Kindī himself was an enemy of Muḥammad and Aḥmad the two sons of al-Munajjim. They all accepted his opinion except for Bughā the Elder who remarked. 'We will appoint someone whom we fear and respect for then we shall remain with him. If we brought someone who fears us, we would then compete among ourselves and kill one another.' It was then that they mentioned Abū al-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. al-Muʿtaṣim, saying: 'He is a descendant of our Lord al-Muʿtaṣim, and (the Caliphate) should not be taken away from them. If we hold him in high esteem he will be indebted to us. They kept on persuading Bughā the Elder until he accepted. Then they brought Aḥmad b. Muḥammad on the eve of Monday, the sixth of Rabīʿ II (June 9, 862), who was twenty-eight years old.'" to the Public Audience Hall (Dar al-ʿĀmmah),[4] by way of the ʿUmarī[5] Road, between the gardens. They had dressed him in long robes and in the caliphal raiment.[6] Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq carried the spear (ḥarbah)[7] in front of him; this took place before sunrise. Wājin al-Ushrūsanī arrived at the gate of the Public Audience Hall by way of the main thoroughfare leading to the public treasury (bayt al-māl).[8] After arranging his troops in two lines, he took his position in line together with the notables among his men. Present at the hall were the men of rank (aṣḥāb al-marātib). These included the sons of al-Mutawakkil, the ʿAbbāsids, the Ṭālibids and others of stature. While they were stationed in this manner—an hour and a half of the day had already passed—shouting was heard from the direction of the main thoroughfare and the markets.[9] Suddenly, there were fifty horsemen of the Shākiriyyah[10]—it is reported that they were men of Abū al-ʿAbbās Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh[11]—accompanied by a group of Ṭabariyyah cavalry and mixed forces (akhlāṭ al-nās). They were joined by the hotheads and the rabble from the market, amounting to a group of about one thousand men. Drawing their weapons, they shouted "Victory to Muʿtazz! (yā Muʿtazz yā manṣūr)"[12] and charged the two lines of the Ushrūsaniyyah formed

4. For this translation see Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 365, and Le Strange, Lands, 54. This Dār was also sometimes called Dār al-Sulṭān. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 255.

5. The reference is to al-Qaṣr al-ʿUmarī, built by ʿUmar b. Faraj for al-Muʿtaṣim. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 258.

6. For the caliphal dress, see Ṣābiʾ, Rusūm, 73–74.

7. Originally it was the spear of the king of Abyssinia. It was given as a gift to Prophet Muḥammad and was passed thereafter from one caliph to the next as a sign of authority. See Khwārizmī, Mafātīḥ, 118–119.

8. For the thoroughfare leading to the bayt al-māl, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 255, 260, and Sāmarrāʾī, Sāmarrā fī Adab, appended map where the main street runs parallel to the Tigris in a north-south direction.

9. For the arrangement of the markets around the main thoroughfare, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 260.

10. The probable origin of the word is from Persian shāgird, meaning apprentice. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 276. But sometimes it is used to mean simply mercenary soldiers. See Jāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, II, 130.

11. Ṭabarī, Cairo ed., IX, 188 mentions the arrival of this Muḥammad from Khurāsān in the year 237 (851/852) and his appointment as al-Mutawakkil's lieutenant over Baghdad in that year. See Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, V, 92–93, and Kutubī, Fawāt, III, 403–4. The text here refers to the possibility that Muḥammad's men may have been still loyal to the descendants of al-Mutawakkil and were here objecting to al-Mustaʿīn's usurpation of their power.

12. Yā . . . yā manṣūr is obviously a battle cry, rendered in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 117, as nafīr yā manṣūr (call to arms! O victorious one!).

by Wājin. A great melee ensued, and the men collided with one another. Some of the Mubayyiḍah[13] guarding the Public Gate (Bāb al-[1504] ʿĀmmah) broke rank and joined the Shākiriyyah, thus increasing their number. At this the Maghāribah and the Ushrūsaniyyah attacked, and, routing the rebels, they forced them onto the great road (darb) named after Zurāfah and ʿAzzūn.[14] A group of them charged the followers of al-Muʿtazz, and, having defeated them, they pursued them to the residence of Azzūn b. Ismāʿīl's brother where the latter held a narrow part of the road. Al-Muʿtazz's followers held their ground there, whereupon the Ushrūsaniyyah fired arrows at some of them and engaged them with swords. As the battle raged between them, the followers of al-Muʿtazz and the rabble proclaimed "God is Great!" Many of the protagonists fell, slain, as the battle continued until the third hour of the day. The Turks then departed, having rendered allegiance to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Muʿtaṣim. They left (by the road that runs) beside the ʿUmarī (Palace) and the gardens. Before leaving, the mawlās obtained the oath of allegiance from all those present at the Public Audience Hall, including, among others, the Hāshimites and the men of rank. Al-Mustaʿīn departed by way of the Public Gate for the Hārūnī (palace) where he spent the night.

The Ushrūsaniyyah (also) went to the Hārūnī; both factions had lost many men. A group of Ushrūsaniyyah had entered some private quarters, whereupon the rabble overwhelmed them and took their shields, weapons, coats of mail and their mounts. The rabble and the plundering mob entered the Public Audience Hall en route to the Hārūnī (Palace). They freely pillaged the storehouse containing weapons, shields, coats of mail, swords, and thaghrī bridles. None of them refrained from looting a coat of mail or a lance that happened
[1505] to be lying by.[15] They also pillaged the residence of Armash b. Abī

13. The name Mubayyiḍah was commonly used to describe a non-orthodox sect believing in the possibility of God's incarnation. See Sāmarrāʾī, al-Ghulūw, 143, on the authority of Isfarāyinī, Tabṣīr, 70. They seem to have been recruited into the army as a sect.

14. The reference is probably to Zurāfah, al-Mutawakkil's chamberlain (see Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 394 and FHA, III, 555) and to ʿAzzūn, al-Muʿtaṣim's boon companion (see Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 163).

15. The text reads rubbamā marra aḥaduhum bi-l-jawshan wa-l-ḥirāb fa-akthara, which is difficult to understand with the previous fa-akthara.

Ayyūb, accompanied by the sellers of barley juice (fuqqāʿ),[16] taking shields and headless spears of bamboo. As a result, spears and shields became plentiful in the hands of the rabble, the bath attendants and the boys who delivered groceries.[17] A contingent of Turks, including Bughā the Younger, then came at them from the direction of Darb Zurāfah and forced them away from the storehouse, killing several of them and detaining a few.

Both factions now departed, having suffered many losses. But the rabble began confiscating the weapon of any Turk passing by the lower reaches of Sāmarrā while heading through the thoroughfares towards the Public Gate. They killed a contingent of Turks near the residences of Mubārak al-Maghribī and Ḥabash the brother of Yaʿqūb Qūṣarrah.[18] Most of those seizing these weapons were reportedly sellers of barley juice and dried fruits (nāṭif), bath attendants, water bearers and the rabble from the markets. They continued in this way until midday. The prisoners at Sāmarrā became agitated on that day (as well), and a group of them managed to escape. The receipt of military pay (ʿaṭā') was now made contingent on swearing allegiance to the new Caliph, and the document of the oath of allegiance was sent to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir on the day when allegiance was sworn to al-Mustaʿīn. The document reached Muḥammad on the second day; it was brought to him by a brother of Utāmish, when Muḥammad was out on a walk. Muḥammad's chamberlain sent Utāmish's brother to his patron after informing him of Ibn Ṭāhir's whereabouts. At this, Muḥammad returned immediately and sent for the Hāshimites and for the commanders and troops. He granted them all their allotments (waḍaʿa lahum al-arzāq).

In Rajab, 248 (August 31–September 29, 862), word reached al-Mustaʿīn of the death of Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir in Khurāsān. Al-Mustaʿīn now appointed Ṭāhir's son Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAb- [1506] dallāh b. Ṭāhir as governor of Khurāsān. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh

16. Fuqqāʿ is barley juice according to Lisān, VIII, 526, and those who sold such items were considered of low class. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 261.

17. Some occupational groups were apparently beginning to make themselves felt as especially threatening to the central authority. For more information on their interaction, see Dūrī, Abḥāth, 15–17. For their social position, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 261.

18. The vocalization is unclear.

was given control of Iraq as well as the Ḥaramayn[19]; (he was put in charge of) security (shurṭah), and (he was appointed) vice-ruler (mu'āwin) over the Sawād.[20] The appointment of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir over Khurāsān and the adjoining districts took place at the Jawsaq Palace[21] on Saturday, the twelfth of Sha'bān (October 11, 862).

Bughā the Elder fell ill in Jumādā II (August 2–30, 862) and was visited by al-Musta'īn in the middle of the month. Bughā died that very day, and his son Mūsā was given all his duties, that is, all his father's duties, in addition to (heading up) the postal service (barīd).

In this year, Unūjūr the Turk arranged (wajjaha) to kill Abū al-'Amūd al-Tha'labī in Kafartūthā on the twenty-fourth of Rabī' II (June 27, 862).

In this year, 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān went on pilgrimage. A Shi'ite messenger called Shu'ayb was sent after Ibn Khāqān to inform him that he was being banished to Barqah[22] and was thus prohibited from continuing the pilgrimage.

[1507] In Jumādā I, 248 (July 3–August 1, 862), al-Musta'īn bought from al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'ayyad everything they possessed except for one item valued at one hundred thousand dīnārs which al-Mu'tazz kept. The latter and Ibrāhīm (al-Mu'ayyad) were to receive annual revenues (ghallah) of eighty thousand dīnārs.[23] And on Monday, the 19. Usually refers to Mecca and Medina. See *EI*², III, 175.

20. Ṣūlī's account as given by the editors of the Leiden edition: "Al-Musta'īn appointed his son Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir over Khurāsān, and his uncle Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh over Iraq. He also added Fars to the latter's responsibilities. He had previously intended to appoint Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh over Khurāsān, but al-Musta'īn was told that he was their most distinguished person (i.e. the Ṭāhirids) and is like a hostage for them. He was then inclined to appoint 'Abdallāh's offspring of whom Sulaymān, Ṭalḥah and 'Ubaydallāh were in Khurāsān. Muḥammad was afraid, however, that they would seize authority (for themselves) and councelled al-Musta'īn to appoint his nephew. Thus the two police departments were specifically given to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh; his nephew Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir had no responsibility for them." The two police departments refer to the security arrangements for East and West Baghdad. See Dūrī, Abḥāth, 17; FHA, III, 563.

21. The Jawsaq Palace was one of the most famous palaces built by al-Mu'taṣim. For the literary and historical sources concerning this palace, see Sāmarrā'ī, Sāmarrā fī Adab, 225–228; Ḥimyarī, Rawḍ, 301; Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 265; and Yāqūt, Mu jam, III, 175. The architectural details are discussed in Creswell, Architecture, 259f.

22. This is a reference to Barqah in North Africa (modern Tunis). See Aboulfeda, Géographie, 127, and Ḥimyarī, Rawḍ, 91.

23. This was obviously their pay-off to drop the claim to the caliphate.

twelfth of Ramaḍān (November 9, 862), all the possessions of al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'ayyad, including buildings, residences, estates, palaces, household furnishings and so forth were bought from them for twenty thousand dīnārs. This sale was witnessed by (legal) witnesses (shuhūd), notaries ('udūl)[24], and judges, among others. It is said that (only) their estates were bought and that Abū 'Abdallāh (al-Mu'tazz) retained properties producing a cash revenue of twenty thousand dīnārs per annum, while Ibrāhīm (al-Mu'ayyad) had access to a yearly revenue of five thousand dīnārs. What was bought from Abū 'Abdallāh was worth ten million dīnārs and ten pearls, and from Ibrāhīm three million dirhams and three pearls. Bearing witness to the transaction were the jurists (fuqahā') and judges. The purchase was made in the name of al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad[25] on behalf of al-Musta'īn in the month of Rabī' II, 248 (June 4–July 2, 862). The two ('Abbāsid princes) were then jailed in the (detention) room of the Jawsaq Palace, and were entrusted to Bughā the Younger. The Turks had intended to kill them when the rabble and the Shākiriyyah rioted, but they were stopped by Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb who said, [1508] "They have committed no fault and the rioters are not their followers but, rather, the followers of Ibn Ṭāhir. Better that they be jailed." Therefore, they were jailed.

In that year, the mawlās were angered by Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb; in Jumādā I (July 3–Aug. 1, 862) his possessions as well as those of his sons were confiscated (ustuṣfiya), and he was banished to Crete.

In this year, 'Alī b. Yaḥya was relieved of his command of the Syrian frontier and was appointed governor of Armenia and Ādharbayjān. This was in Ramaḍān, 248 (October 29–November 27, 862).

In this year, the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ rioted against Kaydar b. 'Ubaydallāh, al-Musta'īn's governor of the city, and expelled him from it. Al-Faḍl b. Qārin was then sent against them. Using his guile, he captured the rebels and killed a great number of them. He destroyed their (defensive) wall and he took one hundred of their notables to Sāmarrā.

In this year, Waṣīf—he was residing on the Syrian frontier—was 24. The translation "notaries" follows Schacht, Introduction, 194.

25. This al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad was originally in charge of the dīwān of the estates (ḍiyā') under al-Mutawakkil. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 290, n. 9. After an illustrious career in several government jobs he became the wazīr to al-Mu'tamid, ibid.

taking part in the summer campaign when word reached him of al-Muntaṣir's death. Nevertheless, he invaded the Byzantine territory and conquered a fortress called Farūriyyah.[26]

In this year, al-Mustaʿīn appointed Utāmish over Egypt and the West (al-Maghrib), and he took him as his wazīr.

In this year too, Bughā al-Sharābī was appointed over Ḥulwān, Māsabadhān, and Mihrajān Qadhaq,[27] and al-Mustaʿīn assigned Shāhak al-Khādim to administer his apartments, kitchen, harem, treasury, and his private affairs. The Caliph favored him and Utāmish over all others.

[1509] Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Zaynabī.

---

26. For a parallel description of this campaign, see Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 300.
27. These are districts east of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 202, 228.

The Events of the Year 249

(FEBRUARY 24, 863–FEBRUARY 12, 864)

Among the events taking place were Ja'far b. Dīnār's raid during the summer campaign and the capture of a fortress and several storage depots (maṭāmīr). 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Aqṭa' sought permission from Ja'far to march to a district of the Byzantine territory. The former granted his request, and 'Umar set off with a great force drawn from the people of Malaṭiyah. He was met by the emperor, who commanded a huge army, in a place called Arz of Marj al-Usquf.[28] The emperor engaged 'Umar in a fierce battle, and many men were killed on both sides. The Byzantines then surrounded 'Umar—there were fifty thousand of them. He was killed together with two thousand Muslims on Friday in the middle of Rajab (September 3, 863).

In this year, 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī was killed.

The Reasons for His Death

It is reported that when the Byzantines killed 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh, they went to the frontier of al-Jazīrah, eager for the lands and the Muslim strongholds (ḥaram) there. When the news reached 'Alī b.

28. Marj al-Usquf is known from other sources to have been in Asia Minor. See Le Strange, Lands, 138.

Yaḥyā, (who was) on his way back from Armenia to Mayyāfāriqīn,[29] [1510] he rushed to meet them at the head of a contingent drawn from Mayyāfāriqīn and al-Silsilah.[30] As a result, some four hundred men were killed. This took place during Ramaḍān (October 18–November 16, 863).

On the first day of Ṣafar, 249 (March 26, 863), the troops and the Shākiriyyah rioted in Baghdad.

The Reasons for This

When news concerning the death of 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Aqṭa' and 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī reached the people of Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām), Sāmarrā and the rest of the nearby Muslim cities—the two were strong defenders of Islam, men of great courage who elicited enormous praise along the frontier districts they served—people became exceedingly distressed. Their hearts were heavy, especially because one had died so quickly after the other. Moreover, they had already been appalled by al-Mutawakkil's death at the hand of the Turks and by the way (in which) the latter assumed control over the affairs of the Muslims. The Turks killed any caliph they desired to kill and appointed in his stead whomever they wished, without reference to the religious authority and without eliciting the opinions of the Muslims. The populace (al-'āmmah) of Baghdad gathered, shouted out in protest and called for action. Joining them were the Abnā'[31] and the Shākiriyyah, who openly called for their allotments. That took place on the first day of Ṣafar (March 26, 863).

The Baghdādīs liberated the prison of Naṣr b. Mālik and freed those who were in it, as well as those who were in the masonry bridge (qanṭarah) near the Bridge Gate (Bāb al-Jisr).[32] Among the detainees there were the dregs of society (rufūgh) from Khurāsān, wretches (ṣa'ālīk) from Jibāl, and the Muḥammarah. They cut one of 29. Located in upper Mesopotamia, ibid., 111–112.

30. It is obviously in the area of upper Mesopotamia.

31. For this group of military personnel, refer to Lassner, Shaping, 129–136, 279, n.49, and 280, n.67, for further bibliography.

32. At the uppermost bridge spanning the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 178, 198.

the two (river) bridges[33] from its moorings and set the other afire, sinking its pontoons. The prison records of the detainees were looted, and the individual files were torn loose and cast into the [1511] water. They also looted the residence of Bishr and Ibrāhīm, the sons of Hārūn, Christians who were secretaries to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. All of that took place on the East Side of Baghdad, which was governed at that time by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Harthamah.

At that time, the wealthy people of Baghdad and Sāmarrā spent great amounts of their money to supply those setting out for the frontiers to fight the Byzantines. Masses of people came forward from al-Jabal, Fārs, al-Ahwāz and other districts in order to partake in the raids against the Byzantines. We received no information that the central authorities were prepared to send a military force against the Byzantines on their own account in those days, despite the actions of the latter against the Muslims.[34]

On Friday, the twentieth of Rabīʿ I (May 14, 863), an unknown group of people attacked the prison in Sāmarrā and freed everyone in it. Zurāfah was sent with a contingent of mawlās to seek the perpetrators of this act, but he was himself attacked and routed by the mob. Utāmish, Waṣīf and Bughā now rode out with the Turks for the same purpose and killed some of the mob. A boiling pot was reportedly dumped on Waṣīf; it is also said that a group from the mob hurled stones at him near al-Sarījah.[35] At this, Waṣīf gave orders to the fire hurlers (naffāṭīn), who cast their fire at the shops and [1512] residences in that neighborhood. I, myself, have seen that burnt-out place in Sāmarrā near the residence of Isḥāq.[36]

It is reported that on that day the Maghāribah looted the houses of some of the common people. The disturbance finally quieted down towards the end of that day. Aḥmad b. Jamīl was dismissed from his 33. On bridges, see Lassner, Topography; also Le Strange, Baghdad, 108.

34. The text is very difficult, but this seems to be the sense of: fa-lam yablughnā annahu kāna li-l-sulṭān fī-mā kāna min al-rūm ilā-l-muslimīn min dhālika taghyīr wa-lā tawjīh jaysh ilayhim li-ḥarbihim.

35. The text is al-Sharīḥah; it should be read al-Sarījah, which was both a major artery of traffic and a large neighborhood. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 260.

36. Either Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm or Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā, for they both had their residence around that area. See Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 260.

duties in charge of security at Sāmarrā on account of the aforementioned actions by the mob and the (rebellious) troops[37] that day. Ibrāhīm b. Sahl al-Dārij was subsequently appointed in his place.

In that year Utāmish and his secretary Shujāʿ were killed. This took place on Saturday, the fourteenth of Rabīʿ II (June 6, 863).

The Reason for Their Death

It is reported, that when al-Mustaʿīn assumed the caliphate, he gave Utāmish and Shāhak al-Khādim control over the treasury, permitting them to do whatever they pleased. Moreover, he did the same for his own mother, refusing to deny any of her wishes; her secretary was Salamah b. Saʿīd al-Naṣrānī. Invariably, the wealth that came to the central authorities from the various regions ended up in the possession of these three people. Utāmish, who had designs on the trea-[1513] sury, skimmed off the money that was in it. Al-Mustaʿīn had entrusted his son al-ʿAbbās to the supervision of Utāmish[38] (fi ḥijr Utāmish), and whatever money was left over by those three was taken for al-ʿAbbās to be spent on his needs. The supervisor of the Caliph's Bureau of Estates at that time was Dulayl who, in turn, embezzled an enormous amount of money.

The mawlās began to see that the (government's) wealth was being squandered while they themselves were hard pressed. Moreover, Utāmish, the companion of al-Mustaʿīn, who had been given full control over the caliph and his affairs, started to dispense the business of government to the exclusion of Waṣīf and Bughā. As a result, they stirred up the mawlās against Utāmish by persistently plotting against him. Finally, they perfected their plot, and the Turks and Farāghinah were incited to rise against Utāmish. On Thursday, the twelfth of Rabīʿ II, 249 (June 4, 863), a group of them from al-Dūr and al-Karkh[39] came out against him. They set up camp and then 37. The text reads nafar.

38. See Lisān, IV, 167, has ḥjr meaning supervision as well.

39. These two northern quarters of Sāmarrā were given by al-Muʿtaṣim to the Turks in an attempt to isolate them from the main population, thus avoiding the troubles they caused in Baghdad where they had no special quarters of their own. See Sāmarrāʾī, Tārīkh, I, 243–246, and Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 259.

slowly marched towards him while he was at the Jawsaq Palace[40] with al-Musta'īn. When word of this reached him he wished to flee but was unable to do so. He now sought refuge with al-Musta'īn but was refused. The mawlās maintained their positions all day Thursday and Friday; and then on Saturday they entered the Jawsaq Palace and brought Utāmish out of the place where he had been hiding. He was subsequently killed along with his secretary Shujā' b. al-Qāsim. The mawlās then looted the residence of Utāmish; I have reports that enormous amounts of money as well as furniture, rugs, and household items were taken from it.

When Utāmish was killed, al-Musta'īn appointed Abū Ṣāliḥ 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād as wazīr. Al-Faḍl b. Marwān was removed from the Bureau of Taxation, and the Caliph appointed 'Īsā b. Farrukhānshāh to head it. Wāṣif was appointed over al-Ahwāz and [1514]
Bughā the Younger was given Palestine during Rabī' II (May 24–June 21, 863). Afterwards, Bughā the Younger and his party became angry with Abū Ṣāliḥ b. Yazdād, and the latter subsequently fled to Baghdad. Al-Musta'īn appointed in his stead Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl al-Jarjarā'ī, and he entrusted Sa'īd b. Ḥumayd to head the Bureau of Correspondence (Rasā'il) Concerning that al-Ḥamdūnī recited:

Sa'īd (now) wears the sword after living in rags [dhā ṭimrayn] with no position.

Indeed, God has his own signs [āyāt,] this being one of them [that] has been bestowed [munzalah] upon us.

In this year, 'Alī b. al-Jahm b. al-Badr was killed. The reason for this was that he had set out from Baghdad to the frontier. When he neared Aleppo, at a place called Khusāf,[41] a group of cavalry from the Kalb engaged and killed him. The bedouins took whatever he had with him. While in the chase he recited:

Has the night been increased or has the dawn been swept away by the torrent.

40. The Jawsaq Palace, see n. 21 above was actually on the eastern bank of the Tigris and was thus very close to al-Dūr and al-Karkh. If the Turks were marching against Utāmish, they were doing so at a very slow pace.

41. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 370.

I recall the people of Dujayl, but alas! Where am
I from Dujayl?

His residence had been in the street of Dujayl.[42]

In this year, Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was removed from his position [1515] as head of the judiciary, and Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār al-Burjumī from al-Kūfah was appointed. It has been said that this took place in the year 250.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 249 (January 15–February 12, 863), a violent earthquake struck al-Rayy. As a result, many houses were demolished and a number of the inhabitants were killed. The survivors fled the city and camped at the outskirts.

On Friday, the twenty-fifth of Jumādā I (July 16, 863), a violent downpour struck the populace of Sāmarrā accompanied by thunder and lightning. The clouds darkened that day and the rain kept pouring until the sun was about to set. Afterwards, the weather became calm.

On Thursday, the third of Jumādā I this year (June 24, 863), the Maghāribah[43] became agitated—they used to meet near the bridge in Sāmarrā—but on Friday they dispersed.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm the imām and governor of Mecca.

---

42. That is, in Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 443, and Le Strange, Baghdad, 111, 127–31.

43. Since the Maghāribah had their own quarters along Gulf Street (Shāriʿ al-khalīj) which was parallel to the eastern bank of the Tigris, Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 263, the bridge where they used to meet was probably the one spanning the Tigris near the Jawsaq Palace at the end of their quarter.

The Events of the Year

250

(FEBRUARY 13, 864–FEBRUARY 1, 865)

Among the events taking place this year was the uprising of Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥusayn b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, the one who is nicknamed Abū al-Ḥusayn. He rebelled in al-Kūfah and was killed there.

The Causes and Consequences of His Uprising [1516]

It is reported that Abū al-Ḥusayn Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar, whose mother was Umm al-Ḥusayn Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib, was hard pressed by his creditors. One day he met ʿUmar b. Faraj who was entrusted with the affairs of the Ṭālibids; the latter had just arrived from Khurāsān during the reign of al-Mutawakkil. The ʿAlid asked him for a grant (ṣilah) but ʿUmar responded harshly, whereupon Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar cursed him (qadhafahu) during his own assembly. Yaḥyā was subsequently imprisoned and remained incarcerated until his family vouched for him and he was set free. Following this, he went to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) where he took up residence, still suffering from hardship. Then he went to Sāmarrā where he met Waṣīf and requested that an allowance be given to him, but Waṣīf responded harshly, saying, "Why should there be an allowance for the likes of you?" Yaḥyā then left his presence.

Ibn Abī Ṭālib reported on the authority of Ibn al-Ṣūfī, the Ṭālibid, that (Yaḥyā) had come to him on the eve of his uprising and spent the night, but he did not reveal anything of his intentions. He had offered Yaḥyā food, for he had realized that he was hungry, but the latter rejected it, saying, "If we live, we will eat." Ibn al-Ṣūfī said, "I realized then that he had decided on a rash course of action." Yaḥyā left him and went directly to al-Kūfah, whose governor at the time was Ayyūb b. al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān—he ruled on behalf of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Yaḥya b. ʿUmar gathered [1517] a great throng of bedouins; a contingent from al-Kūfah also rallied to him. Coming to al-Fallūjah, he encamped in a village known as al-ʿUmud, where he was reported by the post master.[44] Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir then wrote to Ayyūb b. al-Ḥasan and ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd al-Sarakhsī, who was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's security officer for Iraq, ordering them to join forces against Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar. The tax collector in al-Kūfah (at the time) was Badr b. al-Aṣbagh. Together with seven men drawn from his cavalry, Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar marched to al-Kūfah. He entered the city and proceeded as far as the treasury, where he took whatever he found. This amounted to more than two thousand dīnārs; as regards silver, he found seventy thousand dirhams.

Declaring his rebellion in al-Kūfah, he now liberated the two prisons of all those who were interred, while expelling the wardens. He was met by ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd al-Sarakhsī, who was one of the Shākiriyyah. Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar struck him where his hair parted, and the force of the blow cut his face. Ibn Maḥmūd then fled together with his companions, and Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar took possession of all that Ibn Maḥmūd had in the way of mounts and money. Afterward Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar left al-Kūfah for its agricultural hinterland (the Sawād) and journeyed until reaching a place called Bustān, or some place close to it, around three farsakhs (eighteen km) from Junbulā'.[45] He did not reside in al-Kūfah. He was followed by a [1518] group of Zaydīs,[46] and was supported as well by bedouins residing

44. The post master was also responsible for intelligence information. See Dūrī, Abḥāth, 18. For Fallūjah in the area of al-Kūfah, see Le Strange, Lands, 74.

45. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 168.

46. Originally a group of Shīʿite sects following either Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn or Zayd b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib; they believed that the imām should be chosen near that district. He was also supported by the people of the Ṭaff region and the lower Sīb all the way to Wāsiṭ.[47] The ʿAlid then established himself at Bustān while his followers grew in number.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh now sent al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab against him, attaching to al-Ḥusayn's command a group of brave and valiant officers such as Khālid b. ʿImrān, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who was known as Wajh al-Fals, Abū al-Sanā al-Ghanawī, ʿAbdallāh b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, and Saʿd al-Ḍabābī. From the Isḥāqiyyah came Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl, some elite Khurāsānīs, and others. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl went out and camped opposite Hafandā,[48] facing Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar; but he and his force did not attack. Yaḥyā went off in the direction of al-Baḥriyyah, a village five farsakhs (thirty km) away from Qussīn.[49] Had al-Ḥusayn wished to catch up with him, he could have done so. Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar now marched along the eastern bank of the Sīb, while al-Ḥusayn did likewise on the western side, until reaching Aḥmadābādh.[50] There he crossed over in the direction of Sūrā[51] and had the troops sieze every soldier who was too weak to keep up with Yaḥyā; at the same time, they were to detain those villagers who had gone over to Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar. Aḥmad b. al-Faraj, who was known as Ibn Fazzārī, [1519] was in charge of the security of the Sīb on behalf of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. He was carrying whatever he could gather of the Sīb revenue before Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar entered Ahmadābadh. As a result, Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar did not gain possession of it. Yaḥyā marched towards al-Kūfah, and was met by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Khaṭṭāb Wajh al-Fals whom he engaged in a fierce battle near the Kūfah Bridge. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Kaṭṭāb was routed and he fled in the direction of Shāhī;[52] he was joined by al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl who encamped there.

Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar entered al-Kūfah and was joined by the Zaydīs by the consent of the descendents of ʿAlī. See Nawbakhtī, Firaq, 19; Sāmarrāʾī, al-Ghulūw, 300–301; Shahrastānī, Milal, I, 207.

---

47. See Ṭaff in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 36, and for lower Sīb, near Qaṣr Hubayrah in the region of al-Kūfah, ibid., III, 293.

48. Ibid., V, 408.

49. Ibid., IV, 350.

50. A general term used to describe several villages or cities that were associated with some Aḥmad or other.

51. See Le Strange, Lands, 70–72

52. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 316.

who propagandized on behalf of the Chosen One (al-Riḍā) of Muḥammad's family.[53] With that, his position became solidified; for a group of people gathered to him and liked him. The mob of Baghdad held him in esteem, and it is not known that they did as much for anyone else of his house. In al-Kūfah a group of experienced Shīʿites swore allegiance to him and were joined by a mixed bag of people who were not known for their piety. In the meantime, al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl remained encamped at Shāhī and rested; his companions revived their mounts and were themselves revived as they drank the sweet waters of the Euphrates, and supplies, provisions, and funds reached them. As for Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar, he remained in al-Kūfah, collecting provisions, forging swords (yaṭbaʿ al-suyūf), [1520] reviewing fighting men, and gathering weapons. A group of Zaydīs, without knowledge of combat, counselled Yaḥyā to hasten against al-Ḥusayn, and most of his followers urged the same. So Yaḥyā advanced against him from the back of al-Kūfah, behind the trench—this was on Monday, the thirteenth of Rajab (August 20, 864).

The ʿAlid was joined by al-Haydam al-ʿIjlī at the head of a group of horsemen from Banū ʿIjl, a group of the Banū Asad, and infantry drawn from the populace of al-Kūfah, who had neither knowledge of war nor experience, and were without valor. They marched the whole night and in the morning came up against al-Ḥusayn and his men—the latter were rested and prepared. They charged wildly and hurled (stones)[54] at them for a whole hour just before daybreak. Al-Ḥusayn's troops then counter-attacked and put them to the sword. The first prisoner was al-Haydam b. al-ʿAlāʾ b. Jumhūr al-ʿIjlī. The Kūfan infantry was routed, most of them being unarmed, weak and dressed in rags; and the (government) cavalry trampled them. The army scattered from the presence of Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar, who was wearing the Tibetan coat of mail which he had taken from ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd; it trailed down the sides of the mule. A son of Khālid b. ʿImrān called Khayr came upon Yaḥyā but did not recognize him; he thought that Yaḥyā was a man from Khurāsān on account of the

53. This is but one more instance of the continuous struggle by the Shīʿites against the ʿAbbāsids that is profusely documented by Ṭabarī.

54. Their uncoordinated and chaotic attack is only a reflection of their lack of training and inexperience.

coat of mail he was wearing. Abū al-Ghawr b. Khālid b. ʿImrān also came upon him and called out to Khayr b. Khālid, "O brother! By God! This is Abū al-Ḥusayn. The heart of his army has fled and he doesn't yet realize it." Khayr then called upon one of his men, an officer (ʿarīf) from Mosul by the name of Muḥsin b. al-Muntāb. The latter dismounted and went after him; after killing Yaḥyā, he put his head in a basket and sent it with ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, the brother of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Khaṭṭāb, to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. [1521]

Several people claimed to have killed him. Al-ʿIrs b. ʿUrāhim (said) they discovered him slain (bārik) and found his signet-ring and sword with a man known as al-ʿAsqalānī, who claimed that he had stabbed him and robbed him. Saʿd al-Ḍabābī also claimed that he had killed him. And it is also reported on the authority of Abū al-Ḥusayn, the maternal uncle of Abū al-Sanā, that he had stabbed a man in the back at dawn without recognizing who it was; they subsequently discovered a stab wound in the back of Abū al-Ḥusayn (Yaḥya). But no one is certain who killed him because so many claimed to have done it.

The head arrived at the residence of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir in a state of decomposition. They sought someone who would carve the eyes and larynx out of the flesh but to no avail; the butchers ran away. A volunteer was sought from the slaughterers among the Khurramiyyah[55] who were (then) in prison, but none came forth except for one man, one of the attendants of the new prison by the name of Sahl b. al-Ṣughdī. The latter took charge of carving out his brain and eyes, performing this task with his own hands. The (empty) head was then stuffed with aloes, musk, and camphor after it had been washed and wrapped in cotton. They reported that they had seen (evidence of) a severe sword blow on his temple. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir gave orders that the head be sent to al-Mustaʿīn on the morning of the day it had reached him, and he personally wrote to the Caliph of the victory. [1522]

The head was displayed at the Public Gate in Sāmarrā, where the people gathered to see it. They grew in numbers and complained.

55. There were several sects known by this name. Originally, the name designated the followers of Abū Muslim al-Khurāsānī, see Masʿūdī, Murūj, 41–42. But later the name was given to regional sects who were mainly extremist Shīʿites. See, for example, Rāzī, Kitāb al-Zīnah, 306.

Ibrāhīm al-Dayraj was in charge of displaying it, having been ordered to do so by Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's lieutenant. He displayed it for a little while, then it was taken down to be sent to Baghdad for display at the Bridge Gate.[56] But this couldn't be arranged for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh on account of the crowds that had gathered; he was told that they gathered to seize it. As a result, he did not display it but, instead, had it placed in a coffer in the arsenal of his palace. On the other hand, al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl sent the prisoners and the heads of the slain in his possession with a man called Aḥmad b. ʿIṣmawayh—he was one of those accompanying Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm. Aḥmad drove them hard, starved and humiliated them, and had them detained in the new prison. Then Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh wrote, asking that they be pardoned and then set free. He also ordered that the heads be buried and not displayed. Thus, they were buried in a palace near the Golden Gate.[57]

One of the Ṭāhirids reported that he was in the assembly of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir while the latter was being congratulated for the death of Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar and the military victory. A group of Hāshimites and Ṭālibids, among others, were in attendance. Among those who had entered into his presence was Dāwūd b. al-Haytham [1523] Abū Hāshim al-Jaʿfarī who, hearing people congratulating him, said, "O Prince! You are being congratulated for killing a man for whom the Messenger of God, had he been alive, would be among the bereaved." Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh did not respond, whereupon Abū al-Hāshim al-Jaʿfarī left, reciting:

O Banū Ṭāhir eat him like a plague for the flesh of the prophet is not nourishing.

A revenge that God himself seeks will, I am sure, be crowned with perfect success.

Al-Mustaʿīn had sent Kalbātikīn to reinforce al-Ḥusayn (b. Ismāʿīl) and to help him to victory. But he caught up with al-Ḥusayn after the enemy had been routed and Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar had been killed. Kalbātikīn continued his march, accompanied by the postmaster of al-Kūfah, and encountered a contingent of Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar's men. They were carrying provisions and food and were seeking Yaḥyā's camp. He killed them and then entered al-Kūfah with the intention of looting it and putting its populace to the sword. Al-Ḥusayn (b. Ismāʿīl) prohibited him from doing so, giving protection to both the blacks and whites of the city. Kalbātikīn stayed for a few days, then withdrew from al-Kūfah.

56. Public display of parts of bodies of one's political enemies, usually the head, was a common practice at this time as is attested by Ṭabarī himself in several instances below.

57. That is, in the Round City of al-Manṣūr. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 19, 30–33, 242–5, and Lassner, Topography, s.v. Gold Palace.

In this year, during the month of Ramaḍān (October 6–November 4, 864), the rebellion of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib took place.

The Reason For His Rebellion [1524]

A group of people from Ṭabaristān and others reported on the reason for this. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir had been granted some government controlled lands in Ṭabaristān as fiefs. This was to mark his success in killing Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar and the subsequent entry of his officers and troops into al-Kūfah. Among those grants was a fief near the two frontiers of Ṭabaristān bordering Daylam, that is, Galār and Sālūs. Behind it was land jointly utilized by the people of that district as a source of firewood, and for grazing lands and pasturage for their animals. No one held ownership of this area; it was but a barren stretch of uncultivated state land, except for thickets, some bushes and grazing grass. I was told that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir sent one of the brothers of his secretary Bishr b. Hārūn al-Naṣrānī—he was called Jābir b. Hārūn—to take possession of the land there that had been granted (to the Ṭāhirid) as a fief.

At that time the governor of Ṭabaristān was Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh, the lieutenant of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. But Muḥammad b. Aws al-Balkhī had Sulaymān totally under his control. The former positioned his offspring in the cities of Ṭabaristān, establishing them as governors. Each was assigned to a particular city of the province. They were impudent youths and caused harm to those subjects who were their responsibility. Their [1525] subjects thus disapproved of them as well as of their father, Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh, on account of their arrogance, the manner in which they treated them, and their brutality. If the story of these excesses were properly told, it would fill a book by itself.

According to reports I have received, Muḥammad b. Aws also started a blood feud with the Daylamites by launching a surprise attack against the regions of their country that bordered Ṭabaristān. He did this although they were peaceful people on good terms with the populace of Ṭabaristān. Muḥammad took some Daylamites prisoner and killed others before he returned, contented, to Ṭabaristān. This further enraged the people of Ṭabaristān against him. When the messenger of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, that is, Jābir b. Hārūn al-Naṣrānī, came to Ṭabaristān to take possession of the land that was granted there to Muḥammad, he went, so I was told, to the government controlled lands. He reportedly took possession of this land (which had been granted to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh) and in addition he took the uncultivated state land which was commonly utilized by the inhabitants of that region. Among the uncultivated state lands (mawāt) he wanted the (area) by the two frontier regions, Galār and Sālūs.

At the time, there were two men in that region who were famous for their courage and valor. Moreover, they were known in days gone [1526] by for their ability to hold that region against any Daylamites, who desired it, thus allowing people to find sustenance there and granting favor to those who would support them. One of them was called Muḥammad, the other Jaʿfar; they were brothers, the sons of Rustam. They disapproved of Jābir b. Hārūn's attempt—described previously—to appropriate the uncultivated state land, and they resisted it. The two sons of Rustam were obeyed in that region, and they stirred up support among their followers to prevent Jābir b. Hārūn from obtaining the uncultivated state land that he desired—the land which was reportedly utilized by the people of that region and which was not inside the fief granted to his master Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. Their followers rose in support of them, and Jābir b. Hārūn fled for his life, fearing Muḥammad and Jaʿfar and their followers who did not approve of Jābir al-Naṣrānī's intended action. The latter thus joined Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.

The two sons of Rustam and their followers, who supported them in preventing Jābir from obtaining the uncultivated state land, as I have mentioned, became convinced that mischief was underway. For the governor of all of Ṭabaristān, Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh, was the brother of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and the paternal uncle of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh, who was then al-Mustaʿīn's governor over Khurāsān, Ṭabaristān, al-Rayy and all of the eastern provinces. When the people became convinced (of what would happen), they contacted their neighbors among the Daylamites and reminded them of their loyalty to the existing agreement between them, and of what treachery Muḥammad b. Aws had perpetrated in killing and [1527] taking prisoners among them. They also expressed their fear that he was about to do the same to them, and they were therefore asking the Daylamites to show themselves against him and his followers. The Daylamites responded by saying that their land was totally surrounded by territory under the control of either the Ṭāhirid governors, or those governors who supported the Ṭāhirids when needed. Thus, there was no way that they could support them until their fear—that troops would be sent against them if they became openly involved in a war that affected the subjects of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh's governors—abated.[58]

Those who sought their open support against Sulaymān and his governors informed the Daylamites that they would not be mindless of their needs, thereby allaying the Daylamite fears. The Daylamites then responded positively, and formulated an agreement with the people of Galār and Sālūs to support one another in the fight against Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh, Ibn Aws and any others who intended to attack them. Afterwards, Rustam's sons Muḥammad and Jaʿfar reportedly sent word to one of the Ṭālibids then living in Ṭabaristān—he was called Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm—offering to solicit the oath of allegiance to him. He refused them, saying, "However, I will direct you to another one of us who is more suited to your call." They asked, "Who is this man?" And he told them that it was al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and directed them to al-Ḥasan's residence in al-Rayy. People were then sent to al-Rayy, at the recommendation [1528] of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm the ʿAlid, to invite al-Ḥasan to Ṭabaristān. Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd did this. He met the local population and found that the Daylamites and the people of Galār, Sālūs and Rūyān had already spoken of their allegiance to him and of their intention to campaign jointly against Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh. When al-Ḥasan b. Zayd met them, they swore allegiance to him. Those who swore allegiance were: the two sons of Rustam; most of the people of the frontier region; the chiefs of the Daylamites such as Jāyā, Lāshām, and Wahsūdām b. Justān; and of the people of Rūyān, 'Abdallāh b. Wandāmīd, who was esteemed among them as a devout and pious man. They now rebelled against the governors of Ibn Aws in that region and expelled them, whereupon the latter joined Ibn Aws and Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh who were then in Sāriyah.[59]

58. The text is difficult: wa-inna mā sa'alū min mu'āwanatihim lā sabīl lahum ilayhi illā bi-zawāl al-khawf 'anhum man(?) yu'tū min qibal ẓuhūrihim idhā hum ishtaghalū bi-ḥarb min bayn aydīhim min 'ummāl Sulaymān . . .

Those who swore allegiance to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd from the aforementioned districts were joined by those who now heard of his rebellion. That is, they were joined by the thugs (ḥawziyyah) of the [1529] mountains of Ṭabaristān such as Masmughān, Qādusbān, Layth b Qubādh, and, among the people of the foothills, Khushakajistān b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Khalīl b. Wandāsifjān. The exceptions were the inhabitants of Mount Firīm,[60] who were well defended in their mountain and were under the leadership of Qārin b. Shahriyār. They did not join al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and his followers until after Qārin himself died, although at times they had amicable dealings with them and also intermarried with them. These dealings were an attempt by Qārin to ward off the antagonism of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and his followers.

After that, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and his commanders from the aforementioned regions marched on Āmul, the city of Ṭabaristān closest to Galār and Sālūs[61] by way of the foothills. Ibn Aws proceeded from Sāriyah to defend the city, and the two armies met in one of the regions of Āmul and engaged one another in battle. Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd slipped away from the scene of the battle with some of his followers and entered the city from another direction. When the news of his entrance into the city reached Ibn Aws, who was preoccupied with al-Ḥasan b. Zayd's men before him, he thought only of saving [1530] himself and joining Sulaymān at Sāriyah. When al-Ḥasan b. Zayd entered Āmul the ranks of his army swelled, and his cause began to show promise. Joining him was every seeker of booty and every adventurous rebel from among the vagabonds (ṣa'ālīk), the squatters and others.

---

59. See Le Strange, Lands, 370, 375.
60. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 260.
61. In Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 130, 132, it is spelled in the alternate form Shālūs. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 172, 311.

According to what I was told, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd remained in Āmul for a few days in order to collect taxes from its inhabitants and make preparations. Then he and his force pushed on towards Sāriyah seeking Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh. Sulaymān and Ibn Aws marched out with their armies, and the two forces met outside Sāriyah where they waged battle. One of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd's commanders slipped away from the area of the engagement and approached the city of Sāriyah from another direction. He then entered the city together with his officers and men. Once that news reached Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh and his troops, they thought only of saving themselves.

A group of people from that district and others (said) Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh fled, leaving behind his family, his household, his baggage, and all the money, furnishings, and other things he had at Sāriyah. He did this without a second thought and went straight to Jurjān. Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and his men then took over Sulaymān's possessions in Āmul as well as those of his army. As for Sulaymān's household, his family and furnishings, I was told that al-Ḥasan b. Zayd had them sent to Sulaymān, and they caught up with him in [1531]
Jurjān. As for the possessions of his companions, they were looted by the followers of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. With Sulaymān b ʿAbdallāh taking refuge in Jurjān, the control of all Ṭabaristān was left to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

As soon as al-Ḥasan b. Zayd gained control over Ṭabaristān, having driven out Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh and his men, he sent cavalry, under the leadership of a man from his own house (also) called al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, to al-Rayy. The latter reached the city and expelled the Ṭāhirid governor. When al-Rayy was taken by the man sent by the Ṭālibids, its governor fled. The former appointed a Ṭālibid called Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar as his lieutenant and then withdrew from the city. In addition to Ṭabaristān, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd now controlled the whole district of al-Rayy, up to Hamadhān.

News of this reached al-Mustaʿīn—his administrative assistant at the time was Waṣīf the Turk, and his secretary was Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shīrzād who was also entrusted with the privy-seal and the wazīrate. The Caliph now sent Ismāʿīl b. Farāshah with an army to Hamadhān with orders to establish himself there and secure the region lest the cavalry of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd penetrate the area. The order was limited to that (locality) because the district beyond Hamadhān was controlled by Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.

The latter's governors ruled it, and he was charged with its welfare.

[1532] When Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar the Ṭālibid was firmly in control over al-Rayy, he reportedly manifested behavior which elicited the disapproval of its inhabitants. At this, Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh sent to al-Rayy one of his commanders, called Muḥammad b. Mīkāl—he was the brother of the Shāh b. Mīkāl—with an army of cavalry and infantry. He and Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar the Ṭālibid met outside the city. It is reported that Muḥammad b. Mīkāl took Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar the Ṭālibid prisoner. Dispersing the latter's army, he entered al-Rayy where he remained and mentioned the central authorities (once again) in the invocation (daʿā li-l-sulṭān).[62] Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd did not wait long before sending a cavalry force commanded by a man from Lāriz[63] called Wājin. As Wājin made out for al-Rayy, Muḥammad b. Mīkāl came forth to meet him. They engaged in a battle in which Wājin and his troops routed Muḥammad b. Mīkāl and his men. The latter then fled to the city seeking to defend himself there, but Wājin and his followers pursued him until he was killed. As a result, al-Rayy went over to the supporters of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. Appearing in al-Rayy on the day of ʿarafāt that year,[64] following the death of Muḥammad b. Mīkāl, were Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn the Younger b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī [1533] Ṭālib and Idrīs b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā led the festival prayer at al-Rayy and invoked the name of the Chosen One of Muḥammad's family.[65] Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ṭāhir came up against him, but Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā routed him and afterward made his way to Qazwīn.

In this year, Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid fell from favor, having been accused by Waṣīf of corrupting the Shākiriyyah to whom he was sent. He was exiled to al-Baṣrah on the twenty-third of Rabīʿ I (May 4, 864).

In this year, those Umayyads who had a position of rank at the

62. Although the Ṭāhirids had full control over the area, they still ruled on behalf of the central authority and recognized the Caliph as their supreme sovereign.

63. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 7.

64. The day of ʿarafāt is on the ninth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, *EI*², I, 604, hence the date is January 11, 865.

65. See n. 53, above.

Public Audience Hall such as Ibn Abī al-Shawārib were dropped from that position. This was also true of the 'Uthmānids.[66]

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn was freed from prison.

In this year, al-'Abbās b. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad was made heir to the throne (ujlisa) and Ja'far b. al-Faḍl b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā, who was known as Bashāshāt, was appointed governor of Mecca in Jumādā I (June 10–July 9, 864).

In this year, the people of Ḥimṣ, and a group of the Kalb under the leadership of 'Uṭayf b. Ni'mah al-Kalbī, attacked al-Faḍl b. Qārin, the brother of Māziyār b. Qārin, and killed him—he was then governor of Ḥimṣ on behalf of the central authorities. Al-Musta'īn then sent Mūsā b. Bughā the Elder against them. The latter set out from Sāmarrā on Thursday, the thirteenth of Ramaḍān (October 18, 864). When Mūsā approached (Ḥimṣ), its inhabitants met him between the city and Rastan. Engaging them in combat, he routed them and conquered Ḥimṣ. He killed a great many of its inhabitants, burned [1534] the city and took a group of the local leaders prisoner; but 'Uṭayf had escaped and joined the bedouins.

On Sunday, the twenty-fourth of Ramaḍān, 250 (October 29, 864) Ja'far b. Aḥmad b. 'Ammār al-Qāḍī died.

In this year, Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-Karīm al-Jawārī al-Taymī, the judge of al-Baṣrah, died.

In this year, Ḥamad b. al-Wazīr was put in charge of the judiciary of Sāmarrā.

In this year, the Shākiriyyah and the regular army (jund) in Fārs assaulted 'Abdallāh b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm. They looted his residence and killed Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Qārin as 'Abdallāh b. Isḥāq fled.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir sent two elephants from Khurāsān (to Baghdad?)—he had received them from Kābūl—along with statues and perfumes.

Leading the summer campaign this year was Balkājūr.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Ja'far b. al-Faḍl Bashāshāt, who was the governor of Mecca.

66. For these ranks of nobility and the social stratification, see Mez, Renaissance, 132–155.

[1535]

The Events of the Year

251

(FEBRUARY 2, 865–JANUARY 21, 866)

Among the events taking place, Waṣīf and Bughā the Younger killed Bāghar al-Turkī, and the mawlās became agitated.

Their Killing of Bāghar

The reported reason (was that) Bāghar had been one of those who murdered al-Mutawakkil. As a result, his military allotment increased and he was granted several fiefs, among them the estates belonging to the hinterland of al-Kūfah. One of the dihqāns of Bārūsmā and Nahr al-Malik[67] was given the responsibility for farming taxes on these estates; (the taxes were to be collected) by a Jewish secretary acting on behalf of Bāghar. The sum was two thousand dīnārs a year. Now a man from that region by the name of Ibn Mārimmah attacked[68] one of Bāghar's agents, as a result of which Ibn Mārimmah was arrested and fettered. But he later managed to escape from prison and went to Sāmarrā where he met Dulayl b. Yaʿqūb al-Naṣrānī who was then Bughā al-Sharābī's secretary and the administrator of his affairs. The army was Dulayl's responsibility, and commanders and governors thus came to him with requests on account of the esteem accorded to him by Bughā. Ibn Mārimmah was a friend of Dulayl, and Bāghar was one of Bughā's commanders.

67. For Bārūsmā and Nahr al-Malik, see Le Strange, Lands, 70, 81. For dihqān, see EI^{2}, II, 253–254.

68. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 137, where he uses wathaba instead of the unusual ʿadā . . . ʿalā for "attack".

Dulayl prevented Bāghar from dealing harshly with Aḥmad b. Mārimmah. This precipitated the antagonism that Bāghar felt for [1536]
Dulayl and was the reason for the rift between them. Bāghar was a courageous hero and well respected among Turks, but Bughā and others were wary of him and feared his capacity for evil. Bāghar reportedly came to Bughā on Tuesday the twenty-seventh of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 250 (January 29, 865). He was totally intoxicated when he found Bughā in the bath. He waited for the latter to get out. Then, entering into Bughā's presence, he said, "By God Dulayl must be killed." He then took to insulting Dulayl, whereupon Bughā replied, "If you had wished to kill my son Fāris I wouldn't have stopped you. Why should I concern myself with Dulayl al-Naṣrānī? But my affairs, as well as those of the caliphate, are in his hands. Wait until I appoint someone in his stead, and then do with him as you please."

Following this, Bughā sent word to Dulayl ordering him not to ride out. It is also said that one of Bughā's physicians, called Ibn Sarjawayh, met Dulayl and told him the news, whereupon the latter returned to his residence and hid. Bughā then sent for Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Fīrūz—he had been one of his previous secretaries—and appointed him in Dulayl's place to deceive Bāghar into thinking that he had discharged Dulayl from his office. Bāghar quieted down, and Bughā then attempted to reconcile Dulayl and Bāghar. But Bāghar kept threatening to kill Dulayl if he ever came face to face with him.[69]

Bāghar then ingratiated himself with al-Musta'īn and was assigned to palace duties. (He was liked so much that) al-Musta'īn disliked having him replaced. When it was the day for Bughā to be at home off duty, al-Musta'īn asked, "What duties [a'māl] were assigned to Ītākh." Waṣīf informed him, whereupon the Caliph said, "These functions ought to be transferred to Abū Muḥammad Bāghar." To which Waṣīf replied, "Yes". When the story reached Dulayl, he rode out to Bughā and said, "You sit at home while they are arranging to discharge you from all your duties. If you are indeed [1537] discharged, nothing remains but for you to be killed." Then, on the eve of his day off, Bughā went straight to the caliphal palace and said to Waṣīf, "You wanted to demote me and bring in Bāghar to replace me, while Bāghar is but one of my servants and followers?" Waṣīf responded, "I had no idea of the Caliph's wishes in that regard." Waṣīf and Bughā then agreed to remove Bāghar from the palace and to plot against him. They spread alarming rumors that he was being given command of a force in addition to his own, that he was being given robes of honor, and that he was to be seated in the palace assemblies in place of Bughā and Waṣīf, while the latter would be reduced in status to commanders (amīr). They persisted in arguing that that was going to take place on account of al-Mustaʿīn's fear of him.

69. The text reads: khalā bi-aṣḥābihi, "He was alone with his friends."

Bāghar and his followers became suspicious, and he gathered the group who had sworn allegiance to him in the killing of al-Mutawakkil, or at least some of them, as well as others. When they gathered, he consulted them and confirmed their allegiance as he did at the killing of al-Mutawakkil. They responded, "We are still bound by our oath of allegiance." To which he replied, "Stay at the palace until we kill al-Mustaʿīn, Bughā and Waṣīf. Then we will install ʿAlī, the son of al-Muʿtaṣim, or the son of al-Wāthiq as caliph, so that control will be ours, as it is now for those two who have taken everything tangible and left us with nothing." They agreed with him on this course of action. When the news reached al-Mustaʿīn, he sent for Bughā and Waṣīf—that was on Monday—and he said to [1538] them, "I didn't ask you to make me caliph, but you and your friends did it anyway. Now you want to kill me?" They both swore that they knew nothing of this. Whereupon he told them the news—it was said that word had been brought by a divorced wife of Bāghar, who came to al-Mustaʿīn's mother and to Bughā with it. Early the next morning Dulayl went to Bughā, and there he was joined by Waṣīf, who was accompanied by Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ, his secretary. They all agreed to seize and imprison Bāghar and two other Turks until they determined what to do with them. Bāghar was then brought with many others into the house of Bughā.

Bishr b. Saʿīd al-Marthidī (said that he) was present when Bāghar arrived. He was denied access to Bughā and Waṣīf but was taken, instead, to one of Bughā's bath-houses, and shackles were ordered for him. Although he resisted, they imprisoned him in the bath-house. When word reached the Turks at the Hārūnī Palace, at al-Karkh and at al-Dūr,[70] they attacked the government stables and looted them of all the animals they could find. Then they mounted the animals and presented themselves at the Jawsaq Palace fully armed. By the end of the day Waṣīf and Bughā commanded Rashīd, the son of Waṣīf's sister Suʿād, to kill Bāghar. He came to him with a group of men, and they cut him down with axes until he lay still. When al-Mustaʿīn got wind of their gathering, he set sail in a fire-boat (ḥarrāqah) together with Waṣīf and Bughā, and they journeyed to the residence of Waṣīf. People rushed back and forth with their weapons all day and all night—that was Tuesday. Waṣīf told (his followers), [1539] "Wait and see. If they persist in their uprising, we'll throw them his head." When the news of his death reached the rioting Turks, they persisted in their uprising until they learned that al-Mustaʿīn, Bughā and Waṣīf were already on their way to Baghdad. Waṣīf had given arms and lances to some cavalry and infantry among the Maghāribah and sent them against these rioters. He also sent word to the Shākiriyyah to be prepared in case they were needed. But, by noontime people quieted down, and the disturbance came to an end. A number of Turkish commanders had gone to these rioters and asked them to go home, saying, "Yūq Yūq," meaning "No! No!"

Bishr b. Saʿīd reported on the authority of Jāmiʿ b. Khālid, one of the Turks who succeeded Waṣīf: He (Jāmiʿ) and several people who knew Turkish were ordered to speak to the rioters. They told the latter that al-Mustaʿīn, Bughā and Waṣīf had already gone to Baghdad, whereupon the Turks showed signs of regret and left with their spirit broken. But as the news of al-Mustaʿīn's departure spread, the [1540] Turks attacked the dwellings of Dulayl b. Yaʿqūb and the nearby houses of his family, as well as those of his neighbors. They looted them completely, even the wood and the darwands.[71] They killed whatever mules they could, stole the fodder of the pack-animals and the wine that was stored in the wine cellar (khizānat al-sharāb). The dwelling of Salamah b. Saʿīd al-Naṣrānī was defended by a group of wrestlers and other neighbors of Dulayl, who were charged with protecting it. The defenders (also) prevented them from going through the building—the rioters wanted to reach the dwelling of Ibrāhīm b. Mihrān, the Christian soldier—and drove them away. Therefore, Salamah and Ibrāhīm were spared the looting.

70. See n. 39, above.

71. Darwand probably refers to the wooden stalks used for medicinal purposes and usually hung around houses to dispel desease. It is an arabized word from the Persian dorāniǰ or dorowanǰ. See Shir, Loan-Words, 62.

A poet, reported to have been Aḥmad b. al-Ḥārith al-Yamāmī, said on the occasion of Bāghar's death and the riot that took place on account of it:

By my life, having indeed killed Bāghar,
Bāghar unleashed a devastating war.

The caliph escaped with the two commanders at night seeking [the fastest] ship.

They called for Maysān their sailor, and he came faster than a glance.

He made them retreat to the belly of the ship and the squeak of their oars [marked] the speed.

And what power had this Ibn Mārimmah that we suffer on his account vicious war?

But it was Dulayl who intervened this one time, and on account of it God devastated the world.

[1541] He came to Baghdad just before sunrise thereby bringing to it much of the Baghdādīs' sorrow.

Would that that ship had never reached us,
but that God had sunk it along with its passengers,

For the Turks came with the Maghāribah and were joined by the Farāghinah armour clad.

Their squadrons march fully armed going to and fro, mounted soldiers and infantry.[72]

72. The text thibīnā should be read thā'ibīnā, "coming back"—in contrast to yarūḥūn, "they go forth."

They were met by an expert at war, someone who had been at it for too long.

He refurbished the defensive walls on both sides until he encompassed all of them.

He reinforced all of the gates along the defensive wall protecting al-Mustaʿīn.

He set up a ballista that casts death, but protects the lion's den.

He called to arms many a soldier and a recruit, that would number thousands and thousands if counted.

And he aligned the ballistas in perfect order all along the wall like the pupils of eyes.

It was reported that when they (that is, al-Mustaʿīn, Waṣīf and Bughā) reached Baghdad, Ibn Mārimmah fell ill. He was visited by Dulayl b. Yaʿqūb who asked him about the cause of his illness, to which he replied, "The wound caused by the shackles went foul [intaqaḍa] on me." Dulayl then said, "If the shackles have caused you wounds, you [in turn] have defiled [naqaḍta][73] the caliphate and caused internal strife."

Ibn Mārimmah died during those days. Abū ʿAlī al-Yamāmī al-Ḥanafī said on the occasion of al-Mustaʿīn's arrival at Baghdad:

He lasted only as long as his reign, perishing shortly thereafter.

The Turks forbade the people from coming down to Baghdad. [1542]
They reportedly took a sailor who had rented out his boat and whipped him two hundred times, after which they hung him on the mast of his vessel. The boat-men were thus inhibited from making the trip except secretly, or heavily laden with provisions.

In this year the internal strife came to a boil and war broke out between the people of Baghdad and the government army stationed in

73. The pun is in the use of the verb intaqaḍa, said of an unsound wound that has gone bad, and naqaḍa, "meaning "to break a pact," "to demolish a house," etc.

Sāmarrā. Everyone in Sāmarrā swore allegiance to al-Muʿtazz, while those in Baghdad kept their allegiance to al-Mustaʿīn.

The Outbreak of This Civil Strife and the Reason Why the Regular Army in Sāmarrā Pledged Allegiance to al-Muʿtazz and Deposed al-Mustaʿīn; Their War Against Those Who Retained Allegiance to the Latter

We have already mentioned the arrival in Baghdad of al-Mustaʿīn, Shāhak al-Khādim, Waṣīf, Bughā, and Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shīrzād. That took place three hours past daylight on Wednesday, the fourth—some say the fifth—of Muḥarram, 251 (February 5–6, 865). Upon arriving, al-Mustaʿīn established his residence at the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Following that, one of Waṣīf's lieutenants known as Sallām came to Baghdad. He exchanged information and then returned to his residence in Sāmarrā. With the exception of Jaʿfar al-Khayyāṭ and Sulaymān b. Yaḥyā b. Muʿādh, the commanders now came to Baghdad, along with most of the secretaries, the governors and the Hashimite family. These, in turn, were [1543] followed by the Turkish commanders who were on the side of Waṣīf: Kalbātikīn the commander, Ṭayghaj the lieutenant (al-khalīfah), who was a Turk, and Ibn ʿAjūz the deputy, who was from Nasā.[74]

Among those on the side of Bughā was Bāyakbāk the commander, who was one of the bodyguards (ghilmān al-khidmah), together with several of Bughā's lieutenants. Waṣīf and Bughā had reportedly sent a messenger to them before their arrival, ordering them to do the following: If they came to Baghdad, they were to go to the island opposite the dwellings of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. They were not to go to the pontoon bridge (spanning the Tigris) where they would frighten the populace by their arrival. They complied, [1544] and on arriving at the island they dismounted. Skiffs were now sent

74. The text is difficult to interpret and hard to defend on grammatical grounds: wāfā ba'd dhālika . . . Kalbātikīn al-qā'id wa-Ṭayghaj al-khalīfah Turkī wa-Ibn 'Ajūz al-khalīfah Nasā'ī. If the vocalization nasā'ī is correct, then it is probably a nisbah signifying the town in Khurāsān known as Nasā. See Samʿānī, Ansāb, fol. 559r. One would normally expect al-Turkī and al-Nasā'ī to occur as adjectives rather than as predicates of sentences, which seems to be the case here.

to transport them across (the river). Kalbātikīn, Bāyakbāk, the commanders from al-Dūr, and Arnātjur the Turk climbed out of the skiffs and presented themselves to al-Musta'īn. They threw themselves in front of him with their belts on their necks, as signs of submission and humiliation, and then spoke to al-Musta'īn and asked him for forgiveness and acceptance. He responded by saying, "You are people of corruption and ill-repute who belittle the bonds of privilege. Didn't you bring your children for me to put on the military rolls, about two thousand of them, and didn't I agree to let them join you? And didn't I order that your daughters, about four thousand women, be counted amongst the married? Then there were those who had just reached puberty, the recent born. I have seen to it that all your desires were met. I poured out my gifts to you until I was giving you the gold and the silver that I deprived myself of. All of that I did in an attempt to please you and to attend to your welfare. In return you persisted in your corruption, infamy, arrogance and threats." They pleaded with him, saying, "We have sinned; the Commander of the Faithful is right in all that he has said. We ask his forgiveness in overlooking our offence." Al-Musta'īn responded, "I have already forgiven you, and I am content." Bāyakbāk then said, "If you are pleased with us and have forgiven us, then come ride with us to Sāmarrā where the Turks are waiting for you." Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh signaled to Muḥammad b. Abī 'Awn who, in turn, nudged Bāyakbāk. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh then said to the latter, "Does one speak thus to the Commander of the Faithful, 'Come, ride with us?'" Al-Musta'īn laughed at that and said, "These are foreign people and have no knowledge of protocol [ḥudūd al-kalām]". Then he said to them, "Go to Sāmarrā, where [1545] your allotments are secure, while I stay here to manage my affairs and look into the matter of my residence." They left, despairing of him and angered by Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh's behavior.

They reported what had happened to all the Turks that they encountered, but they distorted his response to them in an attempt to provoke the Turks into deposing the Caliph and replacing him (with another). The Turks thus agreed to free al-Mu'tazz and to swear allegiance to him. Al-Mu'tazz had been detained, together with al-Mu'ayyad, in a small room at the Jawsaq Palace. Each of them was attended to by a page serving a Turk called 'Īsā, the lieutenant of Yulnār.[75] With them were several aides. They freed al-Muʿtazz on that same day and took some of his hair—the oath of allegiance had already been rendered to him. He, in return, ordered that the people be given ten months worth of their allotments, but the money could not be raised. Given the scarcity of funds, they were granted two months payment instead. Al-Mustaʿīn had left around five hundred thousand dīnārs in the treasury at Sāmarrā. These revenues originated in Syria, having been brought from the region of Mosul by the commanders Ṭalmajūr and Astakīn. In the treasury of al-Mustaʿīn's mother there were close to one million dīnārs, and in that of al-ʿAbbās b. al-Mustaʿīn there were around six hundred thousand dīnārs.

The text of the oath of allegiance reportedly read as follows:

In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate

[1546] You swear allegiance to the Servant of God, the imām al-Muʿtazz billāh, Commander of the Faithful. You swear this allegiance of your free will, and in good faith. You swear contented with desire and with loyalty from your very hearts. You swear full of joy and good intention, not forced or coerced, but fully cognizant of what this allegiance calls for by way of asserting the fear of God, the preferance for His obedience, the strengthening of His ways and His religion, the common welfare of His servants, following the concensus of opinion, the buttressing of unity, the subduing of troublemakers, insuring peace of mind, the strengthening of the supporters and the suppression of the unbelievers. You swear that Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz billāh is the Servant of God and His caliph to whom you owe obedience, good counsel, and loyalty without any doubt, hypocrisy, swerving, or suspicion, and to whom you owe submission, support, faithfulness, uprightness, good counsel in secret and in public, and that you will rush to fulfill all the commands of the servant of God, Abū ʿAbdallāh, the imām al-Muʿtazz billāh, Commander of the Faithful, in all matters concerning loyalty to his supporters, waging war against his internal or external foes.

75. The name is uncertain, with a range of possible variations as different as Limyān, Bilyān, etc.

You swear that you will always uphold your allegiance to him, being fully honest, and accepting what the Commander of the Faithful accepts after this allegiance of yours. You have taken upon yourself and confirmed most willingly with complete sincerity of heart the desire and intention that the heir apparent of the Muslims be Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad billāh, the brother of the Commander of the Faithful. You also swear that you will not attempt to disobey any of the promises given by you, nor swerve in your loyalty and support, nor change your minds, nor contradict nor go back on this allegiance, nor would you hold in secret other than what you declare. Now allow this allegiance that [1547] you have given by your word and pledge to be an allegiance that God can exact from your hearts and count on its fulfillment. Let Him count on your loyalty and your support for it, aiding those to whom His allegiance is given without hesitation, duplicity or reconsideration, in order that you meet your God having fulfilled His pledge and satisfied His commandments to you, without any violation. Those of you who swear the caliphal oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful and the heir apparent, the brother of the Commander of the Faithful, Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad billah, do so as though they swear to God, and the hand of God is above all of theirs. Anyone violating this pledge does so at his own peril, and those who remain faithful to it, will be greatly rewarded in the hereafter on that account, and on account of the demands this allegiance requires them, and which they give in good faith in accordance with the conditions incumbent upon them by way of loyalty, support, and earnest assistance. The pledge is with God, and God's pledge is indeed executable. It is incumbent upon you under God's guardianship, may He be exalted, and under the guardianship of Muḥammad, peace be upon him, and in accordance with all the pledges that God has exacted of his prophets, messengers and any of his servants, that you heed what you promised in this pledge. Do not change it nor deviate from it, and hold fast to what you pledged to God in the same manner the obedient hold to obedience and [1548] the faithful keep their pledges.

Let no ambition or desire dissuade you from your pledge, nor any plotting and wickedness turn your hearts away from the right path. Strive to the utmost in that regard and be obedient and faithful to this pledge as a supreme duty; God accepts nothing but faithfulness to his pledges.

Anyone amongst those of you who have sworn allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful and the heir apparent of the Muslims, the brother of the Commander of the Faithful, anyone of you who violates this pledge secretly or publicly, expressly or finding excuses by dubious means, and betrays his pledge to God or to His commandments, and strays from the path that the righteous take, all the possessions of such a person who has treacherously violated his pledge, be they estates, flocks, agricultural lands or cattle, they will be given as legal charity to the poor and will be used towards righteous objectives, and he will be prohibited from having access to them, even if he resorts to ruses or legal stratagems. He shall not be allowed to benefit from any possessions, be they small or large, and it will remain thus [1549] until his day comes and he departs from this life. Every slave he owns, be it male or female, is from this day on till the end of thirty years, completely free. All his wives at the day when his infringement is proven, and all those he will marry thereafter till the end of thirty years, are considered obligingly divorced. God will accept no substitute for faithfulness to His pledges. Any such violator has no claim unto God or His Prophet, and God and His Prophet are free of any obligation towards him. God will not accept from him any repentance [ṣarf] or ransom [ʿadl]. He is your witness, and there is no strength except in God. He is sufficient for us, and He is the best of Guardians.

Abū Aḥmad b. al-Rashīd was reportedly brought to swear allegiance while carried on a litter, for he was stricken by gout. When he was ordered to swear allegiance, he refused and said to al-Muʿtazz, "You had spoken out before, declaring your obedience and repudiating [the caliphate], while proclaiming that you would not assume rule." Al-Muʿtazz retorted, "I was coerced into saying that, in fear of the sword." Abū Aḥmad then said, "We were not told that you were coerced, and we have sworn allegiance to this man.[76] Now you want us to divorce our wives and lose our possessions.[77] We do not know what will become of me if you leave me until the people gather here. You have no alternative but to use this sword." Al-Mu'tazz then ordered, "Let him be." And he was returned to his house without swearing allegiance.

76. That is, al-Mustaʿīn.

Among those swearing allegiance were Ibrāhīm al-Dayraj and 'Attāb b. 'Attāb—the latter fled afterwards and went to Baghdad. As for al-Dayraj, he was given robes of honor and was put in charge of security. Robes of honor were also given to Sulaymān b. Yasār, al-Kātib, who was appointed head of the Bureau of Estates. He spent that day issuing orders and (generally) carrying out his functions. Then concealing himself in the (darkness) of night, he made his way to Baghdad. When the Turks swore allegiance to al-Mu'tazz he appointed his officials ('ummāl): Sa'īd b. Ṣāliḥ over the police, and [1550]
Ja'far b. Dīnār over the guards; Ja'far b. Maḥmūd was made wazīr, and Abū al-Ḥimār was given the Bureau of Taxation but was soon dismissed, to be replaced by Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm Minqār; The Bureau of the Turkish Army was given to one known as Abū 'Umar, the secretary of Sīmā al-Sharābī; Muqallad Kayd al-Kalb, the brother of Abū 'Umar, was given control of the treasury and the army payrolls of the Turks, the Maghāribah and the Shākiriyyah, while the postal bureau and the privy-seal were given to Sīmā al-Sharābānī; Abu 'Umar was appointed as secretary in the rank of wazīr.

When word reached Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh concerning the oath of allegiance to al-Mu'tazz and that the latter had appointed his officials, he ordered that all foodstuffs be withheld from the populace of Sāmarrā.[78] He also wrote to Mālik b. Ṭawq ordering him to Baghdad along with those of his kinsmen who accompanied him, and his contingent of troops. And he sent word to Najūbah b. Qays, who ruled al-Anbār, to call for general mobilization, while Sulaymān b. 'Imrān al-Mawṣilī was given orders to gather his kinsmen and to prohibit all vessels and foodstuffs from going down to Sāmarrā.[79]

---

77. The idea being that in the oath of allegiance to al-Musta'īn, Abū Aḥmad had already sworn that if he were to change his allegiance he would lose his wives and possessions. The text of allegiance to al-Mu'tazz just cited makes the same demand.

78. Apparently Sāmarrā was heavily dependent on Baghdad and other cities for supplies. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 263, 265.

79. That is, the foodstuff that had to be brought to Sāmarrā downstream from the north.

He saw to it that no foodstuffs came up to Sāmarrā from Baghdad. A boat carrying rice and spices (saqaṭ)[80] was thus confiscated, whereupon the captain fled his vessel which was left abandoned until it sank. Al-Musta'īn ordered Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir to fortify Baghdad. At this, Muḥammad proceeded to encompass the East [1551] Side of the city with a protective wall, extending from the Tigris near Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah to Sūq al-Thalāthā' and back to the Tigris.[81] Similarly on the West Side (he built a wall) from the Tigris by the Gate of the Fief (Qaṭī'ah) of Umm Ja'far to the palace of Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.[82] Moreover, he placed at each gate an officer with a contingent of his troops as well as others. The Caliph also ordered that trenches be dug along the curving walls on both sides of the city and that pavilions (miẓallāt) be erected so that the cavalry could take refuge underneath them during the hot weather and rain. The expenditures for the two walls, the trenches and the pavilions was said to have reached 330 thousand dīnārs. At the Shammāsiyyah Gate[83] he set up five war engines (shaddākhāt) covering the width of the road. The engines contained cross beams ('awāriḍ), wooden planks (alwāḥ) and long protruding spikes. Outside the second gate, another gate, equal to it in thickness and armored with iron sheets, was suspended by ropes in such a way, if one were to enter that gate, the suspended gate would drop and kill whoever happened to be underneath it. On the inner gate a ballista ('arrādah) was set up, and on the outer one there were five huge mangonels (majānīq). Among them was a large one called The Angry One (al-ghaḍbān). Added to these were six ballistas which fired in the direction of Raqqat al-Shammāsiyyah.[84] On the Baradān Gate, eight ballistas, four on each side, and four war engines were set up. Similar arrangements were made for each and every gate on

80. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 1381, col. 3.

81. That is, along the East Side of Baghdad in a north to south direction. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 168–186, and Lassner, Topography, 78–84, 203.

82. This wall encircled the West Side in the same north to south direction as the previous wall. For the palace of Ḥumayd and the possible location of this wall, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 96, 172.

83. The Shammāsiyyah Gate is the natural entrance to Baghdad from the direction of Sāmarrā. For a full description of the neighborhood, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 199–230.

84. For the word Raqqah, meaning "plain" in this context, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 203.

the West and East Sides of Baghdad. Moreover each of the city gates was furnished with an arched passageway ample enough for a hundred cavalry and infantry. Every mangonel and ballista had men assigned to stretch the ropes and one man to fire whenever fighting broke out. [1552]

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh instituted a special draft in Baghdad. He even requested a group of Khurāsānīs who had come to the city (en route to Mecca) as pilgrims to assist in fighting the Turks, and they did. He also ordered a special draft among the vagabonds (ʿayyārūn) and appointed a commander (ʿarīf) over them. Muḥammad saw to it that they had shields made of tar-covered mats (bawārī),[85] and nosebags (makhālin) filled with rocks, and this was done—Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn was reportedly in charge of making the tar-covered mats. Any man standing behind the mat could not be seen; it was made of fabrics that cost more than a hundred dīnārs.[86] The commander of the vagabonds with the tar-covered mats was called Yantawayh.

The work along the wall was completed on Thursday, the twenty-first[87] of Muḥarram (February 22, 865). Al-Mustaʿīn then wrote to the tax-collectors in every city and region to transport their revenues to the authorities at Baghdad and take nothing to Sāmarrā. He also wrote to the deputies of his lieutenant (over Iraq?) to reject the letters of the Turks. And he ordered that a document be sent to the Turks and the regular army at Sāmarrā commanding them to break the pledge to al-Muʿtazz, to return and fulfill their pledge of allegiance to him. He reminded them of his generosity towards them and prohibited them from disobeying him and violating their pledge to him. This letter was addressed to Sīmā al-Sharābī. [1553]

Various correspondences and messages were then exchanged between Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and al-Muʿtazz. The latter called upon Muḥammad to undertake the same pledge to him as was given by the others who swore allegiance to his caliphate and the deposition of al-Mustaʿīn. He reminded Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh of the pledge that (al-Muʿtazz's father) al-Mutawakkil, had extracted

85. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 274, col. 3.

86. It is not clear whether the price is for all the mats (too low) or for each (too high).

87. The text is li-sabʿin, which could not be Thursday. It should be read li-tisʿin, which is very close orthographically, to coincide with Thursday which was indeed the twenty-first of Muḥarram.

from Muḥammad in regard to his being heir to the caliphate after his brother al-Muntaṣir. For fear of becoming too verbose, I have left out all the excuses which al-Muʿtazz provided Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to render allegiance to him and still not be held in violation of his services to al-Mustaʿīn.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh now gave orders that the masonry bridges (qanāṭir) be destroyed, and the water canals be flooded in the district (ṭassūj) of al-Anbār and those sections of the district of Bādurāyā[88] that bordered it. He did this in order to cut the road to the Turks, fearing that they would come to al-Anbār. The men in charge of that were Najūbah b. Qays and Muḥammad b. Ḥamad b. Manṣūr al-Saʿdī.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh received word that the Turks had sent someone for the royal canopy (shamsah)[89] which was in the custody of al-Baynūq al-Farghānī. He was to guard it from the latter's men. Instead, Muḥammad sent Khālid b. ʿImrān and Bundār al-Ṭabarī to the region of al-Anbār on the evening of Wednesday, the twentieth of al-Muḥarram (February 21, 865). Following them, he [1554] sent Rashīd b. Kāwūs, and they met al-Baynūq and his followers among the Turks and the Maghāribah. Khālid and Bundār demanded the royal canopy from them, after which Baynūq and his men came to al-Mustaʿīn in Baghdad.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Jaylawayh the Kurd was in charge of 'Ukbarā'.[90] Rādān[91] was entrusted to a man from the Maghāribah; he had gathered some revenue. Ibn Jaylawayh went to him and asked him to bring the district revenue, but the latter refused and declared his intention to do battle. Ibn Jaylawayh captured him and brought him to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's door together with the district revenue, which came to 12,030 dīnārs. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallah then granted Ibn Jaylawayh ten thousand dirhams.

Both al-Muʿtazz and al-Mustaʿīn wrote to Mūsā b. Bughā, each calling upon him to serve them. He was then stationed at the fron-

88. These districts were in the north-west section of Baghdad, a possible direction of the forthcoming attack. By flooding the land, the attacking army will have to come down the Tigris through the well-defended Shammāsiyyah Gate. For the geography involved, refer to Le Strange, Baghdad, the map facing page 47.

89. The meaning is uncertain. The translation follows Mez, Renaissance, 133.

90. See Le Strange, Lands, 50, 51, 84, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 142.

91. See Le Strange, Lands, 35, 80.

tiers of Syria near al-Jazīrah, having been sent to fight the people of Ḥimṣ. The two sent him several standards to dispense to whomever he pleased. Al-Mustaʿīn ordered him to report to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) after leaving behind a suitable replacement for himself. But Mūsā went to al-Muʿtazz and joined with him, while ʿAbdallāh b. Bughā the Younger came to Baghdad. He had tarried in Sāmarrā when his father left the city with al-Mustaʿīn. ʿAbdallāh now apologized to al-Mustaʿīn and said to his father, "I have come to you to die under your stirrup." He stayed in Baghdad for a few days before asking permission to leave for a village near Baghdad on the road to al-Anbār. Permission was granted to him, and he stayed there till nightfall when he fled through the West Side to Sāmarrā, avoiding his father and lying (mumāliyan) to him. He apologized to al- [1555]
Muʿtazz for having gone to Baghdad and told him that he went there only to gather information about them and come back to him with the truth. Al-Muʿtazz accepted this explanation and returned him to his post.

Al-Ḥasan b. Afshīn came to Baghdad and al-Mustaʿīn bestowed robes of honor upon him. In addition he attached a large contingent of the Ushrūsaniyyah and others to his command, and increased his military allotments by sixteen thousand dirhams per month.

Asad b. Dāwūd Siyāh stayed at Sāmarrā until he fled the city. The Turks reportedly pursued him in the direction of Mosul, al-Anbār and along the western bank (of the Tigris). Fifty horsemen were sent after him in each direction. But he arrived at Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) and came to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, who gave him command of a hundred horsemen and two hundred infantry drawn from the troops of Ibrāhīm al-Dayraj. In addition he was given charge of Bāb al-Anbār together with ʿAbdallāh b. Mūsā b. Abī Khālid.

On Saturday, the twenty-third of al-Muḥarram, 251 (February 24, 865), al-Muʿtazz charged his brother, Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil, to do battle with al-Mustaʿīn and Ibn Ṭāhir, giving him full command of the army and supreme authority. The administration he gave to Kalbātikīn al-Turkī. Abū Aḥmad encamped in al-Qāṭūl[92] with five thousand Turks and Farāghinah, and two thousand Ma-

92. Since Qāṭūl is in Sāmarrā's vicinity, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 174, IV, 297, and Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 256, this camp was then only a staging ground for the troops and not a camp for actual combat.

ghāribah under the command of Muḥammad b. Rashīd al-Maghribī. They arrived at 'Ukbarā' Friday evening, the twenty-ninth of al-Muḥarram (March 2, 865). Abū Aḥmad led the prayers there and declared the caliphate of al-Muʿtazz (from the pulpit); he then sent a copy of his sermon to al-Muʿtazz. Some people of 'Ukbarā' reported [1556] that they had seen the Turks, the Maghāribah and the rest of their followers extremely frightened when they noticed that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh had already come out to surprise them into war. They started looting the villages between 'Ukbarā' and Baghdad. The populace residing between 'Ukbarā', Baghdad, and Awāna[93] and in the remaining villages on the western bank fled for their lives, leaving the estates and the harvest behind. Estates were laid waste, harvest (crops) and household items were looted, houses were demolished, and people on the road were robbed.

When Abū Aḥmad reached 'Ukbarā' with his troops, a contingent of Turks among the mawlās of Bughā al-Sharābī, who were with him in Baghdad and who were attached to his command, fled at night through the Shammāsiyyah Gate. Commanding the gate was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Khaṭṭāb, but he did not know of their escapade. When news of this reached Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, he became angry with him and chastized him, and he offered recompense to anyone who would take charge of guarding the gates and defending them. When al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn came to Baghdad he was put in charge of the Shammāsiyyah Gate. When Abū Aḥmad and his army reached Shammāsiyyah on Sunday evening, the seventh of Ṣafar (March 10, 865), he was accompanied by the following: his secretary Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Bishr b. Saʿd al-Marthidī, an army intelligence officer (ṣāḥib khabar) working for al-Muʿtazz, al-Ḥasan b.
[1557] ʿAmr b. Qimāsh, and one of his own called Jaʿfar b. Aḥmad al-Bayān[94] also known as Ibn al-Khabbāzah.

A man from al-Baṣrah known as Bādhinjānah, who was with the army, said:

> Oh! Sons of Ṭāhir the Soldiers of God have > come up against you carrying death along in their ranks,

93. See Le Strange, Lands, 50.
94. The text is unvocalized and could be read as tabbān, banān, etc.

And armies led by Abū Aḥmad indeed a good man in charge and an excellent supporter.

When Abū Aḥmad reached the Shammāsiyyah Gate, al-Musta'īn appointed al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl in charge of that Gate and assigned the commanders there to be his aides. He remained positioned there during the period of war until he set out for al-Anbār, at which time Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm was appointed in his stead. On the thirteenth of Ṣafar (March 16, 865), a spy came to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh and reported that Abū Aḥmad had recruited people to burn the market awnings on both sides of Baghdad; the coverings were thus removed that same day.

It was reported that Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh sent Muḥammad b. Mūsā the astrologer and al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl with orders to leave the (city) from the West Side and climb past the army of Abū Aḥmad in [1558] order to estimate its numbers. Muḥammad b. Mūsā claimed that he estimated it as two thousand men and one thousand animals. On Monday, the tenth of Ṣafar (March 13, 865), the Turkish vanguards came to the Shammāsiyyah Gate and positioned themselves next to it; whereupon Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh sent al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl, al-Shāh b. Mīkāl and Bundār al-Ṭabarī together with their troops against them. He himself was about to ride out to battle when al-Shāh came to him and reported that he (al-Shāh) and his men reached the Shammāsiyyah Gate, but the Turks, having seen the standards and the battle flags coming in their direction, returned to their camp. Al-Shāh and al-Ḥusayn thus departed and Muḥammad decided against riding out that day. But on Tuesday, the eleventh of Ṣafar (March 14, 865), Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh decided to send the army to al-Quṣṣ[95] in order to review them there and put fear in the hearts of the Turks.

Bughā and Waṣīf rode along with him wearing coats of mail. Muḥammed wore Ṭāhir's breast-plate above his own coat of mail, as well as an iron sleeve. He took along jurists and judges with the intention of calling upon the enemy to turn back from their longstanding rebellion and obstinacy. He offered them a guarantee, 95. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 146. See also Ṭabarī, index. A suburb of Baghdad, Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 382.

promising that Abū 'Abdallāh (al-Mu'tazz) would be the heir apparent to al-Musta'īn. If they would accept his offer, well and good; otherwise, he would begin hostilities on the morning of Wednesday, the twelfth of Ṣafar (March 15, 865). Muḥammad then marched to the [1559] Qaṭrabbul Gate[96] and dismounted at the bank of the Tigris together with Waṣīf and Bughā; he could go no further on account of the crowds. Opposing them on the eastern side of the Tigris was Muḥammad b. Rashīd al-Maghribī. Afterwards Muḥammad departed.

In the morning, he was met by messengers from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Khaṭṭāb Wajh al-Fals, 'Alak the commander, and other officers who were with the two. They informed him that the army had drawn near and had returned to their base near Raqqat al-Shammāsiyyah where they dismounted and set up their tents.[97] He sent word to them, "Don't initiate hostilities. If they attack, do not attack them. Defensive action is the order of the day." Twelve horsemen of the Turks came up to the Shammāsiyyah Gate. It was protected by a (fortified) gate and an arched way (sarāb) which itself had a gate. The twelve horsemen stood at the gate and cursed those who protected it. Then they shot their arrows, but the defenders at the Shammāsiyyah Gate turned a deaf ear to them. When they persisted, 'Alak gave orders to the man at the mangonel to fire at them; he did, and hit one of them, killing him. His companions dismounted, and carried him back to their camp by the Shammāsiyyah Gate. 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān, the lieutenant of Waṣīf the Turk, who was sent to guard the Mecca Road with Abū al-Sāj, returned with three hundred men of the Shākiriyyah and presented himself to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, who bestowed five robes of honor upon him and four upon another man who accompanied him.

[1560] On that day, a bedouin from the Tha'labah presented himself seeking to enlist; he had fifty men with him. Also arriving were forty Shākiriyyah who came from Sāmarrā in various companies. Muḥammad issued orders to give them bonuses and a place to camp; they were subsequently paid.

96. On the north side of Baghdad along the Ṭāhirid Trench. See Le Strange, Baghdad, map facing p. 107.

97. For Raqqah, see n. 84 above. The attacking army seems to have taken the plain of the Shammāsiyyah as their camping grounds.

The Turks arriving at the Shammāsiyyah Gate this day were shot at with arrows and from mangonels and ballistas. Among them were many dead and wounded. The commanding officer fighting the Turks was al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl; he was reinforced by four hundred of the Muṭallibīn under the command of a man known as Abū al-Sanā al-Ghanawī, and later by a group of about three hundred bedouins. Those who fought well that day were rewarded with gifts including twenty-five thousand dirhams, and gold necklaces and bracelets. These were given to al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Khaṭṭāb, ʿAlak, Yaḥyā b. Harthamah, al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn and the chief of staff (ṣaḥīb al-ḥarb) al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl. The wounded among the people of Baghdad amounted to more than two hundred persons; also, a number of them were killed. The same was true of the dead and wounded among the Turks; most of the killing was done by the mangonels. Most of the general populace at Baghdad were routed; those with the mats stood fast and then withdrew completely, suffering an equal number of dead and wounded. It was reported that about two hundred men were wounded from each faction and a number were killed.

On this day a squadron of Farāghinah and Turks came to the [1561] Khurāsān Gate on the East Side[98] in order to enter (the city). The commotion was heard by Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, but the Mubayyiḍah and the rabble stood firm and drove them back. Muḥammad had given orders that the area be ploughed; so, when the enemy tried to withdraw their mounts became stuck in the mud, but still most of them managed to escape. The Turks now brought in a mangonel, but the rabble and the Mubayyiḍah overwhelmed it, breaking one of its supports—two of the pilgrims from Shāsh[99] were killed. The order was given to bring burnt bricks from Qaṣr al-Ṭin[100] and that area to the Shammāsiyyah Gate. The Shammāsiyyah Gate itself was opened, and people went out to get the bricks and bring them inside the wall. Afterwards, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh received word that a group of Turks had marched to the vicinity of al-Nahrawān.[101] He 98. This should be distinguished from the gates with the same name in New Baghdad, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 281, 288 and in the Round City, ibid., 17, 24, 101, 105.

99. A district in Tashkand. See Le Strange, Lands, 480–483.

100. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 201.

101. That is, just east of Baghdad, and actually adjacent to it. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 324–325.

therefore sent two of his commanders to that area; they were called ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd al-Sarakhsī and Yaḥyā b. Ḥafṣ, who was known as Ḥabūs. The two commanded five hundred cavalry and infantry. Muḥammad subsequently reinforced them with seven hundred men, ordering them to establish their position there and rebuff any of the Turks who wished to seize it. The last of them set out for that district on Friday, the seventh of Ṣafar (March 10, 865). On the [1562] evening of Monday, the sixteenth of Ṣafar (March 19, 865), a contingent of Turks marched to al-Nahrawān. A group of ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd's followers came out to challenge them but turned around and fled. Their mounts were seized, and those who were able to save themselves withdrew to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) in flight. Around fifty men were killed and sixty mounts were taken together with several mules that had previously arrived from the vicinity of Ḥulwān laden with weapons. The Turks sent them to Sāmarrā, along with the heads of those killed. These were the first heads to reach Sāmarrā during that war. When ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd departed in defeat with a few remaining followers, the road to Khurāsān fell into the hands of the Turks, and traffic between Baghdad and Khurāsān was cut. Ismāʿīl b. Farāshah had been sent to Hamadhān to make a stand there, but word was sent to him to withdraw, which he did. He and his men were then given bonuses that were due them.

Al-Muʿtazz now sent out an army of Turks, Maghāribah, Farāghinah, and their like. Al-Durghumān al-Farghānī was in command of the Turks and the Farāghinah, and Ratlah[102] led the Maghāribah. They marched against Baghdad from the west bank (of the Tigris) and penetrated Qaṭrabbul en route to the city. They encamped between Qaṭrabbul and the Fief of Umm Jaʿfar on Tuesday evening, the seventeenth of Ṣafar (March 20, 865). The following morning, that is Wednesday, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir sent (out) al-Shāh b. Mīkāl from the Gate of the Fief, accompanied by [1563] Bundār and Khālid b. ʿImrān with their troops of cavalry and infantry. Al-Shāh and his companions lined their men in rows and began casting stones and shooting arrows, but the enemy forced al-Shāh to retreat to a narrow place near the Gate of the Fief. The Mubayyiḍah of Baghdad now gathered in large numbers and, together with al-

102. The reading is uncertain. It could also be Rablah, Zaylah, etc.

Shāh, they all charged in unison and displaced the Turks, the Maghāribah and their companions from their positions. The Mubayyiḍah charged on and managed to clear the area of them. The Ṭabariyyah attacked, in turn, and engaged them in battle while Bundār and Khālid b. ʿImrān attacked them from an ambush they had laid for them in the vicinity of Qaṭrabbul. They put the followers of Abū Aḥmad to the sword, Turks and others among them, and killed huge numbers of them. Only a few escaped.

The Mubayyiḍah looted their camp, taking everything in it, including furnishings, household members, heavy baggage, tents, and odds and ends. All those escaping death threw themselves into the Tigris to cross over to Abū Aḥmad's camp. They were, however, seized by the troops on the river boats (shabbārah), which had been loaded with fighting men. The enemy were thus either killed or taken prisoner; the dead (bodies) and the heads of the dead from among the Turks, the Maghāribah and others were placed in skiffs. Some of them were hung, either on the two bridges,[103] or on the gate of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's (palace). Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh gave orders that those who fought valiantly that day were to be rewarded with bracelets. A great number of men from the regular army and others were thus given bracelets. The fleeing enemy were [1564] sought; some of them reached Awānā, while others reached the camp of Abū Aḥmad, across the Tigris. Still others reached as far as Sāmarrā. It was reported that on the day of its defeat by the Gate of the Fief the Turkish army numbered four thousand men; two thousand were killed there the day of (that) battle. They had been put to the sword from the Gate of the Fief to al-Qufṣ. There were those who were slain in battle and those who were drowned; a number of them were also taken prisoner.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh bestowed four robes of honor on Bundār, one woven type (mulḥam), one of washy, one black (sawād) and one silk (khazz). In addition he gave him a gold necklace. He also bestowed four robes of honor on Abū al-Sanā and (gave) the same to Khālid b. ʿImrān and to each of the commanders. They departed on the day of battle around sunset, after requisitioning mules and taking saddle bags to transport the heads to Baghdad. Anyone reaching 103. That is, probably the upper and the main bridges spanning the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 122f, 102.

the palace of Muḥammad with the head of a Turk or a Maghribī was given fifty dirhams; most of the work was done by the Mubayyiḍah and the drifters (ʿayyārūn).[104] The drifters of Baghdad then came to Qaṭrabbul and looted whatever furnishings the Turks had left behind belonging to the people of Qaṭrabbul as well as the doors of their houses.

Towards the end of this day, Muḥammad sent his brother, Abū Aḥmad ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh, and al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal to follow [1565] the tracks of those who fled in an attempt to safe-guard the people of Baghdad, for he was afraid that they would return to the attack. The two reached as far as al-Qufṣ and returned safely after having dispersed the infantry and the drifters in the vicinity of Qaṭrabbul. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh was then counselled to send (another) army after the enemy on the second day and that night in order to follow relentlessly in their tracks, but he refused and did not follow those who escaped, nor did he give the order to finish off the wounded; it was said that he felt the confidence of complete security. He then gave orders to Saʿīd b. Ḥumayd to compose a document describing that battle. The document was subsequently read to the populace of Baghdad in the Friday Mosque. The text reads as follows:

> In the name of God, the Merciful and Compassionate.
> Thanks to the Beneficent Lord who cannot be sufficiently thanked, the Mighty who cannot be opposed, the All-Powerful whose obedience is not humiliating. He is the Fair Judge whose judgement cannot be overruled, and the supporter of the truth and its advocates. He is the inescapable Owner of everything, the true Guide to mercy for those who are obedient to Him. He exhibits His forbearance in order to exact His claim.
>
> He granted His religion out of compassion for His servants, and made the succession over the guardianship of His religion a virtue. The obedience to His caliph is a duty incumbent upon the whole nation, for the caliphs are the protectors on this earth of the message that He had entrusted to His prophets and His > [1566] trustees over His creation. They have been called to His religion and have been shown the passage to the truth, and thus have been protected from error.

104. For this organized group, see Dūrī, Abḥāth, 16, and EI^{2}, I, 794.

He is the Guide to the path of the Chosen Ones of His servants. They are the guardians of religion against sedition and rebellion. They hold against other nations the Book of God that grants them their authority; and to it they call the nation in accordance with God's justice for which they had been chosen.

When they fight, God's claim will be on their side. And when they go to war He will ordain victory for them. If they are sought by an enemy, God's protection will be a shelter for them and a stronghold. If anyone plots against them, God will be their aid. God has appointed them to uphold His religion, and whoever opposes them would oppose the religion which God has fortified through them. Whoever resists them would be rebelling against the truth that God defends through them.

Their armies are always crowned with victory and glory. Their forces are guarded by God's might from their foes. Their arms are for the defense of God's religion. And their zeal for the defense of the truth encompasses all of their factions. All bands of their enemies are defeated by their own injustices—their claim in the eyes of God and His creation being of no value—and their attempts at victory are in vain. God ordains defeat to these enemies, and their destinies are put in the hands of God's servants, as it has been the case with all nations of times past. [1567]
God does that in order that the people of the truth are assured of the execution of His forewarnings and the enemy is fairly dealt with by admonishments. God's anger is quickly dealt to them through His servants. And punishment awaits them with their Lord. Ahead of them is the shame of this world, and behind them is the torment in the hereafter. God was never unjust to His servants. May His prayers be upon His chosen prophet, His favored messenger, the rescuer from error and the guide to the right path. May it be a perfect and continuous prayer of everlasting blessings, and may His salutations be upon him.

May humble praise be accepted by the Lord as a sign of His majesty, and a confession of His lordship. May it be an admission of the incompatibility of our highest thanks with His dignity, for our thanks are always lacking. Praise be to the Lord whose praise elicits further praise, and through it He exhibits the extent of His beneficence. May it be a praise that pleases Him. May He accept it and allow it to shine forth as it issues from His sovereignty and His graciousness. Praise be to the Lord Who has decreed unquestionable defeat to those who trespass against the people of His religion, for He had already promised victory to His supporters who had been transgressed against. He revealed His Glorious book as a counsel to the transgressors; for if they were to abstain, such a reminder would be useful, and God will fulfill the desires of the obedient among them. God has also decreed that after reminding the transgressors one should persist in fighting them, for he had said in His fore-[1568] warning and clear admonishing, "Those who have been victims of transgression, God will grant them victory".[105] Indeed it is an assured promise from God in which He prohibits His enemies from disobeying Him, and He strengthens His faithful in His path; and God does not break His promise.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the client of the Commander of the Faithful, is a chief supporter of God's cause. He is the sword of the caliph's authority, a defender of his sovereignty, and an object of his trust. He is in the forefront of those giving obedience to him and giving counsel to his servants. He is a protector of his rights, and a fighter of his enemies. He is a favor granted by God to the Commander of the Faithful; may he be grateful for it and may it endure. God had decreed that the ancestors of the Commander of the Faithful be destined to issue the first call [to righteousness], and to him He granted their heritage. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh enabled him to establish his rule when the enemies of God attempted to suppress His religion and obliterate it. He rose in the cause of God and His caliph; he fought for its support by giving advice to those who were near and far, and by devoting himself to that which brings him closer to God and insures his position with Him. God favored the Commander of the Faithful by this client who guided him to the truth and helped him in establishing goodness against the enemies of religion.

105. Qur.: 22:60 "That [is so]. And whoso hath retaliated with the like of that which he has made to suffer and then hath again been wronged, Allāh will succor him. Lo! Allāh verily is Mild, Forgiving."

You have already learned of the contents of the message of the Commander of the Faithful to you concerning the deeds of the band that strayed from the path of God, and forsook the dignity of religion. Those were ungrateful for the graces of God and His caliph, and were against the majority of the community whose order was bound together by God's caliphate. They at- [1569] tempted to sow dissention in place of unity, thereby betraying the oath of allegiance, and denying their fellowship to Islam. I mean the Turkish clients who supported the youth known as Abū 'Abdallāh b. al-Mutawakkil in order to set him up as Commander of the Faithful when he descended to Baghdad leading a group of his own supporters and the sons of his father's supporters. You have also learned of the way the Commander of the Faithful has dealt with their treason and his patience with them.

But these defectors had gathered around them a group of Turks, Maghāribah and bands of deception who have all joined them in error and merged with them in support of their rebellion. These bands were led by Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil. They marched against the East Side of Baghdad upholding injustice and arrogance and persevering in support of deception. The Commander of the Faithful was patient with them, gave them a chance to reconsider, and ordered that a message be sent to them to guide them to the wise course. He reminded them of their allegiance and clarified to them their duties towards God and himself—that their rebellion against their voluntary oath of allegiance was a rebellion against the religion of God and a rejection of His prophet. He reminded them that their acts would prohibit them from access to their possessions and their wives; and that if they were to rally around him they would have the security of their religion, continuation of their prosperity and [1570] protection from wrath. He detailed to them his previous graciousness to them, when he promoted them to the highest ranks and selected them for the most supreme positions. They refused to heed counsel and persisted in their rebellion and error. The Commander of the Faithful appointed his loyal counsellor and supporter, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the client of the Commander of the Faithful, to take charge of them, to call them to the truth, while they had a chance, and to ask them to repent; otherwise, if they perservered in their error by going astray and rushing headlong into deception, he was to fight them. He did not spare them any chance of admonishment, guidance, persuasion and advice. But they kept raising their voices, threatening to put the people of Baghdad to the sword and seize their women and possessions.

Moreover, while following the path of the idolators, they never missed an opportunity to raid or destroy every inhabited district on their way, and to desecrate the inviolable [rights] of Muslims and others. They killed helpless Muslims and appropriated their possessions. Because of that, many who had heard they were coming their way fled their districts, abandoned their habitations and dwellings, and ran to the door of the Commander of the Faithful to take refuge from this devastation. They did not leave one rich person without appropriating his wealth, nor [1571] did they leave a God-fearing person without defiling his womenfolk and dependents. They did not differentiate between Muslims and others, and devastated both in the same manner without heeding any prohibitions concerning bloodshed or sanctity. They received the threat of war, but responded to it by persevering in their iniquity and countered good advice with further contemplation of evil.

As they thronged at the Shammāsiyyah Gate, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the servant of the Commander of the Faithful, had already amassed armies there as well as at the other gates of Baghdad, all clad in full armor and prepared for war. These armies took refuge in their dependence on God, and defended themselves with His obedience. Their banners were the claim of God's greatness and they upheld them in the face of their enemy.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the servant of the Commander of the Faithful, ordered them to fortify their lines and to abstain from war as much as possible. The faithful thus dealt with them by counsel and advice, while the rebellious answered with war. They kept on provoking them for days in great numbers and with weapons, assuming that no one could defeat them—not knowing that the power of God is greater than theirs, and His commandments, unlike their desires, are always realized. His decrees are just and He would support those who are on the right course against them [the defectors].

On Saturday, middle of Ṣafar [March 17, 865], they all gathered at the Shammāsiyyah Gate and raised their banners, proclaiming their battle cry and fortifying themselves with their weapons. Anyone observing them then would have thought that no warning would dissuade them from bloodshed nor from seizing both women and possessions. The faithful counselled them but they would not listen. They admonished them but they would not yield and, instead, went further and commenced hostilities. At that time the faithful rushed against them, seeking the help of God and confident that their will would be realized by Him. They waged war against them until the afternoon of that day. God killed great numbers of their defenders, cavalry, chiefs and leaders of their infamy, and wounded the great majority of their masses. When the enemies of God and His religion saw that He denied their hopes, stood between them and their ambitions, and turned their fortune into a tragedy, they mobilized a large army of Turks and Maghāribah from Sāmarrā with full gear, weapons and fighting machines.[106] Then they came up against the West Side of Baghdad intending treachery and hoping to have their way with God's people, for they thought that the latter were busy fighting on the East Side. [1572]

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the servant of the Commander of the Faithful, had anticipated that and had amassed men and weapons on both sides of Baghdad. He also appointed for each area someone who would guard it and defend it from the affliction of this enemy. Over each gate he appointed a general with a great number of followers and ordered that the wall be guarded day and night. He also sent men to gather information about the enemies of God, their movements, their march, and their camps. He sought details of their condition in order to control every situation, so that, with God's help, he could defeat them. [1573]

106. The text has wa-lijuld, which should be read wa-l-juld, that is "robust men." But since several weapons of that period were made of skin, jild, and since it is parallel to asliḥah, it may be a reference to war machines protected by skin.

On Wednesday, the eighteenth of Ṣafar (March 21, 865), the mobilized army of the rebels arrived on the West Side of Baghdad by the Qaṭrabbul Gate, and took their position across from the camp of their followers who were on the east bank of the Tigris. Their numbers had by then filled the horizon and covered an immense stretch of space. They had agreed that they would approach the gates together in order to engage the faithful in a war on both fronts and, thus, weaken them and defeat their truth with their own deception. But God frustrated their false hopes and realized His decree by thwarting their ambitions.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh set against them Muḥammad b. ʿAwn, Bundār b. Mūsā al-Ṭabarī, the servants of the Commander of the Faithful, and ʿAbdallāh b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah at the Qaṭrabbul Gate. His orders were that these commanders fear God, obey Him and heed His commandments. They were to behave in accordance with His Book, and not to wage war until their admonitions had been well heard. Only then would they be free of blame for attacking the enemy which still persevered in rushing into evil.

[1574] They went out in an army that matched that of the rebels, but these were well guided by their duty to God while in combat. They advanced in full confidence of reward in the hereafter and recompense here and now. They were met by the enemies of God who charged at them with lance in hand, seeking their throats, thinking that it was the opportune time for the thief and the marauder to earn his loot.

They were admonished with clear, good advice, but it fell on deaf ears and blind eyes. The faithful kept their promise, however, and met them with unified hearts and the full knowledge that God would fulfill His promise to them. The cavalry charged the enemy more than once, followed by lances, swords and arrows. The pain began to surge from their wounds, and war was tearing at them with its teeth, mauling them under its millstone; once they realized that they were pursued by warriors thirsty for blood, they took to flight as God dealt them His mighty blow. A great number of those who did not fear the affliction of God, who did not repent nor take refuge from His punishment by reestablishing their loyalty, were killed.

Then they were reinforced from their camp by some one thousand men in ships, who encouraged them further in their transgression. They came up against the faithful at the Shammāsiyyah Gate, and war surged again. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh set against them Khālid b. ʿImrān and al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, the servant of Ṭāhir, who charged at them without hesitation and with unfailing will. They were accompanied by al-ʿAbbās b. Qārin, [1575] the servant of the Commander of the Faithful. When al-Shāh and his company came up against the enemies of God, he set guards at the positions which could be infiltrated by assailants and then joined the other commanders in a unified assault, fearing no threats and being completely assured of God's support and victory. They fell on them with their swords, executing God's decrees against them, until they chased them back to their camp and well beyond it. Once in flight the faithful looted all their weapons, animals and war machinery.

Many a dead body was abandoned on the very spot where death came upon it, while the head was moved to a place where it could be a lesson for others. Many a man ran away from the sword only to be drowned, and God did not offer him any refuge. Many a prisoner was brought in shackles to the dwellings of the faithful and God's party. Many a man escaped with his life after God had filled his heart with fear. With God's assistance, defeat was dealt out to both those who came up on the West Side and those who crossed over from the East Side to help them; no one escaped. No one took refuge in repentance, and no one came forth to the side of God.

Four bands[107] were to be fed to the fire, and punishment was quickly meted out to them in order that it be an exhortation and an advice to those who comprehend [ūlī al-abṣār]. Their example was the one intended by God, may He be exalted: "Hast [1576] thou not seen those who exchanged the bounty of God with unthankfulness, and caused their people to dwell in the abode of ruin? — Gehenna, wherein they are roasted; an evil establishment".[108]

But war raged on between the faithful and the dissenters on the East Side. The killing spread amongst their warriors, and the wounds were laying them low. They saw the destruction that God had dealt to their fellow supporters, and the vengeance He meted out to them. They found themselves without a shelter from God's wrath. They had no refuge nor a hiding place from those who were faithful to Him. They saw that, and they fled in defeat and disarray after learning the lesson of their erring brethren and their bands of deceivers. They themselves were also bewildered when they saw God's victory granted to His soldiers and the aid He gave to His faithful.

107. The text is difficult here. One cannot determine which four are intended.
108. Qur. 14:28.

Praise be to God, Lord of all Creation, the Oppressor of the evil ones who dissent from His religion, the transgressors who rebel against His pledge, and the hypocrites who revolt against those of His domain. May it be a praise that secures His utmost satisfaction, and may God's prayers and many salutations, first and last, be upon Muḥammad, His servant and messenger, who guides to His path and calls to Him by His permission.

That was written by Saʿīd b. Ḥamīd on Saturday, the seventh of Ṣafar (March 10, 865).[109]

On Tuesday the seventeenth of Ṣafar (March 20, 865), Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh rode to the Shammāsiyyah Gate and ordered the destruction of the houses, shops and gardens behind the wall of Baghdad. He also ordered that the palm trees and shrubbery be cut down there. The razing and cutting was to extend from the Shammāsiyyah Gate up to Three Gates[110] in order to make room for the men fighting in that area.

[1577] The Caliph had had over seventy donkeys loaded with money sent from the districts of Fars and al-Ahwāz to Baghdad. The Commander Mankajūr b. Qārin al-Ushrūsanī was reportedly in command. Abū Aḥmad and the Turks discharged Ibn Bābak with a force of three hundred cavalry and infantry to Ṭabaristān to intercept this

109. This date is obviously a later insertion since most of the events described in the dispatch took place a few days later than the tenth of March, 865. The twenty-fourth of Ṣafar, 251 (March 25, 865), the seventh day before the end of Ṣafar, is preferable.

110. This area was to the northeast of the Shammāsiyyah quarter which itself was north of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 203. The way the name Thalāthat Abwāb is used in the sources suggests a specific locality rather than any "three gates." See also Lassner, Topography, 263, n. 13.

money if it came to that province. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, however, sent his own general by the name of Yaḥyā b. Ḥafṣ to transport that money. For fear of Ibn Bābak, the latter diverted it from Ṭabaristān. When Ibn Bābak knew that the money had escaped him, he marched with his company to al-Nahrawān,[111] and together with the regular troops accompanying him, he attacked the inhabitants, forcing most of them from the town. He then set the boats of the pontoon bridge aflame[112]—there were more than twenty boats—before he departed to Sāmarrā.

Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Yazīd now advanced—al-Mustaʿīn had entrusted him with the frontier areas of al-Jazīrah. The former had been positioned in the administrative center (madīnah) of Balad[113] to wait for the troops and money coming to him. But when the Turks rebelled and al-Mustaʿīn took to Baghdad his only route to the city was by way of al-Raqqah.[114] Thus he went to al-Raqqah with his special retainers and his troops, about four hundred horsemen and infantry. Following that, he left the city and went down to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām). Having entered it on Tuesday, the seventeenth of Ṣafar (March 20, 865), he went to the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir who presented him with five cloaks of honor: a garment of embroidered brocade (dabīq)[115], (one of) silk, one distinguished by colorful embroidery, and a black one. He then sent him at the head of a large army to fight Ayyūb b. Aḥmad. Ibn Yazīd sailed [1578] along the Euphrates and then engaged Ayyūb in combat with a small group. The former was routed and subsequently returned to his village in the Sawād.

Saʿīd b. Ḥamīd (reported the following.) When word of Muḥammad b. Khālid's flight reached Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the latter said, "No Arab could succeed unless accompanied by a prophet through whom God offers assistance."

On this day the Turks engaged in a battle at the Shammāsiyyah Gate. They had come up to the gate and dispersed the defenders after heavy fighting. They shot naphtha and fire at the mangonel which 111. For al-Nahrawān, just east of Baghdad, see n. 101 above, and Le Strange, Baghdad, 217, 307.

112. On the pontoon bridges, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 42, n. 1.

113. See Le Strange, Lands, 90.

114. That is, along the Euphrates, ibid., 4, 86.

115. An Egyptian brocade, see ibid., 294, and Mez, Renaissance, 460.

had been erected at the left side of the gate, but their fire did not affect it. The troops defending the gate grew too strong for them and succeeded in dislodging the Turks from their positions. They pushed them back from the gate, but only after the latter had killed a number of Baghdadis and wounded many others with arrows. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh now dispatched against them eight ballistas carried in vessels and skiffs. Using these weapons, he subjected the defenders to an intense bombardment which took a great toll among them—some one hundred men. The defenders were now forced to retreat from the gate. On this day, one of the Maghāribah came to the wall of the Shammāsiyyah [Gate] and cast grappling hooks. The hooks caught and he ascended the wall. Those entrusted with guarding the wall seized and killed him, and then used the mangonel to cast his head to the Turkish camp. At this, the Turks retreated to their camp.

It was also said that some of the Abnā',[116] who were among those [1579] entrusted with defending the wall of the Shammāsiyyah Gate, became terrified when they saw the throng of Turks and Maghāribah who came there that day. They had approached with their banners and drums, when one of the Maghāribah cast a grappling hook that found the wall. One defender wanted to yell "Victory to Mustaʿīn," but erred and called out "Victory to al-Muʿtazz." Some of those guarding the gate thought that he was a Maghribī, whereupon they killed him and sent his head to the residence of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, who ordered that it be displayed in public. That evening, his mother and brother brought his body on a stretcher, screaming and demanding his head. It was not given to them but remained displayed at the head of the bridge until it was brought down together with the other heads.

On Friday evening, the twenty-first of Ṣafar [March 24, 865], a group of Turks reached the Baradān Gate, which was commanded by Muḥammad b. Rajā'—this was before he went down to the Wāsiṭ area. He killed six of them and captured four.

On one of those days al-Durghumān, a courageous hero, came with the Turks to the Shammāsiyyah Gate and was hit by a stone fired from a mangonel that struck him in the chest. He was taken to

116. See n. 31, above.

Sāmarrā but died between Buṣrā[117] and 'Ukbarā'.[118] (His body) was then transported to Sāmarrā.

Yaḥyā b. al-'Akkī, the Maghribī commander, reported that one day he was next to al-Durghumān when the latter caught a Nawākī[119] arrow that struck his eye. Following that he was hurt with a stone which split his head. He was (already) dead when he was carried away. [1580]

'Alī b. al-Ḥasan al-Rāmī (reported the following incident). We had gathered a group of bowmen at the wall by the Shammāsiyyah Gate. A Maghribī used to draw near the gate, bare his rear end, and fart giving a yell. One day, I selected an arrow for him, and shot it right through his anus. It came out at his throat as he fell dead. A group of men exited from the gate and hung him for public display; afterwards, the Maghāribah came and carried him away.

The rabble reportedly gathered in Sāmarrā after the Turks had been routed during the battle for the Qaṭrabbul Gate. Realizing the weakness of al-Mu'tazz, they looted the markets of the jewellers, the swordsmiths and the money-exchangers, taking everything they found there. The merchants then gathered with Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad, the brother of al-Mu'tazz, and complained to him, saying that the authorities had guaranteed them their possessions and promised to look after them. He retorted, "You should have taken your possessions to your houses." That reply made him appear haughty.

On Saturday, the twenty-first of Ṣafar (March 24, 865), Najūbah b. Qays b. Abī al-Sa'dī advanced with his bedouin recruits[120]—they numbered six hundred men on foot and two hundred horsemen. On this day too, ten notables of Tarsūs came forward to complain of Balkajūr. They claimed that two hours after receiving a (copy) of that oath of allegiance to al-Mu'tazz, he went out demanding (that others sign) the oath of allegiance to him. Thus Balkajūr received the oath on behalf of al-Mu'tazz from the commanders and the people of the frontier regions. Most of them swore allegiance, but a few declined; the latter were beaten, fettered or put in jail. Some [1581]

117. See Le Strange, Lands, 50.
118. See n. 90, above.
119. For Nawākī, see the Leiden edition of Ṭabarī, Glossary, Dxxxv.
120. That is, those whose names had been inscribed on the military roll.

reportedly refused and fled when he demanded their allegiance against their wishes. To that Waṣīf retorted, "I can only say that the man was deceived and that the carrier of al-Muʿtazz's missive to him was al-Layth b. Bābak; the latter told him that al-Mustaʿīn had died and that they [the military] had replaced him with al-Muʿtazz." But this group persisted in their complaint concerning Balkajūr, pointing out that he acted intentionally, and accusing him of favoring the sons of al-Wāthiq.[121] Then a letter from Balkajūr arrived on Wednesday, the twenty-fifth of Ṣafar (March 28, 865). It came with a man called ʿAlī al-Ḥusayn—he was known as Ibn al-Ṣuʿlūk. The letter stated that he (Balkajūr) had received a communication from Abū ʿAbdallāh b. al-Mutawakkil that the latter had assumed the caliphate, and thus he swore allegiance to him; but (it continued) when al-Mustaʿīn's letter came revealing the truth, he again sought the oath of allegiance from those beholden to him, and he, himself, would heed and obey al-Mustaʿīn. The messenger was given one thousand dirhams which he accepted. A letter had been drafted to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī al-Armanī, who was known as Abū Naṣr, charging him with responsibility for the Syrian frontier regions; but after the arrival of Balkajūr's letter of obedience, the letter of appointment to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī al-Armanī was withheld.

On Monday, the twenty-third of Ṣafar, 251 (March 26, 865), Ismāʿīl b. Farāshah advanced from the district of Hamadhān at the head of three hundred cavalry. His (entire) force contained fifteen [1582] hundred scattered men, some of whom arrived before the others. Accompanying him was a messenger who had been sent by al-Muʿtazz in order to exact his oath of allegiance (on behalf of the pretender). He had him fettered and brought him to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) on a bare-back mule. Ismāʿīl was then given five cloaks of honor. He also arrived with a man, reportedly an ʿAlid, who had been seized in the vicinity of al-Rayy and Ṭabaristān. He had been sent to the ʿAlids there. With the ʿAlid were pack animals and slaves (ghilmān). Orders were given that he be detained in the Public Audience Hall for several months, but he was released after a surety was extracted from him.

121. For al-Wāthiq, Hārūn b. al-Muʿtaṣim, the ninth ʿAbbāsid caliph and the uncle of al-Mustaʿīn, see Kutubī, Fawāt, IV, 228–230. Balkajūr is being accused here of defection from al-Mustaʿīn's camp, and of his support for the house of al-Wāthiq which produced the fourteenth caliph al-Muhtadī, who came to power after al-Muʿtazz, in 869.

On this day, the letter of Mūsā b. Bughā was read. In it he mentioned that al-Mu'tazz's missive had arrived, and that he had summoned his companions and told them what had transpired. He had ordered them to come with him to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām), but they had refused. The Shākiriyyah and the Abnā' had supported him, while the Turks and their supporters broke rank and fought against him. He killed several of them and took others prisoner bringing them along (to Baghdad). When this letter was read at Ibn Ṭāhir's palace, the people declared "God is Great."

On the twenty-fourth of Ṣafar (March 27, 865), ten deepwater vessels called bawārij[122] came up from al-Baṣrah, each carrying a ship master (ishtiyām),[123] three fire hurlers, a carpenter (najjār), a baker, and thirty-nine oarsmen and warriors. Thus every vessel had a complement of forty-five men. That night, they reached the island opposite the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir; still later they reached the Shammāsiyyah area. The men on the vessels fired upon the Turks, who then decided to move their camp from the low-lying area of al-Shammāsiyyah to Abū Ja'far's garden at the bridge.[124] Then it appeared to them that they should go still higher, to a place above their camp, in order to avoid the fire. [1583]

The day before the end of Ṣafar (March 31, 865), the Turks and the Maghāribah came up against the eastern gates of the city. The gates were locked in front of them, and they were assaulted with arrows, mangonels, and ballistas. Both factions suffered losses and many were wounded, but they did not cease fighting until the time of the afternoon prayer.

In this year Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh reversed the course he had set and returned from Jurjān to Ṭabaristān. He emerged from Āmul with a large force, including cavalry and weapons, whereupon al-Ḥasan b. Zayd retreated into Daylam. Sulaymān's nephew, Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir, then wrote to the central authorities informing them

122. For this and other names of vessels, see Kinderman, Schiff; for bārijah pl. bawārij, ibid., 3.

123. For ishtiyām, meaning ra'īs al-rukkāb, "chief of the passengers," see Lisān, XII, 319.

124. It cannot be precisely located.

that he had entered Ṭabaristān. His letter was read in Baghdad, and al-Mustaʿīn sent a copy of it to Bughā the Younger, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful. It mentioned the conquest of Ṭabaristān at the hands of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir, the rout of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, and the safe arrival of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh at Sāriyah.[125] It also mentioned that Māziyār and Rustam, two sons of Qārin b. Shahriyār, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, had reached Sulaymān with five hundred men. And (it reported) the remaining news of the conquest. The letter also informed him that the people of Āmul came to Sulaymān, publicly repenting and seeking forgiveness for their misdeeds; he received them in a way that put [1584] them at ease and made them feel secure. Before marching on with his force, which had been fully mobilized and was headed cross-country through the villages and highways, he ordered his men to refrain from killing and from acting in a dishonorable fashion. They were given a free hand to loot, but they were warned not to go beyond that. Furthermore, al-Mustaʿīn's missive indicated that a letter had reached him from Asad b. Jandān telling of the defeat of ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh the Ṭālibid, who was named al-Marʿashī,[126] together with his companions. They were more than one thousand men. With them were two of the chiefs of al-Jabal,[127] and a huge crowd which followed them when they heard of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd's defeat and of how Asad had entered that district with the loyalists. The original letter also noted how Sulaymān had entered Āmul in fine form, displaying an aura of invincibility and creating a sense of security; all rebellion was then quenched.

On the twenty-fifth of Muḥarram, 251 (February 26, 865), a dispatch arrived at (Baghdad) from al-ʿAlā' b. Aḥmad, Bughā al-Sharābī's agent responsible for the taxes and the estates of Armīniyah. The dispatch told of the uprising of two men in that district who were mentioned by name. It also reported that he attacked them and that they took refuge in a fortress. He then employed the mangonels and exhausted the defenders, whereupon the two men fled the fortress and vanished. It then fell into the hands of the loyalists.

---

125. See n. 59, above.

126. As in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 183. Ṭabarī's text is unvocalized and could be read as al-Mubarnaʿash, al-Mubartaʿash, etc.

127. The text is al-Jīl; it should be read al-Jabal as in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 163.

Also in that year, a dispatch dated the nineteenth of Muḥarram [1585] (February 20, 865), brought news of an uprising (intiqāḍ) by the people of Ardabīl. They received a letter from the Ṭālibid who sent four armies against the four gates of their city to beseige it.

In that year, a dispatch arrived reporting the war between ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh and al-Muwaffaq al-Khārijī. It indicated how ʿĪsā had arrested al-Muwaffaq and how he then requested needed weapons of al-Mustaʿīn so that ʿĪsā might have equipment at al-Balad to arm the troops for raiding. He also requested that the governor of Tyre (al-Ṣūr)[128] be instructed to send him four fully equipped vessels to join the vessels already under his command there.

In that year, a dispatch from Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir brought news of the Ṭālibid who rebelled in al-Rayy and the surrounding area. It spoke of the armies that were prepared and sent against him, and it brought news of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd's flight while en route to al-Muḥammadiyyah[129] and of the siege layed to al-Muḥammadiyyah by Muḥammad's army. When al-Ḥasan entered al-Muḥammadiyyah he appointed officers (to guard) the roads and major highways, and he scattered his men. God granted him victory over Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar who surrendered unconditionally. Those ʿAlids who came to al-Rayy a second time after the capture of Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar were Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn the Younger b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and Idrīs b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, that is, the one who rebelled when the [1586] pilgrims ascended Mt. ʿArafāt.[130] The ʿAlid in Ṭabaristān was al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

Also in this year, a dispatch from Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir reached al-Mustaʿīn reporting his defeat of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. He had met the rebel with an army of about thirty thousand and the battle ensued. Muḥammad indicated that he had killed some 340 men of his chief supporters. Al-Mustaʿīn ordered that a copy of this letter be read throughout the realm.

---

128. The text reads al-Sūr instead of Ṣūr, that is Tyre, which is the only coastal city that has similar vocables.

129. That is, of al-Rayy, not to be confused with other locations of that name. See Le Strange, Lands, 57, 214, 215.

130. The text reads maṣʿad al-Ḥajj, that is, the ascent of the pilgrims to ʿArafāt which takes place during the pilgrimage in Mecca.

In this year, Yūsuf b. Ismāʿīl the ʿAlid, the nephew of Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥusaynī, rebelled.

In Rabīʿ I, 251 (April 2–May 1, 965), Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh ordered that the vagabonds (ʿayyār)[131] of Baghdad be given clubs (kāfirkūbāt) fashioned with iron nails to be distributed at the residence of al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal. They used to present themselves for battle without any weapons and (simply) cast bricks. He called for a herald and the latter announced, "Those who need weapons, let them come to the residence of al-Muẓaffar." The vagabonds arrived from every direction; weapons were distributed to them, and their names were registered (in the military roll).[132] These vagabonds ap-[1587] pointed their own chief, a man called Yantawayh whose patronymic was Abū Jaʿfar, and several other (leaders) called Dūnal, Dimḥāl,[133] Abū Namlah and Abū ʿUṣārah. Only Yantawayh retained his rank as he continued to be the chief of the vagabonds of the West Side until this rebellion came to an end. When the vagabonds were given the clubs, they spread out to the gates of Baghdad. That day they killed some fifty Turks and their followers. Their own casualties were ten persons. Some five-hundred of them went out with bows and arrows, and seized two banners and two ladders (after battling) with the Turks.

In (this year), Najūbah b. Qays engaged a group of Turks in battle in the district of Bazūghā;[134] he met them there together with Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn and others. They captured seven of them and killed three, while the others threw themselves in the water; some drowned and others escaped.

Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shīrzād (reported that) he (Aḥmad) had asked one of the prisoners about the number of men who had battled Najūbah. The prisoner responded, "We were forty men. Najūbah and his companions met up with us very early in the day. Three of us were killed, three drowned, and eight were taken prisoner; the rest escaped. He also took eighteen animals, coats of mail, and a banner belonging to the governor of Awānā,[135] who was the brother of

131. See n. 104, above.

132. That is, they received combat pay.

133. It could also be Damḥāl, Dumḥāl, etc.

134. That is, about two farsakhs (twelve km) northeast of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 50, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 411.

135. That is, a famous town between Baghdad and Sāmarrā, some ten farsakhs (sixty km) north of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 274, and Le Strange, Lands, 50.

Hārūn b. Shu'ayb." The battle took place at Awānā on Wednesday, [1588] and the soldiers of Najūbah and 'Abdallāh b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah remained armed at Qaṭrabbul.

During one of those days, Yantawayh and his companions among the vagabonds reportedly set out from the Qaṭrabbul Gate and continued cursing the Turks until they passed Qaṭrabbul. Some Turks crossed over in skiffs, shooting arrows at them. They killed one of the vagabonds and wounded ten others. However, the vagabonds overwhelmed them with stones causing numerous casualties, so that the Turks retreated to their camp. Yantawayh was brought to the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir who ordered him not to go out except on a day of battle. The former was then presented a bracelet of honor, and Ibn Ṭāhir ordered that he be given five hundred dirhams.

On the fourteenth of Rabī' I, 251 (April 15, 865), Muzāḥim b. Khāqān came from the area of al-Raqqah and gave orders to the commanders, the Hāshimites and the heads of the government bureaus to meet him. About one thousand of his companions among the Khurāsānīs, the Turks and the Maghāribah accompanied him, bringing with them all sorts of instruments of war. He entered Baghdad with Waṣīf to his right and Bughā to his left. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir was to the left of Bughā, and Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq was behind them. The impression he himself made in public was one of dignity. Upon arriving, he was granted seven cloaks of honor and girded with a sword; each of his two sons was granted five cloaks of honor. It was ordered that he be given command of three thousand men including cavalry and infantry. Al-Mu'tazz sent Mūsā b. Ashnās along with Ḥātim b. Dāwūd b. Bajūr with a force of three [1589] thousand men including cavalry and infantry. Mūsā then set up camp opposite Abū Aḥmad on the West Side by the Qaṭrabbul Gate. This was on the first evening of Rabī' I (April 2, 865). One of the vagabonds, known as Daykawayh, went out riding on a donkey accompanied by his lieutenant on another donkey. They carried shields and weapons. Another bearing the patronymic Abū Ja'far, and known as al-Mukharramī, emerged from the East Side at the head of five hundred men carrying drawn weapons, shields, tar-covered mats, swords, knives in their belts, and clubs.

When the army arriving from Sāmarrā drew near to the West Side of Baghdad, Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh rode out in full gear together with fourteen of his commanders. Also coming out (of the city) were great numbers of the Mubayyiḍah and onlookers (naẓẓārah). He marched until he was opposite the camp of Abū Aḥmad. They fought one engagement across the water,[136] during which more than fifty men of Abū Aḥmad's force were killed. The Mubayyiḍah advanced until they passed more than half a farsakh (three km) beyond the army. At this, river boats (shabbārah)[137] from Abū Aḥmad's force crossed over to them. A skirmish between the two contingents took place, and several vessels were seized and secured, [1590] together with their fighting men and sailors. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh then left giving orders to Ibn Abī ʿAwn to disperse the people. Ibn Abī ʿAwn thus sent someone who dispersed the masses of people and the onlookers. The latter addressed them crudely and cursed them, and they, in turn, cursed him. He then struck one of them killing him, whereupon the mob charged him and rendered him defenseless in their midst. Four river vessels from the flotilla of the Baghdadis had been left behind; so that when Ibn Abī ʿAwn left, fleeing the mob, Abū Aḥmad's troops saw them and sent their own vessels after them. They seized the vessels and burned one with a ballista in it belonging to the Baghdadis. The mob immediately set off to plunder the residence of Ibn Abī ʿAwn, saying, "He inclined towards the Turks, aided them and fled with his followers." They called upon Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to dismiss him and began to hoot and holler; whereupon Muḥammad dispatched al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal with his followers, ordering him to disperse the mob and prevent them from taking any of Ibn Abī ʿAwn's belongings. Muḥammad also informed them that he had dismissed Ibn Abī ʿAwn from his naval command and all other military duties, and that he had transferred these responsibilities to his own brother, ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh. Muẓaffar then went out and dispersed the people from the residence of Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn.

On Thursday, the nineteenth of Rabīʿ I (April 20, 865), the Turkish army coming to Baghdad from Sāmarrā reached ʿUkbarā.[138] At this Ibn Ṭāhir sent out several of his commanders, including Bandār [1591] al-Ṭabarī, his brother ʿUbaydallāh, Abū al-Sanā, Muzāḥim b.

136. The text reads fī al-maʾ, "in the water."

137. Shabbārāt is rendered as sufun, that is "vessels," in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 150. See also Kinderman, Schiff, 45–46.

138. That is, they travelled about half the distance between Sāmarrā and Baghdad. For 'Ukbarā', see n. 90, above.

Khāqān, Asad b. Dāwūd Siyāh, and Khālid b. 'Imrān. They marched until they reached Qaṭrabbul where the Turks lay in ambush. The latter attacked and the two forces became engaged in combat. The Turks pushed them back against the two walls of Qaṭrabbul Road. Abū al-Sanā and Asad b. Dāwūd fought furiously, each killing several Turks and Maghāribah. Abū al-Sanā pressed forward, followed by (his) troops, and managed to kill one of the Turkish commanders—he was called Sūr. He severed his head and made straight for Ibn Ṭāhir's palace, where he informed the latter of his troops' defeat, and requested reinforcements. Ibn Ṭāhir gave orders that he be granted necklaces of honor. The weight of each necklace was thirty dīnārs and the weight of each bracelet was seven and a half mithqāl.[139] Abū al-Sanā went back to the troops with the reinforcements that he brought along from all the gates (of the city).

Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh reportedly chastised Abū al-Sanā for deserting his position and bringing the head himself. He allegedly said to him, "You have abandoned the troops. May God shame this head and your bringing it." When Muḥammad b. 'Abdūs (Abū al-Sanā) left (the field of battle), Asad b. Dāwūd fought on furiously; even after the troops had split off from him. He was subsequently killed. Some of the Baghdadis went back to the place where he had been, but this was after the Turks had taken his head. They repelled the Turks guarding his corpse and transported it to Baghdad in a skiff. The Turks reached Qaṭrabbul Gate, but the people went out and exerted great pressure against them, forcing them away from the gate. They then pursued the enemy until they broke them. That day, after the battle, the heads of those Turks and Maghāribah who were killed were brought to the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir. He ordered that they be displayed at the Shammāsiyyah Gate, and this was done. [1592]

Following that, the Turks and the Maghāribah returned to attack the Baghdadis from the direction of Qaṭrabbul. A great number of Baghdadis and Turks were killed, as Bandār and his troops kept on fighting until evening. Then he took leave with the people, and the gates were locked. Ibn Ṭāhir now left orders for al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal, Rashīd b. Kāwūs and another commander. They went out at the head of five hundred cavalry, exiting from the Qaṭrabbul Gate in the direction of Ibn Ashnās's camp. They came up against an enemy 139. That is, about 34 grams. See Hinz, Masse, 1–8.

(force) which was unprepared and offguard, and they killed about three hundred of them, captured several, and then withdrew.

On this day, the Turks and the Maghāribah reportedly reached the Gate of the Fief (qaṭīʿah)[140] and breached the wall near the bath-house (ḥammām) known as Ḥammām Bāb al-Qaṭīʿah. The first of them to come through the breech was killed. The number of dead among the Turks and the Maghāribah this day was higher than among the defenders, but many among the Baghdadis were wounded by arrows.

I heard some say that a young man who had not yet reached puberty took part in this battle. He had a nosebag filled with stones and a slingshot in his hand. He would cast (the stones) never missing the faces of the Turks and their animals. Four Turkish horsemen who were bowmen began to shoot at him but they always missed. He would shoot back and hit them, and their mounts would then throw them. The Turks kept at it, until, assisted by four Maghribī horsemen carrying lances and shields, they charged at him. Two of [1593] them came upon him, but he threw himself in the water. They jumped in after the boy, but could not catch up with him. He crossed to the East Side and taunted them. The troops proclaimed "God is Great!" and returned without ever catching him.

On this day ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh reportedly summoned the commanding officers—there were five of them—and ordered each of them to a district. The people then marched off to war while he left for the gate. He told ʿAbdallāh b. Jahm who was in charge of Qaṭrabbul Gate, "Do not let any of them come back through the gate in retreat." When the battle was engaged, the people scattered and the rout was on. Asad b. Dāwūd stood fast until he was killed. He had killed three with his own hands when a silver (gharab) arrow struck his throat. He was retreating when another arrow hit the back of his mount; it bolted and threw him. No one stood with him except his son, who himself was wounded. The closing of the gates in the face of the retreating men was harder on them than the enemy. Seventy prisoners and three hundred Baghdadi heads were reportedly taken to Sāmarrā.

It was reported that when the prisoners drew close to Sāmarrā, the (officer) accompanying them was given orders not to let them enter the city until their faces were covered. When the populace of Sāmarrā saw them emotions ran high, and they joined their womenfolk in crying aloud and in prayer. News of this reached al-Muʿtazz and he feared the hardening of the hearts of those around him. He thus ordered that each prisoner be given two dīnārs on condition [1594] that they abandon their belligerency. He also ordered that the heads be buried, and it was done. Among the prisoners was a son of Muḥammad b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, a brother of Qusṭanṭīnah, the slave girl of Umm Ḥabīb, and five of the notables of Baghdad who were among the onlookers. As for the son of Muḥammad b. Naṣr, he was reportedly killed and then hung aloft opposite the Shammāsiyyah Gate where his father's position was.

140. That is, the Fief of Umm Jaʿfar. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 113.

On Thursday, the twenty-sixth of Rabīʿ I (April 27, 865), Abū al-Sāj advanced by way of the Mecca Road accompanied by seven hundred horsemen and eighteen litters containing thirty-six shackled bedouin prisoners. He and his men then entered Baghdad, smartly attired and with their weapons in full view. He marched until reaching the palace (of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh) where he was given five cloaks of honor and was girded with a sword. He then departed for his residence along with his companions. Four of his men had also been given cloaks of honor.

It was said that on Monday, the last day of Rabīʿ I (May 1, 865), a group of Turks came up to the Shammāsiyyah Gate bearing a message from al-Muʿtazz to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, and requested that they be allowed to deliver it. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl refused to receive it until he consulted (someone); the order to receive it was subsequently given. Three horsemen then came on Friday and were met by a man armed with a sword and shield, who had been sent to them by al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl. He removed the letter from a pouch, and it was taken away and delivered to Muḥammad. It contained a reminder to Muḥammad of the duties encumbent upon him stemming from his previous and unbreakable agreement with al-Muʿtazz. It was his duty to be the first of those who support al- [1595] Muʿtazz in his endeavor and set his caliphate on the right course. That letter was said to have been the first to reach him from al-Muʿtazz after the conflict (had begun).

On Saturday, the fifth of Rabīʿ II (May 6, 865), Ḥabshūn b. Bughā the Elder came to Baghdad accompanied by Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb Qūṣarrah, the mawlā of al-Hādī, and those Shākiriyyah who were with Mūsā b. Bughā. Most of the Shākiriyyah stationed in al-Raqqah—there were some thirteen hundred men—joined them. He was given five cloaks of honor while Yūsuf was given four. Cloaks of honor were also bestowed on some twenty notables among the Shākiriyyah. Following this, they all departed for their residences.

A man came to Baghdad and reported that the Turks, Maghāribah and their retinue on the West Side numbered twelve thousand men; they were headed by Bayakbāk, the commander. The troops with Abū Aḥmad on the East Side numbered seven thousand; al-Durghumān al-Farghānī was Abū Aḥmad's lieutenant. He also reported that there remained but six commanders of the Turks and the Maghāribah in Sāmarrā. They were in charge of guarding the gates.

The two parties engaged in battle on Wednesday, the seventh of Rabī' II (May 8, 865). On that day, al-Mu'tazz reportedly lost four hundred men, including those who drowned. Ibn Ṭāhir lost three [1596] hundred killed and drowned; the count included only troopers, for on that day none of the rabble came out. Al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Ḥarbi[141] was killed; this had been a hard day for both parties.

It was also reported that Muzāḥim b. Khāqān was struck by an arrow, shot by Mūsā b. Ashnās, and left (the field) wounded. About twenty Turkish and Maghribī commanders were found missing from the army of Abū Aḥmad.

On Thursday, the fifteenth of Rabī' II (May 16, 865), five cloaks of honor were given to Abū al-Sāj, four to Ibn Farāshah, and three to Yaḥyā b. Ḥafṣ (who was known as) Ḥabūs.[142] The camp of Abū al-Sāj was then at Sūq al-Thalāthā'.[143] The regular army was given mules from the stock held by the central authorities; they were to be used as transport for the infantry. Muzāḥim b. Khāqān was transferred from the Ḥarb Gate[144] to the Salāmah Gate and Khālid b. 'Imrān al-Ṭā'ī al-Mawṣilī was appointed in his stead.

It was also reported that when Ibn Ṭāhir ordered Abū al-Sāj to come to him, the latter was supposed to have said, "O Prince, I have 141. Reading is uncertain.

---

142. The text is Jabūs; it should be read Ḥabūs. See the Leiden edition of Ṭabarī, index, 632.

143. That is, in the southeast section of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 68, and Lassner, Topography, 264, n. 25.

144. That is, in the northeast section of Baghdad, in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 112, and map facing p. 107, n. 11.

advice to give." He was told, "Go ahead, Abū Ja'far, you are above suspicion," and he said, "If you want to get the most out of those people, you are advised not to take leave of your commanders and not to scatter them but, rather, to hold them together until you break this army stationed across the way. For once you finish with them, you will have full mastery of your own forces." Ibn Ṭāhir responded, "I have my battle plan; if God wills it, He will see to it that it is [successful]." Abū al-Sāj then said, "I am at your command," and departed to execute his orders. [1597]

It was reported that al-Mu'tazz wrote to Abū Aḥmad blaming him for his tarrying in fighting the Baghdadis whereupon the latter responded:

Death's command has its way with us sometimes it can be borne with ease, sometimes it is hard.

Our recorded battle days are examples for people, some of them are firsts of their kind, some are not.

Some are hard enough to turn the infant's hair white, and some see friends betraying one another.

A wide wall so high that eyes cannot see its top, and a deep trench;

The devastating battle, the drawn sword, the terrible fear, and the strong fortress.

The early morning calls, "To arms! to arms!" but no one wakes.

Here's a dead body, here's a wounded one;
here's a burnt person, and here's a drowned one.

This one has been killed, this one has been knocked down, another one has been bashed with a mangonel.

There, one finds cruelty, and over there looting ruined palaces which had been pleasing.

Everytime we climb a new path
we find the way blocked.

[1598] Only with God's help shall we attain what we desire, and only with God's help shall we resist the hardships.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh responded, or (the following) may have been said on his behalf:

Isn't it true that anyone who goes astray and digresses from the guided path,

Will find what you have described?
and how befitting is such an end to such a person!

It is especially true of the one who violates his allegiance;
for exacting it from him is a confirmed pledge.

The guided path will be closed to his face, and he will meet unbearable hardships.

He will never attain what he desires, nor will the one who does not repent his transgressions.

This we know just like a proverb, received from one generation to another.

Our witness is this [Holy] Book which has been confirmed by the true Prophet.

As for the first poem, it was recited by ʿAlī b. Umayyah during the civil war between the deposed (al-Amīn) and al-Maʿmūn. The response is anonymous.

In Rabīʿ II, 251 (May 2–30, 865), two hundred cavalry and infantry were reportedly sent by al-Muʿtazz to the district of Bandanījayn[145] under the command of a Turk called Ablaj. They made for al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī and looted his residence while attacking his village. Following this, they proceeded to a nearby village, where they ate and drank. When they felt secure, al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī cried out for help against them, (addressing his call to) some Kurds from among his maternal uncles and people from the villages surrounding him. [1599] They fell upon the Turks, catching them unawares. They killed most of them, and took seventeen men as prisoners. Ablaj was killed, and the rest of them fled at night. Al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī now sent the prisoners, the head of Ablaj, and the heads of those who were killed with him, to Baghdad. This al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī was from the (tribe of) Shaybān. He reportedly served as Yaḥya b. Ḥafṣ's deputy when the latter was a public official. His mother was Kurdish.

145. That is, the northeast section of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 499, and Le Strange, Lands, 63, 80.

Al-Madā' in During This Civil War

It was reported that when Abū al-Sāj, Ismāʿīl b. Farāshah and Yaḥyā b. Ḥafṣ were given cloaks of honor in order to proceed to al-Madāʿin; they set up camp at Sūq al-Thalāthā'. On Sunday, the twentieth of Rabīʿ I (April 21, 865), Abū al-Sāj[146] let his infantry ride the mules, and he set off towards al-Madā'in, which had been the trench of the Sassanian Emperor.[147] He wrote asking for reinforcements, and five hundred infantry of the regular army were sent to him. He himself had set out at the head of three thousand horsemen and infantry. Then Abū al-Sāj asked for further reinforcements, and they were given to him; so his army reached three thousand men of the old Shākiriyyah who were transported in vessels that set sail for him on Sunday, the fourth of Jumādā I[148] (June 3, 865).

Al-Anbār[149] and the Civil War There

Among these events, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh sent Najūbah b. Qays at the head of a bedouin force to al-Anbār, and ordered him to estab-

146. The text does not specify his name, but he is obviously intended by the context.

147. For Madā'in, and its importance under the Sassanians, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 74–75.

148. The text has Jumādā II, which would not be a Sunday. The fourth of Jumādā I, however, was a Sunday, and the text should be emended as in the translation.

149. That is, on the Euphrates, northwest of Baghdad, at some ten farsakhs (sixty km) away. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 257.

lish a position there and to enlist recruits among the bedouins of that district. He managed to enlist some two thousand men from [1600] among them and those like them, and he established himself at al-Anbār, thus securing the city. Word then reached him that a contingent of Turks was making its way towards him. At this, he opened the floodgates of the Euphrates, emptying its waters into the trench of al-Anbār. When the trench was filled, it overflowed (and flooded) the surrounding steppes, with the water reaching as far as al-Saylaḥayn.[150] The area surrounding al-Anbār thus became one continuous swamp. He also demolished the masonry bridges (qanṭarah) leading to the city, and he wrote asking for reinforcements. Rashīd b. Kāwūs, the brother of al-Afshīn, was selected to go to him, and the latter gathered those of his troops who were with him—they numbered one thousand men: five hundred cavalry and five hundred infantry. He went forth and set up camp by Qaṣr ʿAbdawayh.[151] Ibn Ṭāhir reinforced him with three hundred infantry from the Malaṭiyah[152] contingent which was coming from the frontier region. They were selected, given what was due them, and assigned to him on Tuesday. By Monday, the last day of Rabīʿ I [153] (May 1, 865), Rashīd departed from Qaṣr ʿAbdawayh at the head of fifteen hundred men.

On Tuesday, al-Muʿtazz dispatched Abū Naṣr b. Bughā from Sāmarrā along the Isḥāqī Road. After marching a day and a night, he came up to al-Anbār in the morning. At the same time Rashīd b. Kāwūs set up camp there. Najūbah had positioned himself inside the city while Rashīd was camped outside of it. When Abū Naṣr ar-[1601] rived, he took Rashīd and his men unawares; they had not taken up their battle stations yet. Abū Naṣr's men put them to the sword and

150. The text is al-Ṣāliḥīn; it should be read al-Saylaḥayn, as in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 298–299. This district, according to Yāqūt, is only some three farsakhs (eighteen km) from Baghdad; hence the flooded land must have covered some forty km down from Al-Anbār.

151. See Lassner, Topography, 70. The camp was still in the Baghdad area.

152. See Le Strange, Lands, 120, 121, 128, 136, 142.

153. There is a mistake in the text at this point. The last day of Rabīʿ II was not a Monday but, rather, a Wednesday. The confusion may have occurred because the daily cycle begins in the evening rather than at midnight or midday. In any case, Tuesday is the correct reading, being consistent with the rest of the text as well as with the end of Rabīʿ I, which was, indeed, a Tuesday.

showered them with arrows, killing a number of them. Some of Rashīd's troops took up their arms and fought furiously with the Turks and the Maghāribah, killing several of them. Rashīd and the Shākiriyyah then fled back to Baghdad along the road they had taken before. When Najūbah learned what had befallen Rashīd's men, and that the Turks intended to attack al-Anbār following the former's retreat, he crossed over with a group of his men to the west bank and cut the pontoon bridge of al-Anbār (behind him). That night, Rashīd went to al-Muḥawwal,[154] while Najūbah moved along the west bank (of the Ṣarāt) until he reached Baghdad on Thursday evening. Later that evening, Rashīd entered the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir. Najūbah told Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh that when the Turks were marching to al-Anbār, he sent word to Rashīd asking him for a hundred archers so that he could array them in front of his army, but the latter refused. Najūbah now asked Ibn Ṭāhir to assign to his command archers drawn from the cavalry and the infantry so that he could march with them to his kinsmen. Najūbah mentioned that they were stationed here on the West Side, obediently awaiting the Commander of the Faithful. After giving guarantees that he would execute what was expected of him,[155] Najūbah was given the command of three hundred archers from the cavalry of the Shākiriyyah and from their [1602] infantry. After being given five cloaks of honor, he marched to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah to make ready there.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh then selected al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl to go to al-Anbār and sent along with him Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ al-Ḥiḍārī, ʿAbdallāh b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, Rashīd b. Kāwūs, Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā and a group of others. He also ordered that money be given to anyone leaving with al-Husayn and this company. The Shākiriyyah, who came from Malaṭiyah, and who represented the main group[156] accepting four months military allotment, refused, for most of them did not have a mount. They said, "We need to replenish ourselves and buy mounts." Four thousand dīnārs had been offered them, but they were satisfied with four months pay. Al-Ḥusayn held an audience at the door of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh's palace and began to check the lists (jarā'id) of recruits[157] in order to review the troops[158] with his companions in Madīnat Abū Ja'far.[159] On that day, he paid a contingent of his special forces. Following that, al-Ḥusayn and the clerks of the dīwāns went to Madīnat Abī Ja'far and offered service pay to those regular troops who would move out with him. They were to be paid at three sessions; the payments were completed on Saturday, the eighteenth of Jumādā I (June 17, 865).

154. That is, on the ʿĪsā Canal, about one farsakh (six km) northwest of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 31, 32, 66, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 425.

155. This seems to be the sense of the uncertain text, ḍamana an yatalāqā mā kāna minhu.

156. The text is man, "who"; it should be read mimman, "of those," as in Ms. O.

On Monday, al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl was brought to the palace (of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh). With him were the commanders who were leaving with him, namely: Rashīd b. Kāwūs, Muḥammad b.
[1603] Rajā', 'Abdallāh b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, Irmīs (?) al-Farghānī, Muḥammad b. Ya'qūb, the brother of Ḥuzām, Yūsuf b. Manṣūr b. Yūsuf al-Barm, al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī, al-Faḍl b. Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl, and Muḥammad b. Harthamah b. al-Naḍir. Al-Ḥusayn was given cloaks of honor and was promoted from the fourth battalion (fawj) to the second. These commanders were also given cloaks of honor; Rashīd b. Kāwūs was put in charge of the vanguard, and Muḥammad b. Rajā' was given the train. Al-Ḥusayn, those of his kinsmen ('ashīrah) who were attached to him, and his generals marched to their camp, following Waṣīf and Bughā (who) had been ordered (to depart) ahead of him. He was escorted to al-Yāsiriyyah[160] by 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh and all of Ibn Ṭāhir's commanders, (his) secretaries, the Banū Hāshim, and the notables. The army families were given thirty-six thousand dīnārs. Eighteen hundred dīnārs were taken to the encampment at al-Yāsiriyyah to be distributed to the remaining fighting men in order to pay off what was due them.

On Thursday al-Ḥusayn's vanguard, commanded by 'Abdallāh b. Naṣr b. Muḥammad b. Ya'qūb and comprising one thousand cavalry and infantry, marched until they reached the dam (bathq) known as Bathq al-Qāṭūfah, where they encamped.

---

157. Jarā'id could also mean a company of horsemen without footmen among them. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 407, col. 1; but it is hard to read that meaning with taṣḥīḥ, that is, "to correct," "to check." In this context it should be understood as military rolls.

158. The Text is al-nās, "people."

159. The reference is to the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 15–46.

160. That is, some two miles northwest of Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 425, and n. 154 above.

The Turks had already sent to al-Manṣūriyyah,[161] five farsakhs [1604] (thirty km) from Baghdad, a contingent consisting of their men, some Maghāribah, and the rabble. The group numbered around one hundred men. Seven of the Maghāribah were taken (prisoner), and then brought to al-Ḥusayn who had them taken to the Gate (in Baghdad). Al-Ḥusayn himself set forth on Friday, the twenty-third of Jumādā I (June 22, 865). The populace of al-Anbār had asked for guarantees of safe conduct when the Turks and Maghāribah arrived at the city after Najūbah and Rashīd had retreated. It was granted to them. They were ordered to open their shops, conduct business in them, and go about their affairs as usual. As a result, the Anbārīs felt secure and trusted that the garrison would not harm them. They remained so for a day and a night. But the next morning, while the garrison was (still) in control of the city, vessels sailing from al-Raqqah arrived containing flour, and rafts bearing oil and other items also arrived. The garrison seized the shipments and everything they found including camels, pack animals, mules and donkeys. They sent them off with someone who would deliver them to their residences in Sāmarrā. They looted whatever they could find, and sent along the heads of those who were killed from among the men of Rashīd, Najūbah, and the Baghdadis, together with those that were taken prisoner. The prisoners numbered 120 men; there were sev- [1605] enty heads. The prisoners were carried in sacks with their heads sticking out until they reached Sāmarrā. Later the Turks went up to the mouth of the river at al-Asnānah[162] and attempted to block it, thereby preventing the waters of the Euphrates from reaching Baghdad. After paying a man some money, they sent him to get (hold of) the lock mechanism and to lock it with ropes and yardarms. But he was discovered as he was buying (the equipment). The mob beat him and cursed him until he lay near death, and then he was taken to the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir. When he was asked about the matter, he confessed the truth and was sent to prison.

Ibn Ṭāhir had already sent al-Ḥārith, Abū al-Sāj's lieutenant—he 161. This town name is mentioned several times by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VIII, 599, 620, 622, IX, 251, 569, X, 16, 50, but all references are to North Africa. The Iraqi counterpart is hard to determine.

162. We should probably read Astān to mean a "district." See Le Strange, Lands, 79–80. Apparently they wanted to block the traffic along one of the major arteries that connected the Euphrates to Baghdad.

had been travelling along the Mecca Road—to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. He attached to al-Ḥārith's command five hundred Shākiriyyah cavalry who were to advance with him. Al-Ḥārith departed with his companions on the seventh of Jumādā I (June 6, 865). Ibn Ṭāhir also sent Ibn Abī Dulaf Hāshim b. al-Qāsim at the head of two hundred infantry and cavalry to al-Sībān[163] in order to establish a position there. When al-Ḥusayn set out for al-Anbār, written orders were sent to Hāshim to join al-Ḥasayn's army and accompany it to the city. In Baghdad, the call went out to the troops of al-Ḥusayn and Muzāḥim b. Khāqān to join their commanders, after which al-Ḥusayn set out. Khālid b. ʿImrān also advanced, setting up camp in [1606] Dimimmā.[164] There, he wanted to build a pontoon bridge across the Aniq[165] canal so that his troops might cross the waterway, but the Turks resisted him. A contingent of infantry crossed over to encounter the enemy and dispersed them, whereupon Khālid completed the bridge and crossed over with his company. Meanwhile, al-Ḥusayn marched to Dimimmā and camped outside the village. After having spent one day in his camp, the vanguard of the Turkish army reached him in the area along the Aniq and the Rufayl above the village of Dimimmā. Al-Ḥusayn then ranged his troops along one side of the river while the Turks, numbering around one thousand men, were on the other side. They showered each other with arrows and a number of troops were wounded. The Turks then departed for al-Anbār, while Najūbah was still positioned at Qaṣr b. Hubayrah.

Joining al-Ḥusayn at this point were all the bedouins in Najūbah's force and others. Najūbah wrote asking for money to pay to his troops, and orders were given that three thousand dīnārs be taken to al-Ḥusayn's camp and paid out to Najūbah's men. As for al-Ḥusayn, he was given money, necklaces, bracelets and gifts to be distributed to those who fought with valor. Moreover, al-Ḥusayn was promised further reinforcements to bring his army up to ten thousand men. Orders were subsequently dispatched that that promise be met. Moreover, it was ordered that Abū al-Sanā Muḥammad b. ʿAbdūs al-Ghanawī and al-Jaḥḥāf b. Sawād be sent at the head of a thousand infantry and cavalry from among the Malaṭiyah (troops) and a force selected from various commands. These men received their rations on [1607] the second day before the end of Jumādā I (June 28, 865),[166] and then marched with Abū al-Sanā and al-Jaḥḥāf along the Karkhāyā[167] Canal to al-Muḥawwal,[168] and then to Dimimmā.

163. The locale is uncertain. Any two water courses (sīb) could be called thus. See, however, Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 293, who locates it near Qaṣr Hubayrah.

164. See Le Strange, Lands, 66.

165. The reading is uncertain. Also rendered as Abiq.

Al-Ḥusayn encamped with his army in an open expanse that was sufficient for his force; it was known as al-Qaṭī'ah. He stayed there for one day and then intended to leave for an area adjacent to al-Anbār. But Rashīd and the commanders advised him to keep the camp in that place because it had ample space and was fortifiable. He could then proceed together with his commanders and part of a cavalry squadron to find out if the conditions (there) would be in his favor. If so, he could then transfer the camp; if not, he could withdraw to the camp and counterattack his enemy. He did not accept the idea and ordered his men to move out from their positions. They did this, moving to a new place some two farsakhs (twelve km) away. When they reached the place where al-Ḥusayn wanted to set up camp, he gave orders for people to dismount.

The Turks had spies in al-Ḥusayn's camp, and they went and informed them of the latter's journey and how the loyalist army found their (new) encampment crowded. The Turks charged al-Ḥusayn's force while people were still unloading their baggage. The army was stirred to action, and the call went out, "To arms!" They arrayed their troops and fought back as both parties suffered casualties. Al-Ḥusayn's troops then attacked the Turks, inflicting an ignominious defeat on the latter, slaughtering a great number of them while many others drowned in the Euphrates. The Turks, however, had also positioned a party of ambushers. With the battle joined, they emerged, attacking the rest of the loyalist camp. The latter found no refuge except the Euphrates. Many of al-Ḥusayn's men were thus drowned, a number were killed, and some of the infantry were taken [1608] prisoner. As for the cavalry, they beat a hasty retreat on their mounts, paying attention to nothing else. None responded to the 166. The text does not specify which Jumādā. But since the events seem to lead into Jumādā II, we assume here that it was Jumādā I.

167. The Karkhāyā Canal was on the West Side of Baghdad, and still within the city area. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 52–56.

168. The distance to Muḥawwal is some six kilometers northwest of Baghdad. See n. 154, above.

commanders who pleaded and called upon them to return. Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ and Rashīd, however, fought valiantly that day. Those who retreated withdrew all the way to the Yāsiriyyah Gate of Baghdad. When the commanders could not control their men any longer they, too, retreated behind them, protecting their rear lest they be followed. As a result, the Turks appropriated all of al-Ḥusayn's camp, including the tents, the household possessions of the troops and the wares of the merchants. Al-Ḥusayn also had with him weapons that had been stored aboard vessels. These were safe, however, for the sailors guarded their vessels, thus saving the weapons and the merchant's wares they were carrying.

Ibn Zanbūr, the secretary of al-Ḥusayn (reported the following). Seized from al-Ḥusayn were twelve chests containing garments, eight thousand dīnārs belonging to the central authorities, about four thousand dīnārs of his own, and a hundred mules. Al-Ḥusayn's (own) recruits looted his tents and those of his troops and then fled, arriving at al-Yāsiriyyah. Most of the looting, however, had taken place among the men of Abū al-Sanā. As for al-Ḥusayn, he and those who fled arrived at al-Yāsiriyyah on Tuesday, the sixth of Jumādā II[169] (July 5, 865). One of the merchants, from among those who had lost their possessions in al-Ḥusayn's camp, met him along with [1609] a group of them and said, "Praise the God Who cheers you. It took you twelve days to get where you wanted, but only one to retreat all the way back." Al-Ḥusayn paid no attention to him, however.

(According to) Abū Jaʿfar, what follows is drawn from the reports that reached us about al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl and his commanders and troops, who were dispatched in this year by Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. They were dispatched from Baghdad to fight the Turks and the Maghāribah who had come to al-Anbār and the adjacent district. When al-Ḥusayn reached al-Yāsiriyyah, after having retreated from Dimimmā in defeat, he stayed at Bustān Ibn al-Ḥarūrī. The others who came back in defeat stayed on the western side of al-Yāsiriyyah and were not allowed to cross over. It was announced in Baghdad that those troops of al-Ḥusayn's army (who were) currently in the city were to join his camp (at al-Yāsiriyyah). They were given three days to do so; anyone found in Baghdad after three days would be administered three hundred lashes and his name would be erased from the military roll. At this, the people left. On the same night in which al-Ḥusayn arrived, Khālid b. ʿImrān was given orders to encamp with his men at al-Muḥawwal. That night he gave his men their allotments while they sat mounted. It was also announced among Khālid's men, who were then in al-Muḥawwal, to join him there. Similarly, the old recruits, who were conscripted by Abū al-Ḥusayn Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar in al-Kūfah—they amounted to some five hundred men—were called into service together with Khālid's troops, about one thousand men. They encamped at al-Muḥawwal [1610] on Tuesday, the fourth of Jumādā II (July 3, 865).[170]

169. The sixth of Jumādā II was not a Tuesday but, rather, a Thursday. Better read Jumādā I, which would then be June 5, 865.

The morning following the night of al-Ḥusayn's arrival, Ibn Ṭāhir gave orders to al-Shāh b. Mīkāl to meet al-Ḥusayn and refuse him entry to Baghdad. He met him en route (to the city) and sent him back to Bustān Ibn al-Ḥarūrī, where they (al-Ḥusayn and his retinue) stayed that day. When night fell they came to the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir. The latter chastized al-Ḥusayn and ordered him to go back to al-Yāsiriyyah and then march to al-Anbār together with any soldiers who would do so. That same night, al-Ḥusayn returned to al-Yāsiriyyah and ordered that one month's salary be given to the families of this army. Nine thousand dīnārs were brought, and the clerks handling the payroll and the muster roll came to al-Yāsiriyyah to muster the troops and hand them their pay.

When Friday, the seventh of Jumādā II (July 6, 865), came around, Khālid b. ʿImrān went up to the masonry bridge of Bihlāyā, which is the site of the dam (sikr). At the same time, some twenty vessels set sail and ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh, Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl, and al-Ḥusayn b. Makhlad rode off to the camp of al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl in al-Yāsiriyyah. There, they read to al-Ḥusayn and the commanders a letter written by al-Mustaʿīn. In it, al-Mustaʿīn informed them of their offensive disobedience, their mutiny and their dissent. It was read to them while the army stood by and the muster officers were lining them up to find out who had been killed and who had drowned from each command. After that, they were called to join [1611] their units. Marching out, they received a dispatch from some of their informants at al-Anbār that the Turks suffered more than two hundred dead, and around four hundred wounded. All the prisoners that the Turks took from the Baghdadis, including regular troops and infantry recruits were 220 persons. The heads of the (loyalist) dead were counted and found to be seventy heads. They had taken along some of the market people who cried out to Abū Naṣr, "We are the people of the market." He asked, "And why was it that you were with them?" To which they answered, "We were compelled, and thus we went along to ply our trade or. . . ."[171] Those of them who looked like market people were set free, while the prisoners were jailed at al-Qaṭī'ah. The officer in charge of the government mules was reported to have said that all the government mules that were lost amounted to 120 animals.

170. The text reads Jumādā, but it should be emended to read "fourth of Jumādā II".

Al-Ḥusayn departed on Monday, the seventeenth of Jumādā II (July 16, 865), and wrote to Khālid b. 'Imrān, who was positioned at the dam, to march before him. But Khālid refused to do so and indicated that he would not leave his position until an officer with a huge army replaced him, for he feared that the Turks operating from their camp in the region of Qaṭrabbul might come up behind his army. Ibn Ṭāhir ordered that money be sent to al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl to pay each of his troops one month's salary. The money was to be distributed at Dimimmā. He also ordered that clerks and muster of-[1612] ficers accompany the shipment sent there. Al-Faḍl b. Muẓaffar al-Saba'ī was in charge of military expenditures and also the payroll, which was to draw upon the bureau of taxation for funding. The money was brought by al-Saba'ī to al-Ḥusayn's camp so that the former could march along with him when he moved on.

It was said that al-Ḥusayn departed for al-Anbār at midnight on Wednesday, the nineteenth of Jumādā II (July 18, 865). The call went out for his men to join up with him, and his army followed him during the day on Wednesday.[172] Al-Ḥusayn marched until reaching Dimimmā where he wanted to build a pontoon bridge over the Aniq Canal[173] to cross the waterway, but the Turks resisted him. A contingent of his infantry crossed over and fought the Turks until they

171. The exact meaning of sūqī and sawaqah is uncertain. Lane, Lexicon, I, 1472, col. 2, argues that it means subjects of a king, because he drives them. But here it seems to mean people who make their livelihood by roaming around in the sūq with whatever commodity they are selling.

172. The Muslim day begins at night fall. See Bīrūnī, Chronology, 5. So midnight of Wednesday is midnight Tuesday of the civil day.

173. This story, almost verbatim, was attributed to Khālid b. 'Imrān, p. 1606 of the Leiden edition. Ṭabarī seems to be confusing both events.

dispersed them, whereupon Khālid[174] built the bridge allowing his men to cross the waterway. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh then sent him a message of congratulations with his secretary Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā, who was said to have brought along necklaces and bracelets. Muḥammad then returned to his residence. On Saturday, the eighth of Rajab (August 5, 865),[175] a man came to al-Ḥusayn and told him that the Turks had been guided to several spots on the Euphrates which could be forded in an effort to reach his camp. He ordered that the informant be given two hundred lashes, and ordered one of his officers called al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Armanī together with one hundred infantry and one hundred cavalry to guard the crossing points. When the Turkish vanguard appeared, carrying fourteen banners, he charged them, and his men engaged them for an hour. He [1613] charged Abū al-Sanā with guarding the bridge (qanṭarah)[176] and instructed him to prohibit anyone fleeing from crossing it. When the Turks came up to the crossing and found it guarded, they left and moved on to another one behind it. But they were fought by al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī who persevered in battle. When al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl was informed of that, he marched in that direction, but he did not reach Ibn ʿAlī before the latter was routed together with Khālid b. ʿImrān, and their men. At the bridge Abū al-Sanā would not let them cross, and the infantry and Khurāsānīs turned back throwing themselves into the Euphrates. Those who could not swim drowned; but those who could swim escaped, crossing without their clothes, to an island from which one could not reach the shore because there were Turks along the shore.

Some of al-Ḥusayn's troops (reported that) when al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī al-Armanī sent word to al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl informing him that the Turks had reached the crossing, the messenger was told, "The commander is asleep." So he returned and reported that. Then a second messenger was sent, but he was told by the guard, "The commander is at the privy." And he went back and reported that. A third messenger reported back, "He came out of the privy but he went back to 174. The text has Khālid where it should read al-Ḥusayn. Note, this is the same account as the one given on p. 1606 of the Leiden edition.

175. Saturday was the seventh of Rajab, 251. One should read either Sunday or the seventh of Rajab.

176. The reference here seem to be to a masonry bridge (qanṭarah) and not to a pontoon bridge (jisr). See Lane, Lexicon, I, 424, col. 3.

sleep." When morning came and the Turks attacked, al-Ḥusayn sat himself in a skiff (zawraq) or river vessel and sailed downstream. A group of Khurāsānīs were taken prisoner; they cast aside their clothes and weapons and sat naked on the shore. Those who bore the Turkish banners pressed on until they hoisted their flags at al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl's tent and cut off the marketplace. Most of the [1614] vessels sailed downstream and were safe except for those that were put under guard.[177] The Turks pursued al-Ḥusayn's followers and put them to the sword. They killed or captured some two hundred men, while a great number drowned. Al-Ḥusayn together with the defeated army reached Baghdad by midnight. The rest of those fleeing arrived during the day; among them were several wounded. They kept on arriving, naked and wounded, until midday. Among the lost commanders of al-Ḥusayn was Ibn Yūsuf al-Barm. But a letter came later reporting that he was being held prisoner by the Turks at the camp of Mufliḥ, and that the number of prisoners from al-Ḥusayn's second battle exceeded 170 men. There were a hundred dead, and two thousand pack animals and two hundred mules were lost. The value of the clothes, and weapons and other things lost was more than one hundred thousand dinārs. Al-Hindawānī recited in reference to al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl:

O You, most firm in staying behind
From battle. You've mixed serenity with sorrow.

When you saw the drawn swords of the Turks, you knew what destinies these swords were bringing.

You stayed secluded in shame and disgrace, success is always lost between impotence and distress.

In Jumādā II, 251 (June 30–July 28, 865), a group of people from Baghdad joined al-Muʿtazz, including some of the secretaries and members of the Banū Hāshim. Joining al-Muʿtazz from among the [1615] generals was Muzāḥim b. Khāqān Urṭūj, and from among the secretaries were ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm b. Nūḥ, Yaʿqūb b. Isḥāq, Namārī, Yaʿqūb b. Ṣāliḥ b. Murshid, Muqlah, and a son of Abū Muzāḥim b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān. The Hashimites included ʿAlī and Muḥammad the sons of 177. That is, they were told not to move.

al-Wāthiq, Muḥammad b. Hārūn b. ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, one of the sons of ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. ʿAlī.

In this year, there was a battle in which Muḥammad b. Khālid b. Yazīd and Aḥmad al-Muwallad faced Ayyūb b. Aḥmad at Sukayr[178] in the territory of Banū Taghlib. A great number of men from the two factions were killed. Muḥammad b. Khālid fled, leaving his possessions to be looted by the others. Ayyūb destroyed the dwellings of the family of Hārūn b. Maʿmar and killed every man of theirs that he captured.

In (this year), Balkājūr conducted a raid of conquest which reportedly uncovered a cache containing a great deal of booty. He captured a number of the heathen soldiers (aʿlāj), and the news was brought to al-Mustaʿīn through a letter dated Wednesday, the twenty-sixth of Rabīʿ II, 251 (May 27, 865).[179]

On Saturday, the twenty-second of Rajab, 251 (August 19, 865), a battle took place in which Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ and Ismāʿīl b. Farāshah faced Juʿlān al-Turkī. The battle occurred in the districts of Bādurāyā and Bākusāyā.[180] Ibn Rajāʾ and Ibn Farāshah defeated Juʿlān and killed or captured several of his men.

In Rajab, 251 (July 29–August 27, 865), a battle reportedly took [1616] place between Dīwdād Abū al-Sāj and Bāyakbāk in the district of Jarjarāyā.[181] In this battle Abū al-Sāj killed Bāyakbāk together with a number of his men and captured some others. Still others drowned in the Nahrawān.

In the middle of Rajab, 251 (August 12, 865), the ʿAbbāsids of the Banū Hāshim, who were in Baghdad, gathered together and went to the island opposite the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. They called for al-Mustaʿīn and cursed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, using ugly words. They also said, "We have been denied our stipends, while you pay money to others to whom it is not due. We shall die shrunken from starvation. Unless you pay our due we will go to the 178. That is, in the Jazīrah area, near the Byzantine borders. See Le Strange, Lands, 97–98, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 231, II, 334–335.

179. That day was not Wednesday but, rather, Sunday. Was it possibly the third day of Rabīʿ I, which was indeed a Wednesday, and hence April 4, 865 ?

180. These districts are to the northeast of Baghdad. See n. 145, above, and Le Strange, Lands, 63.

181. That is southeast of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 37. Note these military activities are conducted without involving the ruling family, a sign of their lack of control.

gates and open them to the Turks, and no one in Baghdad would oppose us." Al-Shāh b. Mīkāl crossed over and spoke gently with them. He asked that three of them accompany him to the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir. They rejected that and refused to do anything except cry out against and curse Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. Al-Shāh took leave of them, and they persisted in this behavior until night approached. Then they departed, but they gathered again the very next day. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh sent orders to them to appear at his palace on Monday so that he could appoint someone to look into their claims (yunāẓiruhum). When they came to the palace, Muḥammad b. Dāwūd al-Ṭūsī was ordered to negotiate with them. He gave them one month's payment with an order to accept it and not bother the Caliph anymore. They, on the other hand, refused to accept one month's payment and left.

[1617] In this year a Ṭālibid called al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad b. Ḥamzah b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib rebelled in al-Kūfah. He sought the caliphate for one of the Ṭālibids, a man called Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. al-Ḥusayn b. Jaʿfar b. al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥasan. His patronymic was Abū Aḥmad. Al-Mustaʿīn sent Muzāḥim b. Khāqān Urṭūj against him. The ʿAlid was in the environs of al-Kūfah at the head of three hundred men from the Banū Asad, and three hundred men of the Jārūdiyyah and the Zaydiyyah;[182] most of them were wool manufacturers. The governor of al-Kūfah at that time was Aḥmad b. Naṣr b. Malik al-Khuzāʿī. The ʿAlid killed eleven of Ibn Naṣr's men, four of them troops in the city. Aḥmad b. Naṣr fled to Qaṣr Hubayrah and met with Hishām b. Abī Dulaf who was in charge of some of the hinterland and surroundings of al-Kūfah. When Muzāḥim reached the village of Shāhī, he received orders to position himself there until someone was sent to persuade the ʿAlid to return to the fold. He (Hishām) then sent Dāwūd b. al-Qāsim al-Jaʿfarī along with some money. The latter headed towards the rebel; but Dāwūd and his message were slow in coming to Mu-[1618] zāḥim, and the latter had already marched off against al-Kūfah from the villgae of Shāhī. He entered the city, seeking the ʿAlid who had, in turn, fled. Whereupon, Muzāḥim sent an officer to pursue the rebel. He wrote of his conquest of al-Kūfah, sending the dispatch in a feathered mail pouch.

182. For more information on these Shīʿite groups, see Nawbakhtī, Firaq, 19, 49–51, and Shahrastānī, Milal, 207–214.

It was reported that the people of al-Kūfah urged the ʿAlid to fight Muzāḥim when the latter came up against him, and they promised him victory. The ʿAlid went out on the west side of the Euphrates, whereupon Muzāḥim dispatched one of his commanders on the east side with orders to march until he crossed the Kūfah Bridge. Then he was to return. The officer went to execute his orders while Muzāḥim ordered some troops who remained with him to ford the river at the crossing point of the Euphrates at the village of Shāhī. They were then to advance and engage the Kūfans in combat when they were arrayed directly in front of them. Thus they marched with Muzāḥim, who crossed the Euphrates leaving his baggage and the rest of his men. When the Kūfans saw them, they attacked. But Muzāḥim's commander reached them and attacked the rear while Muzāḥim (himself) was in front of the Kūfans. The government force overwhelmed the Kūfans, and not one of them escaped.

Ibn al-Kurdiyyah (reported that) thirteen of Muzāḥim's men were killed before he entered al-Kūfah. Among the Zaydī, the wool manufacturers, seventeen were killed. The bedouins lost three hundred men. When Muzāḥim entered al-Kūfah stones were thrown at him. He responded by hurling fire on both sides of al-Kūfah, burning seven marketplaces, until the fire reached al-Sabīʿ.[183] He also attacked the house where the ʿAlid was staying, but the latter had fled. Later he was brought back and killed. In that battle only one ʿAlid (supporter) was killed, while all the ʿAlid (supporters) who were in al-Kūfah were reportedly imprisoned, as were the Banū Hāshim; the [1619] ʿAlid (himself) was one of them.

Abū Ismāʿīl al-ʿAlawī (told that) Muzāḥim reportedly burned a thousand dwellings in al-Kūfah and manhandled the ʿAlid's daughters. It was also reported that he took the servant girls of the ʿAlid, including a free woman who was in his charge. He set her up by the mosque door and auctioned her off.

In the middle of Rajab, 251 (August 12, 865), Muzāḥim received a letter sent by al-Muʿtazz in which the latter ordered him to join his side and promised him whatever he desired. Muzāḥim read the letter to his followers. The Turks, the Farāghinah and the Maghāribah responded positively, while the Shākiriyyah refused to go along. He marched on with those who obeyed him—some four hundred men. Abū Nūḥ had already preceded him to Sāmarrā, as the letter indicated. Muzāḥim had been waiting for word of al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, and when the latter was routed Muzāḥim marched off to Sāmarrā. With the conquest of al-Kūfah, al-Mustaʿīn sent Muzāḥim ten thousand dīnārs, five cloaks of honor, and a sword. As the (Caliph's) emissary was heading towards Muzāḥim, he met the latter's troops along the road. They returned everything to the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and reported to him about Muzāḥim. The troops and the Shākiriyyah were commanded by a lieutenant of al-Ḥusayn b. Yazīd al-Ḥarrānī, Hishām b. Abī Dulaf, and al-Ḥārith, the lieutenant of Abū al-Sāj. Ibn Ṭāhir ordered that each of them be given three cloaks of honor.

183. A district of al-Kūfah named after the tribe Sabīʿ. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 187.

[1620] It was also reported that this ʿAlid had risen in rebellion at Nīnawā at the end of Jumādā II, 251 (July 28, 865). A group of bedouins—some of whom had rebelled in support of Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar in 250 (864)—joined him. Hishām b. Abī Dulaf had come to that region, and the ʿAlid attacked him with some fifty men. The latter was defeated and several of his followers were killed; twenty men were captured together with a young boy (ghulām). The ʿAlid then fled to al-Kūfah and hid there. Later on he reappeared.

The prisoners and the heads (of the dead) were taken to Baghdad. Five of the men were identified; they had served with Abū al-Ḥusayn Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar, (were captured at that time) and (were) then set free. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh had ordered that anyone who had been set free and then returned (to rebellion) should be administered five hundred lashes.[184] They were beaten on the last day of Jumādā II (July 28, 865).

It was also reported that when the dispatches of Abū al-Sāj came with the news that he had defeated Bāyakbāk on the eighteenth of Rajab, 251 (August 15, 865), ten thousand dīnārs in aid were sent to him together with a gift of five cloaks of honor and a sword.

In this year, a battle reportedly took place between Mankajūr b.

184. It is not clear whether such an order was supposed to dissuade people from rejoining the battle once they had been freed, or whether aṭlaqa here means "to single out."

Ḥandarūs (?) and a group of Turks at the Madā'in Gate. In this battle Mankajūr defeated the Turks, killing several of them.

Also in 251, Balkājūr led a summer campaign in which he [1621] reportedly conquered some territory.

A battle between Yaḥyā b. Harthamah and Abū al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh took place this year. Several men from both sides were killed and Abū al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh was defeated.

On Thursday,[185] the twelfth of Sha'bān (September 8, 865), a battle took place at the Baghwārayā Gate between the Turks and the followers of Ibn Ṭāhir. The occasion for that was as follows. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ḥātim and the commander known as al-Nasawī were in charge of the Baghwārayā Gate at the head of some three hundred infantry and cavalry. A large contingent of Turks and Maghāribah came forward, pierced the wall in two places, and entered through the breaches. Al-Nasawī gave combat, but they routed him and reached the Anbār Gate, which was defended by Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab, Ibn Abī Khālid, and Ibn Asad b. Dāwūd Siyāh, who were unaware of the Turks' entry through the Baghwārayā Gate. They fought furiously against the Turks, and a number of men were killed on both sides. Then those Baghdadis who were at the Anbār Gate fled, paying attention to nothing else. The Turks and Maghāribah attacked the Anbār Gate with fire, and it was set aflame, as were the mangonels and ballistas situated there. They now entered Baghdad, reaching the Iron Gate and the Rahīnah Cemetery.[186] From the direction of the Shāri' quarter[187] they reached the street of the waterwheel workers,[188] burning everything in that vicinity before and after them. They hoisted their flags on the shops of that neigh- [1622] borhood, and the people fled leaving no one to face them. That took place at the time of the morning prayer.

Ibn Ṭāhir sent for the commanders and then rode out armed. He stopped at the gate of Darb Ṣāliḥ al-Miskīn,[189] where the com-

185. Read Saturday.

186. They seem to have entered the Ḥarbiyyah quarter of Baghdad itself. See Le Strange, Baghdad, map facing p. 107; for Rahīnah, see Lassner, Topography, 71.

187. That is, just north of the Round City, ibid.

188. The text is mawḍi' aṣḥāb al-dawālīb. For dwellings of such professionals, see Lassner, Topography, 102.

189. Ṣāliḥ al-Miskīn owned property on both sides of Baghdad. See Lassner, Topography, 70, 82, and Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 249.

manders assembled to meet him. He dispatched them to the Anbār Gate, the Baghwārayā Gate and all the gates of the West Side. He massed men at these gates, while Bughā and Waṣīf rode out as well. Bughā with his men and his sons headed for the Baghwārayā Gate, while al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, ʿAbbās b. Qārin, and al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, together with the rabble, went to the Anbār Gate. They met the Turks inside the gate, where al-ʿAbbās b. Ḥāzin charged them at once and reportedly killed a group of them on the spot. He then had their heads sent to Ibn Ṭāhir's door. The people of Baghdad overwhelmed the invaders at these gates and pushed them back, forcing them out of the gateways after a group of them had been killed. Bughā al-Sharābī set out for the Baghwārayā Gate at the head of a large force. He caught the enemy by surprise, killing a large number of them as the rest fled. The Turks exited through the gate, but Bughā kept fighting them until late afternoon. Following their defeat the Turks withdrew. Bughā appointed someone to take charge of the gate, and then went to the Anbār Gate. He also directed that burnt bricks and gypsum be brought to block up the structure.[190] On this day, there was also a fierce battle at the Shammāsiyyah [1623] Gate. It was reported that many were killed from both factions, and others were wounded. The one who fought the Turks that day was reportedly Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb Qūṣarrah.

In this year, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh gave orders to al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal to set up camp at the al-Yāsiriyyah, and he did. Later, he shifted to al-Kunāsah[191] where he was met by Balfardal, Ibn Mkẖwnfẖl[192] al-Ushrūsanī. Orders went out for recruits to join the latter, and some Shākiriyyah and others were subsequently attached to his command. It was also decreed that he join al-Muẓaffar and encamp at al-Kunāsah as part of a joint command securing that region. They both remained there for a while; then Balfardal ordered al-Muẓaffar to move out and obtain information about the Turks, in order to use this information to devise a strategy for dealing with them. Al-Muẓaffar refused, claiming that the commanding officer

190. It is not clear whether the gate itself was blocked or the bricks were used to block the breach in the wall.

191. If al-Kunāsah is the quarter in al-Kūfah, as in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 481, then he moved the camp site quite some distance and from the northwest of Baghdad to the south.

192. Both names, Balfardal and Ibn Mkẖwnfẖl, are uncertain.

gave no orders to that effect. Each of them then wrote, complaining about the other. Al-Muẓaffar sent word asking to be excused from his position at al-Kunāsah, claiming that he was not fit for combat. He was excused and ordered to depart and to remain confined to his house. Balfardal was given command of that army, both the reserves (nā'ibah) and the regular forces (athbāt). Al-Muẓaffar's regulars were also attached to his command as he took charge of the whole area.

In the month of Ramaḍān 251 (September 26–October 25, 865), Hishām b. Abī Dulaf encountered the rebellious ʿAlid at Nīnawā. The latter was accompanied by a man of the Banū Asad. The two forces clashed, and about forty followers of the ʿAlid were reportedly killed. After the factions parted the ʿAlid entered al-Kūfah, whose [1624] inhabitants swore allegiance to al-Muʿtazz, while Hishām b. Abī Dulaf entered Baghdad.

Also in Ramaḍān, a battle took place in the vicinity of Jarjarāyā between Abū al-Sāj and the Turks. Abū al-Sāj routed them, killing a great number of Turks and capturing others.

On the day before the end of Ramaḍān, 251 (October 24, 865), Balfardal was killed. The circumstances of his death were as follows. When Abū Naṣr b. Bughā conquered al-Anbār and the adjacent area, forcing the armies of Ibn Ṭāhir to retreat from there, he dispatched his cavalry and infantry to the outskirts of West Baghdad. He then marched to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah which was held by Najūbah b. Qays for Ibn Ṭāhir, but the latter fled the city without giving fight. Abū Naṣr went on to the Sarsar Canal.[193] News of him reached Ibn Ṭāhir together with news of Abū al-Sāj's battle against the Turks in Jarjarāyā and the latter's disappointment with his recruits during the adverse conditions. Ibn Ṭāhir then selected Balfardal to march with his troops and join forces with Abū al-Sāj. Balfardal and his men moved out on Tuesday morning, the twenty-eighth of Ramaḍān (October 23, 865). He marched the whole day, and as morning broke he reached al-Madā'in at the same time as the Turks and others who were attached to their command. The commanders and men of Ibn Ṭāhir were stationed in al-Madā'in. The Turks engaged the loyalists in combat, and the latter were routed. The commander who had been in the city then joined Abū al-Sāj. Meanwhile, 193. One of the major canals connecting the Euphrates with the Tigris. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 49.

Balfardal had engaged the Turks in furious combat; when he saw [1625] that Ibn Ṭāhir's men had been routed in the city, he and his troops headed towards Abū al-Sāj, but he was overtaken and killed.

Ibn al-Qawārīrī, who was one of the commanders, reported the following. I was in charge of the Baghdad Gate[194] together with Abū al-Ḥusayn. Mankajūr, himself, was in charge of the Sābāṭ Gate. There was a gap in the wall of al-Madā'in close to his gate. I asked Mankajūr to block it up, but he refused. The Turks then entered the city through it and dispersed his followers. Ibn al-Qawārīrī continued. I remained behind with some ten men when Balfardal himself arrived together with his troops. The latter said, "I am the field commander. I am a cavalryman, and I have cavalry with me. We shall march along the river banks,[195] while the infantry proceeds aboard the vessels." He resisted (the enemy) a while and then left seeking Abū al-Sāj, or the area where he was situated, leaving his troops aboard the vessels on their own. After his departure, I held my position for a while, dressed with ornaments and mounted on a blond horse. Then I rode it into a canal where it stumbled and threw me, and they made for me saying, "The master of the blond horse." I emerged from the canal on foot, and, having cast off my ornaments, I escaped. Ibn Ṭāhir was angered by Ibn al-Qawārīrī and his men, and he ordered them to confine themselves to their residences. Balfardal drowned.

On the fourth of Shawwāl, 251 (October 29, 865), Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir reportedly gathered all of his commanders, (those) who were in charge of the Baghdad gates and others. He consulted with all of them on the state of affairs and told them of the retreating armies that had come to them. Each of them responded to Ibn Ṭāhir's desires by expressing his readiness to sacrifice himself [1626] and his possessions. He rewarded them handsomely and brought them in to al-Mustaʿīn, telling the latter of his negotiations with them and their favorable response to him. Al-Mustaʿīn said to them, "Commanders! I swear to you by God, if, indeed, I fight for myself and my authority, I fight only for your victory [dawlah] and for your subjects [ʿāmmatikum], and that God might bring you full circle,

194. That is, the Baghdad Gate at al-Madā'in.
195. Probably along the Tigris, going north to Baghdad.

back to the status you enjoyed before the arrival of the Turks and their like.[196] It is incumbent upon you to be sincere in your advice and persistent in your fight with these profligates." They responded in the most positive manner, and he rewarded them handsomely. Ibn Ṭāhir then ordered them to leave for their command posts, and they did so.

On a Monday in Dhū al-Qa'dah, 251 (November 24–December 23, 865), The Baghdadis engaged in a great battle in which they defeated the Turks and looted their camp. The circumstances were as follows. The gates were opened on both sides of the city. Mangonels and ballistas were set up at all the gates and in the river vessels in the Tigris. The entire army then came out of the city. Ibn Ṭāhir, Bughā and Waṣīf rode out when both factions were on the march, and the battle was engaged as far as the Gate of the Fief (of Umm Ja'far).[197] The three of them then crossed over to the Shammāsiyyah Gate, and Ibn Ṭāhir sat under a canopy that was erected for him. Archers with nāwakī bows moved out from Baghdad in skiffs. At times a single arrow went through several men, killing all of them. The Turks were routed, and the Baghdadis pursued them all the way to their camp, where they plundered their market. The loyalists set aflame one of the Turkish boats, known as The Iron One (al-Ḥadīdī); it had inflicted much damage on the people of Baghdad. Those who were in it drowned. In addition they took two of their [1627] river boats as the Turks fled, paying heed to nothing else. Every time a head was brought, Waṣīf and Bughā would say, "By God, the mawlās are broken."

The Baghdadis pursued them until Rūdhabār,[198] where Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil stood, and sent the mawlās back into the fight; he warned them that if they did not turn back, they would be totally routed and the enemy would pursue them all the way to Sāmarrā. As a result, they re-formed and returned to battle. The rabble began to sever the heads of the dead, for Muḥammad b. Abdallāh began to bestow necklaces and gifts to anyone bringing in a head.

196. Note the melodramatic plea of a powerless caliph in the face of his Turkish commanders.

197. That is, the northern entrance to Baghdad.

198. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 77, identifies this place simply as one of the villages of Baghdad, meaning in the Baghdad region. The exact location is hard to determine.

The practice became excessive, however, and the Turks and the mawlās who were under the command of Bughā and Waṣīf were visibly displeased. Then, as a southerly wind carried the dust and the smoke of the burning fires, the banners of al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn were brought forward together with the Turkish flags. At the head of the flags was a red standard that was stolen by one of Shāhak's slaves who forgot to lower it. When the Baghdadis saw the red standard and those behind it, they imagined that the Turks had returned to do combat, and fled. Some of those who stood their ground attempted to kill Shāhak's slave, who now realized what was happening and lowered the flag. The people were fleeing in confusion as the Turks fell back to their camp, not knowing that the Baghdadis were in retreat and that they could attack them.[199] Thus the two factions broke away from each other.

In that year, Abū al-Salāsil, Waṣīf's agent (wakīl) in the region of of al-Jabal, battled with the Maghāribah. The battle was engaged at [1628] the instigation of a Maghribī called Naṣr Salhab, who came at the head of a group of Maghāribah to some of the places which fell under the jurisdiction of Abū al-Sāj. He and his companions plundered the villages there. Abū al-Salāsil wrote to Abū al-Saj informing him of that, and the latter reportedly dispatched about a hundred infantry and cavalry. When they reached Abū al-Salāsil, they took these Maghāribah by surprise, killing nine of them and taking twenty prisoners; but Naṣr Salhab escaped at night.

After this engagement between the mawlās and Ibn Ṭāhir, the weapons of war were put aside and the battle was not renewed. The circumstances were reportedly as follows. Ibn Ṭāhir had already corresponded with al-Muʿtazz seeking peace before the battle. When this battle took place, he was criticized for it (by al-Muʿtazz), and word was sent to him in that regard. He responded that he would never again undertake anything that al-Muʿtazz would disapprove of. But the gates of Baghdad were closed shut after that, and the siege against them was intensified. On Friday, the first of Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 251 (November 24, 865), the populace cried out "Hunger!" and went to the island facing the palace of Ibn Ṭāhir. Ibn Ṭāhir sent word to them, "Send me five of your elders." And they complied. When the 199. The text is taḥammalū ʿalayhim; it should be read yaḥmilū as in the Leiden edition Glossary cciii.

elders were brought to him, he said, "There are certain things that the common people do not know. I am ailing, but I wish to give the soldiers their allotments and then lead them to fight your enemy." They were appeased and departed empty-handed. But the common people and the merchants later returned to the island facing the pal- [1629] ace of Ibn Ṭāhir, and they cried out complaining about the rise in prices and the hardships it caused them. Ibn Ṭāhir sent word to them and thus calmed them, promising (he would attend to their wishes) and, thereby, offering them hope. He also sent al-Mu'tazz an offer of peace as the affairs of the Baghdadis were thrown into disarray. Ḥammād b. Isḥāq b. Ḥammād b. Zayd arrived at Baghdad in the middle of Dhū al-Qa'dah, 251 (December 8, 865), and Abū Sa'īd al-Anṣārī was sent to Abū Aḥmad's camp as security (for Ḥammād's return). The latter met with Ibn Ṭāhir privately; there was no mention of what transpired between them. Ḥammād then went back to Abū Aḥmad's camp, and Abū Sa'īd al-Anṣārī returned. Later, Ḥammād returned to Ibn Ṭāhir, and many letters were exchanged between the latter and Abū Aḥmad through him.

On the twenty-first of Dhū al-Qa'dah (December 14, 865), Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl set out for Abū Aḥmad's camp together with Ḥammād and Aḥmad b. Isḥāq, the agent (wakīl) of 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā. They left with Ibn Ṭāhir's permission to negotiate peace with Abū Aḥmad.

On the twenty-third of Dhū al-Qa'dah (December 16, 865), Ibn Ṭāhir ordered the release of all those who had been taken prisoner in the battles between him and Abū Aḥmad, those who had supported the latter against him. On the morning of that day, a group of the regular infantry and many of the common people gathered. The troops demanded their allotments, and the people complained of the atrocious conditions which had been imposed upon them, owing to the rise in prices and the intensity of the siege. They said, "Go out and fight, or let us be." He promised them that he would either go out or open the door for peace. He gave them cause for hope, and they departed. But after that, on the twenty-fifth of Dhū al-Qa'dah [1630] (December 18, 865), he positioned a large number of troops at the prisons, bridges, the gates of his palace and at the island. Nevertheless, a large crowd came to the island and drove away those (troops) that Ibn Ṭāhir had brought there. Then they marched to the bridge from the East Side and liberated the women's prison, setting the detainees free. But they were stopped by 'Alī b. Jahshiyār and his men of the Ṭabariyyah at the men's prison. Abū Mālik who was in charge of the eastern bridge resisted them, and they fractured his skull. They also injured two of his men's pack animals. He went into his residence,[200] leaving them to loot what they could find in his audience room. The Ṭabariyyah attacked, forcing them to give way until a group of them were pushed beyond the doors, which were locked behind them. Later, Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn crossed over to them and guaranteed the troops four month's allotments, whereupon they departed. Ibn Ṭāhir then gave orders that Ibn Jahshiyār's men be given two months' salary that very day, and it was done.

During those days, Abū Aḥmad sent out five vessels laden with flour, wheat, barley, fodder and straw to Ibn Ṭāhir, and they arrived. On Thursday, the fourth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (December 27, 865), the populace learned how Ibn Ṭāhir had deposed al-Mustaʿīn and rendered the oath of allegiance to al-Muʿtazz. They also learned that he had sent his commanders to Abū Aḥmad to obtain the oath of allegiance to al-Muʿtazz. They were each given four cloaks of honor. The common people thought that peace had been achieved with al-Mustaʿīn's permission and that al-Muʿtazz was appointed as his heir apparent.

On Wednesday, Rashīd b. Kāwūs, who was in charge of the [1631] Salāmah Gate, left (the city) with a commander by the name of Nahshal b. Ṣakhr b. Khuzaymah b. Khāzim and with ʿAbdallāh b. Maḥmūd. He sent word to the Turks that he is on his way to join them. About one thousand Turkish cavalry came to him, and he went out to them intending to greet them with the understanding that peace had been concluded. He greeted them, embracing those that he knew and they, in turn, took the reins of his mount and led him and his son behind him. On Monday, Rashīd went to the Shammāsiyyah Gate and said to the people, "The Commander of the Faithful and Abū Aḥmad send you their greetings. Their message to you is, whoever obeys us, we will promote him and reward him. Anyone who does not, will learn his lesson." The populace responded by cursing him. Following that, he circumambulated all the gates of the East Side and repeated his offer; at each gate he was cursed as was al-Muʿtazz. When Rashīd did that, the people knew what Ibn Ṭāhir had been up to and went to the island facing his palace. They screamed at him and cursed him in the ugliest terms. Then they went to his door and did the same. Rāghib al-Khādim came out to them and urged them to continue what they were doing in their support of al-Mustaʿīn. But, following that, he went to the army barracks and brought along the troops and another group; altogether there were some three hundred armed men. They marched to Ibn Ṭāhir's door, dispersed those who were there and pushed them back. They kept on fighting the populace until they pushed them into the (open) corridor (dihlīz) of the palace.[201] They attempted to burn the entrance gate but could not find fire. Instead, they spent the whole night at the island cursing and reviling him.

200. For the residence of ʿAlī b. Jahshiyār on the East Side of Baghdad, see Lassner, Topography, 78.

Ibn Shujāʿ al-Balkhī (reported the following). I was with the amīr. [1632] While talking to me he heard everyone's curse against him. When they mentioned the name of his mother, he laughed and said, "Abū ʿAbdallāh! I can't figure out how they came to know the name of my mother, since it was not known to many of the slave girls of Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir." I then responded, "O amīr, I have never seen anyone with more forebearance than you." He then said to me, "O Abū ʿAbdallāh! I do not see anything better than being patient with them; besides, I have no alternative." When they awoke, the populace came to the door and cried out. Ibn Ṭāhir went to al-Mustaʿīn and asked him to go out and calm them and tell them of his condition. He appeared above the gate clad in the Prophet's cloak (burdah) and the lance ṭawīlah,[202] with Ibn Ṭāhir at his side. He swore to them invoking God's name, "I do not accuse him. I am indeed well and suffering no distress on his account." He also indicated that he was not deposed, and promised that he would come out the next morning and lead them in the Friday prayers while making his appearance. Most of them departed; several had already been killed. On Friday morning, the people arose early screaming for al-Mustaʿīn and then looted the pack animals of ʿAlī b. Jahshiyār, which were at the ruins by the Bridge Gate on the East Side. As ʿAlī

201. The exact architectural meaning is uncertain. According to Lisān, V, 349, it is any space between the outer door and the inner house. All sources agree, however, that it is a Persian word. See Shir, Loan-Words, 68, where it is translated as vestibule (qanṭarah).

202. The reference is to the ḥarbah. See n. 7, above.

fled, they took everything they could find in his residence and continued to behave in this fashion well into the day. Then Waṣīf, Bughā, their children, mawlās, officers and the maternal uncles of al-Mustaʿīn arrived. The entire populace then went to the door of (Ibn Ṭāhir's) palace. Waṣīf, Bughā and their retainers entered to-[1633] gether with al-Mustaʿīn's uncles, reaching the (open) corridor where they remained mounted.

Ibn Ṭāhir was told about the uncles, and gave them permission to dismount, but they refused, saying, "We will not dismount this day until we and the populace know the truth of the matter." Although messengers were continuously sent to them, they still refused. Finally, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh himself emerged, and asked them to dismount and go in to see al-Mustaʿīn. They informed him, "The common people became agitated because of the news that reached them. They have been able to verify your deposition of al-Mustaʿīn, and your swearing of allegiance to al-Muʿtazz. They have also verified your having sent the commanders to swear allegiance to al-Muʿtazz, as well as your intention to use intimidation in order to turn the rule over to him and allow the Turks and the Maghāribah to enter Baghdad. They know you would allow the latter to deal with them in the same fashion as they dealt with those who rebelled against them in al-Madāʾin and the villages. The people of Baghdad are suspicious of you, and they accuse you of being against the Caliph and unmindful of their possessions, their children and themselves. They have asked for the Caliph to come out to them, in order that they see him and refute the news reaching them about him." When Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh confirmed the truth of their remarks and saw for himself the size of the mob that had gathered and its agitated state, he asked al-Mustaʿīn to go out to them. The Caliph then left for the Public Audience Hall. A chair was set aside for him there, and a group from the populace entered and looked at him. Then they left to tell those behind them that he was in good condition. But they were not convinced of this. When he realized that they would not be calmed without his going out to them—he had [1634] known of the large crowd—he ordered the exterior iron gate locked. This was done.

Following that, al-Mustaʿīn, his paternal uncles, Muammad b. Mūsā al-Munajjim, and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh all ascended the stairs that lead to the roofs of the Public Audience Hall and the arsenals. Ladders were then set up for them against the roof of the audience hall where Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and al-Fath b. Sahl held sessions. (From there) al-Mustaʿīn appeared to the people. He was wearing a black garment covered by the Prophet's cloak and he carried the scepter (al-qaḍīb).[203] He spoke to the people and pleaded with them, asking them, for the sake of the cloak's (original) owner, to leave, for he (that is, al-Mustaʿīn) was safe and sound and was not under any distress on account of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. They asked him to ride out with them away from the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, as they were not certain of his safety. He informed them that he was about to transfer to the residence of his maternal aunt Umm Ḥabīb, the daughter of al-Rashīd, and that he would leave after his quarters were prepared and after plans to move the treasury, the arsenals and all his belongings from the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh were completed. Most of the people departed, and the Baghdadis calmed down.

When the populace of Baghdad continued to behave as they did, gathering time after time and addressing Ibn Ṭāhir in vituperative language, he sent word to the men of the city police to requisition every camel, mule and donkey that they could lay hold of so he could use them for moving. They say that he wanted to make for al-Madā'in, but a group of notables (mashāyikh) from al-Ḥarbiyyah[204] and the suburbs all gathered at his door to apologize to him and to ask him to forgive them their offenses. They pointed out that those [1635] deeds were committed by the rabble and the riffraff on account of the grievous conditions they had to contend with and the poverty that had afflicted them. According to reports, he responded in a beautiful way, speaking kindly to them, forgiving them, and then praising them. He ordered them to approach their youth and their riffraff and to restrain them, and he agreed to set aside his departure. He then wrote to the city police to stop requisitioning the animals.

In the early days of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (December 24, 865–January 21, 866), al-Mustaʿīn moved from the palace of Muḥammad b.

203. Simply as a symbol of authority. See Qalqashandī, Ṣubḥ, III, 468.

204. For this quarter of Baghdad, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 122–135, and Lassner, Topography.

ʿAbdallāh, and he rode to the residence of Rizq al-Khādim in al-Ruṣāfah.[205] On his way, he passed by the palace of ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaṣim, who came out and asked him to stay. Instead, al-Mustaʿīn asked ʿAlī to ride along. When he reached the house of Rizq al-Khādim, he took up residence there. He reportedly arrived in the evening, and at that time ordered ten dīnārs for each horseman and five for each footman. Ibn Ṭāhir rode in al-Mustaʿīn's train carrying the lance of authority in front of him, and the commanders followed behind. It was also reported that the evening al-Mustaʿīn moved to the residence of Rizq, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh stayed with al-Mustaʿīn for one third of the night and then departed. As for Waṣīf and Bughā, they stayed until the morning and then left for their own residences.

The morning following the night al-Mustaʿīn moved from the house of Ibn Ṭāhir, the populace gathered at al-Ruṣāfah, and the [1636] commanders and the Banū Hāshim were ordered to go to Ibn Ṭāhir. They were to greet him[206] and ride with him to al-Ruṣāfah if he went there. They marched to him, and by late morning Ibn Ṭāhir rode (out) at the head of all his commanders in military formation surrounded by archers on foot. When he left his house, he waited for the people and then scolded them, swearing that he intended no evil against the Commander of the Faithful, may God strengthen him, nor against any of his supporters, nor any of the populace. He only wanted to improve their condition and ensure that they would continue to be favored. Moreover, he complained that he had no knowledge of the things they accused him of. Ibn Ṭāhir continued until he had the populace in tears. One of those present prayed for him, and he then crossed the bridge. Upon coming to al-Mustaʿīn he sent for the neighbors and the notables of the western suburbs. He spoke to them reproachfully and then apologized for the news that had reached them. Waṣīf and Bughā sent someone to circumambulate the gates of Baghdad with the news and appointed Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf over the Shammāsiyyah Gate.

It was reported that al-Mustaʿīn did not care to move from Muḥammad's palace, but he did so because the people sailed in skiffs carrying fire hurlers, intending to fire at Ibn Ṭāhir's balcony

205. That is, in the northeast quarter of Baghdad, south of Shammāsiyyah. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 187–198.

206. The text is al-salām; it should be read taslīm, as in Mss. O and M.

when they found it difficult to open the gate on Friday.

It was also reported that a group, including Kanjūr, stood at the Shammāsiyyah Gate on behalf of Abū Aḥmad and requested that Ibn Ṭāhir talk to him. The latter wrote to Waṣīf about these people and asked him to inform al-Musta'īn so that the Caliph might issue orders as he saw fit. Al-Musta'īn responded by giving him full charge [1637] of the matter and instructed him to proceed as he saw fit.

On that occasion, 'Alī b. Yaḥyā b. Abī Manṣūr al-Munajjim reportedly spoke to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh in a coarse manner. As a result Muḥammad b. Abī 'Awn pounced upon him, reviling him and abusing him physically.

Sa'īd b. Ḥumayd (reported that) Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl, al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad and 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā met privately with Ibn Ṭāhir and persisted in beguiling him (yaftulūnahu bi-l-dhurwah wa-l-ghārib)[207] and counselling him to conclude peace. Whenever (other) people were with him, they would launch conversation opposing peace, whereupon he would frown at them and turn aside. But whenever these three came he would receive them and hold consultations with them.

It was reported that one of them said he told Sa'īd b. Ḥamīd one day that Ibn Ṭāhir must have been filled with treason from the very beginning. But he responded, "I wish it were so. No, by God, I think it was only after his men were routed from al-Madā'in and al-Anbār that the group wrote to him and he responded to them in earnest."

Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā al-Naḥwī, who was the tutor of Ibn Ṭāhir's sons (reported that) Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh was sincere in his support of al-Musta'īn until he was dissuaded by 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān, who told him, "May God prolong your life. Indeed, the one you support and on whose behalf you strive is the most sacrilegious of people and the most deviant in observance, for he had given orders to Waṣīf and Bughā to kill you. They didn't act, as they were [1638] appalled. And if you doubt what I have described, ask and you will be told. As to his obvious sacrilegious behavior, during the prayers at Sāmarrā he never pronounced the basmalah[208] aloud; he only said it aloud when he came to you, in order to appease you and to persuade you to cease from supporting your benefactor, your in-law [ṣuhr],[209] and the youth that you reared." When he was told more of the same, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh responded, "May God defeat the one who is no good for this world nor for the hereafter." During that session, the first one to attempt to dissuade Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh from supporting al-Mustaʿīn was ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā. Only then , did ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā gain the support of Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad, and they did not desist with Ibn Ṭāhir until they succeeded in changing his mind in regards to his support for al-Mustaʿīn.

207. Lane, Lexicon, I, 2244, col. 2.

208. That is to say: bism Allāh al-Raḥmān al-Raḥīm, "In the name of God the Merciful and the Compassionate."

On the day of the Aḍḥā[210] feast this year (January 2, 866), al-Mustaʿīn led the Aḍḥā prayers on the island facing Ibn Ṭāhir's palace. The Caliph rode out with ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh in front of [1639] him, carrying Sulaymān's lance. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl carried the lance of authority (sulṭān), while Bughā and Waṣīf flanked the Caliph. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir did not ride along , however, and ʿAbdallāh b. Isḥāq stayed to pray at al-Ruṣāfah.

On Thursday, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh rode out to al-Mustaʿīn, who was attended by some jurists and judges. He reportedly told al-Mustaʿīn, "You have previously promised to execute anything I considered proper. I have a document [ruqʿah] in your own handwriting testifying to that." Al-Mustaʿīn responded, "Produce the document!" He brought it. It mentioned peace, but there was no mention in it of deposing (the Caliph). Al-Mustaʿīn then said, "Yes! start with the peace." At this, al-Khalanjī rose and said, "O Commander of the Faithful! He is asking you to shed [takhlaʿa] the shirt [qamīṣ] that God has granted you."[211] ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Munajjim also spoke and addressed Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh crudely. After that incident, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh rode out in the middle of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (January 7, 866) to meet al-Mustaʿīn in al-Ruṣāfah, and then he departed with Waṣīf and Bughā. They all went to the Shammāsiyyah Gate, where Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh waited on his mount while 209. That is, related by marriage, for ṣuhr could be the husband of the sister or the daughter. See Lisān, IV, 471.

210. The ʿId al-Aḍḥā, "Sacrificial Feast," falls on the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and is the day when those who have made the pilgrimage to Mecca sacrifice at al-Minā. See EI^{2}, III, 1007.

211. Note the use of khalaʿa, "to take off the cloak" of authority, to mean "to depose," "to abdicate," etc.

Waṣīf and Bughā went to the residence of al-Ḥasan b. al-Afshīn. The Mubayyiḍah and the riffraff came down from the defense wall, and no one was allowed to open the gates; for earlier, a large group left (the city) for the camp of Abū Aḥmad where they bought what they wanted. When those whom we previously mentioned left for the Shammāsiyyah Gate, an announcement was made that the followers of Abū Aḥmad were not to trade with any of the Baghdadis; they were thus forbidden to sell (to them). [1640]

A large red canopy (maḍrab) had been erected for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh at the Shammāsiyyah Gate. Ibn Ṭāhir was accompanied by Bundār al-Ṭabarī, Abū al-Sanā, some two hundred cavalry and a like number of infantry. Abū Aḥmad drew close to the canopy in a fast skiff. The latter then disembarked and entered the canopy with Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. The troops accompanying each of them stood aside while Ibn Ṭāhir and Abū Aḥmad negotiated for a long time. Following this they exited, and Ibn Ṭāhir departed for his palace in a fast skiff.[212] As soon as he disembarked, he rode off to al-Mustaʿīn to tell him what transpired between himself and Abū Aḥmad. He stayed with the Caliph until afternoon and then departed. It was reported that when Ibn Ṭāhir left Abū Aḥmad, he left him with the impression that al-Mustaʿīn was to pay (the army) fifty thousand dīnārs and set aside a revenue of thirty thousand dīnārs a year for them. Moreover, he was to reside in Baghdad until enough money to pay the troops had been collected. Furthermore, he was to appoint Bughā as governor of Mecca, Medina, and the Ḥijāz, and Waṣīf as governor of al-Jabal and the neighboring regions. One third of the revenue was to be given to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and the Baghdad army, while the remaining two thirds were for the mawlās and the Turks. When Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl came to al-Muʿtazz, the latter reportedly appointed him in charge of the postal service and he left with the understanding that he would (later) be appointed as wazīr. ʿĪsā b. Farrukhānshāh was given charge of the bureau of taxation, Abū Nūḥ was entrusted with the privy seal and signatures (tawqīʿ). Thus they divided the administrative tasks among themselves.

When the pouch of the pilgrimage season (kharīṭat al-mawsim)

212. The text reads zallāl, meaning "a fast boat." See Kinderman, Schiff, 35, and Khoury, Nautical Sciences, 772–3. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 160 uses the term sumayriyyah which is also a name of a ship. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 1426, col. 1.

arrived safely at Baghdad it was sent to Abū Aḥmad.[213] Ibn Ṭāhir reportedly rode out to al-Mustaʿīn on the sixteenth of Dhū al-Ḥij-[1641] jah, 251 (January 8, 866). He did so to negotiate the (Caliph's) deposition. He held discussions with the latter, but refused (to step aside), thinking that Bughā and Waṣīf were with him. When they revealed the truth to him, al-Mustaʿīn responded, "Here is my neck, the sword and the throat." When Ibn Ṭāhir saw that al-Mustaʿīn refused, he left. Thereafter, al-Mustaʿīn sent ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā al-Munajjim and some of his (the Caliph's) trustworthy associates to Ibn Ṭāhir saying, "Tell him 'Fear the Lord. I came to you so that you would defend me. If you do not wish to do so, just let me be.'" Ibn Ṭāhir retorted, "I will sit in my home, but, whether you like it or not, you have to abdicate."[214]

ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā reported that Ibn Ṭāhir told him "Tell him [al-Mustaʿīn], 'If you take off the [cloak of authority], by God, there is no harm in that. For it is already shredded beyond repair. You will give up nothing by doing this.'" When al-Mustaʿīn realized his weakness and the betrayal of his supporters, he agreed to abdicate.

On Thursday, the eighteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (January 10, 866), Ibn Ṭāhir sent Ibn al-Kurdiyyah, that is, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar al-Aṣghar b. al-Manṣūr, al-Khalanjī, Mūsā b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shaykh, Abū Saʿīd al-Anṣārī, Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl and Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-Munajjim to Ibn Aḥmad's camp. They were to deliver Muḥammad's letter to him; the letter concerned the things al-Mustaʿīn requested when he was urged to voluntarily abdicate. They delivered the message and Abū Aḥmad granted whatever he had requested. The response came in the form of a letter indicating that al-Mustaʿīn was being granted an estate (yuqṭaʿ), that hence he would reside in the city of the Prophet (i.e., Medina), and that he would only be allowed [1642] to move back and forth between Mecca and Medina. Al-Mustaʿīn agreed to those conditions, but he would not be fully convinced until Ibn al-Kurdiyyah took his request to al-Muʿtazz, discussed it with him and then obtained al-Muʿtazz's written approval, signed by his own hand. Al-Mustaʿīn thus sent Ibn al-Kurdiyyah to him.

---

213. The fact that the pouch was sent to him is an acknowledgement of his authority.

214. The text reads lā budda laka min khalʿihā, "You have no alternative but to take off the cloak," referring to the Prophet's cloak as an insignia of the caliphate. See n. 211, above.

The reported reason why al-Mustaʿīn decided to abdicate (is as follows). Waṣīf, Bughā and Ibn Ṭāhir held discussions with al-Mustaʿīn and advised him to abdicate, but he answered them harshly. Waṣīf then said to him, "You ordered us to kill Bāghar and that led us to this. You also urged us to kill Utāmish and said that Muḥammad is unreliable."[215] They kept on frightening him and beguiling him. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh said, "You also told me that our affairs were not going to be set right until we were rid of those two."[216] When he saw that they spoke as one, he acknowledged their request for him to abdicate, and he stipulated in writing his conditions that were incumbent upon them. This was on the nineteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (January 11, 866). On Saturday,[217] the twentieth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (January 12, 866), Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh rode to al-Ruṣāfah with all the judges and the jurists. He brought group after group of them to al-Mustaʿīn to witness that the former had entrusted Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir with his affairs. Following that, he brought in the doormen and the servants, and the jewels of the caliphate were taken from him. He stayed with him for part of the night, and the next morning the populace spread all kinds of alarming news.

Ibn Ṭāhir sent for his commanders; each was to bring ten of his leading men. When they came to him he had them enter and then raised their hopes with promises saying, "I did what I did for your good and safety and to avoid further bloodshed." He then commissioned a delegation to go to al-Muʿtazz with the conditions that he had set for al-Mustaʿīn, for himself, and for his commanders. Al- [1643]
Muʿtazz was to sign (the document) in his own hand. Following that, Ibn Ṭāhir sent them off to al-Muʿtazz. When they arrived, they obtained his signature, securing everything requested by al-Mustaʿīn and Ibn Ṭāhir. The delegates acted as witnesses to his approval of all that. Al-Muʿtazz, in turn, bestowed cloaks of honor upon them and gave them swords as gifts, but they left without any monetary rewards or personal favors. He sent along with them a group of his own men to secure al-Mustaʿīn's allegiance to him, but 215. The events referred to here are described above, pp. 1535–1538 of the Leiden edition and p. 1512 of the same edition.

216. That is, Waṣīf and Bughā.

217. This date is uncertain, for the tenth day before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah was not a Saturday.

he gave no orders concerning the (loyalist) army. The mother, sister and family of al-Mustaʿīn were returned to him after they had been searched and some of their belongings that were with Saʿīd b. Ṣāliḥ had been confiscated. Having left al-Muʿtazz, the emissaries entered Baghdad on Thursday, the third of Muḥarram, 252 (January 24, 866).

It was reported that when the emissaries of al-Muʿtazz passed al-Shammāsiyyah, Ibn Sajjādah said, "I fear the Baghdadis. Let al-Mustaʿīn be brought to al-Shammāsiyyah or to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's palace. He can render the Caliphal Oath to al-Muʿtazz there and formally abdicate, giving up the cloak and the scepter."

In Rabīʿ I, 251 (April 2–May 1, 865), the one called al-Kawkabī rebelled in Qazwīn and Zanjān. He conquered those places and expelled the Ṭāhirids. Al-Kawkabī's full name is al-Ḥusayn b. Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl al-Arqaṭ b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

[1644] In this year the Banū ʿUqayl cut the Jiddah Road and were fought by Jaʿfar in Shāshāt, where three hundred Meccans were killed. It was one of the Banū ʿUqayl who said:

> You have two garments and my mother is nude > cast me your cloak! You son of an adulteress!

When the Banū ʿUqayl did what they did, prices rose in Mecca and the bedouins attacked the villages.

In this year, Ismāʿīl b. Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib rebelled in Mecca, forcing Jaʿfar b. al-Faḍl b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, the governor, to flee. Ismāʿīl b. Yūsuf looted Jaʿfar's residence as well as the residences of the government's men, killing the troops and a group of Meccans. He also seized the funds that had been brought for repairing the water fountain, the gold kept at the Kaʿbah, and the gold, silver, perfumes and coverings of the Kaʿbah which were in the city treasure house. He also confiscated some two hundred thousand dīnārs from the people, opened Mecca to looting, and burned some of it during Rabīʿ I of this year (April 2–May 1, 865).[218] Fifty days later he left the city and went to Medina where ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, its governor, had gone into hiding. But Ismāʿīl returned to Mecca and laid seige to it until its population began to die from starvation and thirst. Prices reached as high as one 218. See Fāsī, Akhbār Makkah, II, 195.

dirham for three āwāq of bread and four dirhams for a raṭl of meat; the price of a drink of water reached three dirhams.[219] After inflicting all kinds of calamities on the populace of Mecca, he left for Jiddah fifty-seven days later. He withheld food from the people there, seized the possessions of the merchants and boat owners, and carried off wheat and mace from the Yemen to Mecca. The boats from the Red Sea arrived later. On the day of ʿArafāt[220] (January 1,866), Ismāʿīl b. Yūsuf came to the place of assembly (al-mawqif). At the place of assembly were Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. al-Manṣūr, known as Kaʿb al-Baqar, and ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad al-Makhzūmī, commander of the Mecca garrison. Both had been sent by al-Muʿtazz to the city. He engaged them in combat, causing the death of some eleven hundred pilgrims. Subjected to robbery, the people fled to Mecca and did not assemble at ʿArafāt during the night or day; however, Ismāʿīl and his followers did assemble there before returning to Jiddah and looting everything there. [1645]

219. About three grams of silver. See Hinz, Masse, 2.
220. See n. 64, above.

The Events of the Year

252

(JANUARY 22, 866–JANUARY 10, 867)

Among the events taking place, al-Musta'īn, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Mu'taṣim, abdicated and rendered the oath of allegiance to al-Mu'tazz, Muḥammad b. Ja'far al-Mutawakkil b. Muḥammad al-Mu'taṣim. Prayers were said for al-Mu'tazz from the pulpits of both Friday mosques at Baghdad, the one on the East Side and the one on the West Side. This took place on Friday, the fourth of Muḥarram, 252 (January 25, 866). In addition, the oath of allegiance was obtained from the troops who were in Baghdad that day.

Ibn Ṭāhir reportedly came to al-Musta'īn along with Sa'īd b. Ḥumayd when the latter had written a document guaranteeing the Caliph's safety. Ibn Ṭāhir then said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful! Sa'īd has set down the conditions (for your safety) in unambiguous language. May we read the document for you to hear?" Al- [1646] Musta'īn then said, "Never mind that, why don't you disregard it, Abū al-'Abbās? Those people know God no more than you do. You gave assurances before they did, and you know what has happened." Muḥammad did not reply.

When al-Musta'īn swore allegiance to al-Mu'tazz, he did so in Baghdad. The act was witnessed by the Banū Hāshim, the judges, the jurists and the commanders. He then moved from the place where he stayed at al-Ruṣāfah to the palace of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl in al-

Mukharrim.[221] That is, he moved there together with his family, his children, and his servant girls. They were all housed there under the supervision of Saʿīd b. Rajāʾ al-Ḥidārī and his men. The signet, the cloak and the scepter were taken from al-Mustaʿīn, who sent along the following message with ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh:

> Now, Praise the Lord, the One Who sees that benefits [niʿam] are granted through His mercy, and Who rightly guides [men] to express gratitude to Him through His benevolence. God's prayers and salutations be upon Muḥammad, His servant and Messenger, unto whom He granted all the virtues that were distributed to all the previous Messengers, and Who, in turn, passed Muḥammad's inheritance to whomever He selected for succeeding him. My letter to the Commander of the Faithful, now that God has established his rule, is: "I had received the inheritance of the Messenger of God from the one who had it, and now I hand it over to the Commander of the Faithful with ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful and his servant."

[1647] Al-Mustaʿīn was not allowed to go to Mecca, so he chose to take up residence at al-Baṣrah. Saʿīd b. Ḥumayd (reported that) Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Shākir exclaimed, "Al-Baṣrah is ridden with plagues. Why do you choose to live there?" Al-Mustaʿīn then retorted, "Which is more plague-ridden, al-Baṣrah or abdication?"

It was also mentioned that Qurb, Qabīḥah's slave girl,[222] brought a message to al-Mustaʿīn from al-Muʿtazz. In it the latter asked him to give up three of al-Mutawakkil's slave girls that he (al-Mustaʿīn) had married. He consented and gave the girls the freedom to choose for themselves. Al-Mustaʿīn had also withheld two (caliphal) rings; one was called al-Burj, the other al-Jabal.[223] Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh then sent Qurb, the intimate of al-Muʿtazz, and a group of people over to him. Al-Mustaʿīn gave them the rings, and they returned to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh who, in turn, sent them on to al-Muʿtazz.

---

221. For the palace of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl on the East Side of Baghdad which later became the caliphal residence, see Lassner, Topography, 85f.

222. Qabīḥah was the mother of al-Muʿtazz.

223. For the history of this ring, see Bayhaqī, Maḥāsin, 470–471.

On the sixth of Muḥarram (January 27, 866), more than two hundred boats laden with all kinds of merchandize and large numbers of sheep arrived at Baghdad. Al-Musta'īn was sent to Wāsiṭ with Muḥammad b. Muẓaffar b. Saysal and Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah, along with four hundred cavalry and infantry. Following that, 'Īsā b. Farrukhānshāh and Qurb came to Ibn Ṭāhir and told him that Aḥmad b. Muḥammad had withheld a ruby (yāqūt) belonging to the caliphal jewels. Ibn Ṭāhir then sent al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl who retrieved it. It was a beautiful ruby, four fingers long, four wide. He (Aḥmad) had already written his name on it. It was given to Qurb who, in turn, took it to al-Mu'tazz.

Al-Mu'tazz made Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl his wazīr and granted him cloaks of honor and also placed a crown on his head. On the twelfth of Muḥarram (February 2, 866), Abū Aḥmad headed back to Sāmarrā accompanied by Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad. [1648] Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh was given five cloaks of honor and a sword, and then returned from al-Rūdhabār.

One of the poets composed the following about al-Musta'īn's deposition:

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad had been deposed from the caliphate and his successor will either be killed or deposed.

The rule of his ancestors will vanish without seeing anyone who rules and enjoys it.

O Banū 'Abbās! Your way of dealing with the death of your servants is now a beaten track.

You've mended your earthly world but shredded your life so much beyond repair.

One of the Baghdadis recited:

I see that you are afraid of separation.
But the Imām has been expelled and deposed.

On his account the world used to be smiling for he was the spring for those who sought a spring.

Don't you ever deny fate's upsets and vicissitudes for fate separates those who were brought together.

[1649] He wore the caliphate and lovingly undertook conducting all of the Muslim's affairs.

But the hand of fate afflicted him by dealing him a war when he was as far as he could be from war.

The Turks broke away from him in mutiny leaving him frightened after he had been full of courage.

He attacked them and they him as brave hands and heads were covered with the same blood.

Destiny had moved him from the highest ranks to settle in Wāsiṭ feeling he could not return.

They took him by surprise, beguiled him and betrayed him and left him to keep to his bed perpetually asleep.

They encircled Baghdad from all its sides and overcame what used to be impregnable.

Had he faced wars by himself clad in his shields as he met them head on,

[1650] Facing brave men with his own brave [men] in order to kill anyone who intended to fight,

He would have been beyond reach of fate's vicissitudes;
he would have been impregnable to the assault of the traitors.

But he refused the advice and reproof of the compassionate, and obeyed, instead, the orders of traitors.

Authority can only be wielded by a ruler who does not lay waste to genuine advice.

He kept on betraying himself by fooling himself until he was betrayed from his rule.

Ibn Ṭāhir sold his religion for an allegiance that had made the imām impregnable.

He disowned the caliphate and the subjects and fed himself, thus disowning the religion of Muḥammad's God.

May he drink a bitter cup on that account, and let him become a follower of those who follow him.

Muḥammad b. Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb b. Marwān recited the following when al-Mustaʿīn was deposed and went to Wāsiṭ: [1651]

Al-Muʿtazz is now in charge of all affairs while al-Mustaʿīn has gone [back] to his old self.

He already knew that he was not cut out for rule.
It was yours all along, but he fooled himself.

The real ruler is the one who grasps rule and clasps it.
and now rule is brought to you, having been grasped from him.

The caliphate did not agree with him, it was like a free wife given away in a temporary marriage mutʿah.[224]

How hateful it was for the people to offer allegiance to him!
How beautiful it was for them to say he's been deposed.

Would that a ship had pushed him till the end of the world [qāf].
I'd have sacrificed myself for the sailor pushing him off.

How many a king controlled the affairs of men before you;
burdened with your load, he would have been crippled.

224. For this kind of temporary marriage, see Schacht, Introduction, 163.

[1652] With you, people see affluence after distress;
God always grants a respite after crisis.

May God protect you, O King! from all evil as He has protected us from distress by your aid.

My praise for you has never disappeared [ḍāʿā] nor has your patronage [iṣṭināʿ];
I, thank God, have found my patron.

Give me back the estate [ḍayʿah] in Najd that was seized from me;
it is the likes of you who grant estates to the likes of me.

If you were to give me back its revenue, O imām of justice,
God would let me cut off the noses of those who envy me.

He also said in praise of al-Muʿtazz after the deposition of al-Mustaʿīn:

The world has returned to its original state, and God has gladdened us with its fortunes.

A world which God has relieved through you of the terrible horrors it once held.

It had been ruled by an ignorant ruler, and the world will never be right for ignorant ones.

The world had been locked by him, until you became the key to its locks.

What you have succeeded to, in spite of him, has been returned to its favored state.

[1653] A caliphate you were well deserving of,
God preferred you with its [ceremonial] garb.

God returned him to his original place and returned it [i.e., the caliphate] to its former state.

It was not the first borrowed thing that was returned by force to its owner.

By God, if he were to rule over a village he would not be fit to rule any of it.

He inserted a shaking hand into the rule, but soon pulled it out after inserting it.

God has exchanged him with a real master for us, one who calmed the world after it had been badly shaken.

The community had been given this one for that as if it had been living in the times of its false prophet.

He shouldered rule and its responsibilities and shouldered war and its burdens as well.

What frustrated the dreams of the enemies was your charge with horsemen and heroes.

You muster a cavalry that was always successful, no cavalry could replicate its deeds.

Concerning the deposition of al-Musta'īn, al-Walīd b. 'Ubayd al-Buḥturī recited the following in the praise of al-Mu'tazz:

Hasn't he come to take command, and the darkness of the night has been dispersed and life has been eased!

With shame we have returned the borrowed [one] [1654] to its owners, and truth has been restored by its master.

I am amazed by this life; its misfortunes are debilitating.
But life is nothing other than misfortunes and miracles,

When the arrogant [man] hopes to be uncontested concerning the bonds of the crown, or [hopes] that the turban will be placed on his head.[225]

How a usurper claimed the right of the caliphate while the relatives of the Prophet have more right than he to his inheritance.[226]

The eastern pulpit cried when above it there bellowed an ox revealing its dewlaps at the people.

Sluggish, but constantly by the side of the food, watching the table, ready to pounce on it.

Once stuffed with whatever food he could find,
he cared little if the star of royalty shone or not.

[1655] The waiter who comes early to report [what he heard] you find him slim on praise, fat on blame.

He bounded into an affair he couldn't control—at times he flirted with it, other times he fought it.

Don't you see how truth has finally been established and the fruits of injustice finished with completely?

Once al-Mu'tazz billāh marched out he couldn't be defeated, as long as al-Mu'tazz remained the seeker.

He was forced to cast away the scepter obligingly and the cloak of the Prophet was removed from his shoulders.

I rejoiced when I heard that he was sent quickly.
towards the East with his caravans and mounts driven by chants.

---

225. The text is difficult: yuthnā 'alayhi 'aṣā'ib (al-tāj), which seems to imply "securing the crown," as shadd al-tāj in Qalqashandī, Ṣubḥ, III, 480.

226. That is, inheritance of the Prophet.

To Kashkar behind the chicken for he was not capable of fiercely attacking anything but the chicken.

The fluffy beard of the cloth washer [1656]
does not bring good to anyone equal in rank to him.

Ibn Khallād[227] becomes his choice poet and is considered courageous while he writes foolishness.

I swear by the sacred valley with all the sacred things in its low lands and high mountains,[228]

That al-Mu'tazz has urged the community of Aḥmad[229] unto paths that lead to the clear highway of truth.

He rescued God's religion after its identifiable features had been erased in us and its stars had set.

And he embraced the shining lights of rule until it all gathered unto him from east and west.

Abū al-Sāj Dīwdād b. Dīwdast came to Baghdad on the twenty-third of Muḥarram, 252 (February 13, 866). Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh then appointed him to supervise all the land irrigated by the Eu- [1657] phrates. This Abū al-Sāj sent one of his lieutenants by the name of Karbah to al-Anbār, and (he sent) some of his men with another lieutenant to Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. Abū al-Sāj also sent al-Ḥārith b. Asad at the head of five hundred cavalry and infantry to look into his domain and expel the Turks and the Maghāribah, who had been running wild and looting the countryside. On the third of Rabī' I (March 24, 866), Abū al-Sāj set out from Baghdad and distributed his men throughout the administrative districts (ṭassūj) of the Euphrates. He camped at Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, and from there he went to al-Kūfah.

After having departed from his camp, Abū Aḥmad came to Sāmarrā on the nineteenth of Muḥarram (February 9, 866). Al-

227. He is probably the judge al-Ḥasan b.'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khallād who was also "a poet" according to Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 172.

228. That is, Mecca.

229. That is, the Prophet Muḥammad.

Muʿtazz bestowed six cloaks of honor upon him and gave him a sword, a golden crown—in the form of a tall hat (qalansuwah)—decorated with precious stones, and two golden sashes with precious stones. He was then given another sword encrusted with precious stones, and he was seated on a throne while the leading men of the commanders were given their cloaks of honor.

In this year, Sharīḥ al-Ḥabashī was killed. The circumstances were as follows. When peace was concluded, he ran off with a group of Abyssinians and cut the highway lying between Wāsiṭ and the area of al-Jabal and al-Ahwāz. He camped at one of the villages belonging to the mother of al-Mutawakkil—it was called Dayrī.[230] Sharīḥ took up residence in its caravanserai together with fifteen men. Once they had eaten and drunk, the villagers pounced on them. They bound them and then carried them off to Manṣūr b. Naṣr at Wāsiṭ, who took them to Baghdad. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, in turn, sent them off to the army camp. When they arrived there Bāyakbāk met Sharīḥ and cut him in half with the sword. He was [1658] subsequently hung in public at Khashabat[231] Bābak. His companions were administered from five hundred to one thousand lashes.

During the month of Rabīʿ II 252 (April 21–May 19, 866), ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān died in Madīnat Abū Jaʿfar.[232]

Also in this year, al-Muʿtazz wrote to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh ordering him to drop the names of Bughā and Waṣīf and those they had registered from the dīwāns. Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn, one of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's commanders reportedly discussed killing Bughā and Waṣīf when Abū Aḥmad arrived at Sāmarrā. Ibn Abī ʿAwn promised that he would kill them. When al-Muʿtazz sent a banner to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh and tied one for Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn signifying the latter's authority to rule al-Baṣrah, Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn, some followers of Bughā and Waṣīf wrote to them about this, warning them against Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh. On Tuesday, the twenty-sixth of Rabīʿ I (April 16, 866), both Bughā and Waṣīf rode off to Ibn Ṭāhir. Bughā spoke, "We have learned, O

230. The reading is uncertain.

231. For Bābak, the leader of the Khurramite sect, and the place in Sāmarrā that carried his name, see EI^{2}, I, 844. For the quarter of Khashabat Bābak, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 259.

232. That is, the Round City.

amīr, of Ibn Abī ʿAwn's contract to kill us. That group has already betrayed us and broken their promises. If, however, they wish to kill us, by God they won't be able to do so." Ibn Ṭāhir, in turn, swore to them that he knew nothing of the matter. Bughā continued to talk tough, but Waṣīf tried to stop him, saying to Ibn Ṭāhir, "O amīr, that group has already betrayed us, but we intend to do nothing. We would rather stay put in our residences until someone comes to kill us." The two had come with a group of followers, and now they returned to their residences. They gathered their troops and mawlās, and started to prepare—buying weapons and distributing funds in their neighborhoods until the end of Rabīʿ I (April 20, 866).

When Qurb arrived, Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh sent his secretary [1659]
Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā to them. They went with him until they came to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's palace near the bridge. There they were met by Jaʿfar al-Kurdī and Ibn Khālid al-Barmakī, each of whom took a bridle (of their horses) and said, "You were brought in to be taken to the army camp, where a group has been preparing to kill you." They turned back and gathered a force, paying each man two dirhams a day, and then stayed at their residences. Waṣīf had already sent his sister Suʿād to al-Muʾayyad who had grown up in her care (fi ḥijrihā). She brought out a million dīnārs that had been buried at Waṣīf's palace and turned them over to al-Muʾayyad, and he, in turn, spoke to al-Muʿtazz concerning a pardon for Waṣīf. Al-Muʿtazz responded positively in writing, whereupon Waṣīf pitched his tents by the Shammāsiyyah Gate with the intention of leaving the city. Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil spoke for Bughā, and al-Muʿtazz responded in the same fashion for him. However, their situation had worsened while they resided in Baghdad.

The Turks later gathered with al-Muʿtazz and asked him to send for the two of them saying, "They are our elders and our chiefs." He sent them a written invitation with Bāyakbāk who brought the letter, accompanied by some three hundred men. The latter positioned himself at al-Baradān and sent the letter to them on the twenty-third of Ramaḍān, 252 (October 7, 866), but he also wrote to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to detain them. They, in turn, sent their secretaries Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ and Dulayl b. Yaʿqūb to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to ask for his permission to leave. A Turkish contingent came for them and encamped at the prayer platform (al- muṣallā).[233] Waṣīf and Bughā now came out with their children and about four hundred of their horsemen, leaving behind in their [1660] residence the immovable property and their households. The people of Baghdad wished them well, and they reciprocated.

Ibn Ṭāhir had already sent Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Wāthiqī and Bundār al-Ṭabarī to the Shammāsiyyah and Baradān Gates to detain them. But they went through the Khurāsān Gate without their secretaries even knowing.[234] Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh asked Aḥmad and Dulayl, "What have your patrons done?" Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ responded, "I left Waṣīf in his residence." When told (that Waṣīf) had just departed, he responded, "I had no idea." Once at Sāmarrā, Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl came to Waṣīf very early on Sunday, the twentieth of Shawwāl, 252 (November 3, 866), and visited him for a long time. He then departed and did the same with Bughā. Following that, Aḥmad returned to his residence, whereupon the mawlās gathered and asked him to return the two of them to their ranks. They received an affirmative reply, and he sent for the two of them. When they came, they were returned to the ranks they held before they went to Baghdad. An order was issued for their estates to be returned to them, and they were given the cloaks designating their rank. Al-Mu'tazz then rode to the Public Audience Hall and appointed Bughā and Waṣīf to their administrative positions. He also reappointed Mūsā b. Bughā the Elder over the postal bureau and the latter consented.

In Ramaḍān of this year (September 15–October 14, 866), a skirmish took place between the Baghdad garrison and the troops of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh. Commanding the garrison at the time was Ibn al-Khalīl. The circumstances leading to that were reportedly as follows. Concerning the harvest of 252, al-Mu'tazz wrote to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh asking him to sell the harvest of Bādurāyā, [1661] Qaṭrabbul, Maskīn and other districts at an average rate of thirty-five dīnārs for two kurrs.[235] Al-Mu'tazz had given the post of Baghdad to a man by the name of Ṣāliḥ b. al-Haytham. The latter's brother had been in the service of Utāmish during the reign of al-

233. Originally, any prayer platform would be called a muṣallā. Here it seems to have become associated with a specific place. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 204. For similar places in other cities, such as Damascus, see Dhahabī, Duwal, 105, n.4.

234. That is, they went east instead of north.

235. A kurr is about 2.9 tons. See Hinz, Masse, 43.

Mutawakkil. This Ṣāliḥ rose in rank during the days of al-Musta'īn. He was one of those who took up residence at Sāmarrā, although he was from the Mukharrim section (of Baghdad). His father had started out as a weaver before he took to selling spun wool. His brother joined him at a later time, when his fortunes rose.

While at Baghdad, Ṣāliḥ received a letter which was to be read to the Baghdadi commanders such as 'Attāb b. 'Attāb, Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Wāthiqī, Muḥammad b. Harthamah, Muḥammad b. Rajā', Shu'ayb b. 'Ujayf and their like. After he read it to them, they went to Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh and told him about it. Orders were then issued by Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, and Ṣāliḥ b. al-Haytham was brought to him. Muḥammad asked him, "What made you do that without my knowledge?" He threatened Ṣāliḥ and cursed him. Then he said to the commanders, "Wait until I decide what to do, and then issue orders concerning my intentions." They left with that understanding. Following that, on the tenth of Ramaḍān (September 24, 866), the recruits, the Shākiriyyah, and the reserves gathered at Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh's door asking for their allotments. He responded by telling them about the Caliph's letter, which had come to him in answer to one sent by him concerning the service pay of the Baghdad garrison. The Caliph's letter went, "If you recruited men to serve you, pay them. If you recruited them for us, we have no need of them."

When this letter reached him, the army had been rioting for a full [1662] day. He therefore took out two thousand dīnārs and payed them, whereupon they quieted down. But on the eleventh of Ramaḍān (September 25, 866), they gathered, carrying banners and drums, and pitched their various tents by the Ḥarb Gate and the Shammāsiyyah Gate among others. They also built huts of matting and cane, and spent the night there. Their numbers increased as the morning came. Ibn Ṭāhir, on the other hand, had some of his elite troops stay the night at his palace, giving each of them one dirham. But as the morning came, they went out and joined the rioters. Ibn Ṭāhir then called in the troops who had come with him from Khurāsān and gave them two months pay. He also paid the veteran Baghdadi troops two dīnārs for a cavalryman and one for a footsoldier, thereby filling his house with men.

On Friday, a great number of rioters gathered by the Ḥarb Gate bearing arms, banners and drums. They were under the command of a man called ʿAbdān b. al-Muwaffaq—his patronymic was Abū al-Qāsim. He was one of the regular fighters (athbāt) in the command of ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān; however, his listings were in the payroll register of Waṣīf. Abū al-Qāsim had come to Baghdad, sold one of his residences for one hundred thousand dīnārs and set out for Sāmarrā. When the Shākiriyyah rebelled at the Public Gate he went along with them. As a result, Saʿīd al-Ḥājib gave him five hundred lashes and imprisoned him for a long time before finally releasing him. Abū al-Qāsim then came to Baghdad during the disturbances in the reign of al-Mustaʿīn, and he attracted these rioters, urging them to demand their allotments and their back pay. He also assured them that he would lead them and manage their affairs. They con-[1663] sented to that, and on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday he spent about thirty dīnārs to supply them with food. Those who were self-sufficient had no need for his largesse for they went home (to eat), as usual. On Friday, a large number of them gathered and decided to go into the city (madīnah) and make their way to the imām in order to prevent him from leading the prayer and from calling for allegiance to al-Muʿtazz.[236] They marched in military formation through the quarter of the Ḥarb Gate until they reached the city gate in the Damascus Gate quarter. At every street they passed, this Abū al-Qāsim placed a group of rioters consisting of lancers and swordsmen. They were to secure the streets lest someone emerge from them to offer combat. When he reached the city, a large group of people entered along with the rioters and went to the area between the two gates and the arcades.[237] They stood there for a while and then dispatched about three hundred armed men to the court (raḥbah) surrounding the city's Friday Mosque.[238] A large throng of the general populace went with them and positioned themselves in the court. They came to the imām Jaʿfar b. al-ʿAbbās and told him that they did not object to his praying, but they would object if he

236. This is the imām of the Friday Mosque in the Round City. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 33–37.

237. Arcades is a translation of ṭāqāt. For the exact location, see the diagram showing the doors and the ṭāqāt in Creswell, Architecture, 171, and Lassner, Topography, Appendix E, 207–213.

238. It is not clear whether raḥbah here refers to that by the gate, near the small ṭāqāt, or to an open space around the mosque itself.

called for allegiance to al-Muʿtazz. Jaʿfar responded that he was sick and would not be able to lead the prayer, whereupon they left him alone and made for the street of Asad b. Marzubān, filling the quarter (shāriʿ) connecting it with Darb al-Raqīq.[239]

The rioters appointed a group to take charge of the gate to the street of Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar and then made for the (upper) bridge by way of the blacksmiths' quarter[240]. Ibn Ṭāhir dispatched a number of his commanders against them, including al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, al-ʿAbbās b. Qārin, ʿAlī b. Jahshiyār and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Afshīn. They [1664] rode at the head of a group of cavalry. The commanders negotiated with them and pushed them back gently; but the Shākiriyyah and the troops charged them, whereby several of Ibn Ṭāhir's commanders were wounded. One of Ibn Qārin's pack animals was taken together with Ibn Jahshiyār and a Syrian, one of ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā's recruits by the name of Saʿd al-Ḍabābī. They also wounded one known as Abū al-Sanā, and forced the troops all the way back from the bridge, to the gate of ʿAmr b. Masʿadah's residence.[241] When those on the East Side saw that their friends had managed to repulse Ibn Ṭāhir's men from the bridge, they exclaimed "God is Great!" and charged, in an attempt to cross over to their friends. Ibn Ṭāhir had already prepared a boat with thorns and reeds to be set on fire and pushed in the direction of the upper bridge. He carried out his plan, and the boat burned most of the bridge's pontoons, cutting it off to traffic. The boat then made its way to the other bridge,[242] but the rioters on the West Side caught up with it and sank it; then they put out the fire that had spread to the bridge's pontoons.

A large group then crossed from the East Side to the West, pushed Ibn Ṭāhir's men from the vaulted passageway (sābāṭ) of ʿAmr b. Masʿadah's residence, and stormed the gate of Ibn Ṭāhir's palace. The Shākiriyyah and the troops went to the passageway of ʿAmr b. Masʿadah's residence, and by noon some ten men from both factions were dead. A group of rabble and common people went to the assem-

239. For the location of these activities along the main road near the Damascus Gate, northeast of the Round City, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 248–249.

240. This is probably in the Ḥarbiyyah quarter, going northwest from the Round City.

241. For this residence on the West Side, see Lassner, Topography, 70.

242. That is, to the other two bridges spanning the Tigris.

bly hall (majlis), known as the Police Headquarters (Majlis al-Shurṭah), on the western side of the bridge.[243] From there, they went to a building known as the Bayt al-Rufūʿ, and broke the door [1665] down. They looted whatever they found in it —it was filled with all sorts of wares. They fought over it, leaving nothing behind of its rich contents. Ibn Ṭāhir burned both bridges when he saw that the (Baghdad) garrison were winning against his men, and he ordered that the shops lining Sulaymān Street in the Bridge Gate section be set aflame right and left. That was done, and in the shops the fire consumed great amounts of merchandise belonging to the merchants. The walls of the Police Headquarters collapsed as well. When the shops were set ablaze, the fire separated the two factions. The garrison then proclaimed aloud "God is Great!" and left for their camp at the Ḥarb Gate, while al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl and some of the Shākiriyyah commanders went to the merchants and the populace. They chastized them for supporting the troops saying, "Those [troops] have fought for their bread and, thus, could be excused. But you, being the neighbors of the amīr, those obligated to support him, why did you do what you did? You aided the Shākiriyyah against him and threw rocks when the amīr was preoccupied." Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn then went to them and told them similar things before going to Ibn Ṭāhir. The rioting troops remained in their positions and camps, but a contingent of regular warriors joined Ibn Ṭāhir. He now gathered all of his followers, positioning some of them in his palace, others in the thoroughfare connecting his palace to the bridge. He assembled them in battle formation, fearing that the Baghdad garrison might attack him again.

But that did not happen. Instead, one day two of the rioters asked him for safe conduct and came to (see) him—this was when Ibn [1666] Ṭāhir was afraid they would return—and the two informed him of the breaches in their companions' defences. He ordered that these men be given two hundred dīnārs and then commanded al-Shāh b. Mīkāl and al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl to march out to the Ḥarb Gate after the second evening prayer, at the head of a group of their men. They were to speak gently to Abū al-Qāsim, the commander, and Ibn al-Khalīl, who was a companion of Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn. When they got there, Abū al-Qāsim and Ibn al-Khalīl had already gone off in opposite directions. They feared for their safety after the two men had gone to Ibn Ṭāhir together with a third man called al-Qummī. Moreover, they were afraid because the Shākiriyyah had broken away from them. Al-Shāh and al-Ḥusayn pursued them until they left the Anbār Gate, en route to the Baṭāṭiyah Bridge. Ibn al-Khalīl reportedly met them before they reached the Baṭāṭiyah Bridge[244] and called out to them and their companions, asking them to identify themselves. Then they called out to him. As soon as he recognized them, he attacked, wounding several of them. But they managed to surround him, and, as he was in the middle of the group, he was stabbed by one of al-Shāh's men who threw him to the ground. ʿAlī b. Jahshiyār ripped him open with a sword while he was on the ground. He was carried off on a mule, hardly breathing, and died before reaching Ibn Ṭāhir. Al-Shāh ordered that his body be cast away in an enclosure by the entrance corridor to the palace until it could be transported to the East Side.

243. That is, at the west end of the main bridge. See Le Strange, Baghdad, map facing p. 107, n. 7.

As for ʿAbdān b. al-Muwaffaq, he had already gone to his residence [1667] and from there into hiding. The authorities were guided to him, and he was subsequently captured and carried off to Ibn Ṭāhir. The Shākiriyyah, who were at the Ḥarb Gate, dispersed and went to their homes. ʿAbdān b. al-Muwaffaq was shackled with two chains weighing thirty raṭls. Later, al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl came to the prison in the Public Audience Hall where ʿAbdān was being held. Al-Ḥusayn sat on a chair and summoned him. He asked if he was an agent for someone or if he did what he did on his own. ʿAbdān responded that he was no one's agent; he was one of the Shākiriyyah who simply demanded his bread. When al-Ḥusayn returned to Ibn Ṭāhir and informed him of this, Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad went out with his brother to the interior wing of the Public Audience Hall. The two sat down and called in those commanders who slept in the building, as well as al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl and al-Shāh b. Mīkāl. They also sent for ʿAbdān who was carried in by two men. Al-Ḥusayn was the one who addressed him saying, "You are the leader of the people." To which he retorted, "No! I am only one of them, seeking what they sought." Al-Ḥusayn cursed him, and Ḥarb b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥarb called out, "You lie! You are the leader of the people and we have seen you mobilize them at the Ḥarb Gate, at the city[245] and at the Damascus Gate." He continued to insist, "I was not their leader but, rather, one of them, seeking what they sought." Al-Ḥusayn cursed him again and gave orders that he be slapped; and he was. He also ordered that he be dragged by his fetters; and he was, until he was taken out of the house and cursed by everyone who followed him.

244. For this bridge, see Lassner, Topography, 103.

Then Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad went to his father and told him the story; whereupon ʿAbdān was put on a mule and taken to jail, while [1668] Ibn al-Khalīl was put in a skiff and transported to the East Side, where he was hung and displayed to the public. Orders were also given that ʿAbdān be stripped and administered a hundred lashes with the knotted part of the whip. Al-Ḥusayn, wishing to kill him, said to Muhammad b. Naṣr, "How about giving him fifty lashes on his waist?" To which Muḥammad answered, "This is a glorious month,[246] and it is illegal for you to do that to him." Therefore, Muḥammad ordered that he be put on display while still alive, and this was done. He was carried on a ladder until he was hung on the bridge, to which he was tied with ropes.[247] ʿAbdān asked for water after he was displayed, but al-Ḥusayn prohibited him from getting any. Al-Ḥusayn was told that if he drank water he would die, to which he replied, "Then let him drink." He was given a drink and left to hang until mid-afternoon. After that, he was imprisoned for two days; he died on the third with the coming of noon. Orders were given that he be hung and displayed on the same wooden plank where Ibn al-Khalīl had been displayed before him. The body of Ibn al-Khalīl was given to his faithful followers, and it was buried.

In Rajab, 252 (July 18–August 16, 866) al-Muʿtazz removed his brother as heir to the throne.

The Reason For Removing Him

The reason for that, according to information we received, is the following. Al-ʿAlāʾ b. Aḥmad, the governor of Armīniyah, sent Ibrāhīm

245. That is, the Round City.

246. That is, Ramaḍān, the month of fasting.

247. Bridges, as main gathering points, seem to have been favorite places for displaying criminals and enemies of the State.

al-Mu'ayyad five thousand dīnārs to settle his affairs; however, Ibn Farrukhānshāh sent for it and took it. Al-Mu'ayyad therefore incited the Turks against 'Īsā b. Farrukhānshāh, but the Maghāribah resisted them. It was then that al-Mu'tazz sent for his two brothers, al-Mu'ayyad and Abū Aḥmad, and imprisoned them at the Jawsaq Palace. He put al-Mu'ayyad in chains and held him in a small room. At the same time, he paid generous bonuses to the Turks and the Maghāribah. He also imprisoned Kanjūr, al-Mu'ayyad's chamberlain (ḥājib), and beat him fifty times with a rod. In addition, he administered five hundred lashes to Abū al-Hawl, Kanjūr's deputy, and had [1669] him paraded around on a camel. Afterwards, he expressed satisfaction with him, as well as Kanjūr, and Abū al-Hawl returned to his residence.

It was also reported that he had his brother al-Mu'ayyad beaten forty times with a rod. He was deposed later, in Sāmarrā on Wednesday, the seventh of Rajab (July 24, 866),[248] and in Baghdad on Sunday, the eleventh of Rajab (July 28, 866). This was after al-Mu'ayyad signed a document in which he abdicated his position. On the twenty-fourth of Rajab—some say the twenty-sixth—(August 10 or 12, 866),[249] Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far, who was known as al-Mu'ayyad, died.

The Cause of His Death

One of the Turkish women reportedly came to Muḥammad b. Rāshid al-Maghribī and told him that the Turks were seeking to get Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad out of prison. Muḥammad b. Rāshid then rode off to al-Mu'tazz and told him about that, and he, in turn, summoned Mūsā b. Bughā and interrogated him. The latter denied it, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful! They wanted to free Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil on account of their feelings for him during the past conflict. As for al-Mu'ayyad, [what you have been told is] not true." But on Thursday, the twenty-second of Rajab (August 8, 866), the Caliph summoned the judges, jurists, witnesses and nota-

248. The text says Friday; read Wednesday. The next date is correctly given as Sunday, the eleventh of Rajab.

249. This must be the date when his death was announced publicly, for the next paragraph details the account of his death, which was certified by witnesses, judges, etc., on the twenty-second of Rajab (August 8, 866).

bles, and the dead body of Ibrāhīm al-Mu'ayyad was brought to them containing no mark or wound.[250] He was taken on a donkey to his mother, Umm[251] Isḥāq; she was also the mother of Abū Aḥmad. Carried along with him were the shrouds and the funerary perfumes (ḥunūṭ). Orders were subsequently given to have him buried. Abū Aḥmad was then transferred to the cell where al-Mu'ayyad had been.

It was reported that al-Mu'ayyad was inserted into a fur wrapper whose sides were (tightly) wrapped until he died (of suffocation). Other reports say that he was seated on an ice block and his body was covered with ice until he died from cold.[252] [1670] In Shawwāl of this year (October 15–November 12, 866), Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Mustaʿīn was killed.

The Report of His Death

It was reported as follows. When al-Muʿtazz intended to kill al-Mustaʿīn, he wrote to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir urging him to execute the former caliph and to dispatch his lieutenant's men to the outlying districts (ṭassūj). Later, a letter was also sent to Ibn Ṭāhir with a servant, called Sīmā, in which the amīr was ordered to write to Manṣūr b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, the governor of Wāsiṭ. The latter was to deliver al-Mustaʿīn to Ibn Ṭāhir. Al-Mustaʿīn was residing there in the charge of Ibn Abī Khumayṣah, Ibn al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal, Manṣūr b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah, and the postal chief. Muḥammad wrote demanding that al-Mustaʿīn be delivered to him. It was said that he subsequently dispatched Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn the Turk at the head of a contingent of troops. The latter brought al-Mustaʿīn out (of Wāsiṭ) on the twenty-fourth of Ramaḍān (October 8, 866), and he arrived with him at al-Qāṭūl[253] on the third of Shawwāl (October 17, 866).

---

250. The intention is to have legal witnesses to the fact that al-Mu'ayyad was not murdered, and that he did not die a violent death, but rather of natural causes.

251. The text is ummihi; it should be read umm as in Ms. C.

252. Such fanciful methods of execution seem to be the work of the chroniclers themselves. See, e.g., the account of al-Muʿtazz's death, p. 1711 of the Leiden edition, and the account of the death of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī, the uncle of Caliph al-Manṣūr (754–775) in Lassner, Shaping, 41.

253. See n. 92, above, for the location of Qāṭūl.

It was also said that Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn was in charge of al-Mustaʿīn, and that it was Saʿīd b. Ṣāliḥ who was sent to bring al-Mustaʿīn from al-Qāṭūl after he had been brought there by Ibn Ṭūlūn. Still other reports are at variance with these two. Some said that it was Saʿīd who killed him at al-Qāṭūl, and that on the day after he killed him he brought in al-Mustaʿīn's slave girls and told them, "Look at your master. He is dead." Others said that Saʿīd brought him to Sāmarrā together with Ibn Ṭūlūn, and the former went with him into his residence[254] where he tortured him to death. Another report said that he sailed with al-Mustaʿīn in a skiff filled with supplies until they [1671] reached the mouth of the Dujayl. At that point, he tied a stone to al-Mustaʿīn's feet and cast him into the water.

A Christian physician by the name of Faḍlān, who was in the company of al-Mustaʿīn, reported the following. I was with him when he was carried off. He was taken along the Sāmarrā Road, and when he reached a waterway he saw a procession, a group of people carrying banners. He told me, "Go ahead and take a look. If it is Saʿīd I'm finished." I went up to the lead men of the force and asked them. They said, "It's Saʿīd the gate keeper (bawwāb)." I then went back and reported this. He was in a domed litter accompanied by a woman. He said, "We are God's, and unto Him we shall return. By God, I am dead." I lagged a bit behind him. The lead men of the force met him and charged. Forcing him and his nurse (dāyat) down, they struck him with their swords. He and his nurse screamed, and then he was killed. At that point the troops departed. I reached the spot, and behold, he was dead in his drawers with no head. The woman was also dead with several stab wounds. We ourselves cast the river's earth upon them until we covered them, and (then we) departed. When his head was brought to al-Muʿtazz, the latter was playing chess. Told that it was the head of the deposed, he said, "Put it there." Then he finished playing. Following that, the Caliph had it brought to him. He looked at it and, subsequently, ordered that it be buried. Fifty thousand dirhams were given to Saʿīd, and he was put in charge of the security (maʿūnah) of al-Baṣrah.

One of al-Mustaʿīn's pages (ghulām) said that when Saʿīd received al-Mustaʿīn, he had him dismount and ordered one of the Turks to 254. The text is manzilan lahu; it should be read manzilihi, as suggested by Ms. O.

[1672] kill him. Al-Mustaʿīn asked Saʿīd to grant him time until he finished two prostrations in prayer. Saʿīd asked the Turk to demand the cloak that al-Mustaʿīn was wearing before killing him; this he did. When al-Mustaʿīn bowed down for the second prostration, the Turk killed him and severed his head. Saʿīd then had him buried and hid the place of his burial.

Praising al-Muʿtazz, Muḥammad b. Marwān b. Abī al-Janūb b. Marwān b. Abī Ḥafṣah composed the following verse on the affair concerning al-Muʾayyad:

You are the one who holds the world fast if it ever trembles.
You can, indeed, hold both the world and religion if they tremble.

Your subjects, may God keep you for them, wish that with your justice you'll be preserved for generations.

You had to deal with a very difficult war, but your arrows were of hardwood, not of willow.

You were never the first head to be betrayed by a tail, for you were indeed the head, and the traitor [was] the tail.

If he had succeeded in accomplishing what he plotted, both Islam and royalty would have vanished.

He wanted to destroy our world and to devastate it.
But it was religion that he really wanted to destroy.

[1673] As soon as he rose in rebellion with his impudence, he found the imām of justice having already risen against him.

He shot an arrow at you but missed with it.
Whoever shoots his arrow at you, it boomerangs at him.

You had seen to it that he was well respected, while he was ungrateful and disrespectful [to you].

No brother had ever done so much good for another brother as you did.
We were always there to witness that.

You were always busy and drained by a war.
While he was playing, and you never charged him with any responsibility.

O generous one, he was always given without asking.
And you, generous one, always gave him with no requests.

You were more faithful to him than his own father;
you were indeed a father in faithfulness, not a brother.

His seat was always close to the throne of rule, but it was he who pulled away after he had been close.

He had several benefits that are now gone; he also had [1674] an open house and was visited, but now he is secluded.

He is now isolated, after his processions, twenty thousand men in groups were seen behind him.

Where are the ranks who used to rise with him every time he came and every time he went?

Now he is humiliated after his transgressions and insolence just like a big fish whose water has suddenly dried.

You have set every neck free from his allegiance.
no preacher would call his name if he ever preaches.

You gave him a title after elevating his rank,
as if God has exchanged his command for his title.

You dressed him with robes of glory, but he neglected it;
it was disregarded and thus was seized from him.

How many a time you shared with him your benefits, but God now removed him from grace because of his deeds.

He is just like a lamp which had lots of fire, but now you've left for him no light or flame.

[1675] The land grants [qaṭīʿah] to Ibrāhīm had already severed [qaṭaʿat]
the rope of peace and cut the rope of love.

You, generous one, never took anybody to task without succeeding in defeating them and exposing their faults.

I build my fame on praising the Banū ʿAbbās, and praise of the Banū ʿAbbās is now my name.

The fear of God, Banū ʿAbbās, has become your way of life, so much that Quraysh learn to conduct themselves from you.

Anyone who is brief in regard to your praise,
I am not with him, Thank God, nor am I brief.

Abū ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Fazārī,[255] reported what a young man from Sāmarrā had told him about the deeds of the people of Sāmarrā concerning the Turks: When the caliphate came to al-Muʿtazz and God gave him command over His servants wherever and whoever they might be, namely, the east, the west, on land, on sea, nomads or urban dwellers, in the plains or on mountains, he was displeased with the ill-advised choices of the people of Baghdad and with their rebellion. Al-Muʿtazz thus called for a group of clear-minded people who were good tempered, kind in their presumptions, sound in nature, of perceptive instincts and perfect for rational council. The Commander of the Faithful then said:

[1676] Won't you look at this band of lowly and foolish barbarians whose hypocrisy has become famous and whose aspirations have become base. There is no way to restrain them; they have

255. The reading is uncertain. It could also be read as Qānī, Fānī, etc., or probably Qāyinī.

no discernment or scrutiny. Their rush into folly has extolled their evil deeds; thus, they became a minority, in spite of their numbers, and are always cursed whenever they are mentioned. I have come to know that the only man who could lead armies, buttress the frontiers, carry out decisions and oversee the provinces is a man who has four main traits; namely, firmness with which to scrutinize things when the truth behind them is revealed, wisdom that restrains him from rashness and from taking risks without being certain of their results, courage that does not fail in times of repeated crises, and a generosity that regards as trivial the expenditure of great sums of money when they are called for. But if he were to have only three traits they ought to be: quick recompense for good deeds, harsh punishment against transgressors, and readiness for ominous events, for one is never certain of calamities. If there were to be only two traits, let them be: complete openness with subjects and fair judgement between the weak and the strong. If it were but a single trait, let that be: readiness for administering affairs, that [1677] is, never postponing a day's work until the next day. What do you think of that? I have already chosen men from among my mawlās possessing these traits. Each of them is known for his strength of will and determination. Each among them does not become arrogant in good time nor befuddled at times of crises. He is never frightened by what comes up behind him nor by that which confronts him, for he is like a crawling insect at the root of a bitter tree—it endures attacks and bites to kill. He is always prepared and his vengeance is stiff. He meets an army with a heart stronger than iron although his company may be few. He seeks revenge and cannot be subdued by armies. He is courageous and relentlessly (muqtaḍib al-anfās)[256] endures hardships. He is never dissuaded from what he seeks, and there is no refuge for anyone escaping from him. He is ready of mind and highly esteemed. He is not self-indulgent nor is he incapacitated by turns of fortune. When he rules, he does so completely, and when he promises, he always fulfills his promises. In war he is a genuine hero, and when he threatens he lives up to his

256. That is, short of breath; as if to say he can hold his breath as a sign of endurance.

threats. His shadow is indeed protective of all those who seek it, and his courage distinguishes him in battle. He overcomes those who vie with him, vanquishes those who rise against him, and is superior to anyone competing with him. He energizes those who are faithful to him.

One of those present stood up and said:

God has gathered for you, O Commander of the Faithful, all the virtues of eloquence [adab] and He has singled you out with the legacy of prophecy. He handed you the reigns of wisdom and favored you with the gift of dignity. He has granted you excessive discernment and He has enlightened your heart with the most precious knowledge and the clearest mind. Eloquence definitely [1678] flows from your heart. By God, your acumen, O Commander of the Faithful, is evident even to those who are not as gifted as you are with magnificent graces, immense generosity, praiseworthy virtues and nobility of character. Wisdom expresses itself in your speech. What you have perceived is the truth itself, and what you have comprehended is the right that has no blemish. By God, you, O Commander of the Faithful, are unique in character and the hero of your time. There is no description that does justice to your virtues and there are no adjectives that can delineate the particulars of the excellence of your nobility.

Following that, the Commander of the Faithful appointed his own supporters over the various districts, entrusting them completely with the fates of their enemies, and giving them the power of life and death over those who oppose them. When word reached Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh about the orders the Caliph issued regarding the districts, he composed the following letter (to the incumbents):

Indeed, whimsical error has led you astray from solid thinking, and thus entangled you in falsehood. If you had allowed the truth to rule you, you would have become discerning and would have been saved from ignorance and confusion. But now, if you lean towards peace, you will save yourselves and improve your lot. The Commander of the Faithful will forgive the crimes of the offenders amongst you, and he will single you out for the choicest benefits. But if you continue in your error and hope for your worst deeds, then you invite God's war and that of His Prophet. All excuses made on your behalf will be disregarded, for you will be associated with the wrong cause. Moreover, when battles begin, the flame of war is set ablaze, and war must run its full course. Swords begin to dismember their protectors, [1679] lances begin to quench their thirst, combat is called for, and heroes lock in battle. War exposes its jaws and teeth and totally unmasks its face. The necks of horses become tangled, and people of courage charge against those of folly. You will indeed come to know at that time which of the two factions finds it easy to challenge death, and which is mightier in enduring battle. Excuses will not be allowed, nor will ransom be accepted. Those who warn (of this) will surely be forgiven, and soon the unjust will surely know what change of fortune they will experience.[257]

When Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh's letter reached the Turks they wrote to him the following answer:

The embodiment of falsehood has revealed itself to you in the garb of truth. Thus folly appeared to you as wisdom, just like a mirage that appears as water to the thirsty but vanishes as one reaches it. And if you were to refocus the sharpness of your mind, it would enlighten you with rational proof and dispell the elements of suspicion. But you have strayed from the path of truth and swung back on account of your confusion, a confusion which has taken your full attention and obsessed you. You are just like one who has been enchanted by devils, perpetually wandering over the face of the earth. By your life, Muḥammad, your threats and admonishing have reached us, but they did not bring us any closer to you nor did they estrange us from you. For [1680] a close investigation has revealed your inner secrets and found you as if you were satisfied with the guidance of lightening—if it lights [in the sky] you would march, otherwise you would stay put. By your life, if your folly is to persist, and if you delve in the mist of hope, you will find yourself in total darkness, and we would come to you with troops, the likes of which you have never seen before. Be sure that you will come out of this totally humiliated and downtrodden. If we had not been waiting for the letter of the Commander of the Faithful concerning what we should do with the likes of you, we would have brought death with our whips,[258] piercing [flesh] even with our dull swords. We would have turned everything upside down and made [your dwellings] a refuge for ostriches, serpents and owls. We addressed you very clearly to make sure you heard us if you had any life in you. If you pay heed, you will be saved, but if you persist in your folly we will humiliate you, and you will soon be sorry.

257. Qur. 26:227.

On the first day of Rajab, 252 (July 18, 866), a battle took place between the Maghāribah and the Turks. For on that day the Maghāribah gathered under Muḥammad b. Rāshid and Naṣr b. Saʿīd. They overcame the Turks at the Jawsaq Palace and expelled them [1681] saying, "Every day you kill one caliph, depose another and kill a wazīr." The Turks had previously attacked ʿĪsā b. Farrukhānshāh, had him beaten and took his pack animals. When the Maghāribah expelled the Turks from the Jawsaq Palace and overcame them at the treasury, they seized fifty mounts from them. The Turks then gathered and sent for their compatriots in al-Karkh and al-Dūr.[259] Following that, they encountered the Maghāribah and killed one of them; however, the Maghāribah succeeded in capturing the killer. The Shākiriyyah and the rabble now assisted them and they wore down the Turks who capitulated to the Maghāribah. A reconciliation between the two groups was arranged by Jaʿfar b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid. They both agreed that they would not initiate any further action, and wherever a man of one group was to be stationed, a man from the other was to be with him. They kept that arrangement for a while, but when the Turks heard that the Maghāribah were gathering to Muḥammad b. Rāshid and Naṣr b. Saʿīd, they gathered under the command of Bāyakbāk saying, "We seek only those two heads and no one will say anything if we succeed in getting them." The morning of that day on which the Turks intended to attack them, Muḥammad b. Rāshid and Naṣr b. Saʿīd had already met and were on their way home when they heard that Bāyakbāk had come to the residence of Ibn Rāshid. Muḥammad b. Rāshid and Naṣr b. Sa'īd then changed course and went, instead, to the residence of Muḥammad b. 'Azzūn, where they intended to wait until the Turks calmed down. Following that, they would go back to their troops. A man betrayed them to Bāyakbāk and guided him to them. It was said that Ibn 'Azzūn sent the man who guided Bāyakbāk and the Turks to them. [1682] The Turks seized them and then killed them. When al-Mu'tazz heard about that he wanted to kill Ibn 'Azzūn. But words were spoken on his behalf, and the Caliph exiled him to Baghdad.

258. Balaghnā bi-l-siyāṭ al-niyāṭ, to be understood with the sense of bi-lā sawṭ wa-la nawṭ, which is said of something done voluntarily "without [the threat of] a whip or hanging."

259. See n. 39, above.

In that year, Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Khalaf al-'Aṭṭār was carried off from Baghdad to Sāmarrā together with a group of Ṭālibids, including Abū Aḥmad Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. Ḥasan b. Ja'far b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and Abū Hāshim Dāwūd b. al-Qāsim al-Ja'farī. That took place on the eighth of Sha'bān, 252 (August 24, 866).

The Reason For Their Being Carried Off

The reason was reportedly as follows. A Ṭālibid man came up with a group of regular troops and Shākiriyyah from Baghdad to the Kūfah district. Al-Kūfah and its environs were then in the charge of Abū al-Sāj, who was in Baghdad negotiating with Ibn Ṭāhir about his departure to al-Rayy.[260] When Ibn Ṭāhir learned of the Ṭālibid coming from Baghdad to the Kūfah district, he ordered Abū al-Sāj to return to his post in al-Kūfah. Abū al-Sāj, on the other hand, sent his deputy 'Abd al-Raḥmān ahead to al-Kūfah while he met with Abū Hāshim al-Ja'farī and a group of Ṭālibids in Baghdad. They spoke to him concerning the Ṭālibid who was going to al-Kūfah. Abū al-Sāj then responded, "Tell him to stay away from me, and I won't be looking for him." But when 'Abd al-Raḥmān, Abū al-Sāj's deputy, reached al-Kūfah and entered the city, he was pelted with stones all [1683] the way until he reached the mosque, for people thought that he had come to fight the 'Alid. When he explained to them (that he was) not intending to (and that he was) simply a man sent to fight the bedouins, they left him alone, and he took up his position at al-Kūfah.

260. See above, pp. 1656–1657 of the Leiden edition, concerning the appointment of Abū al-Sāj over the lands irrigated by the Euphrates.

This Abū Aḥmad b. Jaʿfar, the Ṭālibid whom I mentioned among those Ṭālibids carried off to Sāmarrā, had been appointed by al-Muʿtazz over al-Kūfah. This was after Muzāḥim b. Khāqān defeated the ʿAlid whom he was sent there to fight. All this is mentioned above in the appropriate place. This Abū Aḥmad reportedly devastated the regions around al-Kūfah, causing harm to people while seizing their possessions and estates. When Abū al-Sāj's deputy positioned himself in al-Kūfah, he treated Abū Aḥmad, the ʿAlid, gently and gained his confidence. Having befriended each other, they shared food and drink. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān then strolled with him in one of the gardens of al-Kūfah, after alerting his companions (of his secret intentions). He put the ʿAlid in shackles, and at night he carried him off in chains on the government service mules (bighāl al-dukhūl).[261] He brought him to Baghdad on the first day of Rabīʿ II (April 21, 866). When he reached Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the latter imprisoned Abū Aḥmad at his palace. Later, he took a surety from him and set him free. Letters from al-Ḥasan b. Zayd were found in the possession of one of the nephews of Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Khalaf al-ʿAṭṭār, and when the news about this reached al-Muʿtazz, he sent word ordering him to be sent off with ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb. These Ṭālibids were all transported together with fifty horsemen, including this Abū Aḥmad, Abū Hāshim al-Jaʿfarī, and ʿAlī b. ʿUbaydallāh [1684] b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥasan b. Jaʿfar b. Ḥasan b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

People talked about ʿAlī b. ʿUbaydallāh, saying that he had asked for permission to go to his residence in Sāmarrā and that it had been granted to him. It was also said that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh granted him one thousand dirhams, simply because he complained to him of his difficult straits. As for Abū Hāshim, he bid farewell to his family. It was said that he was carried away because Ibn al-Kurdiyyah and ʿAbdallāh b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā had told al-Muʿtazz, "If you write to Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh asking him to send away Dāwūd b. al-Qāsim, he would not do so. Write to him that you wish to dispatch Dāwūd to Ṭabaristān to set its affairs in order. Once he comes to you, you can do with him as you see fit." He was carried away as a result, and no harm ever befell him.

261. The text literally means "mules of the intimate service" and may be a reference to their status in having access to the caliphal complex. For such provisions of security, see Lassner, Shaping, 184f.

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Shawārib was appointed as chief judge. Regarding the other legal appointments Muḥammad b. ʿImrān al-Ḍabbī, al-Muʿtazz's teacher, had nominated on the latter's behalf eight men, including al-Khalanjī and al-Khaṣṣāf. He had already written their letters of appointment, but Shafīʿ al-Khādim, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Kurdiyyah, and ʿAbd al-Samīʿ b. Hārūn b. Sulaymān b. Abī Jaʿfar stopped him, saying, "These men are followers of Ibn Abī Du'ād[262] and are among the Rāfiḍites, Qadarites, Zaydites or Jahmites."[263] Al-Muʿtazz then ordered that they be expelled and exiled to Baghdad. The populace then attacked al-Khaṣṣāf, and the others fled to Baghdad on their own. Al-Ḍabbī was discharged from all his duties except for the court of appeals (maẓālim).

The estimated payments required by the Turks, the Maghāribah and the Shākiriyyah for this year reportedly reached two hundred million dīnārs, which was equal to two years of taxes (kharāj) collected for the entire realm. [1685]

In this year, Abū al-Sāj was sent to the Mecca Road. The reason for that was said to have been as follows. When Waṣīf was restored to his rank, he was given the signet of al-Muʿtazz. He then wrote to Abū al-Sāj ordering him to go out to the Mecca Road and repair it. He also sent him the needed funds. Abū al-Sāj had begun preparations when Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh wrote asking that he be put in charge of the Mecca Road. This request was approved, and Abū al-Sāj was sent on the latter's behalf.

On the first of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (December 13, 866), ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh b. al-Salīl was appointed governor of al-Ramlah, whereupon he sent his deputy Abū al-Maghrā' to the city. It was also said that he payed Bughā forty thousand dīnārs for the position, or that he guaranteed that sum to him.[264]

In this year, Waṣīf wrote to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf, appointing him over al-Jabal. He also sent him the cloaks signifying his appointment, and ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz ruled on his behalf.

262. That is, Aḥmad b. Abī Du'ād, a famous Muʿtazilite qāḍī under al-Ma'mūn. See EI^{2}, I, 271, and Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, I, 81–91.

263. For these sects, see Nawbakhtī, Firaq, and Shahrastānī, Milal. The reference here is that they are all followers of unorthodox sects, and thus would be dangerous if appointed to official positions. It is also a reflection on al-Ḍabbī himself.

264. The text is ḍamanaha, that is, "he vouched" that he would pay that specific sum for it.

In Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 252 (November 13–December 17, 866), one of Ayyūb b. Aḥmad's lieutenants killed Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Shārī in Diyār Rabīʿah.

In this year, Kanjūr fell from favor and was imprisoned at the Jawsaq Palace. Later, he was carried away to Baghdad in chains. Finally, he was sent to al-Yamāmah where he was imprisoned.

[1686] In (this year), Ibn Justān, the leader of the Daylamites, raided al-Rayy together with Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā al-ʿAlawī and al-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad al-Kawkabī. They killed many people and took others as prisoners. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was in the city at the time of their attack, but he managed to flee. The people of al-Rayy made peace with them by paying two million dirhams. When Ibn Justān departed from the city, Ibn ʿAzīz returned and captured Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā, whom he sent off to Naysābūr.

Also in this year, Ismāʿīl b. Yūsuf the Ṭālibid, who did what he did in Mecca, died.

Leading the pilgrimage this year on behalf of al-Muʿtazz was Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. al-Manṣūr.

The Events of the Year

253

(JANUARY 11, 867–DECEMBER 31, 867)

Among these events, al-Mu'tazz appointed Mūsā b. Bughā the Elder governor of al-Jabal on the fourth day of Rajab (July 10, 867). At the time Bughā had an army of Turks and equivalent troops that amounted to 2,443 men. Mufliḥ commanded 1,530 of them.

In this year, on the twenty-second of Rajab (July 28, 867), Mufliḥ, who commanded the vanguard of Mūsā b. Bughā's army, attacked 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf, who led a force consisting of some [1687] twenty thousand vagabonds and others. The battle between them was said to have taken place about one mīl (two km)[265] outside Hamadhān. Mufliḥ succeeded in pushing 'Abd al-'Azīz back for some three farsakhs (eighteen km), killing some of the latter's men and taking others captive. Mufliḥ and his men returned unharmed; he dispatched the news of this victory that very day. During the month of Ramaḍān (September 4–October 3, 867), Mufliḥ arrayed his cavalry against al-Karaj[266] where he set up two ambushes. 'Abd al-'Azīz, on his part, sent an army of four thousand men, whereupon Mufliḥ engaged them in combat. Mufliḥ's ambushers attacked 'Abd al-'Azīz's men, and the latter fled. Mufliḥ's men put them to the 265. One mil is about two kilometers. See Hinz, Masse, 63.

266. In the area of Jibāl, western modern Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 197–8, where it is simply identified as Karaj Abū Dulaf.

sword, killing and taking prisoners from among them. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, who came to the aid of his followers, fled along with them. He then left al-Karaj and went to one of his fortresses nearby, called Diz, where he fortified himself. As for Mufliḥ, he went into al-Karaj and took a group from the family of Abū Dulaf as prisoners. He also seized some of their womenfolk, including, it is said, the mother of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, and had them bound. Mufliḥ reportedly sent seventy loads of heads to Sāmarrā and a great number of banners.

In this year, Mūsā b. Bughā left Sāmarrā for Hamadhān and set up camp there.

Also in this year, al-Muʿtazz bestowed cloaks of honor upon Bughā al-Sharābī and dressed him with a crown and two sashes. He wore the sashes from the time he left (the Caliph's chambers) until he reached his residence.

On the twenty-sixth of Shawwāl, 253 (October 29, 867), Waṣīf the Turk was killed. The reason for his death was reportedly as follows. The Turks, the Farāghinah and Ushrūsanis rioted, demanding four months of their allotments. Meeting them were Bughā, Waṣīf, Sīma [1688] al-Sharābī and about a hundred of their followers. Waṣīf addressed them saying, "What do you want?" They responded, "Our allotments." He then said, "Take dust. Do we have any money?" Bughā said, "Yes. Let's ask the Commander of the Faithful about this and then negotiate in the residence of Ashnās. But let those who do not belong to your group depart." Then they went into the residence of Ashnās, and Sīma al-Sharābī left for Sāmarrā. After that, he was followed by Bughā, in order to secure the Caliph's permission concerning their pay. Waṣīf was left to their mercy, and one of them attacked him twice with a sword while another stabbed him with a knife. Nūsharā b. Ṭājibak, who was one of his officers, then carried Waṣīf to his residence. When Bughā was late in returning, they thought that the Turks were mobilizing against them. Therefore they brought Waṣīf out of Nūsharā's residence and hit him with axes until they broke his arms and decapitated him. Then they placed his head on top of a stick which was used to stir bread ovens. The common people of Sāmarrā rushed to loot the residence of Waṣīf and those of his sons, but the sons had already returned to defend their houses. Following this episode, al-Muʿtazz entrusted Bughā al-Sharābī with all of Waṣīf's duties.

On the day of the Fiṭr (Feast) this year (October 4, 867), Bundār al-Ṭabarī was killed.

The Reason For His Death

The circumstances were as follows. A Khārijite (muḥakkim) known as Musāwir b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd rebelled (ḥakkama) in al-Bawāzīj[267] during the month of Rajab, 253 (July 7–August 5, 876). Al-Muʿtazz dispatched Sātikīn against him during the month of Ramaḍān (September 4–October 3, 867). The rebel then headed towards the Khurāsān Road, and Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh was dispatched against him. The latter had entrusted the Khurāsān Road to the armed men of Bundār and Muẓaffar b. Saysal. When they reached the Daskarat al-Malik[268] they took up positions. Bundār reportedly went out to hunt on the last day of Ramaḍān (October 3, 867). He went far in search of his prey, indeed, he passed about a farsakh (six km) beyond the houses of al-Daskarah. While preoccupied with this, he saw two banners being carried by a group of people on their way to the city. He therefore sent some of his men to find out about the banners. They were told by the leader of the group that he was the governor of Karkh Juddān,[269] and that he had heard of a man by the name of Musāwir b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, one of the dihqāns of al-Bawāzīj; the latter had risen in rebellion and the governor had received word that Musāwir was on his way to Karkh Juddān. Upon hearing that, the governor fled to al-Daskarah to take solace near Bundār and Muẓaffar. Bundār immediately went to Muẓaffar and told him, "The rebel is on his way to Karkh Juddān and will be seeking us next. Let's go after him first." Al-Muẓaffar retorted, "It's evening and we wish to pray the Friday prayer. Moreover, tomorrow is the holiday (ʿīd). Once the Fiṭr is over, we will go after him." Bundār refused (to wait) and set out immediately, hoping to defeat the rebel by himself without Muẓaffar. As for Muẓaffar, he remained at al- [1689]

267. In the eastern part of the Jazīrah area. See Le Strange, Lands, 91.

268. The next station on the Khurāsān Road after Nahrawān, northeast of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 62.

269. Close to the border between Iraq and Iran. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 449.

Daskarah. The city itself was eight farsakhs (forty-eight km) from Tell 'Ukbarā'[270] and the distance between 'Ukbarā' and the battle-[1690] field was four farsakhs (twenty-four km).

Bundār set out to Tell 'Ukbarā', reaching it at dusk on the eve of the Fiṭr (October 3, 867). He fed his animals, and following that he rode off until he overlooked the rebel camp. This was during the night while the people were praying and reading the Qur'ān. Some of his followers and associates suggested that he let them sleep without knowing of his presence. But he refused, saying, "Not until I face them and they face me." He then sent out two or three horsemen to bring back information. When they came close to the rebel camp, the latter gave warning, and cried out, "To arms!" Then they mounted their horses and stood for battle waiting for morning, when the battle was waged. Bundār's men were unable to shoot a single arrow, although they were (a force of) about three hundred cavalry and infantry. He therefore arrayed them in a formation consisting of right and left flanks and a rear, while he himself was positioned in the center. Musāwir and his followers charged them, but Bundār and his followers stood firm. The rebel then moved away from their camp and their night shelter, in order to entice Bundār and his followers into looting. But Bundār and his followers stayed away from the camp. Following that, the rebels counterattacked with swords and lances; there were about seven hundred of them. Neither party gave way. The rebels resorted to swords and disregarded lances, thus losing some fifty of their men. A similar number of Bundār's men were killed. Then, in one charge, the rebels managed to isolate about a hundred of Bundār's followers. The latter gave battle for a while, but soon all of them were killed. Bundār and his men retreated and the rebels isolated groups of them, one group after another, and then killed them. Bundār continued to flee and was persistently sought. The rebels caught up with him near Tell 'Ukbarā', about four farsakhs (twenty-four km) from the battlefield. They killed him and fixed his severed head (to a pole). Only about [1691] fifty men, some say a hundred, of Bundār's followers managed to escape by wandering away from the battlefield at a time when the Khārijites were occupied in cutting them in groups. News of Bundār reached Muẓaffar—he was still in al-Daskarah. He therefore pulled out from the city and drew closer to Baghdad.

270. See n. 90, above.

The news of Bundār's death reached Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh the day after the Fiṭr. It was said that he did not drink or amuse himself, as he used to do, for he was struck with grief on account of the news of Bundār's death. Musāwir went immediately to Ḥulwān, where he was met by the populace who fought him. He killed some four hundred persons while they killed a group of the rebel's followers. Moreover, a group of pilgrims from Khurāsān who were in the city were also killed; they had supported the people of Ḥulwān. Following that, the pilgrims departed.

During the night of the fourteenth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 253 (November 15, 867), there was an eclipse of the moon that was either total or almost so.[271] Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir reportedly died by the end of the eclipse, having succumbed to ulcers that appeared on his head and throat. The ulcers on his head and throat were reportedly big enough for wicks to be inserted into them. When he died his brother ʿUbaydallāh and his son Ṭāhir vied with one another for who would pray over him. His son finally said the prayers; it was said that this was Ibn Ṭāhir's wish. Later, a dispute arose between ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh, the brother of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, and the latter's household retinue. It reached the point of their drawing swords against him, and he was pelted with stones. The rabble, the common people, and the mawlās of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm sided with Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir and shouted, "Victory to Ṭāhir [Ṭāhir yā manṣūr]!" As for ʿUbaydallāh, he crossed over to his [1692] residence on the East Side. The commanders sided with him, for Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh had deputized ʿUbaydallāh in his will. ʿUbaydallāh was to take over (Muḥammad's) functions. Muḥammad had also written of this to his governors. Following that, al-Muʿtazz sent ʿUbaydallāh robes of honor and the document signifying him to be the governor of Baghdad. The latter was said to have ordered that fifty thousand dirhams be given to the person who brought the robes on behalf of al-Muʿtazz.

The following is a copy of the letter of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh to 271. This eclipse did indeed take place. See Oppolzer, Canon, No. 3206, Julian Day 2038048.

his governors, in which he deputized his brother ʿUbaydallāh to succeed him:

> Now, God has decreed death for those of his creatures who still live, as it was for those who are gone. Anyone who has been granted some of God's grace should prepare himself at all times to meet the unavoidable and the inescapable. I write now while I am afflicted by a terrible illness that causes despair to almost overshadow hope. If God were to cure me, it would be because of His might and His usual benevolence. But if I were to be struck with the same fate as those dead and alive, I would deputize ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, my brother, and the one trusted to follow my example and to execute what I am entrusted with by the Commander of the Faithful until he receives his orders to act accordingly. You shall obey the commands dispatched to you by ʿUbaydallāh, if God so wills it. Written on Thursday the thirteenth of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (November 14, 867).

[1693] In this year, al-Muʿtazz exiled Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil to Wāsiṭ and then to al-Baṣrah. Later, he was brought to Baghdad and made to reside on the East Side in the palace of Dīnār b. ʿAbdallāh.[272]

In this year, ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaṣim was also expelled to Wāsiṭ and later brought to Baghdad.

Also in this year, Muzāḥim b. Khāqān died in Egypt during the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (December 2–31, 867).

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Zaynabī.

In this year, the Muslims raided in the district of Malaṭiyah, under the command of Muḥammad b. Muʿādh. They were, however, routed, and Muḥammad b. Muʿādh was taken prisoner. This took place in Dhū al-Qaʿdah (November 2–December 1, 867).

In this year, Mūsā b. Bughā met the Ṭālibid al-Kawkabī in battle, one farsakh (six km) from Qazwīn. This was on Monday the last day of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (December 1, 867). Mūsā routed al-Kawkabī, who 272. For more information on Dīnār b. ʿAbdallāh, see Sourdel, Vizirat, 223, and FHA, 357, 445, 456. The exact location of his residence in East Baghdad can not be determined any further.

then linked up with the Daylamites. Mūsā b. Bughā then entered Qazwīn.

I was told the following by those who witnessed the battle. The Daylamites who were with al-Kawkabī stood in rows when they met Mūsā and his followers, and they held their shields in front of them to avert the arrows of Mūsā's men. When Mūsā saw that the arrows of his men were ineffective, he ordered that all the oil that he had be poured on the ground on his side of the battlefield. Then he ordered his men to retreat, pretending that they were defeated, which they did. When al-Kawkabī and his followers thought that Mūsā's men had been routed they took after them. When Mūsā learned that al-Kawkabī's followers had reached the middle of the oil, he called for torches and a fire was subsequently lit. The flames [1694] took to the oil and reached the ground under al-Kawkabī's men where it incinerated some; the others fled. It was at that point that they were defeated, and Mūsā entered Qazwīn.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year (December 2–31, 867), Khuṭārmish met Musāwir the Khārijite in battle in the district of Jalūlā'. He was defeated by Musāwir.

The Events of the Year

254

(JANUARY 1—DECEMBER 19, 868)

Among those events was the killing of Bughā al-Sharābī.

The Circumstances Leading to His Death

The circumstances were reportedly as follows. Bughā al-Sharābī used to urge al-Muʿtazz to go to Baghdad, but the latter would refuse him that. One day, when Bughā was occupied with the wedding of his daughter Jumʿah to Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf—they were married in the middle of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (November 5, 868)—al-Muʿtazz rode off at night together with Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl to Karkh Sāmarrā. They were seeking Bāyakbāk and his men because he was estranged from Bughā. The cause of this estrangement was that one day, while they were sharing a drink, the two quarreled and parted ways. As a result, Bāyakbāk was fleeing from, Bughā and hiding from him. Now when [1695] al-Muʿtazz and his company reached al-Karkh the people of al-Karkh and al-Dūr gathered around Bāyakbāk and proceeded with al-Muʿtazz to the Jawsaq Palace in Sāmarrā. When the news reached Bughā he set out with his pages, who were around five hundred men, and a similar number drawn from his sons, his followers and his officers. He proceeded until reaching the river Nayzak. Later on, he shifted to other places before arriving at al-Sinn.[273] He carried with him coins—nineteen pouches of dīnārs, and one hundred pouches of dirhams. He had taken the money from his own treasury and that of the government, and he had barely spent any of it when he was killed.

When Bughā heard that al-Mu'tazz had come to al-Karkh with Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl, he reportedly marched with those commanders closest to him to Tell 'Ukbarā', and from there he went to al-Sinn. His men began to complain to one another about the hardship that they were facing, for they had not moved out with tents nor with anything to keep them warm from the winter cold. While Bughā was in a small tent that he had pitched for himself by the Tigris, Sātikīn came to him and said, "May God favor the amīr. The people in camp have already discussed such and such a thing and I am their messenger to you." Bughā then asked, "Do they all say what you say?" He answered, "Yes. If you wish, send for them; they will speak as I do." To this Bughā responded, "Let me look into this tonight; I'll send word out to you in the morning." In the darkness of the night, he called for a skiff and sailed away with two of his servants, taking along some of the money. But he took no weapons, not even a knife nor a club. Nor did he inform the people at his camp of this. From [1696] the time of Bughā's absence, al-Mu'tazz slept in his clothes, fully armed. Moreover, he would drink no wine, and he entrusted all of his maids to one man. Bughā reached the bridge in the first third of the night. As the skiff drew near, the men in charge (of the bridge) sent someone to look into the skiff, but the young man turned back as Bughā yelled at him. Bughā escaped into the garden of the Khāqānī[274] Palace. Having been followed by a group of them, he halted for them and said, "I am Bughā." Walīd al-Maghribī, who had followed him, then replied, "What's the matter with you? I am at your service." Bughā replied, "Take me to the residence of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf or accompany me to my house so that I can reward you." Al-Walīd al-Maghribī put him in someone's care and galloped off to the Jawsaq Palace, where he sought an audience with al-Mu'tazz. When 273. He seems to have gone in the direction of Jazīrah, for Sinn was on the postal route from Baghdad to Mosul on the eastern bank of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 125, 90, 91, 133, and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 268–9.

274. For more information, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 175; Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 258; and n. 21, above.

it was granted, he said, "My Lord, I have captured Bughā and put someone in charge of him." To which the Caliph exclaimed, "Woe unto you if you don't bring me his head." Walīd then returned to those in charge of him and said, "Stand aside, so I can deliver the dispatch to him." When they moved away, he struck him a blow on the forehead, and then the head. Then he went on to his hands, cutting them off. He kept striking Bughā until he felled him and then killed him. He carried Bughā's severed head in the folds of his garment and brought it to al-Muʿtazz, who granted him ten thousand dīnārs and a robe of honor. The head was hung first in Sāmarrā, then in Baghdad. The Maghāribah, pounced on his corpse and put the torch to it. As for al-Muʿtazz, he sent immediately for Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl, al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad, and Abū Nūḥ. He invited them into his presence and then told them the news. In Baghdad, ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir pursued Bughā's sons one after another. They had fled to the city with some people they had trusted, and were now hiding at their [1697] homes. Fifteen of his children and followers were reportedly imprisoned in the Gold Palace, and ten at the Maṭbaq Prison.[275]

It was also said that when Bughā went to Sāmarrā on the evening he was seized, he consulted his companions about his trip. He indicated that he would go to the residence of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, and at the approach of the holiday (ʿīd), the troops would enter (the city) while he and Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf and his men would march against the Maghāribah and al-Muʿtazz.

In this year, Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf appointed Dīwdād governor of Diyār Muḍar, Qinnasrīn and the ʿAwāṣim.[276] This took place in Rabīʿ I (February 29–March 29, 868).

In (this year) Bāyakbāk appointed Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn over Egypt.

In Rabīʿ I, 254 (February 29–March 29, 868), Mufliḥ and Bajūr attacked the people of Qumm[277] killing a great number of them.

275. For Maṭbaq Prison, see Le Strange, Baghdad, 27 who locates it in the southern part of the Round City at the intersection of the roads leading to the Baṣrah and the Kūfah Gates respectively. Qaṣr al-Dhahab (Gold Palace) was in the center of the Round City, ibid., 31, and Lassner, Topography.

276. In northern Syria, west of Aleppo, with Antioch as the capital city for most of the time. See Le Strange, Palestine, 36–37. See also Aboulfeda, Géographie, 233. According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 165, the name is derived from the singular ʿāṣim, meaning "an obstruction," because it was applied to a series of fortresses in this area bordering Byzantium and were thus like obstructions to the enemy. The exact extent of the area called ʿawāṣim varied.

On Monday, the twenty-fifth of Jumādā II (June 21, 868), ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Mūsā al-Riḍā died. Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil prayed over him in the quarter named after Abū Aḥmad,[278] and he was buried in his own residence.

In Jumādā II (May 28–June 25, 868), Dulaf b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf arrived at al-Ahwāz because his father ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz had sent word for him to go there and to Jundī Sābūr and Tustar.[279] Dulaf collected two hundred thousand dīnārs in taxes at these places and then departed.

During the month of Ramaḍān, 254 (August 24–September 22, 868), Nūsharā marched against Musāwir the rebel. Upon encountering Musāwir he routed him, killing a great number of his followers.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad. [1698]

277. That is, in northwest Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 209, 210, 227, 229.

278. For this quarter of Sāmarrā, see Yaʿqūbī, Buldān, 260, 261.

279. Jundī Sāpūr was a pre-Islamic city in western Iran, known for its hospital and for its intellectual life. Most of the physicians of the early ʿAbbasid caliphs, like the Bakhtīshūʿ family, came from this city. See Schoffler, Akademie. For its location, as well as that of Tūstar, see Le Strange, Lands, 233, 238, 247 and 233–236.

The Events of the Year

255

(DECEMBER 20, 868–DECEMBER 8, 869)

Among the events taking place were Mufliḥ's entry into Ṭabaristān and the battle that he fought with al-Ḥasan b. Zayd the Ṭālibid. In this battle Mufliḥ defeated al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, who then linked up with the Daylamites. Following that, Mufliḥ entered Āmul and burned the residences of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. Having done that, he set out for al-Daylam in pursuit of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

In this year, Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth fought a battle with Ṭawq b. al-Mughallis outside Kirmān. In this battle Yaʿqūb took Ṭawq prisoner. The circumstances of that event were reportedly as follows. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh b. Shibl wrote to the central authorities asking for the governorship of Kirmān. He had previously served as governor for the Ṭāhirids. He wrote complaining about the weakness of the Ṭāhirids and how little control they exercised over the regions that they were responsible for. Moreover, he mentioned that Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth had taken over Sijistān from them, and that he had been lax in sending the tax revenues of Fars to the central authorities. The authorities wrote back, appointing him over Kirmān, but they also wrote to Yaʿqūb giving him the same appointment, thus hoping to incite one against the other. Should this have come to pass, the central authorities would only have to supply the victo-[1699] rious of the two, thereby saving the share of the other. For both were at war with the authorities, and none displayed any obedience. When they did that to the two of them, Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth marched from Sijistān seeking Kirmān. But as soon as ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn received word that Yaʿqūb was marching with a large army from Fārs to Kirmān, he dispatched Ṭawq b. al-Mughallis who managed to reach Kirmān before Yaʿqūb. Ṭawq entered the city as Yaʿqūb approached from Sijistān, one day's journey from Kirmān.

I was told by those who witnessed what went on between the two that Yaʿqūb remained in the position that he had established for himself, about a day's journey from Kirmān. He stayed there for about a month or two, spying on Ṭawq, and interrogating anyone who came out of Kirmān towards him. Also, he would not let any- [1700] one going to Kirmān pass through his army in this sector. But neither he nor Ṭawq would march against one another. After some time, Yaʿqūb gave indications that he left his camp to journey in the direction of Sijistān. He had, in fact, put a day's journey between himself and the camp. When word of his journey reached Ṭawq, he thought that it had become evident to Yaʿqūb what it would cost to fight him, and that Yaʿqūb had thus conceded Kirmān to him and to ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn. He then put aside the implements of war and started drinking while calling for entertainment. Through all this, Yaʿqūb continuously sought information about him. When he learned that Ṭawq had put away the implements of war and had started to drink and entertain himself at his alleged departure, he swung back covering two day's journey in one. As Ṭawq was still drinking and playing about, he only noticed towards the end of daylight that a cloud of dust had risen outside the city of Kirmān in which he was staying. He asked the villagers, "What is this cloud of dust?" He was told, "It is the dust of the villager's cattle returning to their owners." But very soon after that (lam yakun illa kalā walā) Yaʿqūb and his men arrived and surrounded him and his followers. When surrounded, Ṭawq's followers thought of protecting their lives. Yaʿqūb then ordered his men, "Make room for them." This they did; whereupon, Ṭawq's men fled before them, leaving behind in their camp all that they had with them. Yaʿqūb then took Ṭawq as prisoner.

Ibn Ḥammād al-Barbarī (reported that) when ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn dispatched Ṭawq, he sent him off with several coffers. Some of them [1701] contained necklaces and bracelets of honor to be granted to those men who fought valiantly at his side; some contained money to be dispensed as rewards to those of his men who were deserving, while still others contained chains and shackles to bind those men of Yaʿqūb who would be seized. When Yaʿqūb took Ṭawq prisoner along with the army commanders accompanying him, he ordered that everything belonging to Ṭawq and his men was to be confiscated. This included money, household items, animals and weapons. All this was confiscated and assembled before him; the coffers that were brought remained locked. Yaʿqūb ordered that some of them be opened, and when it was done, he discovered the chains and shackles. He then addressed Ṭawq, "O Ṭawq! What about these chains and shackles?" He replied, "ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn had given them to me for binding the prisoners." Yaʿqūb then ordered one of his men, "Hey you, see which is the biggest and the heaviest of them, place it on Ṭawq's feet and lock it." He did the same to the prisoners he had taken from among Ṭawq's men.

Following that, he called for the other coffers. They were opened, and he discovered the necklaces and bracelets. He then asked Ṭawq, "O Ṭawq! And what is that?" He replied, "They were given to me to decorate those of my men who fought valiantly." Yaʿqūb then or-[1702] dered one of his men, "Hey you, take from that one such a necklace and such a bracelet and give them to so and so." He began to decorate his own followers, and he did the same with the other coffers.

When Yaʿqūb ordered Ṭawq to extend his hand so that he could shackle him, he discovered a bandage on his forearm; whereupon he asked, "What is that, O Ṭawq?" He replied, "May God favor the amīr, I had felt some fever, and had it bled." Yaʿqūb then summoned one of his men and ordered him to slip off his boots. When he did, dried crumbs of bread fell out. He then said to Ṭawq, "I have not taken these boots off for two months. I carry the bread which I eat in them and have not slept on a bed. And you sit and drink and act frivolously in this way, hoping for a battle in which to fight me?" When Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth finished with Ṭawq, he entered Kirmān, taking possession of the region. Along with Sijistān it became one of his provinces.

In this year, Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth entered Fārs and took ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh prisoner.

Why and How He Captured Him

Ibn Ḥammād al-Barbarī (reported the following). At that time I was in Fārs with ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh. Word reached him about the battle between Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth and his (ʿAlī's) follower Ṭawq b. al-Mughallis and how Yaʿqūb had entered Kirmān and annexed the region. When the defeated army reached him, he was certain [1703] that Yaʿqūb would be coming to Fārs. ʿAlī himself was at that time in Shīrāz in the province of Fārs. He mobilized his army as well as the infantry of Ṭawq's defeated army among others. After arming them he emerged from Shīrāz to a narrow reservoir (kurr)[280] outside the city. The open area between the reservoir, which is contiguous to the city, and the opposite mountain was wide enough for only one man or one animal. Its narrowness did not allow more than one man to pass at a time. He then established a position there and set up camp on the bank of the reservoir close to Shīrāz. He brought along the market people and merchants of Shīrāz to his camp saying, "If Yaʿqūb comes he will find no way to reach us through the desert; for he has no avenue of approach except this open area between the mountain and the reservoir, and it is wide enough for only one man. Were but a single man positioned there, he would be able to prevent anyone from passing through. And if he is unable to pass through to us, he will be left out in the open plain where there is no food for him and his men, nor will he find fodder for their animals."

Ibn Ḥammād (continued). Yaʿqūb proceeded until he approached the reservoir. On the first day, he ordered his followers to set up camp about a mīl[281] from the reservoir on the Kirmān side. Then he proceeded alone, carrying a ten-cubit lance (rumḥ ʿushārī). I can still picture him proceeding alone on his mount accompanied by only a [1704] single man. He examined the reservoir, the mountain and the road. Drawing close to the reservoir, he examined the camp of ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn as well. ʿAlī's followers started cursing him saying, "We will send you back to the people of copper caldrons and boilers, you copper worker."[282] He remained silent, offering no response.

---

280. The translation of kurr as a reservoir follows Firūzābādī, Qāmūs, II, 130, where it is identified as a water well. The sense of a water reservoir is the only one that makes sense of this difficult passage.

281. See n. 265.

282. Ṣaffār is a reference to the fact that Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth was a founder of the Ṣaffārid dynasty that ruled for centuries over a large part of Persia, centered around

After examining what he had come to see, he returned to his men. When it was noon of the following day he came forward with his companions and men until they reached the bank of the reservoir which is on the Kirmān side. He then issued orders for his men to dismount and remove their baggage. He then opened a chest that he had brought along.

Ibn Ḥammād (continued). I can still picture them. They let loose a wolfhound and then mounted their steeds bareback, holding lances in hand. Before that ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn had arrayed his troops in battle formation and arranged them in rows to guard the passage between the mountain and the reservoir, seeing that there was no other way for Yaʿqūb to cross through. They brought the dog and threw it into the reservoir while he and ʿAlī's followers watched and laughed. When they threw the dog in the reservoir, the dog started to swim to the side where ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn's camp was situated. Yaʿqūb's men then urged their animals to follow behind the dog. Carrying their lances in their hands, they started across after the dog.[283]

When ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn saw that Yaʿqūb had already crossed most of the reservoir, and was coming towards him and his men, he be-[1705] came confused and failed to devise another plan. Yaʿqūb's men soon came out of the reservoir in pursuit of ʿAī b. al-Ḥusayn's followers. As soon as the lead troops came out (of the water), ʿAlī's men fled seeking the city of Shīrāz. For, once the army of Yaʿqūb came out of the water, they would be trapped between the army and the reservoir and would find no refuge if they were routed. After Yaʿqūb's troops came out of the reservoir, ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn fled along with his men, but his mount stumbled and threw him to the ground. One of the Sijistānīs encountered ʿAlī, intending to strike him with his sword, when one of his servants called out, "The amīr." The Sijistānī dismounted and wrapped his scarf around ʿAlī's neck, and then he dragged him to Yaʿqūb. When he came with him to Yaʿqūb, the latter gave orders that ʿAlī be bound and that all the implements of war that were in ʿAlī's camp, including, among other things, the weapons and animals, be brought to him. He held his position well

---

Sistān. See Bosworth, Dynasties, 104. Yaʿqūb himself gave this name to the dynasty because he traded as a coppersmith.

283. The text seems to imply that the dog's swimming encouraged the animals to swim after it, hence allowing main divisions of the army to cross over, and not come out one at a time.

into the night and then marched from that place. Ya'qūb entered the city of Shīrāz at night as his men beat the drums. No one in the city moved (to oppose him). When he greeted the morning, he allowed his followers to loot the residences of 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn and his followers. After that, he looked at everything that had been gathered at the treasury, including the tax and estate revenues. He confiscated it, and levied a tax (of his own), which he collected. Ya'qūb then left for Sijistān, taking along with him Ibn Quraysh and those of his commanders that were taken prisoner.

In this year, Ya'qūb b. al-Layth sent to al-Mu'tazz several steeds, [1706] hawks, some musk and various garments as presents.

In this year, Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir was appointed Chief of Security in Baghdad and the Sawād. This took place on the sixth of Rabī' II (March 24, 869). Having come from Khurāsān, he reportedly arrived at Sāmarrā on Thursday, the eighth of Rabī' I (February 24, 869), went straight to al-Ītākhiyyah,[284] and presented himself for an audience with al-Mu'tazz on Saturday. Al-Mu'tazz bestowed robes of honor upon him and Sulaymān then departed.

In this year, 255 (869), a battle took place between Musāwir, the rebel, and Yārjūkh. The rebel routed Yārjūkh, who then fled to Sāmarrā.

Al-Mu'allā b. Ayyūb died during the month of Rabī' II, 255 (March 19–April 16, 869).

In this year, Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf seized Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl, al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad, and Abū Nūḥ 'Īsā b. Ibrāhīm. He put them in chains and demanded money for them. The reason for that was reportedly as follows. These secretaries had gathered to drink on Wednesday, the second of Jumādā II, 255 (May 18, 869). On Thursday morning, Ibn Isrā'īl rode off at the head of a large contingent to the Public Audience Hall (Dār al-Sulṭān) where he held audiences, while Ibn Makhlad rode off to the residence of Qabīḥah, the mother of al-Mu'tazz, for he was her secretary. Abū Nūḥ, in turn, was present at the pal- [1707] ace[285] while al-Mu'tazz was asleep. When he woke up towards the middle of the day he gave them permission (to enter). Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf then attacked Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl, saying to al-Mu'tazz, "O Com-

284. For this area of the Sāmarrā region, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 175 and Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 264.

285. It is not clear which palace. It was probably the residence of al-Mu'tazz.

mander of the Faithful, the Turks are not being paid, and there is no money in the treasury. Ibn Isrāʾīl and his companions have carted away all the money in the world." Aḥmad retorted, "O you disobedient son of a disobedient father." They continued to exchange words until Ṣāliḥ fell unconscious, whereupon water was sprinkled on his face. When his followers, who were at the door, heard about that, they cried out in unison and unsheathed their swords, entering upon al-Muʿtazz with weapons drawn. When al-Muʿtazz saw that, he left them and entered (his chamber). It was then that Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf seized Ibn Isrāʾīl, Ibn Makhlad and ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm. He shackled them with heavy iron chains and carried them off to his residence. Before they were taken away, al-Muʿtazz interceded with Ṣāliḥ saying, "Grant me Aḥmad, for he is my secretary, and he raised me." But Ṣāliḥ refused and then hit Ibn Isrāʾīl until his teeth were broken. Ibn Makhlad was thrown to the ground and administered one hundred lashes. ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm had been phlebotomized and he was now cuffed about until blood began to run from the sides of his neck (maḥajīm). They were not released until they had signed (a statement) promising large sums of money that were to be collected in installments. A group of Turks went to Iskāf[286] to fetch Jaʿfar b. Maḥmūd, but al-Muʿtazz said, "As for Jaʿfar, I have nothing to do with him, nor will he work for me." They went off and al-Muʿtazz sent for Abū Ṣāliḥ ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād al-Marwazī. He was brought to the Caliph so that the latter might appoint him wazīr. He also sent for Isḥāq b. Manṣūr, and he was 1708] brought into the Caliph's presence. Qabīḥah interceded with Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf on behalf of Ibn Isrāʾīl, saying, "You either bring him to al-Muʿtazz, or I will ride to you myself on his behalf."

The following reasons were also reported for this turn of events. The Turks had requested their allotments and made that the pretext for their (actions). Messengers went back and forth between them and those secretaries until Abū Nūḥ said to Sāliḥ b. Waṣīf, "This is your plotting against the Caliph." It was then that Ṣāliḥ fell unconscious on account of the furious anger that overtook him; he remained unconscious until they sprinkled water on his face. When 286. Also known as Iskāf Banū Junayd, and located east of Baghdad on the Nahrawān Canal. See Le Strange, Lands, 59–60.

he came to, there were many words exchanged in front of al-Mu'tazz until they all went out to pray, and Ṣāliḥ remained alone with al-Mu'tazz. Then the people were summoned, and shortly thereafter they entered a pavilion in the courtyard. Then Abū Nūḥ and Ibn Makhlad were summoned, and their swords and caps (qalansūwah) were taken away while their garments were torn. Ibn Isrā'īl now encountered the Turks and threw himself at their mercy, but they made him their third victim.[287] The secretaries were then taken out into the hallway and mounted on donkeys and mules, each accompanied by a Turk who rode behind him. They were all sent to Ṣāliḥ's residence along the Ḥayr Road.[288] When Ṣāliḥ left after a while, the Turks dispersed and went on their way. Several days later, each man was shackled with thirty raṭl of iron on his feet and twenty on his neck, and they were asked for the money. None of them had any response. Their situation went unresolved until the arrival of Rajab (June 15–July 14, 869), when the Turks sent (word) to seize their estates and their residences, the estates of their relatives, and their property. They were labeled "the treacherous secre- [1709] taries (al-kuttāb al-khawanah)." Ja'far b. Maḥmūd arrived on Thursday, the tenth of Jumādā II (May 26, 869), and was given supreme command.

On the second of Rajab (June 16, 869), 'Īsā b. Ja'far and 'Alī b. Zayd, the descendants of al-Ḥasan, rebelled in al-Kūfah and killed 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. 'Īsā.

On the twenty-seventh of Rajab, 255 (July 11, 869), al-Mu'tazz was deposed. His death was made public on the second of Sha'bān (July 16, 869). The circumstances of his deposition were reportedly as follows. When the Turks acted as they did to the aforementioned secretaries and the latter did not acknowledge them, they went to al-Mu'tazz asking for their allotments. "Give us our allotments and we will kill Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf for you," they said. Al-Mu'tazz then sent to his mother asking her to give him the funds to pay them. She responded, "I have none." The Turks and the regular army at Sāmarrā saw that the secretaries had refused to give them anything. At the same time, they found nothing in the treasury, and al-Mu'tazz and

287. The text is thullitha bi-hi, that is, "he was made their third."
288. For this road in Sāmarrā, see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 263.

his mother had already refused and denied them completely. The Turks, the Farāghinah and the Maghāribah therefore united and agreed to depose al-Muʿtazz.

They went to him on the twenty-seventh of Rajab. One of the Sulṭān's[289] relations mentioned that he was with Niḥrīr al-Khādim in the palace of al-Muʿtazz on the day they came for him. The Ca-[1710] liph was shaken only by the shouts of the people of al-Karkh and al-Dūr. Then suddenly, Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, Bāyakbāk and Muḥammad b. Bughā, the one known as Abū Naṣr, entered with their weapons and stood by the door of the residence where al-Muʿtazz was staying. They sent word to him, "Come out to us." He sent word back, saying, "I took a medicine yesterday which has caused me to panic twelve times. I am so weak that I cannot talk. If it is an urgent matter, let one of you enter and inform me of it; let him see for himself why the matter which interests you is at a standstill." A group of the people from al-Karkh and al-Dūr, the lieutenants of the commanders, came in and dragged him to the room's door.

The source of this account also reported the following. I thought that they had already beaten him with clubs, for he came out with his shirt torn in several places and traces of blood on his shoulders. They stood him in the sun in the palace at that time when the heat is oppressive. I saw him lift his foot time and again due to the heat of the place where he had been made to stand. I also saw some of them slap him, as he tried to protect himself with his hand. They started to call out, "Take it off."[290] Then they brought him into a room connected by a door to his own room—this was the room where Mūsā b. Bughā used to stay when he was there. Following that, they sent for Ibn Abī al-Shawārib, who was admitted together with a group of his men. Ṣāliḥ and his followers then said, "Write a letter of deposition for him." He responded, "I can't do a good job of that." An Iṣbahānī who was accompanying him said, "I will write it." He wrote the letter, and they witnessed it and then departed. Ibn Abī al-
[1711] Shawārib now said to Ṣāliḥ, "They bore witness that his sister, his son and his mother shall be given safe conduct." Ṣāliḥ either sig-

289. For this usage of the term sulṭān to indicate a specific person rather than authority in general, see Tyan, Institutions, II, 12f.

290. Reference is to the Prophet's cloak as part of the caliph's symbols of authority. See n. 211, above.

naled with his head or answered, "Yes." They appointed men to guard the Caliph's company (majlis) and some women to watch over his mother. It was reported that Qabīḥah had dug a tunnel in the house in which she lived, and that she managed to leave through this tunnel together with Qurb[291] and the sister of al-Mu'tazz. The troops had blocked the roads around her, preventing people from passing through as of the day they did what they did to al-Mu'tazz. That was from Monday until Wednesday, the last day of Rajab (July 11–13, 869).[292]

After he had been deposed, he was reportedly given over to someone who tortured him, and he was forbidden food and water for three days. Even when he requested a mouthful of well water, it was denied to him. Finally, they plastered a small vault with heavy plaster, put him in it and shut the door behind him.[293] By the next morning he had expired. That took place on the second day of Sha'bān, 255 (July 16, 869). When he died, Banū Hāshim and the generals bore witness to his death and testified that he had no scars on his body. He was buried with al-Muntaṣir in an area of the Ṣawāmi' Palace.

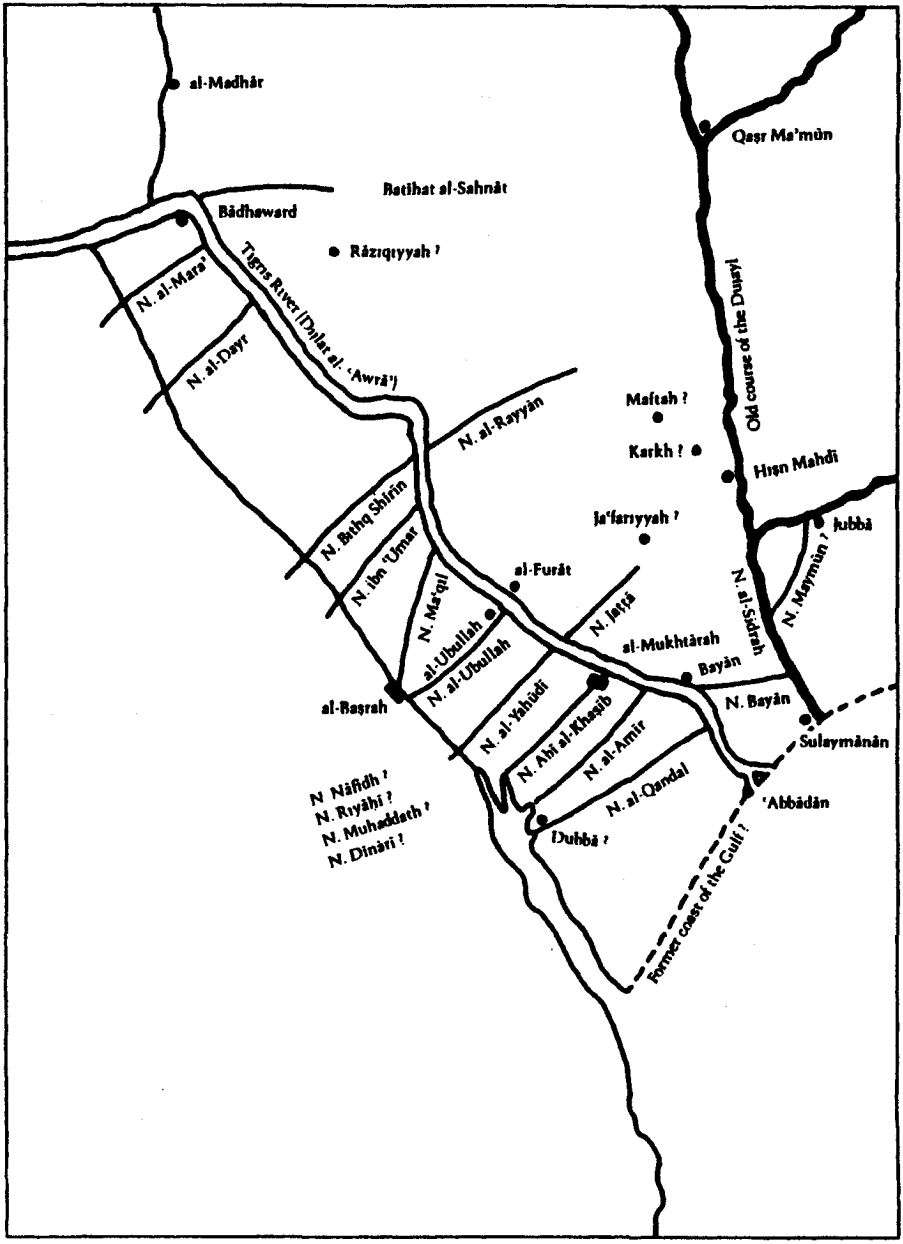
His caliphate, from the day when the oath of allegiance was rendered to him in Sāmarrā until he was deposed, was four years, six months and twenty-three days. He was twenty-four years of age when he died.

He was tall in stature. He had a white complexion and thick dark hair. His eyes were beautiful, his face was narrow and handsome, and he had reddish cheeks. He was born in Sāmarrā. [1712]

291. Qabīḥah's maid. See p. 1647, 1658 above of the Leiden edition.

292. There is some discrepancy in this date, for the last day of Rajab fell on a Friday, the fifteenth of July 869. July 11–13, 869 are retained, however, on the assumption that the events took place during that week.

293. See n. 252, above.



The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXVI

The Revolt of the Zanj

TRANSLATED BY DAVID WAINES

Map 1. The Lower Part of Southern Iraq in the Third/Ninth Century

The Events of the Year

255 (cont'd) [1712]

(DECEMBER 20, 868–DECEMBER 8, 869)

On Wednesday, the last day of Rajab[1] of this year 255 (July 14, 869), Muḥammad the son of al-Wāthiq was rendered the oath of allegiance as caliph. He was called al-Muhtadī bi-Allāh.[2] His agnomen was Abū ʿAbdallāh. His mother, a Byzantine, was called Qurb.

It was reported on the authority of an eyewitness that Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq refused to accept the oath of allegiance from anyone until al-Muʿtazz came before him and submitted his abdication, confirming his inability to administer matters entrusted to him and, moreover, expressing his desire to relinquish these matters into the care of Ibn al-Wāthiq.[3]

Extending his hand, al-Muʿtazz acknowledged his allegiance to Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq, and only then was the new caliph given the honorific title of al-Muhtadī. Thereupon al-Muʿtazz withdrew,

---

1. The last day of the month was, in fact, Thursday.

2. See EI,[1] s.v. "al-Muhtadī"; Masʿūdī, Murūj al-dhahab wa-maʿādin al-jawhar, VIII, 1–41.

3. Al-Muʿtazz had become caliph in al-Muḥarram 252 (January 866), achieving the rank through the forced abdication of his predecessor, al-Mustaʿīn. See EI,[1] s.v. "al-Muʿtazz."

and the inner circle of clients (mawālī)[4] rendered their own oaths of allegiance.

The text of the statement concerning al-Mu'tazz's abdication is as follows:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. The following is what the witnesses, named in this document below, were called upon to testify. They witnessed that Abū 'Abdallāh, the son of the Commander of the Faithful al-Mutawakkil 'alā-Allāh (while calling upon them to attest that he was of sound mind and that he lawfully performed this act of his own free will and without compulsion) acknowledged that he had reflected carefully upon matters concerning his title to the caliphate and the administration of the Muslims' affairs. He had reached the conclusion that he no longer felt suited to the task, as he was unable to fulfill his > [1713] duties. He was unequal to the responsibilities he had to shoulder. Thus he voluntarily withdrew from office, declaring himself free of the burden, removing it by means of abdication. He released from their oaths those of his entourage who had sworn allegiance to him. Likewise anyone else who had sworn before him an oath of allegiance, or covenants and compacts, or oaths of divorce, of the emancipation of slaves, the voluntary payment of alms (ṣadaqah) or of pilgrimage, indeed every manner of oath, he redeemed these from them.
>
> After it had become clear to al-Mu'tazz that the best course both for himself and for all Muslims was to give up the caliphal office and to abdicate, he set free all those with obligations to him.
>
> He called to witness for him, regarding everything that was cited and described in this document, all the witnesses named below and all those present after the document had been carefully read aloud to him and he had acknowledged freely and without compulsion his full awareness of its contents.

4. The word mawlā, pl. mawālī, in the 'Abbāsid period refers mainly to military personnel employed by the caliphs and who were mainly, if not exclusively, of central Asian origin. See P. Crone, Slaves on Horses.

This occurred on Monday, the 27th day of Rajab in the year 255 (July 11, 869).[5]

In his own hand al-Mu'tazz signed his consent to its contents with the words, "I Abū 'Abdallāh acknowledge all that is contained in this document." It was dated Monday, the 27th day of Rajab, 255 (July 11, 869), and witnessed by the following persons: al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad, Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā, Aḥmad b. Janāb, Yaḥyā b. Zakariyā' b. Abī Ya'qūb al-Iṣbahānī, 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad al-'Āmirī, Aḥmad b. al-Faḍl b. Yaḥyā, Ḥammād b. Isḥāq, 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad, and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad.[6] [1714]

In Baghdad at the end of Rajab of this year there were disturbances and riots among the populace against Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir.[7]

An Account of the Causes and Consequences of [the] Disturbances [in Baghdad]

One Thursday, toward the end of Rajab,[8] Sulaymān, who was in Baghdad, received a despatch from Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq in-

5. The document, which is less a formal declaration of abdication than a report on the event itself, seems to end here. See Ṭabarī, III, 1709–12 for details of the deposition. Al-Mu'tazz's death was announced in public shortly afterward, on the 2nd of Sha'bān (July 16, 869).

6. Only the first name in this list has been identified. Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib had been appointed chief judge in 252/866 (see Ṭabarī, III, 1684; his arrest is noted in Dhū al-Qa'dah 255 [October 11–November 9, 869], 1787; see also D. Sourdel, Le vizirat 'abbāside, I, 307), and his presence would have been deemed necessary to give the abdication/deposition at least the appearance of legitimacy. He did not, however, draw up the actual abdication document, which was undertaken by another of the company mentioned, Yaḥyā b. Zakariyā' al-Iṣbahānī. Ibn Abī al-Shawārib confirmed orally that the sister, son, and mother of al-Mu'tazz would be provided with safe-conduct. See Ṭabarī, III, 1710–11.

7. A scion of the famous Ṭāhirid family from Khurāsān, which had long supported the caliphs from the days of al-Ma'mūn (d. 218/833). As well as supplying governors of the eastern provinces, which led to the founding of an autonomous dynasty with its capital at Naysābūr, the family was deeply involved in the affairs of Baghdad. Sulaymān had been governor of Ṭabaristān in 250/864–865 and, earlier in the present year, on the 6th of Rabī'ah II (March 25, 869), he had been appointed chief of security in Baghdad and the districts of the sawād (see Ṭabarī, III, 1706). See EI[1] s.v. "Ṭāhirids"; also C. E. Bosworth, "The Ṭāhirids and Ṣaffārids."

8. The expression salkh, meaning "in the last stage of," is used when the precise date of an event is not known but only its approximate occurrence in a phase or stage of the lunar month. See M. Ocaña Jiménez, Nuevas tablas de conversión de datas islámicas a cristianas y viceverersa, 45.

forming him of the people's oath of allegiance to him as caliph. At the time Abū Aḥmad, a son of al-Mutawakkil, was also in Baghdad.[9] His brother al-Mu'tazz had banished Abū Aḥmad to al-Baṣrah when he quarreled with his brother[10] al-Mu'ayyad. Later, when factionalism erupted in al-Baṣrah, al-Mu'tazz had him brought back to Baghdad, where he continued to reside.[11] Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, who was at the time in charge of the office of security in Baghdad, sent for Abū Aḥmad and had him brought to his palace. The troops stationed in Baghdad and the mob (al-ghawghā')[12] heard of the matter concerning the abdication of al-Mu'tazz and Ibn al-Wāthiq's accession to the caliphate. They gathered in front of Sulaymān's palace, creating a great uproar, but broke up somewhat later when they were informed that there was no confirmation of the report of what had happened. On the following day, Friday, there were again disturbances, and once again people were told the same thing as on the previous day. Prayers were performed in the two main mosques of the city and invocations offered in the name of al-Mu'tazz. Then, on the Saturday morning, troops attacked Sulaymān's palace, calling out in [1715] the name of Abū Aḥmad (b. al-Mutawakkil) and demanding that he be rendered the oath of allegiance. Confronting Sulaymān in his palace, they asked him to produce Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil. He brought him before them, and he promised to meet their wishes if there was delay in their fulfillment. The crowd departed, having been reassured of his guarantee.

Yārjūkh[13] arrived and camped at al-Baradān.[14] He was transporting thirty thousand dinars for the pay of the troops (al-jund) of Madīnat al-Salām.[15] He then advanced to al-Shammāsiyyah[16] and the

9. He was later known by the honorific title al-Muwaffaq.

10. Akhi min ummihi. Ṭabarī notes that Abū Aḥmad and al-Mu'ayyad were brothers by the same mother.

11. Abū Aḥmad had been banished first to Wāsiṭ, thence to al-Baṣrah in 253/867. See Ṭabarī, III, 1693.

12. See n. 17, below.

13. Ṭabarī first mentions this Turkish officer during the course of events of this year in an engagement with the rebel Musāwir, who defeated him, forcing his flight to Sāmarrā. See Ṭabarī, III, 1706.

14. A town lying on the east bank of the Tigris just to the north of Baghdad. The road from it passed through the Baradān Gate on Baghdad's eastern side. See Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate, 174.

15. At this time Madīnat al-Salām was synonymous with Baghdad, and the expression has been retained here wherever it occurs.

16. One of the northern quarters of eastern Baghdad, Shammāsiyyah has the mean-following morning entered Baghdad. When word of this got around, the troops (al-nās) created an uproar as they rushed out to meet him. Yārjūkh was informed of their approach, and he returned to al-Baradān to remain there. Despatches were exchanged between him and the central authorities until he finally sent money to the troops (ahl)[17] of Baghdad, with which they were content. Al-Muhtadī was rendered the oath of allegiance by the inner circle (of clients)[18] in Baghdad on Thursday, the 7th of Sha'bān (July 21, 869). Prayers were offered for him on Friday, the 8th of Sha'bān, following an outbreak of violence (fitnah)[19] in Baghdad, during which some people were killed, others were drowned in the Tigris, while yet others suffered various injuries. This violence occurred because Sulaymān had his palace guarded with a group of armed Ṭabariyyah,[20] against whom the troops of Baghdad waged a pitched battle in Tigris Street and at the Bridge.[21] Thereafter order and peace were restored.

In the month of Ramaḍān of this year (August 13 – September 9, ing "deaconry," as the place had originally been occupied by several monasteries. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 202.

---

17. Ṭabarī at the beginning of the paragraph employs the common word for a military force, troops, or soldiers, al-jund, and then resorts to the more euphemistic terms al-nas and ahl, which literally mean "people" in general. However, a few lines earlier (see n. 12, above) Ṭabarī uses another term in association with al-jund, namely al-ghawghā', which normally has no military connotation. Thus, despite Ṭabarī's rather loose style, he nevertheless conveys the picture of disorder caused by both military and civilian elements in the city. This is underlined by his use of the word al-'āmmah "the populace" in introducing the account of these events. See Ṭabarī, III, 1714.

18. The word al-khāṣṣah alone is taken here to mean those close to the court and the Caliph's person, as in the phrase khāṣṣat al-mawālī, used by Ṭabarī, III, 1712.

19. Ṭabarī's use of the word fitnah here suggests the rising tempo of violence in Baghdad, which had moved from demonstrations of anger to open violence leading to deaths. Sulaymān's deployment of a "foreign" contingent of soldiers around his palace was seen as highly provocative by troops based in Baghdad.

20. A contingent of soldiers from the province of Ṭabaristān. These troops may have been brought by Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh on his journey from Khurāsān to Sāmarrā. See Ṭabarī, III, 1706.

21. Al-jisr. There were three pontoon bridges (pl. al-jusūr) across the Tigris, joining western and eastern Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 177–86, for a description of them. J. Lassner, The Shaping of 'Abbāsid Rule, 299 n. 109 (and 294 n. 63) says that al-jisr signifies the Main Bridge joining the quarter of the Khuld on the western side with the Bāb al-Ṭāq on the east. Of the various scholarly views concerning the precise location of these bridges, Lassner follows Le Strange. See Lassner, The Topography of Baghdad in the Early Middle Ages, 173–76, 280 n. 1, 281 n. 6. Another problem about which there can be no certainty is when, whether in Ṭabarī's time or later, the term al-jisr became applied specifically to the Main Bridge.

869] Qabīḥah[22] went to the Turks and revealed to them the location of some of her possessions, including a hoard of treasures and jewels. That reportedly occurred because she had planned to assassinate Ṣāliḥ (b. Waṣīf)[23] and plotted to do so with a number of secretaries [1716] whom Ṣāliḥ had already maltreated.[24] When Ṣāliḥ [again] submitted them to torture and Qabīḥah learned that they had withheld no information from Ṣāliḥ, owing to the punishment he meted out to them, she became convinced her own life was in danger. She undertook to save herself and thus removed the contents of her treasure stores from inside the Jawsaq palace,[25] which included money, jewels, and other precious goods; she deposited them for safekeeping along with other goods of the same kind she had previously deposited.

Qabīḥah was unsure of being able to act swiftly in the event of such circumstances as eventually overwhelmed her and her son, so she devised a strategem for her escape. A tunnel was excavated leading from one of her private chambers inside the palace to a place that would not be detected. When she learned of the circumstances [surrounding her son's abdication] she hastened to the tunnel without a second thought and escaped from the palace confines. When those who had rebelled against her son had succeeded [in imposing the situation] they wanted, they then set out in search of Qabīḥah, confident of her capture. But they found the palace empty. She had vanished without a trace, leaving them no clue where to search. Finally, however, they stumbled across the tunnel. Realizing this must have

---

22. The mother of al-Mu'tazz.

23. Ṣāliḥ was a prominent military leader, whose father had been murdered two years earlier by his Turkish rivals. He was now attempting to restore the power of his own faction and bore grievances against both the deposed Caliph, al-Mu'tazz, and some of his government officials. Qabīḥah clearly felt Ṣāliḥ would not honor his pledge of securing her safety. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 297–98.

24. Prominent among those who were subjected to Ṣāliḥ's interrogation methods were Abū Ja'far Aḥmad b. Isra'īl al-Anbārī, al-Mu'tazz's vizier, who, together with Abū Nūḥ 'Īsā b. Ibrāhīm and Ḥasan b. Makhlad, were the major pillars of the Caliph's administration. In addition, Ḥasan was also secretary to Qabīḥah. As such they became the target of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf's ambitions in his bid for power. See Ṭabarī, III, 1706–9; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 295–98, for details of relevant parallel sources.

25. This palace, built by the Caliph al-Mu'taṣim, was located on the eastern side of the Tigris at Sāmarrā. See Le Strange, The Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, 55. It should not be confused with the palace al-Jawsaq al-Muḥdath situated in Baghdad. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 257. The architectural details of the palace are discussed in K. A. C. Creswell, A Short Account of Early Muslim Architecture, 259–60.

been her escape route, they followed it as far as the secret exit and became certain of her successful escape. They surmised that she would have sought a safe and secure refuge, and what better way [1717] than to seek shelter with Ḥabīb, the wife of Mūsā b. Bughā,[26] whom he had married from among the concubines of al-Mutawakkil? They set out for this quarter of the city, but being loath to expose themselves to any of her supporters, they organized a surveillance team to watch her. A threat was publicly announced against anyone with information of her whereabouts who then did not inform them of it. Thus matters stood until, in the month of Ramaḍān, she suddenly appeared and went to Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf. A female apothecary in whom she had trust acted as her intermediary with Ṣāliḥ. Qabīḥah had wealth in Baghdad, and so she sent written instructions for some of it to be brought to Sāmarrā.

On Tuesday, the 11th of Ramaḍān in this year (August 23, 869), it was reported, a sum of five hundred thousand dinars arrived in Sāmarrā. The money had been raised for Qabīḥah from the treasure she had in Baghdad and despatched according to her instructions. The central authorities profited greatly from this source, while in Baghdad itself the non-Arab troops (al-jund) and the Shākiriyyah[27] who received regular stipends were assigned considerable sums from it as well. The sale of these hoards continued to raise money in Baghdad and Sāmarrā for several months until, at last, they were depleted. Qabīḥah remained in Sāmarrā until people departed for Mecca on that year's pilgrimage. She was sent in the company of Rajā' al-Rabābī and Waḥash, a mawlā of al-Muhtadī. It was reported that someone heard her along the way imploring God in a loud voice

---

26. Mūsā was the son of the army commander the elder Bughā. See EI,² s.v. "Bughā al-Kabīr."

27. A name variously applied to a group or groups of soldiers who became rivals of troops commanded by the Turkish commanders in Sāmarrā. See Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 276; also R. Levy, The Social Structure of Islam, 418, states the word is derived from the Persian chākir "servant or apprentice" and that, as a contingent, they were distinct from the jund, or regular soldiers. A more precise distinction may be found in the organization of military administration during the earlier reign of al-Mutawakkil (d. 248/861), when there existed a branch of the department of the army called the Diwān al-jund wa-al-Shākiriyyah; jund referred to non-Arab troops while Shākiriyyah meant mercenaries. See Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 596; EI,² s.v. "Djund." Thus, in instances where Ṭabarī uses these two terms in conjunction, the word jund will be rendered as "non-Arab troops"; otherwise it will be rendered variously as "soldiers," "troops," "army," and the like.

[1718] against Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, saying: "Oh God, humiliate Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf just as he has dishonored me, murdered my son, seized my property, squandered my goods, banished me from my home, and behaved obscenely toward me." When the pilgrims set out on their return journey, Qabīḥah was detained in prison in Mecca.

It was reported that, when the Turks became agitated and roused against al-Mu'tazz, they demanded fifty thousand dinars from him, promising in return to kill Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf and then become pacific. Al-Mu'tazz sent word to his mother of the Turks' grievances against him and of his fear for his life. She replied, "I have no liquid resources. We have received some promissory notes,[28] and, if the Turks can wait until they are redeemed, we could then pay them."[29]

When al-Mu'tazz had been killed, Ṣāliḥ made contact with a jeweler, who recounted the following story: "I went to Ṣāliḥ. Aḥmad b. Khāqān[30] was present with him at the time. Aḥmad said to me, 'Woe upon you! This is it. Do you see what a fix I'm in?' Ṣāliḥ had been alarmed by the Turks, who had demanded money of him that he did not have. He said to me, pointing out one of the company present, 'I have been informed that Qabīḥah has treasure hidden in a place to which this man can guide you. Go, and take Aḥmad b. Khāqān with you. Should you uncover anything, make a record of it, hand it over to him, and come with him to me.'

When I had performed my prayers[31] in the congregational mosque, this man took us to a tidy dwelling, which we entered and searched [1719] from top to bottom without finding anything. The man began to abuse Aḥmad b. Khāqān, who in turn menaced, threatened, and abused him and accused him of making an error. The man fetched an ax and commenced piercing the walls with it, searching for a place where the money might be hidden. He continued exploring in this fashion until the ax struck a spot in the wall that, by the sound it made, indicated that something was concealed there. By demolishing the wall, a door was revealed behind it. We opened it and entered. It led to a tunnel, and we found ourselves in a chamber built

28. Safātij.

29. See Ṭabarī, III, 1709, for slightly different details of these events.

30. This is Aḥmad b. Khāqān al-Wāthiqī, a freedman of the Caliph al-Wāthiq, who appears briefly later; p. 73, below.

31. Ila al-ṣufūf, the reading favored by the editor of the Leiden text. Although each of the recensions has a different reading, none of them is satisfactory.

beneath the dwelling we had entered above, identical in structure and floor plan. There, stored in baskets placed upon shelves, we located the money, amounting to something in the order of a million dinars. Aḥmad and his companion removed three hundred thousand dinars. Then we discovered three baskets; one contained a makkūk[32] of emeralds, but of a kind that I could imagine neither al-Mutawakkil nor indeed anyone else possessing. Another smaller basket contained half a makkūk of large beads which, by God, I had never dreamed al-Mutawakkil or anyone else could possess. The third yet smaller basket contained a kaylajah of rubies, the likes of which I had never before seen or even imagined existing anywhere in the world. Estimating the market value of it all, it came to two million dinars. We removed the entire treasure and took it to Ṣāliḥ. When he heard of its value, he could scarcely believe it and remained unconvinced until he was shown the actual goods. He then remarked, 'May God do such-and-such to her! Al-Mu'tazz's mother condemned her son to death for want of the miserable sum of fifty thousand dinars, when she actually had in only one of her treasuries such wealth as this!'" [1720]

The mother[33] of Mu'tazz b. al-Wāthiq (al-Muhtadī) died before the oath of allegiance had been rendered to him. She had been one of al-Musta'īn's wives, and when he was slain al-Mu'tazz transferred her to the palace of al-Ruṣāfah,[34] where he kept his harem. After al-Muhtadī became caliph he one day said to a company of his mawlās, "I now [unlike al-Mu'tazz] have no mother who requires the sum of ten million dinars every year as expenses for her maids and servants and hangers-on; as for myself and my children, I want only sufficient food and nothing extra, except for my brothers, as they have fallen upon hard times."

Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl and Abū Nūḥ were killed on the 27th of Ramaḍān of this year (September 8, 869).

---

32. Measures like this and kaylajah, below, were subject to regional variation. A makkūk in Baghdad and al-Kūfah weighed 5.625 kg., while in al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ it weighed 6 kg. In Iraq a kaylajah was one-third of a makkūk. See W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 40, 44.

33. This was Qurb, the Byzantine woman mentioned above, p. 1.

34. Located in the northeastern quarter of Baghdad, the palace was orginally built by the Caliph al-Mahdī and probably restored or enlarged by Hārūn al-Rashīd. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 189; Lassner, Topography, index, q.v.

An Account of [the] Deaths [of Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl and Abū Nūḥ]

We have already mentioned the cause that led them to their deaths.[35] As for the nature of their deaths, it is reported that, when Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf had seized all their property and that of al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad as well, he did so by torturing them with beatings and chains and placing braziers of red-hot coals next to them, while depriving them of any respite the whole time they were in his custody. They were 1721] accused of grave crimes of treason, of intending to degrade the central authorities, and of attempting to prolong civil disorder by plotting dissent among Muslims. Al-Muhtadī did nothing to interfere with Ṣāliḥ in these matters, though he disapproved of and did not accept his violent behavior toward them. Then, in the month of Ramaḍān (August 13 – September 11, 869), Ṣāliḥ ordered al-Ḥasan b. Sulaymān al-Dūshābī[36] to supervise the extraction of any remaining property that they had concealed from him.

Al-Ḥasan b. Sulaymān related that, when Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl had been brought to him, he abused him, saying "You wretch, do you think that God will give you respite and that the Commander of the Faithful will not sanction your death, though you are the cause of discord, an accomplice in murder and treason, and a corrupter of purpose and character? For the very least of these crimes you deserve to be made an example of, just as those before you have deserved such treatment. Death in this life and torment and ignominy in the life hereafter are your lot if you do not receive God's pardon and mercy, and your Imām's pardon and forgiveness. Protect yourself from incurring the punishment you deserve by being truthful concerning your wealth; if you do so and your truthfulness is confirmed, you can save yourself."

Aḥmad replied that he had nothing left, nor had anyone until then left him property or estates.

Al-Ḥasan said, "I then called for whips to be brought out and ordered that Aḥmad be stood outside in the sun. I assailed him with 1722] ferocity, though triumph could have slipped through my hands if he had shown a little courage and fortitude. Finally, however, he con-

35. See Ṭabarī, III, 1706–9.
36. No further information on this man has been found.

ceded to an amount of nineteen thousand dinars, and I accepted his bond on it."

Al-Ḥasan continued, "Thereafter I had Abū Nūḥ ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm brought to me and told him the same as I had to Aḥmad, or words to the same effect, elaborating somewhat upon them. "Withal, you remain a Christian, violating Muslim women while proclaiming yourself free from Islam and its followers. What better indicates this than the fact that you remain a Christian in private among your family and children? God has permitted such persons to be lawfully killed. But Abū Nūḥ gave no reply to any of this, weak and miserable man that he was."[37]

Al-Ḥasan continued: "As for al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad, I had him brought to me next, but when I addressed him I was speaking to someone already weak and humiliated. I chided him for appearing this way. I said, 'Someone who has grooms to accompany him on his shihrī steed, who judges matters as you do, and desires what you do, should never appear humbled or impotent.' I kept up the pressure on him in this manner until he signed his bond for a jewel the value of which was some thirty thousand dinars. After this I departed, and they were then all returned to their places." Al-Ḥasan b. Sulaymān al-Dūshābī's examination of these men was the last involving them. According to the information that has reached me, no similar examination was held during the remaining days of al-Muhtadī.

On Thursday, the 27th of Ramaḍān (September 8, 869), Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl and Abū Nūḥ ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm were brought to the Public Gate. [1723] Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, who presided in the public audience hall, ordered Ḥammād b. Muḥammad b. Ḥammād b. Danqash[38] to beat them. Aḥmad b. Isrāʾīl was prepared, and Ibn Danqash cried out "Scourge him!" Each flogger lashed him twice, then stepped aside for the next one until Aḥmad had received five hundred strokes. They next prepared Abū Nūḥ and administered five hundred severe lashes on him as well. The two wretches were then placed face down upon the backs of donkeys of water sellers, their heads toward the rear of the animals, so that their lacerated backs were plain for all to see. When

37. At this time there were in the administration several scribes of Nestorian origin, some of whom had been recently converted. To this general group belonged Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl, al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad, and Abū Nūḥ ʿĪsā b. Ibrāhīm. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 304.

38. No further information on this person has been found.

the procession reached Khashabat Bābak,[39] Aḥmad died and Abū Nūḥ died when the procession came to an end. Aḥmad was buried between the walls [of the city] and, according to another account, Abū Nūḥ died the same day in the prison of al-Sarakhsī, who was the deputy of Ṭalmajūr,[40] in charge of the special police. For his part, al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad remained in prison.

Someone who had been present at these proceedings reportedly said, "I heard Ḥammād b. Muḥammad b. Ḥammād b. Danqash berate the floggers saying, 'Exert yourselves, you sons of harlots, may you never be addressed in respectful terms![41] Punish them! Change the whips and replace the teams of torturers with others!' Aḥmad b. Isrā'īl and ʿĪsā (b. Ibrāhīm) cried out for mercy."

When news of this reached al-Muhtadī, he said, "Is there no choice of punishment other than either the whip or death? Is there nothing better? Is imprisonment not enough? We are God's, and to Him we shall return."[42] He repeated this last phrase over and over again.

Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad is reported to have said that their whole af-[1724] fair involving Ṣāliḥ would have come to naught had ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād[43] not been present and in such a ruthless mood. He urged upon Ṣāliḥ to "beat and torture them; indeed it would be best to go beyond that and kill them. If they escape, you will never be sure their injustices will not visit you in the end, let alone what those seeking to avenge them might do." He then mentioned what vile things that he had heard concerning them, which delighted Ṣāliḥ.

Ibn Makhlad continued: "Dā'ūd b. al-ʿAbbās al-Ṭūsī[44] used to

---

39. For Bābak, the leader of the Kurramite sect, and the place in Sāmarrā that carries his name, see EI,[2] s.v. "Bābak." For the quarter of Khashabat Bābak, see Yaʿqūbī, Kitāb al-Buldān, 259. The quarter in these years was the site of public executions. See Ṭabarī, III, 1658.

40. The name is uncertain, other variants being given as Ṭalmaḥūn and Ṭalḥūr.

41. That is, they would not be addressed by their patronymics. See EI,[2] s.v. "Kunya," on the honorific nature of this form of address.

42. A phrase that occurs in the Qur'ān several times.

43. Abū Ṣāliḥ ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād al-Marwazī was the son of the Caliph al-Ma'mūn's last secretary; ʿAbdallāh himself was briefly vizier under al-Musta'īn and was last encountered being summoned by al-Mu'tazz to be appointed vizier during the events here recounted. See Ṭabarī, III, 1707; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 292.

44. His name is otherwise given as Dā'ūd b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-ʿAbbās al-Ṭūsī. See Ṭabarī, index, s.v. "Dā'ūd b. al-ʿAbbās." No other information about him is available, but see n. 45, below.

bring us to Ṣāliḥ, saying, 'May God give you strength, what are these people that they should have caused you such anger?' We thought he might influence Ṣāliḥ to treat us leniently until he said, 'But by God, I know that if they were set free they would perpetrate immense evil and corruption throughout the domain of Islam.' Before he departed Dā'ūd provided a legal opinion (fatwā)[45] justifying our execution and advised Ṣāliḥ to have us put to death. This legal opinion and the other things he said about us increased Ṣāliḥ's anger and his willingness to do us harm."

Someone who had some firsthand knowledge of these developments was once asked how al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad was spared the fate of his two companions. The reply was twofold. First, al-Ḥasan had at once truthfully revealed to Ṣāliḥ the information he required, also providing proof that what he said was true. Ṣāliḥ had promised to pardon al-Ḥasan if he told the truth and swore an oath to that effect. The second reason was that the Commander of the Faithful had mentioned his case to Ṣāliḥ, telling him of the esteem he had for his family and hinting that he desired to have al-Ḥasan rehabilitated. He thereby restrained him from doing anything too reprehensible to [1725] him. The informant also thought that, if Ṣāliḥ had held al-Ḥasan longer in custody, he would have released him in any case and treated him well. But in the matter of government secretaries, Ṣāliḥ was not content to sequester their wealth and that of their children. He went so far as to threaten their relatives and other near relations with sequestration of their wealth and extended his influence even over their hangers-on.

On the 13th of Ramaḍān of this year 255 (August 25, 869) the prison in Baghdad was breached. The Shākiriyyah and reserve soldiers (al-nā'ibah) in the city attacked Muḥammad b. Aws al-Balkhī.

An Account of [the] Events [of Ramaḍān 255]

The cause of these developments was the arrival in Baghdad of Muḥammad b. Aws,[46] who was accompanying Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh

45. This phrase would suggest that Dā'ūd b. al-ʿAbbās al-Ṭūsī was a muftī, a canon lawyer, competent to render such an opinion. See EI[1] s.v. "Fatwā."

46. In his account of events of the year 250/864–65 Ṭabarī notes that Muḥammad b. Aws had virtually wrested Ṭabaristān from the control of its governor, Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh, by placing his own offspring in key positions of power. Their brutality

b. Ṭāhir.[47] Muḥammad was in charge of the army coming with Sulaymān from Khurāsān, in addition to the riffraff[48] whom Sulaymān had assembled while in al-Rayy but whose names were not recorded in the dīwān of the central authorities in Iraq.[49] Sulaymān had been given no instructions concerning them. The prevailing practice for such recruits, however, was to pay those who accompanied him from Khurāsān a rate of pay in Iraq equivalent to that paid to their like in Khurāsān, to be drawn from the revenues of the [Iraqī] estates[50] of [1726] heirs of the Ṭāhirid family.[51] Instructions were then sent to Khurāsān concerning the matter, to arrange that the heirs there were compensated from the public treasury [in Khurāsān] for what was paid out from their property in Iraq. When Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh arrived in Iraq, however, he discovered that the treasury of the heirs' property was depleted. Once this information was confirmed, ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir[52] had undertaken to transfer to his brother, Sulaymān [responsibility for] the task[53] to which he had been assigned. ʿUbaydallāh secured the amount accumulated in the coffers of the heirs of his father and grandfather while demanding payment and arrogance had created much ill feeling against them among the population of the province. See Ṭabarī, III, 1524–25.

---

47. Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh had been appointed by al-Muʿtazz as chief of security in Baghdad and the Sawād on the 6th of Rajab II (March 24, 869). After receiving robes of honor from the Caliph, he departed for Baghdad. See Ṭabarī, III, 1706. His arrival there was the cause for the disturbances recounted on pp. 3–5, above.

48. Ṣaʿālīk, pl. of ṣuʿlūk. The word means a poor or needy person and, by extension, a thief and robber. In the present context they may be understood as a group of untrained conscripts; in any event, they appear to have been quartered together as a group, as will appear in the subsequent narrative. See n. 81, below, and p. 164, where one Abū Dāʾūd al-Ṣaʿlūk was engaged in warlike activities.

49. On the organization of the army in ʿAbbāsid times, see EI,² s.v. "Djaysh"; Bosworth, "Recruitment, Muster and Review in medieval Islamic Armies."

50. Ḍīyāʿ warathah dhī al-yamīnayn. The Ṭāhirids were acting as bankers for the army.

51. The text reads dhū al-yamīnayn. The epithet, meaning ambidextrous, was given to the founder of the Ṭāhirid dynasty, Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn, owing to his ability to use a sword in battle with either hand. See Bosworth, "Ṭāhirids," 90–5; H. Kennedy, The Prophet and the Age of the Caliphs, 150–52; EI,² s.v. "Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn."

52. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, the brother of ʿUbaydallāh, had deputized him in his will to assume his duties in the event of his death. When Muḥammad died in Dhū al-Qaʿdah 253 (November 867) al-Muʿtazz gave ʿUbaydallāh robes of honor and a document signifying that he was the governor of Baghdad; Ṭabarī, III, 1691–92. In the next year, 254/868, ʿUbaydallāh was in Baghdad, tracking down the sons of the Turkish commander Bughā the Younger, murdered at the instigation of the Caliph, III, 1696.

53. That is, the governorship of Baghdad.

of taxes in advance on immature crops. Payments[54] from tax collectors were brought forward to a time when they were not yet due. Nevertheless, he managed to gather the entire amount required.

Thereafter ʿUbaydallāh set out and established camp in al-Juwayth,[55] which was situated on the eastern side of the Tigris. Later he crossed over to the western side. Thus Sulaymān found himself in dire straits as the Shākiriyyah and the non-Arab soldiers[56] agitated for payment of their allotments. Sulaymān corresponded with Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Muʿtazz on the matter, estimating the amount of revenue required for these payments. He added an estimate as well for those who had accompanied him from Khurāsān. He instructed his secretary, Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Kātib al-Khurāsānī, to deal with the matter. After some negotiations Sulaymān received a reply that funds under the control of the tax agents of the Sawād would be assigned to him,[57] on condition of his assuming responsibility for their repayment. The funds would be for the pay of [troops] in Madīnat al-Salām and the garrisons of the Sawād; they were not to meet needs of [Sulaymān's] reserves or the troops accompanying them. Sulaymān was not able to get access to any of the funds. Ibn Aws, the riffraff, and his troops arrived, but the revenue was insufficient for his needs and the needs of those reserves who had anticipated receiving it. They thus found out about this situation and its harmful consequences to them. [1727]

The riffraff and others who had arrived in Baghdad with Sulaymān began to disturb the peace of the local neighborhoods, openly displaying foul behavior and attacking women, slaves (al-ʿabīd),[58] and servants (al-ghilmān).[59] They were able to assault these classes be-

54. Amwāl nujūm. Najm signifies the time when a payment falls due, hence also an installment.

55. The reading is uncertain, the name in manuscripts B and C being unpointed.

56. Ṭabarī again employs the term al-jund here. See n. 27, above. It is, however, unclear whether he is referring to troops already stationed in Baghdad or to soldiers who accompanied Sulaymān.

57. Subbiba lahu. Tasbīb was a form of direct payment made to soldiers either as a salary or as an assignment on a specific source of taxation. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium; CCLXXXIV see also Bosworth, "Recruitment," 75; Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Khwārazmī on the Technical Terms of the Secretary's Art," 139–40.

58. On this term, pl. of ʿabd, see, EI,[2] s.v. "ʿAbd."

59. On the complex of meanings of this term, pl. of ghulām, see EI,[2] s.v. "Ghulām." In the urban contexts of Sāmarrā and Baghdad the term may be rendered as "attendant, guard, servant, and page." See also EI,[2] s.v. "Djaysh," especially at 507, for the cause of their standing with the central authorities, and such behavior aroused against them the anger and fury of the people.

Now it happened that Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh had developed a deep resentment against al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣʿab b. Ruzayq[60] because of the position granted him by ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh, as well as the support and maintenance ʿUbaydallāh provided him. Sulaymān also resented al-Ḥusayn's separation from himself and his supporters. After al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl had returned to Baghdad at the end of his appointment in charge of the non-Arab troops and the Shākiriyyah on behalf of ʿUbaydallāh, Sulaymān imprisoned al-Ḥusayn's secretary in al-Maṭbaq[61] and his chamberlain in the prison by the Syrian Gate.[62] He also placed troops to guard the residence of al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl under the command of Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm. Sulaymān had put this Ibrāhīm in charge of the double bridge[63] of Baghdad and the administrative districts (sg. ṭassūj) of Qaṭrabbul, Maskin, and al-Anbār.[64] These were the very same duties that al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, on ʿUbaydallāh's behalf, had been responsible for previously.

Events transpired as they did in the wake of al-Muhtadī's accession to the caliphate with the revolt of the troops and the Shākiriyyah in Madīnat al-Salām and the outbreak of general unrest. During this period, Muḥammad b. Aws severely maltreated an inhabitant from Marv who was a partisan of the Shīʿah. In Sulay-term "young soldier," which might at times also apply in these same contexts. For a contrasting usage, see n. 139, below.

---

60. One of the military commanders who had been in the service of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir in Baghdad; he then served as one of ʿUbaydallāh's commanders. See Ṭabarī, III, 1664–68.

61. Built by the Caliph al-Manṣūr, this prison is located by Le Strange in the southern part of the Round City at the intersection of roads leading to the al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah Gates. Le Strange, Baghdad, 27.

62. This prison, also built by al-Manṣūr, was located by the Syrian Gate of the Round City. Le Strange, Baghdad, 130.

63. Jisrayn. From the use of this expression and from an earlier context (see Ṭabarī, III, 1663–64), it is possible to suggest that there existed a double pontoon bridge in Baghdad, even before the one known to have been erected in the mid-eleventh century. See Lassner, Topography, 173–76, 281 n. 6; and note 72, below.

64. These districts formed part of a larger suburban area to the north and west of Baghdad, extending as far as the Euphrates river. See Le Strange, Lands, 51; Le Strange, Baghdad, 50–51; Lassner, Topography, index, q.vv. On the ṭassūj, see Bosworth, "Abū ʿAbdallāh," 140; F. Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation, in the Classic Period, 164–65.

mān's palace, Muḥammad administered to him three hundred brutal lashes and then imprisoned him at the Syrian Gate. It happened that the man was among al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl's inner circle. So [1728] when this [unrest] occurred, there was need of al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, because of his fortitude and courage. The troops placed in charge of guarding his palace were removed, and he came out. His own troops, after having been distributed among the contingents of other army commanders, a large number of them being attached to the commander Muḥammad b. Abī Awn,[65] returned to him without orders.

It was reported that, when those who had been thus assigned to Ibn Abī Awn arrived at [al-Ḥusayn's] palace, he dispensed among them from his own resources ten dirhams for each foot soldier and a dinar for each horseman. After they thus returned to al-Ḥusayn, Ibn Abī Awn lodged a complaint regarding that, but no appointment [returning the soldiers to him] or order regarding that was forthcoming.

The position remained the same, and the non-Arab soldiers and the Shākiriyyah clamored for the payment due to them upon the accession of the new caliph[66] and for the remainder of their advance allotments. Arrangements for the distribution of their pay and their receipt [of it] had now passed again into the hands of al-Ḥusayn, along the same lines as in the days of ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Al-Ḥusayn was continuously haranguing them about Muḥammad b. Abī Awn's behavior and that of those who had come with Sulaymān, how these were trying to get their hands on the troops' money and keep it from them, until their hearts were filled [with resentment].

On Friday the 13th of Ramaḍān (August 25, 869) a contingent of non-Arab troops and the Shākiriyyah assembled together with a crowd of the local populace. Under the cover of night they proceeded to the prison at the Syrian Gate, broke down its doors, and released most of the inmates, leaving behind only those criminals who were [1729] either too weak or sick or were loaded with fetters. Among those who managed to escape that night were a number belonging to the 65. He had formerly been one of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's commanders, and had been appointed by al-Muʿtazz in 252/866 to govern al-Baṣrah, Yamāmah, and al-Baḥrayn. See Ṭabarī, III, 1658.

66. Māl al-bayʿah. See EI.[2] s.v. "Māl al-bayʿa."

family of Musāwir b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd the Khārijite.[67] The man from Marv who had been maltreated by Muḥammad b. Aws was also set free. So too was a group of those to whom the central authorities had sent some fifty million[68] before being captured.[69]

When people went out on Friday morning, they found the prison gates opened. [The inmates] who could walk away did so; for those who were unable to walk riding animals were hired. They milled about without let or hindrance. This was one of the most significant events that caused both the privileged and the common people to lose any fear they had of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh. Finally, the doors of the prison at the Syrian Gate were sealed with bricks and clay. No indication was known of any action whatsoever taken that night on the part of Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq[70] or any of his associates. It was rumored among the people that the person suspected of planning the assault on the prison was someone acting on behalf of, and in order to release, the man from Marv whom Ibn Aws had badly beaten.

Scarcely five days had elapsed after these events when Ibn Aws quarreled with al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl over the matter of paying the reserve forces. Ibn Aws wanted the money for his own troops, but al-Ḥusayn would have none of it. Foul words were exchanged between them, and Muḥammad [Ibn Aws] departed livid with anger. The next [1730] morning he set out for Sulaymān's palace; al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl and al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, a mawlā of Ṭāhir,[71] did likewise. Among the

67. Musāwir was one of the dihqāns of al-Bawāzīj, a town in the eastern part of the Jazīrah area, on the bank of the Lesser Zāb river (see Le Strange, Lands, 91). Ṭabarī calls him a Khārijite (muḥakkim, meaning "one who asserts there is no judgment, ḥukm, but God's," a known Khārijite principle) where he notes the commencement of his rebellion in Rajab 253 (July 7–August 5, 876), III, 1688–94. Here, as in all later references, Ṭabarī refers to him as al-Shārī, literally, "seller," a Khārijite term meaning "one who sells his soul for the cause of God," echoing Qur'ān 2:203.

68. Khamsīn alf alf. The text does not mention to what the figure refers; indeed, the copyist may have inadvertently repeated the alf (thousand) and the figure intended may have been fifty thousand.

69. The translation of this last sentence is tentative; the entire passage is quite obscure.

70. This incident appears to have been the sequel to an earlier clash in Baghdad between the mob and the clients of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm, who sided with Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh against Muḥammad's brother ʿUbaydallāh in what was a petty interfamily squabble. See Ṭabarī, III, 1691–92.

71. Al-Shāh b. Mīkāl had been one of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir's loyal commanders in Baghdad. He had a brother Muḥammad who was a commander in the service of another member of the Ṭāhirid family and who was killed in 250/864–65.

crowd gathered in front of Sulaymān's residence some of Ibn Aws's troops were engaged in loud, heated discussion with the reserves. Then the troops of Ibn Aws and the newcomers [from Khurāsān] hastened across to the island,[72] followed by Ibn Aws himself and his sons. Men summoned one another to arms. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, and al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal[73] departed with their own troops, and the men called to the mob, "Join us, those who want to plunder!" It is said that during the day some hundred thousand of the populace crossed over the double bridge (al-jisrayn) of boats.[74] The non-Arab troops and the Shakiriyyah arrived at the island armed, followed by the vanguard of the populace. Suddenly a man from Sarakhs attacked the eldest son of Muḥammad b. Aws and stabbed him, knocking him from the shihrī horse he was riding. He received sword wounds while his supporters fled without raising a finger. Lying there injured, he was stripped clean and then dumped into a boat and carried across the river to the palace of Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir, where he was left.

Someone who was present with Sulaymān at the time reported that, when Sulaymān saw the wounded man, his eyes filled with tears. A bed was prepared for him, and he was attended by physicians. Ibn Aws left immediately for his residence in a palace belonging to the family of Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shīrzād.[75] This was situated in the quarter of al-Dūr,[76] adjacent to the palace of Jaʿfar b. Yaḥyā b. [1731]

See Ṭabarī, III, 1532. Al-Shāh b. Mīkāl appears again, charged with putting down an ʿAlid revolt in al-Kūfah, on p. 115, below.

72. The topography in this passage is obscure. There is a reference by Ṭabarī, III, 1616, to "an island opposite the palace of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh (b. Ṭāhir)," where a crowd of Banū Hāshim gathered demanding their stipends in 251/865–66. The island in the present passage could be the same, if Sulaymān occupied Muḥammad's palace after his brother's death or else had his own palace adjacent to it. The double bridge (al-jisrayn) mentioned in the passage, therefore, could be the one noted by Le Strange, Baghdad, 179, which was known as the Zandaward Bridge. If this identification is correct, then the bridge that, according to Le Strange, had been "temporarily" established by al-Amīn, was still in existence many years later. See also Lassner, Topography, 281, n. 6.

73. A former commander of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. See Ṭabarī, III, 1590, 1623.

74. See n. 72, above.

75. Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shīrzād had been secretary to the Turkish commander Waṣīf. See Ṭabarī, III, 1542.

76. The quarter lay along the road leading out of east Baghdad near the Shammāsiyyah Gate where a number of palaces (al-dūr) of the Barmak family were located. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 200.

Khālid b. Barmak.[77] The troops[78] of Baghdad searched everywhere for them, along with the military commanders, until at last they were found. Fighting broke out between the two sides in al-Dūr, which lasted from about two in the afternoon until seven in the evening. Each side fired arrows at the other, tossed spears, and attacked with their swords. Ibn Aws was supported by his neighbors from the Qaṭūṭā market[79] and boatmen from among the skiffs of al-Dūr. Fighting intensified until the Baghdādī troops sent for some naphtha throwers[80] from Sulaymān's palace; but, when his chamberlain informed him of this, he forbade their use. Ibn Aws himself fought tenaciously until he was overcome by wounds from arrows and spear thrusts, at which point he and his troops were defeated. He had managed to evacuate his family from the palace, but the troops followed them until they were expelled beyond the Shammāsiyyah Gate. Ibn Aws's residence was then ransacked of all its contents. It was reported that the value of its goods amounted to two million dirhams, or at least one million fifty thousand dirhams. The plunder included a hundred pantaloons lined with sable, beside those lined with camel or goat hair, which resembled the others. Furnishings of Ṭabaristān silk, together with brocade material and rich vestments to the value of a million dirhams, were also taken. The crowd then left, [1732] as the regular soldiers began to throng the palace of Sulaymān, bringing with them their booty and creating a great clamor. No one restrained or checked their passage.

Meanwhile, Ibn Aws remained that night in the Shammāsiyyah quarter with those of his troops who had stuck by him. The Baghdādī troops next took to attacking the dwellings where the riffraff[81] [from al-Rayy] were quartered. They plundered their dwellings and dealt harshly with any of the inhabitants who happened to linger be-

77. On the Barmakids, the famous family of viziers who dominated the political scene during the first decade of the rule of the Caliph Hārūn al-Rashīd (170–80/786–96), see EI,[2] s.v. "Barāmika"; and Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 127–81. When the family suddenly fell from favor, Ja'far, who had been Hārūn's closest companion, was murdered. See EI,[2] s.v. "Dja'far b. Yaḥyā."

78. Ahl Baghdād. Here and several times in the following lines the expression is used; it literally means "people" or "populace," and Ṭabarī could be using it deliberately in a somewhat pejorative sense.

79. See Lassner, Topography, 105.

80. Al-naffāṭīn. See Levy, Social Structure, 439.

81. Ṣa'ālīk. See n. 48, above.

hind. Having been suddenly forced to flee, not one of them appeared openly in Baghdad the following day.

It was reported that during the same evening Sulaymān sent clothing, furnishings, and food to Ibn Aws. There is, however, disagreement as to whether he accepted them or sent them back.

The next morning al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl and al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal went to the palace of al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, where they were joined by some of the leading Shākiriyyah, the reserves (al-nāʾibah), and others. They remained there, avoiding contact with Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Indeed, his palace was practically deserted; only a handful of persons were present. Sulaymān sent word to them with Muḥammad b. Naṣr b. Ḥamzah b. Mālik al-Khuzāʿī,[82] who was unaware of what agreement they had come to. This Muḥammad was to let them know that their behavior toward Muḥammad b. Aws was shameful and to instruct them in what was due him because of his honor and reputation. If they would apprise Muḥammad of what it was about Ibn Aws that they rejected, then progress could be made to rectify the situation in a manner satisfactory to them all.

At this the Shākiriyyah who were present in the palace of al-Shāh [1733] b. Mīkāl raised a great hue and cry. They said, "We refuse to accept any clientship[83] with Ibn Aws or with any of his men or with the riffraff who have been assigned to him." Moreover, if anyone were to attempt to force them to do so against their will, they would conclude their own agreement, forsaking Ibn Aws and repudiating anyone who demanded their compliance to him. Al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, al-Ḥusayn b. Ismāʿīl, and al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal reluctantly supported them. The messenger returned to Sulaymān with this information. Sulaymān sent him back on another matter and assured them that he was confident of their word and guarantee, without requiring oaths or formal pledges. Thereafter he retired in a dignified fashion.

Nevertheless, Sulaymān continued to regard Muḥammad b. Aws, the riffraff, and others of his crowd of hangers-on as an unwelcome nuisance. He was well aware of their covetousness and corrupt behavior and the fact that Muḥammad b. Aws prized himself so highly, in addition to his passion for meddling in anything that might insti-

---

82. He had been in the employ of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir. Ṭabarī, III, 1668.

83. Mujāwirah. See E. W. Lane, An Arabic-English Lexicon, s.v. "j-w-r."

gate dissension and division. Sulaymān's musing upon these concerns led him to exaggerate greatly their import, to the point where he confessed that in his prayers he had been driven to plead for respite from Muḥammad b. Aws. Finally, he turned to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ṭāhir[84] and ordered him to go to Muḥammad b. Aws and present him with the decision that he must return to Khurāsān. He was [1734] to inform him as well that there was no way for him to return to Madīnat al-Salām or to handle the affairs that he had been entrusted with on Sulaymān's behalf.

When the news reached Muḥammad b. Aws, he left al-Shammāsiyyah for Raqqat al-Baradān,[85] situated on the Tigris. For some days he remained there while he reassembled those of his troops who had become dispersed. From Raqqat al-Baradān he moved to al-Nahrawān,[86] where he established his camp and settled. He had written to Bāyakbāk[87] and Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, submitting his grievances to them at the way he had been treated. But he found no satisfaction from them.

Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (al-Kātib al-Khurāsānī) had stayed behind in Sāmarrā to carry out Sulaymān's orders. Muḥammad loathed Ibn Aws and completely avoided him, while Ibn Aws, for his part, was greatly disturbed by the hostile presence of the secretary Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā. So, when Ibn Aws and his troops were deprived of material support, they began to prey upon villagers and travelers, the attacks and plundering becoming more frequent until Ibn Aws settled in al-Nahrawān.

It was reported from someone whom Ibn Aws's troops had gone off to plunder and who had reminded them of the afterlife and tried to instill in them a fear of God that they had replied to him, "If plunder and murder are acceptable in Madīnat al-Salām, the shrine of Islam, and the renowned seat of the caliph, why should anyone disapprove of such things in the countryside and deserts?" After leaving the 84. Another of the Ṭāhirid clan, he was last mentioned by Ṭabarī, III, 1533, as unsuccessfully engaged in suppressing a Shīʿite revolt in al-Rayy in 250/864–65.

85. A town located to the north of Baghdad. Raqqah is the term for the swampy terrain beside a river that is subject to periodic inundation. See Le Strange, Lands, 59, 101.

86. This town was the first stage eastward out of Baghdad along the great Khurāsān Road.

87. Bāyakbāk had been one of the military chiefs and special bodyguard of the Turkish commander Bughā, from whom he later (in 254/868) became estranged. Ṭabarī, III, 1694–95.

marks of his rapacious behavior on the district, Ibn Aws departed from al-Nahrawān. He relieved the populace of money and food, which he had transported by boat from al-Nahrawān to Iskāf Banī Junayd[88] to sell there. [1735]

Muḥammad b. al-Muẓaffar b. Saysal was in al-Madā'in[89] at the time he heard of Ibn Aws's arrival in al-Nahrawān. Fearing for his own safety because of his father's presence and role in the battle [against Ibn Aws], Muḥammad made for his residence in al-Nu'māniyyah in the district of the Zābs.[90]

Muḥammad b. Naṣr b. Manṣūr b. Bassām, whose estate was in 'Abartā,[91] reported that his agent had fled the place after having given Ibn Aws, under duress and from fear of death, nearly fifteen hundred dinars. Ibn Aws remained in the district, coming and going, behaving in turns with closed fist and open hand, alternating severity with lenience. His campaign of intimidation lasted until he received a communication from Bāyakbāk granting him, on his behalf, control of the Khurāsān Road. The lapse of time between Ibn Aws's departure from Madīnat al-Salām and the arrival of this letter of appointment was two months and fifteen days.

One of the sons of 'Āṣim b. Yūnus al-'Ijlī reported that his father had been made steward of the estates belonging to al-Nūshurī[92] in the district of the Khurāsān Road. He wrote to al-Nūshurī, mentioning what he had been able to learn of the strength of Ibn Aws's forces and the apparent state of their matériel. He advised that this information should be passed on to Bāyakbāk, describing as well the absence along the Khurāsān Road of any of the central authority's forces to control it and protect the people. Moreover, the army [of Ibn Aws] was already encamped in the district with infantry, equipment, and supplies.

---

88. Also known simply as Iskāf, this location was east of Baghdad on the Nahrawān canal. See Le Strange, Lands, 59–60.

89. Located on the Tigris to the south of Baghdad, al-Madā'in had been known as Ctesiphon under the Sāsānian emperors. See Le Strange, Lands, 25, 32–35.

90. Situated on the western bank of the Tigris, al-Nu'māniyyah was about halfway between Baghdad and Wāsiṭ and thus farther to the south, away from the threat of Ibn Aws in al-Nahrawān. See Le Strange, Lands, 37.

91. See Le Strange, Lands, 59. The name means "crossing place" marked by a bridge of boats.

92. He was one of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf's commanders (see p. 71, below) and was also married to his sister (see p. 90, below).

[1736] Al-Nūshurī mentioned these matters to Bāyakbāk, advising him to appoint Ibn Aws over the Khurāsān Road, thus reducing the burden upon the central government. Bāyakbāk accepted this advice and ordered Ibn Aws to be contacted by letter regarding it. He was entrusted with the Khurāsān Road in Dhū al-Qaʿdah of the year 255 (October 11–November 9, 869).

Mūsā, the deputy of the Khārijite Musāwir b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, was stationed in al-Daskarah[93] and its environs with around three hundred men. Musāwir had placed him in charge of the area from Bāb Ḥulwān up to al-Sūs[94] on the Khurāsān Road and Baṭn Jūkhā,[95] together with the nearby administrative districts of the Sawād.

During the course of this year al-Muhtadī banished the male and female singers[96] from Sāmarrā. He exiled them to Baghdad after an order to this effect had been submitted from Qabīḥah. This was before misfortune had befallen her son. Al-Muhtadī had also ordered that the lions that were kept in the caliphal palace be killed, that the dogs be cast out, and that all frivolous entertainments cease. He reintroduced the court of appeals (maẓālim),[97] and he himself sat and heard the cases of the commoners. During his reign all the domains of Islam were beset by faction and fighting.

Mūsā b. Bughā,[98] his *mawlā*s, and troops of the central authorities set out from al-Rayy, while Mufliḥ[99] departed from Ṭabaristān after his arrival there. This Mufliḥ vanquished al-Ḥasan b. Zayd[100] and drove him from Ṭabaristān into the land of al-Daylam.

---

93. Also Daskarat al-Mālik; it was the next station after al-Nahrawān on the Khurāsān Road, northeast of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 62.

94. A stage on the road between Wāsiṭ and Ahwāz in the province of Khūzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 82.

95. Located in the district of Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 42.

96. For a contemporary description of this profession, to which the Caliph objected, see Jāḥiẓ, The Epistle on Singing Girls.

97. A form of justice of last resort, derived from the absolute authority of the sovereign and from his fundamental competence to deal with all litigation and to right all wrongs. See Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 640–49, for details of its functioning in this period. More generally, see Emile Tyan "Judicial Organization," 109–17.

98. The son of the famous Turkish army commander Bughā al-Sharābī. Mūsā was also the brother-in-law of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf. See Ṭabarī, III, 1694.

99. Mufliḥ was one of Mūsā b. Bughā's commanders. See Ṭabarī, III, 1687.

100. In the account of events at the beginning of this year, 255/868–69, Ṭabarī narrates Mufliḥ's defeat of the Shīʿah rebel al-Ḥasan b. Zayd in Ṭabaristān, thus driving him into an alliance with the Daylamites. Mufliḥ also destroyed al-Ḥasan's residences in Āmul and then set out against him in Daylam. See Ṭabarī, III, 1688.

An Account of Mūsā's Departure

It is reported that, when Qabīḥah, the mother of al-Mu'tazz, became aware of the Turks' unrest and was incensed by their behavior, she [1737] communicated with Mūsā b. Bughā, asking him to come and support her. She had hoped that he would arrive before events took the course they did, involving herself and her son, al-Mu'tazz. Mūsā resolved to set out to help her. Qabīḥah's letter had arrived while Mufliḥ was in Ṭabaristān, and Mūsā wrote to him ordering him to join him in al-Rayy.

One of our acquaintances from Ṭabaristān informed me that Mufliḥ had received Mūsā's letter when he had already set out for the region of al-Daylam to hunt down al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-Ṭālibī. When Mufliḥ received the letter, he returned to his point of departure, much to the distress of a group of notables from Ṭabaristān. They were fleeing from al-Ḥasan b. Zayd before Mufliḥ came to their aid. They thus expected Mufliḥ's arrival would settle the problem of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and enable them to return to their towns and homes. Mufliḥ had indeed promised to pursue al-Ḥasan b. Zayd wherever he was, until he either defeated him or was himself vanquished. According to the account I heard, Mufliḥ had boasted to them that, if he tossed his cap down anywhere in al-Daylam, none of Ibn Zayd's followers would have the courage to come near it. But when the notables of Ṭabaristān saw him returning from his expedition without any of al-Ḥasan's [captured] army, indeed not even a single Daylamite, they demanded to know the reason for his failure to fulfill his promise to pursue Ibn Zayd. According to what I was told, they went on speaking to him, while he seemed confused and perplexed and failed to answer their queries. When they persisted, Mufliḥ said, "I [1738] have received a despatch from the commander, Mūsā, insisting that his instructions be carried out and for me to join him at once. Although I am concerned to settle matters uppermost in your minds, there is no way of disobeying the commander."

Mūsā had not completed his preparations to leave al-Rayy for Sāmarrā when he received a despatch concerning the death of al-Mu'tazz and the establishment of al-Muhtadī as caliph. Because he could not now attain what he had hoped for from al-Mu'tazz, Mūsā's resolve to leave for Sāmarrā was dampened. When he received the news that al-Muhtadī had been rendered the oath of allegiance, his own troops at first prevented him from submitting his. Eventually they conceded, and their [own] oath of allegiance arrived in Sāmarrā on the 13th of Ramaḍān of this year (August 25, 869).

Later, the mawlās in Mūsā's army learned of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf's extraction of money from the secretaries and supporters of al-Mu'tazz and al-Mutawakkil. They begrudged the enjoyment of this money by the troops stationed in Sāmarrā, and they urged Mūsā to depart with them for the city. Mufliḥ then joined Mūsā at al-Rayy, having left Ṭabaristān to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

Al-Qāshānī reported that his cousin wrote to him from al-Rayy, mentioning that he had met Mufliḥ there and had enquired of him his reasons for departing from al-Daylam. Mufliḥ said that the mawlās had refused to stay and that, when they left, he was unable to manage without them.

On Sunday, at the time of the new moon in Ramaḍān 255 (August 13 – September 11, 869), Mūsā demanded the collection of the tax (kharāj)[101] for the year 256 (December 9, 869 – November 29, 870). According to reports, he raised that day five hundred thousand dirhams.

[1739] The inhabitants of al-Rayy assembled and said to him: "May God honor the commander! You claim that the mawlās wish to return to Sāmarrā because they have the prospect of greater pay there, while you and your troops here are better off than the troops there. If you desire to [continue] manning this frontier post[102] and expect your reward to come from its people, and impose on us as taxes on our private property whatever you think we can bear from which to pay your followers, then you should do so." But Mūsā did not comply with their requests. However, they persisted; "May God guide the commander. If he has decided to leave us, what is the sense of extracting the taxes (kharāj) for an agricultural year in which we have not even begun cultivation? Moreover the bulk of the crop of this current year upon which the commander has levied taxes is situated in open areas (ṣaḥārā), to which we would not have access after he had departed from us." But Mūsā paid no attention to any of their arguments or requests.

---

101. See EI,[2] s.v. "Kharādj," for details on the perception of this tax and the method of collecting it; cf. Levy, Social Structure, 309–16.

102. This is, at al-Rayy.

Now, when al-Muhtadī received word of Mūsā's [imminent] departure, he sent several letters to him which made no impression. When he heard that Mūsā was actually on his way from al-Rayy, without al-Muhtadī's despatches having had any effect, the caliph sent two men of the Banū Hāshim[103] bearing a message for Mūsā and for those mawlās attached to his army. They were to state frankly to the arrivals the true situation in the capital, the lack of resources there, and the general apprehension that what they left behind would be lost and that Ṭālibīs[104] would take control of it and their influence spread to the territory of al-Jabal.[105] One of these Hāshimites was called ʿAbd al-Ṣamad b. Mūsā, and the second was Abū ʿĪsā Yaḥyā b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās. The two men, with a number of mawlas, set out to fulfill their commission, as Mūsā and those accompanying him approached. Meanwhile Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf made much of Mūsā's departure with al-Muhtadī, attempting to ascribe to him dissent and rebellion. Indeed, he imputed far worse than this to him and declared before God his own innocence of anything Mūsā did. [1740]

A despatch from the master of the post [ṣāḥib al-barīd][106] in Hamadhān concerning Mūsā's departure from there reportedly reached al-Muhtadī. Al-Muhtadī raised his hands to the sky and, after expressing his thanks to God and extolling Him, he exclaimed, "O God! Before You I am free of any guilt for the actions of Mūsā b. Bughā and his neglect of the defense of the frontier and his leaving it open to the enemy. I am absolved of any bonds between us. O God! Remove the artifice of [this] deceiver of Muslims. O God! Make the armies of Muslims victorious wherever they may be. O God! Wherever Muslims are afflicted, I shall freely venture forth with a firm resolve and give them support and defend them. O God! Reward my

---

103. The Banū Hāshim were kinsmen of the Prophet Muḥammad by common descent from Hāshim, his great-grandfather. During the ʿAbbāsid period they enjoyed certain privileges, such as pensions paid by the state, exemption from payment of the alms tax, and having a special magistrate appointed by the caliph to attend their affairs. See EI.[2] s.v. "Hāshimids."

104. That is, the Shīʿite rebels led by al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

105. Literally, "the mountains," referring to the mountainous region stretching from the Mesopotamian plain on the west to the large desert region of Persia on the east. See Le Strange, Lands, 185.

106. The master of the post also fulfilled the function of intelligence officer, gathering, and sending information to his superiors. See EI.[2] s.v. "Barīd."

intention since I am deprived of effective supporters." He then broke into tears, weeping.

Someone who was present at al-Muhtadī's assemblies reported what he had said on this particular occasion. Sulaymān b. Wahb[107] was also present and he asked, "Is the Commander of the Faithful [1741] ordering me to write to Mūsā what I have heard?" Al-Muhtadī replied that this was so, saying, "If you could engrave my words in stone, then [I would tell you to] do so!"

The two Hāshimite messengers met with Mūsā on the road [to Sāmarrā], but without achieving anything. The mawlas began to clamor and nearly set upon the envoys. Mūsā replied to the caliph's comminiqué, presenting as his excuse that his troops would fail to pay any attention to what he said to them before reaching the Commander of the Faithful's court. Were he to try to go against them, he would not feel safe from them, and he adduced in his defense what the envoys themselves had witnessed. The messengers arrived with the reply, Mūsā having sent with them a delegation from his army. They reached Sāmarrā on the 4th of al-Muḥarram, 256 (December 12, 869).

In this same year Kanjūr[108] left ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Quraysh.[109] In the days of al-Muʿtazz he had been banished to Fārs, where ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn was placed in charge of him and imprisoned him. After ʿAlī had decided to wage war against Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth,[110] he released Kanjūr from prison and gave him command of cavalry and infantry. When ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn's supporters were defeated, Kanjūr escaped

---

107. Sulaymān, one of a number of "Nestorian scribes" in the administration, was descended from a Christian family in Wāsiṭ. Formerly secretary to the military commander Mūsā b. Bughā, he was briefly vizier under al-Muhtadī and again for brief intervals during 263–65/877–79 under al-Muʿtamid. See Sourdel, Vizirat I, 300–303, 310–13; EI,[1] s.v. "Sulaymān b. Wahb."

108. Kanjūr was the chamberlain (ḥājib) of al-Muʿtazz's brother Ibrāhīm al-Muʾayyad at the time the Caliph imprisoned the two of them in the Jawsaq palace in 252/866. Later Kanjūr was sent in chains to Baghdad and was finally imprisoned in al-Yamāmah. See Ṭabarī, III, 1668–69.

109. The battle in which ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn, another contemporary Shīʿite rebel, was defeated occurred near Shīrāz, and he was taken prisoner by Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth. See Ṭabarī, III, 1702–3.

110. Born in Sistān, Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth was a coppersmith (al-ṣaffār) by trade, but his military ambitions took him from membership in a band of marauders to control of Sistān province in 247/861. His influence spread into eastern Afghanistān before he turned against the caliphal authorities in Iraq and the Ṭāhirids in Khurasan. See Bosworth, "Ṭāhirids," 109–17; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, al-Kāmil fī al-taʾrīkh, VII, 191–94.

to the district of al-Ahwāz, where he made a considerable impact on Rāmhurmuz. He then joined Ibn Abī Dulaf[111] in Hamadhān, but he treated Waṣīf's[112] dependents badly, as well as his estates and agents in the district. Next he joined the army of Mūsā (b. Bughā). When Mūsā approached Sāmarrā with the troops who had joined him, word of this reached Ṣāliḥ. On the authority of al-Muhtadī he sent instructions that Kanjūr be brought to the caliph's palace bound in chains, but the mawlās refused to do this. [1742]

Communiqués on this matter continued to go back and forth until Mūsā's army reached and encamped in al-Qāṭūl.[113] It soon became apparent that Ṣāliḥ was nursing a deep dislike of Mūsā and that Mūsā had set out for Sāmarrā determined to avoid Ṣāliḥ and those who sympathized with him. Mūsā stayed in al-Qāṭūl for two days, during which time Bāyakbāk joined his forces. Al-Muhtadī sent his brother on his mother's side, Ibrāhīm, to tell Mūsā that the mawlās in Sāmarrā had unanimously refused to allow Kanjūr to enter the city. The Caliph ordered Mūsā to place him in chains and take him to Madīnat al-Salām, but things did not turn out as Ṣāliḥ had anticipated. Mūsā's reply was that, when they entered Sāmarrā, they would obey whatever the Commander of the Faithful ordered regarding Kanjūr or anyone else.

The First ʿAlawite Rebellion in al-Baṣrah[114]

In the middle of Shawwāl of the year 255 (September 10–October 8, 869) a man who claimed to be ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib[115] appeared in Furāt al-Baṣrah.[116] He assembled his forces from among the Zanj,[117]

111. See Ṭabarī, III, 1605.

112. The Turkish commander, killed in 253/867; he was the father of Ṣāliḥ. See Ṭabarī, III, 1687.

113. In the vicinity of Sāmarrā. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam al-buldān, III, 174; Yaʿqūbī, Kitāb al-buldān, 256.

114. See Popovic, Révolte, 83–93; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 205–14.

115. See Popovic, Révolte, 71–81; EI,[2] s.v. "ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Zandjī." See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 31–33.

116. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 861–62; EI,[2] s.v. "al-Furāt."

117. The word is not Arabic, and, although its plural is zunūj, the expression is used here in its collective sense to refer to a class of people. See Popovic, Révolte, 54–56, for a discussion of the origin of the word. The generally accepted view of the origin of the Zanj is that they were blacks imported from East Africa at a time that who labored in removing the nitrous topsoil (sibākh)[118] of the marshland districts. Thereafter he crossed over the Tigris river and established himself in al-Dīnārī.[119]

An Account of [ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm's] Expedition and What Determined Him to Revolt There

According to reports, his name and his origin were ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm,[120] and he was descended from the ʿAbd al-Qays. His mother's name was Qurrah, a daughter of ʿAlī b. Raḥīb b.
[1743] Muḥammad b. Ḥakīm of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah, who were inhabitants of a village in the vicinity of al-Rayy called Warzanīn, where ʿAlī was born and grew up.

ʿAlī himself was reported to have said: "My ancestor Muḥammad b. Ḥakīm of al-Kūfah was one of those who took part in a rebellion against [the Caliph] Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Mālik with Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn.[121] But, when Zayd was slain, Muḥammad fled to al-Rayy, and finding refuge in Warzanīn, he remained there." ʿAlī's paternal grandfather, ʿAbd al-Raḥīm, who was of the ʿAbd al-Qays, was born in al-Ṭāliqān.[122] He went to Iraq and took up residence there and bought himself a concubine from Sind. She gave birth in Iraq to a son, Muḥammad, who was the father of our ʿAlī.[123] cannot be determined. See Popovic, Révolte, 56–62; C. Pellat, Le Milieu baṣrien et la formation de Ǧāḥiẓ, 41.

---

118. See EI,[1] s.v. "Zandj"; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-b-kh.

119. The name of one of the canals in the environs of al-Baṣrah where the Zanj gathered to launch their first major attack on the city. See Popovic, Révolte, 90.

120. See Popovic, Révolte, 71–73, 187–90, for a discussion of his name[s] and genealogy.

121. The ʿAlid Zayd, known as Abū al-Ḥasan, led a revolt against the Umayyad Caliph Hishām in 112/730–31, and he was killed in the same year.

122. Ṭāliqān (or Ṭālaqān) was reputed to be one of the foremost towns of Upper Ṭukhāristān a district east of Balkh stretching along the southern side of the Oxus river. See Le Strange, Lands, 423.

123. There is another account of ʿAlī's origins that differs in many details from that of Ṭabarī's. In al-Wāfī bi-al-Wafayāt, al-Ṣafadī (d. 764/1363) recounts a tale told by ʿAlī's mother, Qurrah. While on pilgrimage to Mecca, her father would spend time in Medina with the family of a shaykh descended from ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, the Prophet Muḥammad's cousin and son-in-law. The shaykh had a son called Muḥammad, who, after the death of his immediate family, was taken to Warzanīn by Qurrah's father. Qurrah and Muḥammad later married, and she bore him two daughters and a son,

[Earlier in Sāmarrā] ʿAlī was associated with a group attached to the family of the Caliph al-Muntaṣir, among them Ghānim al-Shiṭranjī (the Chessplayer), Saʿīd the Younger, and Yusr the Eunuch.[124] ʿAlī dervied his livelihood from them and from some of the Caliph's entourage and secretaries, seeking their favor by praising them in poetry.[125]

In the year 249/863–64, he reportedly left Sāmarrā for al-Baḥrayn. There he claimed that his genealogy was as follows: ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl b. Ḥasan b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.[126] At Hajar he summoned people to obey him, and a large number did so. However, others refused to do so. As a result, violent partisanship between them led to a number in each camp being killed. In the wake of these events ʿAlī left Hajar and moved to al-Aḥsāʾ.[127] There he took refuge with a section of the Banū Tamīm, a branch of the Banū Saʿd[128] called the Banū al-Shammās, among whom [1744]
he made his residence. The people of Baḥrayn had regarded him as a prophet, so much so indeed that, according to report, taxes were collected in his name. He exercised judicial authority over them, and on his behalf they fought against the supporters of the central authorities. A substantial number, on the other hand, were afraid and, becoming embittered against him, caused him to withdraw into the desert. Even then, many in Baḥrayn joined him. Among them was a man from al-Aḥsāʾ, a grain weigher (kayyāl) called Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Azraq, but known simply as al-Baḥrānī, who was a mawlā of the Banū Dārim.[129] Another was Yaḥyā b. Abī Thaʿlab, a merchant from Hajar. There was also a black mawlā[130] of the Banū ʿAlī. See MS. British Museum Or. 6587, ff. 140b–43b. The passage is translated in Popovic, Révolte, 73. See also Popovic's article, "Quelques renseignements inédits concernant le maître de Zanj, ʿAlī b. Muḥammad," Arabica, XII/2, 1965, 175–87.

124. These three figures remain unidentified.

125. Popovic notes in Révolte, 74, that a later source, Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd (d. 655/1257), in Sharḥ nahj al-balāghah, adds that ʿAlī also earned his living teaching children the arts of writing, grammar, and astronomy.

126. See reference n. 123, above.

127. See EI,[2] s.v. "al-Ḥasa."

128. The Tamimite tribe of Saʿd resided in the Baḥraynī villages of al-Ẓahrān and Laḥsā, according to al-Masʿūdī, Kitāb al-tanbīh wa-al-ishrāf, 396–97.

129. These were descendants of Dārim b. Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah, a segment of the Banū Tamim.

130. Mawlā aswad. See n. 4, above.

Ḥanẓalah named Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ. This latter was a commander of ʿAlī's army. Thus ʿAlī moved about in the desert, from one tribe to another.

It was reported that ʿAlī used to say: "In the course of this period I received signs of my leadership as imām, which were manifest to the people." According to his own account, among such signs was this one: "I received sūrahs of the Qur'ān, which I had not learned by heart, and yet I was able to recite them in a flash. They included Subḥān, al-Kahf, and Ṣād."[131] He continued: "A further example was the time I was lying down, musing about the place I should be heading for to set up residence. The thought of the desert and its recalcitrant inhabitants dejected me, but then a cloud cast a shadow upon me; thunder crackled and lightning flashed. A thunderclap resounded in my ears, and a voice addressed me saying, 'Head for al-[1745] Baṣrah.' I said to my companions who were assisting me, 'A voice from the thunder has commanded me to go to al-Baṣrah.'"

According to report, when ʿAlī had gone into the desert he caused people to believe that he was Abū al-Ḥusayn Yaḥyā b. ʿUmar, who had been slain in the neighborhood of al-Kūfah.[132] There he deceived some of them, and, as a consequence, a great many joined his ranks. He then made his way with them toward a place in al-Baḥrayn called al-Radm.[133] A major battle broke out among them, which swung against ʿAlī and his troops, and many were swiftly killed. The Arab tribesmen abandoned him in disgust and renounced any association with him. Once the tribesmen had left, ʿAlī found the desert wearisome, and he next set out for al-Baṣrah and settled among the Banū Ḍubayʿah. A group of them joined him there, among them ʿAlī b. Abān, known by the epithet of al-Muhallabī; included, too, were his brothers Muḥammad and al-Khalīl and others. ʿAlī arrived in al-Baṣrah in the year 254/868 at the time when Muḥammad b. Rajā' al-Ḥiḍārī was the Caliph's governor there. His arrival also coincided with the civil disturbances between the two rival Baṣran factions of al-Saʿdiyyah and al-Bilāliyyah.[134] ʿAlī's ambition was to secure the 131. Sūrahs 18, 38, and 17(?), respectively.

132. This apparently occurred during the reign of the Caliph al-Mustaʿīn. See Popovic, Révolte, 75.

133. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 774.

134. Precise identification of these two factions, who appear at a number of points in the story of the Zanj operations in al-Baṣrah, has proven elusive.

